The morning star of song who made,

His music heard below,

Don Chaucer, the first warbler, whose sweet breath,

Preluded those melodious bursts that fill,

The spacious times of Great Elizabeth,

With sounds that echo still

ختم نبوت ﷺ زندہ باد
عظمت صحابہ زندہ باد

السلام علیکم ورحمۃ اللہ وبرکاتہ:

معزز ممبران: آپ کا وٹس ایپ گروپ ایڈمن "اردو بکس" آپ سے مخاطب ہے۔

آپ تمام ممبران سے گزارش ہے کہ:

- گروپ میں صرف PDF کتب پوسٹ کی جاتی ہیں لہذا کتب کے متعلق اپنے کمنٹس / ریویوز ضرور دیں۔ گروپ میں بغیر ایڈمن کی اجازت کے کسی بھی قسم کی (اسلامی و غیر اسلامی، اخلاقی، تحریری) پوسٹ کرنا سختی سے منع ہے۔
- گروپ میں معزز، پڑھے لکھے، سلجھے ہوئے ممبرز موجود ہیں اخلاقیات کی پابندی کریں اور گروپ رولز کو فالو کریں بصورت دیگر معزز ممبرز کی بہتری کی خاطر ریموو کر دیا جائے گا۔
- کوئی بھی ممبر کسی بھی ممبر کو انباکس میں میسیج، مس کال، کال نہیں کرے گا۔ رپورٹ پر فوری ریموو کر کے کاروائی عمل میں لائے جائے گی۔
- ہمارے کسی بھی گروپ میں سیاسی و فرقہ واریت کی بحث کی قطعاً کوئی گنجائش نہیں ہے۔
- اگر کسی کو بھی گروپ کے متعلق کسی قسم کی شکایت یا تجویز کی صورت میں ایڈمن سے رابطہ کیجئے۔
- سب سے اہم بات:

گروپ میں کسی بھی قادیانی، مرزائی، احمدی، گستاخِ رسول، گستاخِ امہات المؤمنین، گستاخِ صحابہ و خلفائے راشدین حضرت ابو بکر صدیق، حضرت عمر فاروق، حضرت عثمان غنی، حضرت علی المرتضیٰ، حضرت حسنین کریمین رضوان اللہ تعالیٰ اجمعین، گستاخ اہلبیت یا ایسے غیر مسلم جو اسلام اور پاکستان کے خلاف پراپیگنڈا میں مصروف ہیں یا ان کے روحانی و ذہنی سپورٹرز کے لئے کوئی گنجائش نہیں ہے لہذا ایسے اشخاص بالکل بھی گروپ جوائن کرنے کی زحمت نہ کریں۔ معلوم ہونے پر فوراً ریموو کر دیا جائے گا۔

- تمام کتب انٹرنیٹ سے تلاش / ڈاؤنلوڈ کر کے فری آف کاسٹ وٹس ایپ گروپ میں شیئر کی جاتی ہیں۔ جو کتاب نہیں ملتی اس کے لئے معذرت کر لی جاتی ہے۔ جس میں محنت بھی صَرف ہوتی ہے لیکن ہمیں آپ سے صرف دعاؤں کی درخواست ہے۔
- عمران سیریز کے شوقین کیلئے علیحدہ سے عمران سیریز گروپ موجود ہے۔
- لیڈیز کے لئے الگ گروپ کی سہولت موجود ہے جس کے لئے ویریفکیشن ضروری ہے۔
- اردو کتب / عمران سیریز یا سٹڈی گروپ میں ایڈ ہونے کے لئے ایڈمن سے وٹس ایپ پر بذریعہ میسیج رابطہ کریں اور جواب کا انتظار فرمائیں۔ برائے مہربانی اخلاقیات کا خیال رکھتے ہوئے موبائل پر کال یا ایم ایس کرنے کی کوشش ہرگز نہ کریں۔ ورنہ گروپس سے تو ریموو کیا ہی جائے گا بلاک بھی کیا جائے گا۔

نوٹ: ہمارے کسی گروپ کی کوئی فیس نہیں ہے۔ سب فی سبیل اللہ ہے

0306-7163117	0343-7008883	0333-8033313
محمد سلمان سلیم	پاکستان زندہ باد	راؤ ایاز

پاکستان زندہ باد
پاکستان پائندہ باد

اللہ تبارک تعالیٰ ہم سب کا حامی و ناصر ہو

Geoffrey Chaucer, 1340-1400

Before William Shakespeare, Geoffrey Chaucer was the pre-eminent English poet, and he remains in the top tier of the English canon. He was also the most significant poet to write in Middle English. Chaucer was born in the early 1340s to a fairly rich, well-to-do, though not aristocratic family. His father, John Chaucer, was a vintner and deputy to the king's butler. His family's financial success came from work in the wine and leather businesses, and they had considerable inherited property in London. Little information exists about Chaucer's education, but his writings demonstrate a close familiarity with a number of important books of his contemporaries and of earlier times (such as Boethius's The Consolation of Philosophy). Chaucer likely was fluent in several languages, including French, Italian, and Latin. Sons of wealthy London merchants could receive good educations at this time, and there is reason to believe that, if Chaucer did not attend one of the schools on Thames Street near his boyhood home, then he was at least well-educated at home. Certainly his work showcases a passion for reading a huge range of literature, classical and modern.

Chaucer first appears in public records in 1357 as a member of the house of Elizabeth, Countess of Ulster. This was a conventional arrangement in which sons of middle-class households were placed in royal service so that they could obtain a courtly education. Two years later, Chaucer served in the army under Edward III and was captured during an unsuccessful offensive at Reims, although he was later ransomed. Chaucer served under a number of diplomatic missions.

By 1366 Chaucer had married Philippa Pan who had been in service with the Countess of Ulster. Chaucer married well for his position, for Philippa Chaucer received pension from the queen consort of Edward III. Philippa's sister Katherine de Roet was John of Gaunt's mistress for twenty years before becoming the Duke's wife. Through this connection, John of Gaunt was Chaucer's “kinsman.” Chaucer himself secured an annuity as yeoman of the king and was listed as one of the king's esquires.

Chaucer's first published work was The Book of the Duchess, a poem of over 1,300 lines, supposed to be an elegy for Blanche, Duchess of Lancaster, addressed to her widower, the Duke. For this first of his important poems, which was published in 1370, Chaucer used the dream-vision form, a genre made popular by the highly influential 13th-century French poem of courtly love, the Roman de la Rose, which Chaucer translated into English. Throughout the following decade, Chaucer continued with his diplomatic career, traveling to Italy for negotiations to open a Genoa port to Britain as well as military negotiations with Milan. During his missions to Italy, Chaucer encountered the work of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio, which were later to have profound influence upon his own writing. In 1374 Chaucer was appointed comptroller of the customs and subsidy of wool, skins, and tanned hides for the Port of London, his first position away from the British court. Chaucer's only major work during this period was House of Fame, a poem of around 2,000 lines in dream-vision form, which ends so abruptly that some scholars consider it unfinished.

In October 1385, Chaucer was appointed a justice of the peace for Kent, and in August 1386 he became knight of the shire for Kent. Around the time of his wife's death in 1387, Chaucer moved to Greenwich and later to Kent. Changing political circumstances eventually led to Chaucer falling out of favor with the royal court and leaving Parliament, but when Richard II became King of England, Chaucer regained royal favor.

During this period Chaucer used writing primarily as an escape from public life. His works included Parlement of Foules, a poem of 699 lines. This work is a dream-vision for St. Valentine's Day that makes use of the myth that each year on that day the birds gather before the goddess Nature to choose their mates. This work was heavily influenced by Boccaccio and Dante.

Chaucer's next work was Troilus and Criseyde, which was influenced by The Consolation of Philosophy, which Chaucer himself translated into English. Chaucer took some the plot of Troilus from Boccaccio's Filostrato. This 8,000-line rime-royal poem recounts the love story of Troilus, son of the Trojan king Priam, and Criseyde, widowed daughter of the deserter priest Calkas, against the background of the Trojan War. (Compare Shakespeare's version in Troilus and Cressida.)

The Canterbury Tales secured Chaucer's literary reputation. It is his great literary accomplishment, a compendium of stories by pilgrims traveling to the shrine of Thomas a Becket in Canterbury. Chaucer introduces each of these pilgrims in vivid, brief sketches in the General Prologue and intersperses the twenty-four tales with short dramatic scenes with lively exchanges. Chaucer did not complete the full plan for the tales, and surviving manuscripts leave some doubt as to the exact order of the tales that remain. However, the work is sufficiently complete to be considered a unified book rather than a collection of unfinished fragments. The Canterbury Tales is a lively mix of a variety of genres told by travelers from all aspects of society. Among the genres included are courtly romance, fabliaux, saint's biography, allegorical tale, beast fable, and medieval sermon.

Information concerning Chaucer's descendants is not fully clear. It is likely that he and Philippa had two sons and two daughters. Thomas Chaucer died in 1400; he was a large landowner and political officeholder, and his daughter, Alice, became Duchess of Suffolk. Little is known about Lewis Chaucer, Geoffrey Chaucer's youngest son. Of Chaucer's two daughters, Elizabeth became a nun, while Agnes was a lady-in-waiting for the coronation of Henry IV in 1399. Public records indicate that Chaucer had no descendants living after the fifteenth century.

The Age of Chaucer (1340-1400)

Introduction: - For a profound and comprehensive study of an author's literary work is required, among other things, a thorough understanding of the age which produced and nurtured him. Without acquaintance with the historical context our evaluation and apprehension of literature is bound to be lop-sided, if not altogether warped and garbled. Every man is a child of his age. He is influenced by it though, if he is a great man, he may influence it also. A great writer like Shakespeare or Chaucer is generally said to be "not of an age, but of all ages." But, in spite of his universal appeal, the fact remains that even he could not have escaped "the spirit of the age” in which he lived and moved and had his being.

So, for understanding him and his works in their fullness it is imperative to familiarize ourselves with the influential currents of thought and feeling and sensibility (not to speak of the socio-politico-economic conditions) obtaining in the times in which he flourished. Probably the reverse of it is also true: we may acquire some understanding of these tendencies and currents, the ethos of the age, through the writer himself. Emphasizing this point, W. H. Hudson says: "Every man belongs to his race and age; no matter how marked his personality, the spirit of his race and age finds expression through him" The same critic expresses the relationship between history and literature. He says, "Ordinary English history is our nation's biography, its literature is its autobiography; in the one we read the story of its actions and practical achievements; in the other the story of its intellectual and moral development." Though Chaucer transcends the limits of his generation and creates something which is of interest to the future generation too, yet he represents much of what his age stands for. And therein lies his greatness.

Chaucer's Age-Both Medieval and Modern: - Chaucer's age-like most historical ages-was an age of transition. This transition implies a shift from the medieval to the modern times, the emergence of the English nation from the "dark ages" to the age of enlightenment. Though some elements associated with modernity were coming into prominence, yet mostly and essentially the age was medieval-unscientific, superstitious, chivalrous, religious-minded, and "backward" in most respects. The fourteenth century, as J. M. Manly puts it in The Cambridge History of English Literature, was "a dark epoch in the history of England". However, the silver lining of modernity did succeed in piercing, here and there, the thick darkness of ignorance and superstition. In fact, the age of Chaucer was not stagnant (stationary): it was inching its way steadily and surely to the dawn of the Renaissance and the Reformation, which were yet a couple of centuries ahead. Robert Dudely French observes: "It was an age of restlessness, amid the ferment (excitement) of new life that Chaucer lived and wrote. Old things and new appear side by side upon his pages, and in his poetry we can study the essential spirit, both of the age that was passing and of the age that was to come." What are these "old things and new:' and what made the age restless? The answer will be provided if we discuss the chief events and features of the age.

"The Hundred Years' War": - The period between 1337 and 1453 is marked by a long succession of skirmishes between France and England, which are collectively known as the "Hundred Years War". Under the able and warlike guidance of King Edward III (1327-1377) England won a number of glorious victories, particularly at Crecy, Poietiers, and Agincourt. The French might beaten and Edward was once acknowledged even the king of France. But later, after his demise and with the succession of the incompetent Richard II, the English might waned and the French were able to secure tangible gains. The war influenced the English character in the following two ways: the fostering of nationalistic sentiment; and the demolition of some social barriers between different classes of society.

It was obviously natural for the conflict to have engendered among the English a strong feeling of national solidarity and patriotic fervour. But, as Compton-Rickett reminds us, "the fight is memorable not merely for stimulating the pride of English men." It is important, too, for the second reason given above. It was not the aristocracy alone which secured the victory for England. The aristocracy was vitally supported by the lowly archers whose feats with the bow were a force to reckon with. Froissart, the French chronicler, referring to the English archers says: "They, let fly their arrows so wholly together and so thick that it seemed snow". The recognition of the services of the humble archers brought in a note of democratisation in the country, and the age-old "iron curtain" between the nobility and the proletariat developed a few chinks. This was an advance from medievalism to modernism.

The Age of Chivalry: - Nevertheless, the dawn of the modern era was yet far away. Compton-Rickett observes: "Chaucer's England is 'Still characteristically medieval, and nowhere is the conservative feeling more strongly marked than in the persistence of chivalry. This strange amalgam of love, war, and religion so far from exhibiting any signs of decay, reached perhaps its fullest development at this time. More than two centuries were to elapse before it was finally killed-by the satirical pen of Cervantes." The Knight in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales is typical of his kind. Even the tale he narrates concerns the adventures of two true knights-Arcite and Palamon.

The Black Death, Peasants' Revolt, and Labour Unrest: - In the age of Chaucer most people were victims of poverty, uncleanliness, and filth (epidemic). Even well-educated nobles eyed soap with suspicion, and learned physicians often forbade bathing as harmful for health. That is why England was often visited by epidemics, especially plague. The severest attack of this dread epidemic came in 1348. It was called "the Black Death" because black, knotty boils appeared on the bodies of the hopeless victims. It is estimated that about a million human beings were swept away by this epidemic. That roughly makes one-third of the total population of England at that time.

One immediate consequence of this pestilence was the acute shortage of working hands. The socio-economic system of England lay hopelessly paralysed. Labourers and villains who happened to survive started demanding much higher wages. But neither their employers nor the king nor Parliament was ready to meet these demands. A number of severe regulations were passed asking workers to work at the old rates of payment. This occasioned a great deal of resentment which culminated in the Peasants' Revolt in 1381 during the reign of Richard II. The peasants groaning under the weight of injustice and undue official severity were led to London by the Kentish priest John Ball. He preached the dignity of labour and asked the nobles:

When Adam delved and Eve span
Who was then the gentleman?

The king, overawed (pressurized) by the mass of peasantry armed with such weapons as hatchets, spades, and pitchforks, promised reform but later shelved his promise. The "Peasants' Revolt" is, according to Compton-Rickett, "a dim foreshadowing of those industrial troubles that lay in the distant future." Chaucer in his Nun's Priest's Tale refers to Jack Straw who with Wat Tylar raised the banner of revolt.

R. K. Root thus sums up the significance of this uprising: "This revolt, suppressed by the courage and good judgment of the boy King, Richard II, though barren of any direct and immediate result, exerted a lasting influence on the temper of the lower classes, fostering in them a spirit of independence which made them no longer a negligible quantity in the life of the nation". This was another line of progress towards modernism.

The Church: - In the age of Chaucer, the Church became a hotbed of profligacy, corruption, and materialism. The overlord of the Church, namely, the Pope of Rome, himself had ambitions and aptitudes other than spiritual. W. H. Hudson maintains in this connection: "Of spiritual zeal and energy very little was now left in the country. The greater prelates heaped up wealth, and lived in a godless and worldly way; the rank and file of the clergy were ignorant and careless; the mendicant friars were notorious for their greed and profligacy." John Gower, a contemporary of Chaucer, whom he calls "moral Gower" (on account of his didactic tendency) thus pictures the condition of the Church in his Prologue to Confessio Amantis:

Lo, thus ye-broke is cristes Folde:
Whereof the flock without guide
Devoured is on every side,
In lacks of hem that been urrware
In chepherdes, which her wit beware
Upon the world in other halve.

Another contemporary has to say this about the priests "Our priests are now become blind, dark and beclouded. There is neither shaven crown on their head, nor modesty in their words, nor temperance in their food, nor even chastity in their deeds." If this was the condition of the ecclesiasts, we can easily imagine that of the laity. Well does Chaucer say in the Prologue to The Canterbury Tales: "If gold rust, what iron shall do?" Chaucer himself was indifferent to any reform, but his character-sketches of the ecclesiastical figures in The Canterbury Tales leave no uncertainty regarding the corruption which had crept into the ecclesiastical rank and file. The round-bellied epicurean monk, the merry and devil-may-care friar, and the unscrupulous pardoner are fairly typical of his age.

This widespread and deep-rooted corruption had already begun to provoke the attention of some reformists the most prominent of whom was John Wyclif (13207-84) who has been called "the morning star of the Reformation." He started what is called the Lollards's Movement. His aim was to eradicate the evil and corruption which had become a part and parcel of the Church. He sent his "poor priests" to all parts of the country for spreading his message of simplicity, purity, and austerity. His self-appointed task was to take Christianity back to its original purity and spirituality. He exhorted people not to have anything to do with the corrupt ministers of the Pope and to have faith only in the Word of God as enshrined in the Bible, To make the teaching of the Bible accessible to the common masses he with the help of some of his disciples translated the Bible from Latin into the native tongue. He also wrote a number of tracts embodying his teaching. His translation of the Bible was, in the words of W. H. Hudson, "the first translation of the scriptures into any modern vernacular tongue." That Chaucer was sympathetic to the Lollards' Movement is evident from the element of idealization which characterizes his portrait of the "Poor Parson" in the Prologue to The Canterbury Tales. The movement launched by Wyclif and his followers in the age of Chaucer was an adumbration of the Reformation which was to come in the sixteenth century to wean England from the papal influence.

Literary and Intellectual Tendencies: - Latin and French were the dominant languages in fourteenth-century England. However, in the later half of the century English came to its own, thanks to the sterling work done by Chaucer and some others like Langland, Gower, and Wyclif who wrote in English and wrote well. The English language itself was in a fluid state of being, and was divided into a number of dialects.

The Universities of Cambridge and Oxford employed Latin as the medium of instruction. Latin was also the language of the fashionable who cultivated it as a social necessity. We recall here Chaucer's Summoner who "wolde speke no word but Latyn" after having drunk "well"! The contribution of Chaucer towards the standardization and popularization of the English language cannot be over-estimated. As regards his contribution to English poetry, he has well been characterised as the father of English poetry. No doubt there were other poets contemporaneous with him Langland, Gower, and a few more, but Chaucer is as head and shoulders among them as Shakespeare is among the Elizabethan dramatists. He stands like a majestic oak in a shrubbery. The English prose, too, was coming to itself. Mandeville's travelogues and Wyclif s reformative pamphlets give one a feeling that the English prose was on its way to standardization and popular acclamation.

In another way, too, the age of Chaucer stands between the medieval and the modern life. There was in this age some sort of a minor Renaissance. The dawn of the real Renaissance in England was yet about two centuries ahead, yet in the age of Chaucer there are signs of growing influence of the ancients on native literature. Chaucer1 own poetry was influenced by the Italian writer Boccaccio (1313-75) and to a lesser extent, Petrarch (1304-74). The frameworks of Boccaccio's Decameron and of Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales are almost similar. However, it is somewhat doubtful if Chaucer had read the Italian writer. It was through the work of the two above-named Italian writers that humanism made its way into-English intellectual culture. Well does Compton-Rickett observe: "Chaucer's world is medieval; but beneath his medievalism the leaven of the Renaissance is already at work."

Literary Influences on Chaucer's Poetry

It is convenient to divide Chaucer's literary output into three stages, which show three distinct influences on the development of his poetry:

The French Period: Chaucer's early poetry was directly influenced by contemporary French poetry. He composed in his wild youthful days a number of love poems, none of which have survived, but which gave him some fame as a poet. It is supposed that A B C a prayer to the Virgin, is the first of his extant poems. He translated some portions of the famous French work Roman de la Rose, an elaborate love allegory. Its translation helped Chaucer to fashion his style. He cultivated an allegorical style. He learnt from French poetry the charm of fluent simplicity, complete correspondence of words and thoughts, constant restraint in the expression of emotion and satire. Chaucer wrote in 1369 The Book of Duchessee on the death of Blanche, John of Gaunt's wife. It is an allegory in the manner of reigning French school, but Chaucer gave his elegy freshness and seeming sincerity.

The Italian Period (1372-1384): Chaucer's Italian period is characterised by variety and new technical innovations in his poetry. During his visits to Italy Chaucer saw a new world of art and literature which had reached an astonishing excellence. He read Dante's Divine Comedia, Petrarch's Sonnets and Boccaccio's Decameron. In Italy he saw the dawn of Renaissance, which, to some extent, influenced his poetry which is secular and humanistic in spirit. Moody and Lovett remark: "The unquenchable curiosity of the men of Renaissance was his, more than a century before the Renaissance really began to affect England. He, too, shared their thirst for expression. The great books he had come to know in Italy gave hi_n no peace until he should equal or surpass them." The important works which he produced in emulation of the Italian masters are the House of Fame, The Parliament of Fowls, Troylus and Cryseyde and The Legend of Good Women.

The House of Fame (1382) is a dream allegory, which shows Dante's influence. It is remarkable for the rare combination of lofty thought and simple, homely language, and the presentation of genuine Chaucerian humour. The Legend of Good Women (1385), the unfinished work, was originally planned to contain nineteen tales of virtuous women of antiquity. But in the extant volume it consists of eight accomplished tales and the ninth only begun. It is conspicuous for its masterly narrative, particularly in the portion dealing with Cleopatra, and the skillful handling of the heroic couplet in English for the first time. Troylus and Cryseydc is founded on Boccaccio's Filostrato. It marks a significant development in Chaucer's poetic career. He uses his material very freely and with great artistic ability. In it he "reflects the ideals of his own age and society, and so gives to the whole story a dramatic force and beauty which it had never known before." The characters of Cryseyde and Pandarus reveal a new subtlety of psychological development, and reveal Chaucer's growing insight into human motives. Troylus and Cryseyde is considered as Chaucer's best narrative work. The rhyme royal stanza is used with much deftness and beauty. Chaucer also wrote the Story of Griselda (The Clerk's Tale) and The Story of Constance during this period.

The English Period (1384-1390): In this period Chaucer "becomes independent, relying upon himself entirely even for the use t which he puts his own borrowed themes." A few smaller poems which belong to this period are Former Age, Fortune, Truth, Gentilesse and The Lak of Stedfastnesse, but the crowning and monumental work of this period is The Canterbury Tales.

The Plan of 'The Canterbury Tales': The plan of the Tales was probably adopted soon after 1386, in which year Chaucer composed the Prologue to the Legend of Good Women. They are not, and cannot be looked on as a whole. Many were written independently, and they fitted into the framework of the Prologue. Many which he intended to write were never written. The whole existing body of the Tales was completed before the close of 1390. The composition of the General Prologue to the tales is commonly associated with 1387.

The manner in which Chaucer knitted the tales together was very simple, and likely to please the English people. The Canterbury Tales is a collection of twenty-four tales in verse and prose, some incomplete, told as entertainment by a group of pilgrims riding from London to the shrine of Thomas A. Beckett at Canterbury. Chaucer had probably made the pilgrimage to Canterbury in the spring of 1385 or 1387, and was led by this experience to the framework in which he set his pictures of life. For the general idea of the tales Chaucer was indebted to Boccaccio, but "in nearly every important feature the work is essentially English". To realise his purpose Chaucer grouped around the jovial host of the Tabard Inn twenty-nine pilgrims, including himself, of every class of society in England. He sat them on horseback to ride to Canterbury and home again, intending to make each of them tell tales. But the company never reaches Canterbury, and only twenty-three pilgrims get their turn. Some tales are left unfinished. There are two prose tales, Chaucer's own Tale of Melibeus and The Parson's Tale. The rest of the tales are composed in the decasyllabic or heroic couplet.

In the famous Prologue, Chaucer makes us acquainted with the various characters of his drama. The twenty-nine characters are carefully chosen types, who represent various segments of contemporary society. Endowed with creative imagination Chaucer individualised his characters. All of them are fully realized figures with an importance of their own. F. N. Robinson remarks about Chaucer's characters: "Chaucer's pilgrims are far more vivid and personal than the medieval figures with which they have been compared." William J. Long also remarks: "Chaucer is the first English writer to bring the atmosphere of romantic interest about the men and women and the daily work of one's own world, which is the aim of nearly all modern literature.

Chaucer assigned to a pilgrim a tale suited to his character and vocation. The tales are of astonishing variety and give us a true and faithful picture of differing aspects of medieval life in England. Stopford A. Brooke remarks: "The Tales themselves take in the whole range of the poetry and the life of the middle ages; the legend of the saint, the romance of the knight, the wonderful fables of the traveller, the coarse tale of common life, the love story, the allegory, the animal-fable and the satirical lay."

Chaucer emerges as the first great story-teller in verse in The Canterbury Tales. All the best tales are told easily, gracefully and sincerely. The tales are remarkable for the dramatic quality. F. N. Robinson says: "In fact the pilgrimage is a continuous and lively drama, in which the stories contribute to the action. Because of this sustained dramatic interest and the vivid reality of characters, as well as for the inclusive representation of English society, The Canterbury Tales has been called a Human comedy. The implied comparison with Balzac's great series of stories of the life of modern France is not inappropriate."

In The Canterbury Tales Chaucer made English into a true means of poetry and literature. He developed the resources of English language for literary use, and set an example which was followed by a long line of poets.

In Tales Chaucer appears as a great humorist who has a consummate knowledge of human life. His humour is rich, tolerant, profound and sane, devoid of spite and cynicism. He also had a keen sense of pathos in human life. He can bring tears into our eyes, and he can make us smile or be sad as he pleases.

The Canterbury Tales is the first finest poetic testament of England. It has coherence and imaginative drive of a great work of literature, and presents a firmly realized view of life. Of all medieval poems, The Canterbury Tales gives a modern reader the strongest sense of contact with the life and manners of fourteenth-century England.

Background to “The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales”

The Canterbury Tales is at once one of the most famous and most frustrating works of literature ever written. Since its composition in late 1300s, critics have continued to mine new riches from its complex ground, and started new arguments about the text and its interpretation. Chaucer’s richly detailed text, so Dryden said, was “God’s plenty”, and the rich variety of the Tales is partly perhaps the reason for its success. It is both one long narrative (of the pilgrims and their pilgrimage) and an encyclopedia of shorter narratives; it is both one large drama, and a compilation of most literary forms known to medieval literature: romance, fabliau, Breton lay, moral fable, verse romance, beast fable, prayer to the Virgin… and so the list goes on. No single literary genre dominates the Tales. The tales include romantic adventures, fabliaux, saint's biographies, animal fables, religious allegories and even a sermon, and range in tone from pious, moralistic tales to lewd and vulgar sexual farces. More often than not, moreover, the specific tone of the tale is extremely difficult to firmly pin down.

This, indeed, is down to one of the key problems of interpreting the Tales themselves - voice: how do we ever know who is speaking? Because Chaucer, early in the Tales, promises to repeat the exact words and style of each speaker as best he can remember it, there is always a tension between Chaucer and the pilgrim's voice he ventriloquizes as he re-tells his tale: even the "Chaucer" who is a character on the pilgrim has a distinct and deliberately un Chaucerian voice. Is it the Merchant’s voice – and the Merchant’s opinion – or Chaucer’s? Is it Chaucer the character or Chaucer the writer? If it is Chaucer’s, are we supposed to take it at face value, or view it ironically?

No one knows for certain when Chaucer began to write the Tales – the pilgrimage is usually dated 1387, but that date is subject to much scholarly argument – but it is certain that Chaucer wrote some parts of the Tales at different times, and went back and added Tales to the melting pot. The Knight’s Tale, for example, was almost certainly written earlier than the Canterbury project as a separate work, and then adapted into the voice of the Knight; and the Second Nun’s Tale, as well as probably the Monk’s, probably have a similar compositional history.

Chaucer drew from a rich variety of literary sources to create the Tales, though his principal debt is likely to Boccaccio’s Decameron, in which ten nobles from Florence, to escape the plague, stay in a country villa and amuse each other by each telling tales. Boccaccio likely had a significant influence on Chaucer. The Knight's Tale was an English version of a tale by Boccaccio, while six of Chaucer's tales have possible sources in the Decameron: the Miller's Tale, the Reeve's, the Clerk's, the Merchant's, the Franklin's, and the Shipman's. However, Chaucer's pilgrims to Canterbury form a wider range of society compared to Boccaccio's elite storytellers, allowing for greater differences in tone and substance.

The text of the Tales itself does not survive complete, but in ten fragments Due to the fact that there are no links made between these ten fragments in most cases, it is extremely difficult to ascertain precisely in which order Chaucer wanted the tales to be read.

Prologue to the Canterbury Tales : Summary

"When April comes with his sweet, fragrant showers, which pierce the dry ground of March, and bathe every root of every plant in sweet liquid, then people desire to go on pilgrimages." Thus begins the famous opening to The Canterbury Tales. The narrator (a constructed version of Chaucer himself) is first discovered staying at the Tabard Inn in Southwark (in London), when a company of twenty-nine people descend on the inn, preparing to go on a pilgrimage to Canterbury. After talking to them, he agrees to join them on their pilgrimage.

Yet before the narrator goes any further in the tale, he describes the circumstances and the social rank of each pilgrim. He describes each one in turn, starting with the highest status individuals.

The Knight is described first, as befits a 'worthy man' of high status. The Knight has fought in the Crusades in numerous countries, and always been honored for his worthiness and courtesy. Everywhere he went, the narrator tells us, he had a 'sovereyn prys' (which could mean either an 'outstanding reputation', or a price on his head for the fighting he has done). The Knight is dressed in a 'fustian' tunic, made of coarse cloth, which is stained by the rust from his coat of chainmail.

The Knight brings with him his son, The Squire, a lover and a lusty bachelor, only twenty years old. The Squire cuts a rather effeminate figure, his clothes embroidered with red and white flowers, and he is constantly singing or playing the flute. He is the only pilgrim (other than, of course, Chaucer himself) who explicitly has literary ambitions: he 'koude songes make and wel endite' (line 95).

The Yeoman (a freeborn servant) also travels along with the Knight's entourage, and is clad in coat and hood of green. The Yeoman is excellent at caring for arrows, and travels armed with a huge amount of weaponry: arrows, a bracer (arm guard), a sword, a buckler, and a dagger as sharp as a spear. He wears an image of St. Christopher on his breast.

Having now introduced the Knight (the highest ranking pilgrim socially), the narrator now moves on to the clergy, beginning with The Prioress, called 'Madame Eglantine' (or, in modern parlance, Mrs. Sweetbriar). She could sweetly sing religious services, speaks fluent French and has excellent table manners. She is so charitable and piteous, that she would weep if she saw a mouse caught in a trap, and she has two small dogs with her. She wears a brooch with the inscription 'Amor vincit omnia' ('Love conquers all'). The Prioress brings with her her 'chapeleyne' (secretary), the Second Nun.

The Monk is next, an extremely fine and handsome man who loves to hunt, and who follows modern customs rather than old traditions. This is no bookish monk, studying in a cloister, but a man who keeps greyhounds to hunt the hare. The Monk is well-fed, fat, and his eyes are bright, gleaming like a furnace in his head.

The Friar who follows him is also wanton and merry, and he is a 'lymytour' by trade (a friar licensed to beg in certain districts). He is extremely well beloved of franklins (landowners) and worthy woman all over the town. He hears confession and gives absolution, and is an excellent beggar, able to earn himself a farthing wherever he went. His name is Huberd.

The Merchant wears a forked beard, motley clothes and sat high upon his horse. He gives his opinion very solemnly, and does excellent business as a merchant, never being in any debt. But, the narrator ominously remarks, 'I noot how men hym calle' (I don't know how men call him, or think of him).

The Clerk follows the Merchant. A student of Oxford university, he would rather have twenty books by Aristotle than rich clothes or musical instruments, and thus is dressed in a threadbare short coat. He only has a little gold, which he tends to spend on books and learning, and takes huge care and attention of his studies. He never speaks a word more than is needed, and that is short, quick and full of sentence (the Middle-English word for 'meaningfulness' is a close relation of 'sententiousness').

The Man of Law (referred to here as 'A Sergeant of the Lawe') is a judicious and dignified man, or, at least, he seems so because of his wise words. He is a judge in the court of assizes, by letter of appointment from the king, and because of his high standing receives many grants. He can draw up a legal document, the narrator tells us, and no-one can find a flaw in his legal writings. Yet, despite all this money and social worth, the Man of Law rides only in a homely, multi-coloured coat.

A Franklin travels with the Man of Law. He has a beard as white as a daisy, and of the sanguine humour (dominated by his blood). The Franklin is a big eater, loving a piece of bread dipped in wine, and is described (though not literally!) as Epicurus' son: the Franklin lives for culinary delight. His house is always full of meat pie, fish and meat, so much so that it 'snewed in his hous of mete and drynke'. He changes his meats and drinks according to what foods are in season.

A Haberdasher and a Carpenter, a Weaver, a Dyer and a Tapycer (weaver of tapestries) are next described, all of them clothed in the same distinctive guildsman's dress. Note that none of these pilgrims, in the end, actually tell a tale.

A Cook had been brought along to boil the chicken up with marrow bones and spices, but this particular Cook knows a draught of ale very well indeed, according to the narrator. The Cook could roast and simmer and boil and fry, make stews and hashes and bake a pie well, but it was a great pity that, on his shin, he has an ulcer.

A Shipman from Dartmouth is next - tanned brown from the hot summer sun, riding upon a carthorse, and wearing a gown of coarse woolen cloth which reaches to his knees. The Shipman had, many times, drawn a secret draught of wine on board ship, while the merchant was asleep. The Shipman has weathered many storms, and knows his trade: he knows the locations of all the harbors from Gotland to Cape Finistere. His shape is called 'the Maudelayne'.

A Doctor of Medicine is the next pilgrim described, clad in red and blue, and no-one in the world can match him in speaking about medicine and surgery. He knows the cause of every illness, what humor engenders them, and how to cure them. He is a perfect practitioner of medicine, and he has apothecaries ready to send him drugs and mixtures. He is well-read in the standard medical authorities, from the Greeks right through to Chaucer's contemporary Gilbertus Anglicus. The Doctor, however, has not studied the Bible.

The Wife of Bath was 'somdel deef' (a little deaf, as her tale will later expand upon) and that was a shame. The Wife of Bath is so adept at making cloth that she surpasses even the cloth-making capitals of Chaucer's world, Ypres and Ghent, and she wears coverchiefs (linen coverings for the head) which must (the narrator assumes) have 'weyeden ten pound'. She had had five husbands through the church door, and had been at Jerusalem, Rome and Boulogne on pilgrimage. She is also described as 'Gat-tothed' (traditionally denoting lasciviousness), and as keeping good company, she knows all the answers about love: 'for she koude of that art the olde daunce' (she knew the whole dance as far as love is concerned!).

A good religious man, A Parson of a Town, is next described, who, although poor in goods, is rich in holy thought and work. He's a learned man, who truly preaches Christ's gospel, and devoutly teaches his parishioners. He travels across his big parish to visit all of his parishioners, on his feet, carrying a staff in his hand. He is a noble example to his parishioners ('his sheep', as they are described) because he acts first, and preaches second (or, in Chaucer's phrase, 'first he wroghte, and afterward he taughte'). The narrator believes that there is no better priest to be found anywhere.

With the Parson travels a Plowman (who does not tell a tale), who has hauled many cartloads of dung in his time. He is a good, hard-working man, who lives in peace and charity, and treats his neighbor as he would be treated. He rides on a mare, and wears a tabard (a workman's loose garment).

A Miller comes next, in this final group of pilgrims (now at the bottom of the class scale!). He is big-boned and has big muscles, and always wins the prize in wrestling matches. There's not a door that he couldn't lift off its hinges, or break it by running at it head-first. He has black, wide nostrils, carries a sword and a buckler (shield) by his side, and has a mouth like a great furnace. He's good at stealing corn and taking payment for it three times. But then, Chaucer implies, there are no honest millers.

A noble Manciple (a business agent, purchaser of religious provisions) is the next pilgrim to be described, and a savvy financial operator. Though a common man, the Manciple can run rings round even a 'heep of lerned men'. The Manciple, his description ominously ends, 'sette hir aller cappe': deceived them all.

The Reeve, a slender, choleric man, long-legged and lean ("ylyk a staf"). He knows exactly how much grain he has, and is excellent at keeping his granary and his grain bin. There is no bailiff, herdsman or servant about whom the Reeve does not know something secret or treacherous; as a result, they are afraid of him 'as of the deeth'.

The Summoner is next, his face fire-red and pimpled, with narrow eyes. He has a skin disease across his black brows, and his beard (which has hair falling out of it) and he is extremely lecherous. There is, the narrator tells us, no ointment or cure, or help him to remove his pimples. He loves drinking wine which is as 'reed as blood', and eating leeks, onions and garlic. He knows how to trick someone.

Travelling with the Summoner is a noble Pardoner, his friend and his companion (in what sense Chaucer intends the word 'compeer', meaning companion, nobody knows) and the last pilgrim-teller to be described. He sings loudly 'Come hither, love to me', and has hair as yellow as wax, which hangs like flaxen from his head. He carries a wallet full of pardons in his lap, brimful of pardons come from Rome. The Pardoner is sexually ambiguous - he has a thin, boyish voice, and the narrator wonders whether he is a 'geldyng or a mare' (a eunuch or a homosexual).

The narrator writes that he has told us now of the estate (the class), the array (the clothing), and the number of pilgrims assembled in this company. He then makes an important statement of intent for what is to come: he who repeats a tale told by another man, the narrator says, must repeat it as closely as he possibly can to the original teller - and thus, if the tellers use obscene language, it is not our narrator's fault.

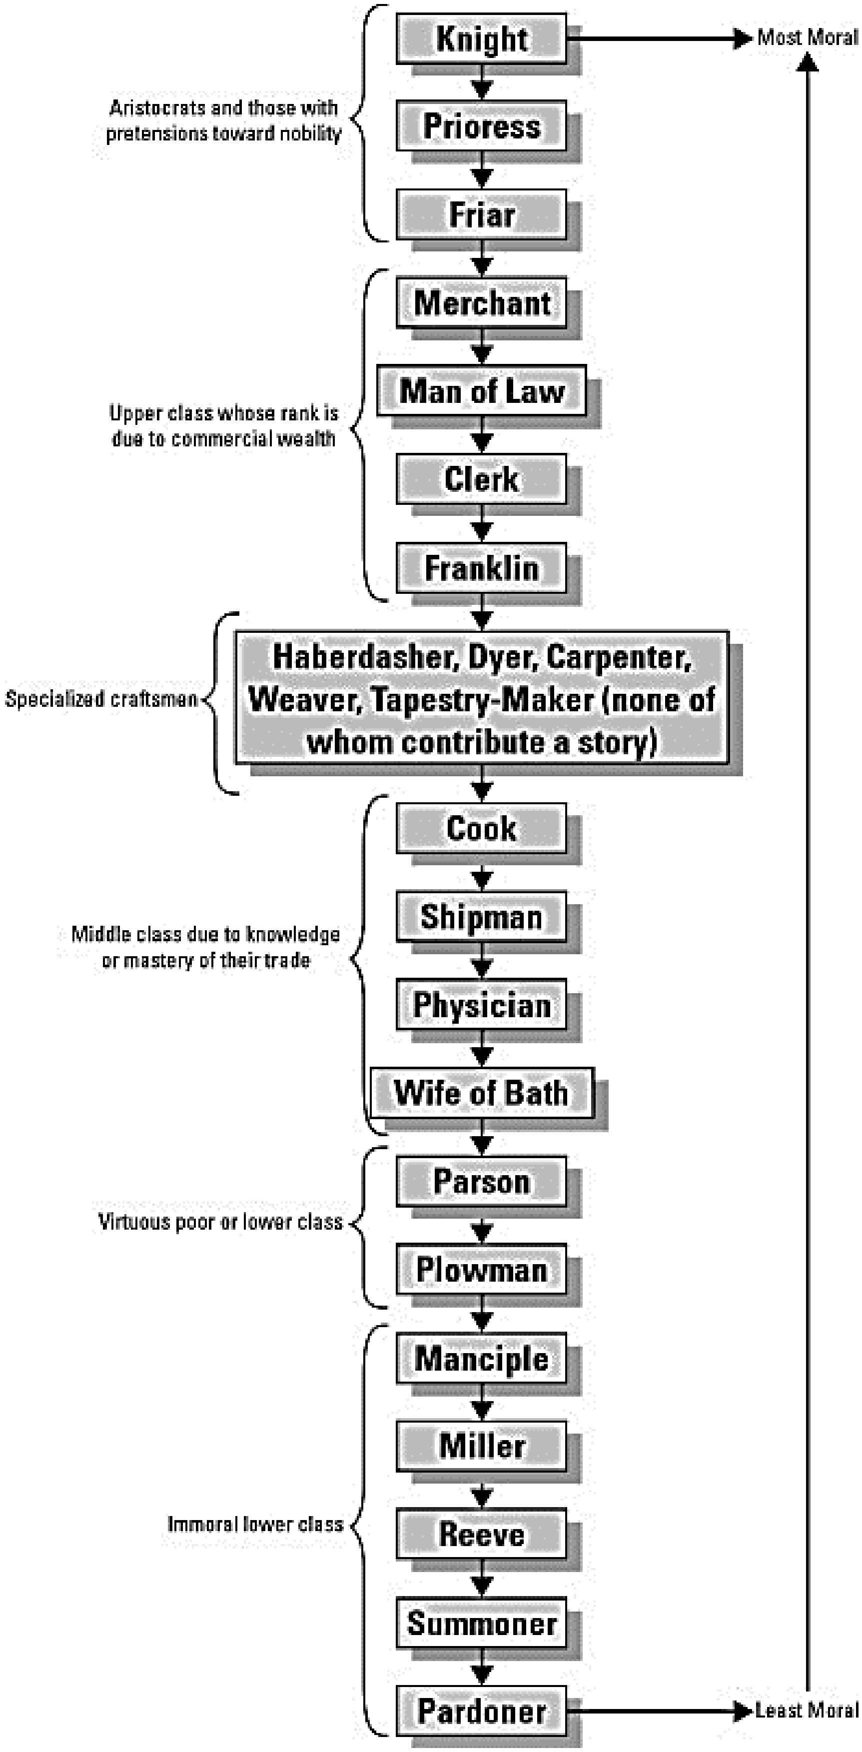
The Host is the last member of the company described, a large man with bright, large eyes - and an extremely fair man. The Host welcomes everyone to the inn, and announces the pilgrimage to Canterbury, and decides that, on the way there, the company shall 'talen and pleye' (to tell stories and amuse themselves). Everyone consents to the Host's plan for the game, and he then goes on to set it out.

What the Host describes is a tale-telling game, in which each pilgrim shall tell two tales on the way to Canterbury, and two more on the way home; whoever tells the tale 'of best sentence and moost solas' shall have supper at the cost of all of the other pilgrims, back at the Inn, once the pilgrimage returns from Canterbury. The pilgrims agree to the Host's suggestion, and agree to accord to the Host's judgment as master of the tale-telling game. Everyone then goes to bed.

The next morning, the Host awakes, raises everyone up, and 'in a flok' the pilgrimage rides towards 'the Wateryng of Seint Thomas', a brook about two miles from London. The Host asks the pilgrims to draw lots to see who shall tell the first tale, the Knight being asked to 'draw cut' first and, whether by 'aventure, or sort, or cas', the Knight draws the straw to tell the first tale. The pilgrims ride forward, and the Knight begins to tell his tale.

Prologue to the Canterbury Tales : Analysis

The General Prologue was probably written early in the composition of the Canterbury Tales, and offers an interesting comparison point to many of the individual tales itself. Of course, it does not match up to the tales as we have them in a number of ways: the Nun's Priest and the Second Nun are not described, and, most significantly, the work as we have it does not reflect the Host's plan. For starters, the pilgrimage only seems to go as far as Canterbury (for the Parson's Tale) and only the narrator tells two tales on the way there, with all the other pilgrims telling only a single tale (and some who are described in the General Prologue not telling a tale at all).



We must, therefore, view the General Prologue with some hesitation as a comparison point to the tales themselves: it offers useful or enlightening suggestions, but they are no means a complete, reliable guide to the tales and what they mean. What the General Prologue offers is a brief, often very visual description of each pilgrim, focusing on details of their background, as well as key details of their clothing, their food likes and dislikes, and their physical features. These descriptions fall within a common medieval tradition of portraits in words (which can be considered under the technical term ekphrasis), Chaucer's influence in this case most likely coming from The Romaunt de la Rose.

Immediately, our narrator insists that his pilgrims are to be described by 'degree'. By the fact that the Knight, the highest-ranking of the pilgrims, is selected as the first teller, we see the obvious social considerations of the tale. Still, all human life is here: characters of both sexes, and from walks of life from lordly knight, or godly parson down to oft-divorced wife or grimy cook.

Each pilgrim portrait within the prologue might be considered as an archetypal description. Many of the 'types' of characters featured would have been familiar stock characters to a medieval audience: the hypocritical friar, the rotund, food-loving monk, the rapacious miller are all familiar types from medieval estates satire (see Jill Mann's excellent book for more information). Larry D. Benson has pointed out the way in which the characters are paragons of their respective crafts or types - noting the number of times the words 'wel koude' and 'verray parfit' occur in describing characters.

Yet what is key about the information provided in the General Prologue about these characters, many of whom do appear to be archetypes, is that it is among the few pieces of objective information - that is, information spoken by our narrator that we are given throughout the Tales. The tales themselves (except for large passages of the prologues and epilogues) are largely told in the words of the tellers: as our narrator himself insists in the passage. The words stand for themselves: and we interpret them as if they come from the pilgrims' mouths. What this does - and this is a key thought for interpreting the tales as a whole - is to apparently strip them of writerly license, blurring the line between Chaucer and his characters.

Chaucer's voice, in re-telling the tales as accurately as he can, entirely disappears into that of his characters, and thus the Tales operates almost like a drama. Where do Chaucer's writerly and narratorial voices end, and his characters' voices begin? This self-vanishing quality is key to the Tales, and perhaps explains why there is one pilgrim who is not described at all so far, but who is certainly on the pilgrimage - and he is the most fascinating, and the most important by far: a poet and statesman by the name of Geoffrey Chaucer.

Knight
Most Moral
Aristocrats and those with pretensions toward nobility
Prioress
Friar
Merchant
Upper class whose rank is due to commercial wealth
Man of Law
Clerk
Franklin
Specialized craftsmen
Haberdasher, Dyer, Carpenter, Weaver, Tapestry-Maker (none of whom contribute a story)
Cook
Middle class due to knowledge or mastery of their trade
Shipman
Physician
Wife of Bath
Parson
Virtuous poor or lower class
Plowman
Manciple
Miller
Immoral lower class
Reeve
Summoner
Pardoner
Least Moral

Chaucer's Realism

Literature is the mirror of its age. Supreme literary artist is one who becomes a mouthpiece and provides a real picture of his age with its minute details. Chaucer is the true representative of his age. He portrayed a comprehensive picture of contemporary life. He realistically epitomizes the social, economic and religious conditions of his age. He was a keen observer of men and manners, and was endowed with the talent of imaginatively presenting contemporary society upon a great scale. He is in true sense a social chronicler of England. His poetry reflects the 14th century not in fragment but as a complete whole. He for the first time made poetry the medium for the expression of social reality. Various aspects of Chaucer's realism are elaborated below:

The Old and the New: Chaucer's age was transitional. It was medieval but beneath the medievalism—the desire for change was already at work. He saw the early rays of Renaissance. Ecclesiastical ideas and the medieval habits of mind were still the controlling elements in Chaucer's period. The Knight in the Prologue reflects the fading chivalry of the middle ages. The old Knight was a brave warrior and was a true symbol of the fast vanishing old world of knighthood. The Knight is a fine expression of the medieval spirit.

The Squire, the Knight's son, represents the new conception of chivalry. He has the more luxurious and less idealistic temper of the age of the French wars. Like his father he does not dream of chivalry and war. He takes delight in the pleasures of life:

Well could he sit a horse and ride,
Make songs, joust and dance, draw and write.

The Clerk of Oxford represents the interest that people had started showing in classical learning. Chaucer was influenced by Boccaccio, Petrarch and Dante, the pioneers of Renaissance in Italy. He imbibed from them humanism which is clearly reflected in The Canterbury Tales. Chaucer was pioneer of Renaissance humanism in English literature. He was the Evening Star of the medieval day and the Morning Star of Renaissance.

Social Condition: Chaucer for the first time made poetry a powerful medium for the expression of contemporary social conditions and life. He had a wide experience of men of many ranks and conditions, and he had been storing up for years, with his keenly observant, quiet eyes, the materials for a literary presentation of contemporary society upon a great scale.

Chaucer exposes the corruption in village life in The Prologue. The village was a self-sufficient economic and social unit. The Reeve was mainly responsible for the organisation of village life. He used to be the elected representative of villagers. Some of the reeves were corrupt and exploited the people. The Reeve in The Prologue took advantage of all his opportunities for cheating the lord of mansion.

Chaucer was aware of the rise of the new class of gentlemen farmers. The Franklin who is quite well off represents this new class.

The Church and Religious Life: Chaucer does not attack like Wycliff or Lollard but he is content to expose the growing corruption, love of luxury and materialism, and laxity of discipline through his ecclesiastical figures. He realistically depicts the growing corruption of the church through his ecclesiastical characters. He draws the vivid portraits of the fat, pleasure-loving Monk, the merry and wanton Friar, the clever-rogue Pardoner who wanders about selling indulgences and relics, clearly show that he was alive to the shocking corruption that prevailed in the church of his times. The ecclesiastics are hangers on and caterpillars of the church. The Friar is intimate with hospitable franklins, inn-keepers and worthy women, and despises beggars and lazars. The Summoner is a repulsive man. Chaucer's Parson is the type of the true shepherds of the church. He is poor in this world's goods, but "rich in holy thought and work". The Parson's brother, a Plowman, travels with him. He is a "true swinker and a good man" who helps his poor neighbours without hire and loves them as himself.

Realistic Presentation of the Cross-Sections of Society: Chaucer realistically presented the varied sections of contemporary society. His men and women represent social realism. Chaucer's Merchant represents the new class of traders and merchants. The merchant is conscious of his importance. He delights in pomp and show:

A merchant was there with a forked beard,
In mottallee, and high on horse he sat.

The low classes also emerged as power group. They clamored for better conditions of life. Chaucer's carpenter, dyer, plowman etc. represent the new power these commoners were getting in those days. Each of them seemed important and their wives, too, were conscious of their growing importance in the national life. The growing prosperity of the new-rich class manifested itself in the love for display and extravagance. The, Knight, the Squire, the Wife of Bath and many other characters in The Prologue love display of pomp and show.

Chaucer's Doctor of Physic represents the medieval medical profession. He has little time to read Bible. He knows about herbal remedies and he is also well versed with astrology. Chaucer laughs at him for his fee loving propensities:

For gold in physick is a cordial
Therefore he loved gold in special.

The poor Clerk of Oxford represents the passion of learning. The Prioress, the Nun, and the Wife of Bath represent women of his time. Chaucer's characters represent almost the entire range of English society in the fourteenth century, with the exception of the highest aristocracy and the lowest order.

In short, Chaucer is a perfect representative of his age. He is in true sense a social chronicler of England. His poetry reflects the 14th century not in fragment but as a complete whole.

Chaucer’s Art of Characterization

Characterization is the concept of creating characters in a piece of literature. It can be said without any doubt that the worth of every writer is judged from the delineation of his characters. Geoffrey Chaucer stands above head and shoulder of all other English writers in art of Characterization. His characters breathe, walk and talk as we do and their wishes and aspirations, their likes and dislikes are quite akin to men of "flesh and blood". They are so universal in nature that we meet these characters daily in every society; therefore, they do not look unreal to us at all.

Chaucer's Prologue is a picture-gallery. His pilgrims are like twenty-nine pictures hung on a wall. These pilgrims are from different walks of life. They are so carefully chosen that they represent the whole of the English society and fully reveal social, moral, material, commercial, romantic and chivalric trends prevailing in the society. He presents each of them with minute details about their dresses, physical features, habits, peculiarities of manner, speech etc.

Chaucer follows the methods common to all painters. He paints with words and not with a brush. He had the seeing-eye, the retentive memory and the judgment to select rightly. Many of his characters are drawn from his own acquaintances. For example, the host Hairy Bailey is drawn from an actual host known to Chaucer. Similarly, the Wife of Bath, and the Oxford Clerk are also drawn from individuals with whom he came in contact in his life. That is way his characters are life-like. They are living and breathing human beings having the force of reality. His picture-gallery is made up real men and women.

In many respects, Chaucer shows a marked preference for brilliant colours, both in dress and appearance. On entering his picture-gallery, one is at once impressed by the remarkable brightness of his portraits. For example, the gown of the Squire is embroidered,

as it were a meede
Al ful of fresshe floures, wyite and reede;

Similarly, the Friar is dressed all in green and the hose of the Wife of Bath is of fine scarlet red. The face of the Summoner is fiery red and the Miller has a reddish beard. The atmosphere of Chaucer's portrait-gallery is sunlit, bright and colourful.

In the portraits of the Prologue Chaucer excels the art of the painter. He has an advantage over the painter. He can make use of sounds which the artist with the brush cannot do. He hears the jingling of the bells of the Monk's palfrey, notes the nasal tones of the Prioress, and the lisping of the Friar.

He highlights one set of character by presenting it as foil to another. The refined and delicate Prioress is contrasted with the coarse and broad-speaking Wife of Bath. His ecclesiastical characters represent the degeneration of the church and the corruption that had overtaken the clergy of the times. His Monk, the Friar, the Pardoner and the Summoner have all forgotten their duties. They have grown greedy and selfish and are given to all sorts of corrupt practices. They have been individualized by noting their personal peculiarities and oddities. For example, the Monk has been individualized by his eyes.

His eyen stepe and rollynge in his heed,
That seemed as a forneys of a leed;

Chaucer uses apt similes and metaphors to present his characters. His similes are always drawn from common, familiar and homely aspects of life and nature. His pictorial imagination constantly uses such imagery. He makes his characters gleam and glow as on a canvas. For example, the merry nature of the Squire is described in a single line by, saying that "he was as bright as is the month of May." The brightness of the Friar's eyes is his most peculiar feature and it is emphasized through an equally apt image:

His eyen twynkled in his heed aryght,
As doon the sterres in the frosty nyght.

Chaucer portrays his characters objectively and impartially. He is so broadminded that he shows his equal sympathy to all the characters, the just and the unjust, the pious and the sinner.

Chaucer's characters are types as well as individuals: they are the symbols of some particular class, age group, or profession, but they also have their own peculiar traits, their own idiosyncrasies, their own ways of talking and doing things. Each of the twenty-nine pilgrims in the Prologue is morally and socially representative, but he is also an individual with marked peculiarities of his own. For example, his Knight is a typical Knight of his age representing the fast fading chivalry of the middle ages. But he is also an individual who, for his personal qualities, had been honoured in foreign lands above all other knights and who had been the guest of honour at many a feast. His son, the young Squire, represents the jollity of youth as well as the spirit of the rising chivalry of the times. He is not, like his father, interested so much in war and adventure as in singing and dancing and Jove-making. He is also an individual, who has a fondness for bright colours and fine apparel,

Embrouded was he,as it were a meede
Al ful of fresshe floures, wyite and reede;

Another worth mentioning about Chaucer's characterization is that he' has the gift of seeing the universal in the particular and he presents both these aspects of life in the picture of pilgrims. These pilgrims possess all those traits, humours and habits that characterize the men and women of all ages and nations in this world. They are not, of an age but of all ages, "They are timeless, creations on a time determined stage." The Squire, the Monk, the Prioress, the Franklin, the Wife of Bath etc., may have changed their names, the title by which they are known, but they are all human beings having the same passions, desires and instincts as are common to humanity. All of us feel at home in their company, for we all recognize in them an element of our own selves.

His characters are not static: they constantly grow and develop like real men and women. They talk to each other, narrate their own tales, and comment on the tales told by others. They reveal a hundred aspects of their natures. They are shown to us as moving, acting, talking and disputing just like men of flesh and blood. In short, it can be said that there is nothing of the dreamer about Chaucer-nothing of the stern moralist and social reformer. Like Shakespeare, he makes it his business in The Canterbury Tales, to paint life as he sees it, and leaves other to draw the moral.

Modernity in Chaucer

Chaucer is regarded as the earliest of the great modernism. In those dark days when light of modernism was not visible on the horizon, Chaucer anticipated the modern taste and the modern mind and in his poetry, he introduced qualities of advanced age. Though Chaucer has not written a drama or a novel as we know it, yet his works contain the seed of modern drama and novel. If he had lived a few years, he would certainly have been our first dramatist and novelist, just as we know he is the first true national poet of England.

When we make a careful and critical analysis of Chaucer's poetry, we arrive at a definite conclusion that sympathy, realism, intelligence, straight forwardness, humor, irony, satire and keen observation are salient features of Chaucer's literary works. He enchants the reader by his lovely diction, his description and narrative power and the graceful movement of his verse. He is the founder. of pure pimple and musical style of writing verses, which was later on followed by Spencer, Shakespeare and Milton.

Firstly Chaucer is rightly regarded as the father of English poetry. He may also be described as the first modern writer in English. He Made a considerable contribution to the development of English prosody and versification, as well as to the development of various poetic forms. He is great delineator of character as well of manners and customs'. The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales is a valuable social document. Chaucer is also a great story teller, as well as a prominent houmorist. His role in the development of English Language was also a significant one. He enabled English language to replace Latin and French as the medium of ambitious literature.

Secondly, his poetry links with the poetry of his predecessors. Here and there we have in Chaucer's poetry words and phrases from earlier poets, as well as rhyme-tags and other items in the stock-in-trade of medieval poets. Some examples of this are words and phrases like 'rose-red', `silver'bright', 'grey as glass', 'still as a stone', 'brown as a berry', etc. However, the most characteristic part of Chaucer's poetry is that here such borrowing is the minimum. Poetry before Chaucer, and to a certain extent even after Chaucer, was alliterative in nature. Chaucer's poetry is accentual and not alliterative, though we now and then have alliterative phrases in his poetry which reflect the alliterative conception of poetry. However, in many cases, his alliterative phrases occur even in modern speech and writing, such as "fish and flesh", "busy as bees", "friend or foe", "sigh and. sob", "weary or wet". etc Chaucer also used many stock phrases, but they only help to accentuate the conversational quality of his poetry. Some 'examples of this type are "No more of this", "ride and go", "Old and .young", "more and less", "weep and cry", "as old bokes seyn" (as old books say), "deep and wide", etc.

Thirdly, Chaucer attempted the new realistic task of portraying men and women as they were and to describe them so that the readers could recognize them as their own acquaintances. His characters have for this reason become a permanent treasure of English literature. Beowulf and Roland are ideal heroes, essentially figures of the fancy, but the merry Host of the Tabard Inn, Madam Eglantine, the fat .Monk, the good Parson, the kindhearted Plowman, the studious Oxford Clerk, these strike us more like personal acquaintances than characters in a story. "Chaucer is the first English writer to bring the atmosphere of romantic interest about the men and women and the daily work of one's Own world which is the aim of nearly all modern literature."

Fourthly, With Chaucer, the English language and English literature grew at a bound to full maturity. No Other Middle English writer has his skill, his range, his complexity, his large human outlook. Unfortunately, the English language was still in the process of rapid change, and major shifts in pronunciation and accentuation were to occur in the following century and a half. This meant that Chaucer's achievement in establishing English as a fully developed literary language could not be adequately exploited by his immediate successors. It was not long before readers were unable to scan him -properly. This fact helps to emphasizes Chancer's loneliness. His followers lack both his technical brilliance and his breadth of vision, leaving him the one undisputed master in medieval English literature. Not until Shakespeare is there an English writer with Chaucer's combination of technique and insight and his ability to put each at the service of the other, and Shakespeare's genius, which was the greater, ran in different channels.

His Trend of Borrowing Material :- Chaucer takes the material for his poems wherever he can find it. He borrows profusely form Latin, French, and Italian literature. But whatever he borrows, he makes entirely his own. His originality consists in giving an old story some present human interest, making it express the life and ideals of his own age. In this respect The Knight's Tale is noteworthy. Its names belong to an ancient civilization, but its characters are men and women of the English nobility as Chaucer knew them. This is perhaps his finest work as a narrative poet. It is heroic in subject, chivalrous in sentiment, and romantic in tone. Nominally, it is a tale of the heroic age of Greece, hut everything in it is medievalised. It may be regarded as an idealised picture of the Middle Ages. Its account of the, tournament, its presentation of the principles of knightly ethics, and its vivid portrayal of the chivalrous conception of love give it a distinctly medieval flavour.

Conclusion: - Chaucer is regarded as the first English short story teller and the first English modern poet. Popular literature till Chaucer's time had been occupied mainly with the gods and heroes of modern era. Chaucer was

The morning star of song, who made
His music heard below,
Don Chaucer, the first warbler, whose sweet breath
Preluded those melodious bursts that fill
The spacious times of great Elizabeth
With sounds that echo still.

He was the Father of verse, who in immortal song

First taught the Muse to speak the English tongue.

Geoffrey Chaucer: A Representative of His Age

Well does Compton Rickett observe: "Chaucer symbolizes, as no other writer does, the Middle Ages. He stands in much the same relation to the life of his time as Pope does to the earlier phases to the Eighteenth century; and Tennyson to the Victorian era; and his place in English literature is even more important than theirs..."

The social groups of thirty pilgrims cover the entire range of fourteenth century English society, leaving only royalty on one hand, and the lowest on the other.

Medieval Chivalry: - Chaucer's knight is a true representative of the spirit of the medieval chivalry which was a blend of love, religion, and bravery. He has been a champion of not fewer than fifteen battles in the defense of Christianity. Being the embodiment of chivalric ideals, Chaucer's knight observes utmost courtesy. He was not only worthy in politeness but also wise in decisiveness.

We must, however, point out that the spirit of true chivalry was breathing its last in the age of Chaucer. The Knight, in fact, is a representative of an order which was losing its ground. The true representative of the new order is his young son. The Squire, who has as much a taste for revelry as for chivalry. He is a lover and a lusty bachelor.

So hoote he lovede that by nyghtertale
He slept namoore than dooth a nyghtyngale

Trade, Commerce and Art: - The Merchant is a typical representative of his class. The countrymen and merchants have always made the two most common objects of humour and satire. But Chaucer lets the Merchant go without much of satire, perhaps in recognition of the importance that his class had gained in his age.

Medicine: - The knowledge of Astronomy rather Astrology was a must for a physician as all the physical ailments were supposed to be the consequences of the peculiar configuration of the stars and planets. That is why the Doctor of Physic, too, was grounded in Astronomy. Chaucer has a sly dig at the Doctor in his reference to his gold-loving nature.

The Church: - The Church had become a hotbed of profligacy, corruption and rank materialism. The Monk is a fat, sprouting fellow averse to study and penance. The Friar is a jolly beggar who employs his tongue to carve out his living. The Prioress bothers more about modish etiquettes than austerity. The Pardoner is a despicable parasite in trading in letters of pardon with the sinners who could ensure a seat in heaven by paying hard cash. The summoner is likewise a depraved fellow.

The only exception is the poor Parson apparently a follower of Wycliffe who revolted against the corruption of the Church.

The New Learning: - The Clerk of Oxford represents the new intellectual culture. He is an austere scholar who prefers twenty books of Aristotle's philosophy to gay clothes and musical instruments. And

Of studie took he moost cure and moost heede
Noght a word spak he moore than was neede

Thus, The Prologue is a comprehensive representation of the fourteenth century society which consisted of three main classes-that of the knights representing medieval chivalry, that of the clergy representing the Church, and that of the workers. These three classes constituted the main social structure and we can reconstruct the life of the fourteenth century through it.

Chaucer's Treatment of women

Literature reflects the tendencies of the age in which it is produced and there is always a supreme literary artist who becomes the mouth piece of his age and gives expression to the hopes and aspirations, its fades, and fetishes, its tears and doubts, its prosperity and enterprise in his work. Chaucer, too, represents his age and holds mirror up to the life of his time. His poetry represents the fourteenth century and not only one limited aspect of it. For example, the unknown author of “Pearls” shows the mysticism of refined mind. Wycliff, points out the surging wave of religious reformation, Gower shows the fear produced in the wealthier class by the Peasant Rising and Langland, presents corruption in the church and the religious order. Each of these authors throws light on only one aspect of life of fourteenth century. It is Chaucer’s greatness that he directs his comprehensive gaze not on one aspect of his time, but on all its wide and vanegated life. He is a wide and capacious soul and takes a fuller view of his times more than anyone else could have taken in those days. Chaucer takes into consideration the chivalry, trade, medical profession, clergymen and women of the fourteenth century.

Chaucer’s attitude towards women is impartial, unprejudiced, realistic and comprehensive. According to Chaucer, a woman is neither a goddess nor necessarily an evil. She is just a companion of man and as there are gods and devils among men, so there are goddesses and witches among women. Chaucer’s realistic approach towards life never allows him to go to extremes. For instance, the Franklin’s opinion about women reflects the whole story. According to his tale, the real question is not of mastery, but of mutual adjustment and co-operation.

In Chaucer’s age, there were two views with regard to women. According to the opinion of the church, woman in the person of Eve was the cause of fall of Adam. It was she who had brought sin and death into the world. On the other hand, quite contrary to this view the poets held positive opinion about them. According to poets, she was a goddess who descended from Heaven with pomp and majesty and filled the world with a unique glow. Women in Chaucer’s England did not enjoy an enviable social position. Women of lower class of society, in particular were doomed to a life of unrelieved drudgery. They were treated as slaves or serfs. Women belonging to the upper classes, however, led a comparatively better social life and they received some education and wore the fine clothes and ornaments.

In “The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales”, Chaucer tells that there are two kinds of woman in the world in all ages. He tells this by depicting two women, The Prioress and The Wife of Bath. The Prioress is the embodiment of sweetness, beauty, grace and good manners whereas The Wife of Bath is a combination of ugly features and shrewish qualities. Both of them are present in all ages. Sometimes, The Prioress predominates and sometimes The Wife of Bath.

In Chaucer's time, a woman was regarded as inferior to man. A woman who attempted governance was very often beaten by her husband. A woman's welfare lays in accepting the mastery of her husband. We are told that fifth husband of The Wife of Bath tried to assert his male superiority over her and once struck her about her ear so violently that she became deaf. Thus, women like The Wife of Bath always manage to escape from the life, a humdrum love, gossip, finery, company of men and never like to stay at home with their husbands. Chaucer explains the nature of such women in the following lines of the Wife's portrait.

In felawshipe wel koude she laughe and carpe;
Of remedies of love she knew per chaunce,
For she koude of that art the oIde daunce.

The Prioress represents the conventional woman with all those vanities dear to feminine heart. In "The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales", her description includes her physical appearance, table manners, affected speech and tender sentimentality. Her name is "Madame Eglentyne". One wonders what this wild flower has to do in the convent. She wears fine clothes and on her brooch is inscribed the motto "Amor Vincit Omnia" (Love conquers all).

The Wife of Bath has expounded her views on women, marriage and love at a great length in the Prologue. She tells the company that she has no faith in virginity. God has given them bodies to use. Let saints be continent. God never forbade marriage, nor did He command virginity. The Clerk replies to the Wife's heresies by telling the story of Griselda. She was a retort to the Wife's heretical doctrine.

Chaucer's "Tale of Melibeus" poses the problem of mastery in domestic life and suggests that husband should accept the mastery of his wife. The Nun's Priest's tale puts the opposite view. Similarly, different pilgrims express their views in their tales. However, the Franklin's tale gives a balanced view. According to this tale, the real question is not of mastery but mutual adjustment and co-operation. The real bliss of wedded life can be enjoyed through mutual co-operation, forbearance and patience; this is the view of Chaucer himself.

Humour in the Prologue

Humour is the tendency of particular cognitive experiences to provoke laughter and provide amusement. Humour is the sympathetic appreciation of the comic and enables us to love while we laugh. Humour enables us to see the person's point of view, to distinguish between crimes and misdemeanours. There is no sting in humour, no consciousness superiority. On the contrary, it contains an element of tenderness. Satire, being destructive, not constructive, is in a class apart, but even satire may become so softened by humour as it does in Chaucer that it may lose the element of caricature and serve only to give a keener edge to wit.

Chaucer's whole point of view is that of the humorist. He is a comic poet who walks carelessly through life pausing the notice every trifle as he passes. He views the world as the unaccustomed traveller views a foreign country. He possesses the faculty of amused observation in a pre-eminent degree. Again and again he contrives to invest some perfectly trifling and commonplace incident with an air of whimsicality, and by so doing to make it at once realistic and remote.

Chaucer's humour is essentially English. It is born of a strong common-sense and a generous sympathy; and there are the qualities of the greatest English humorists like Shakespeare and Fielding.

Chaucer's humour has been acknowledged as always sympathetic. In the Prologue, except in his handling of the Monk and the Friar there is no sting in it. Chaucer does not treat with disdain those whose foolishness he has fathomed, nor does he turn away in disgust from the rascal whose tricks he has detected. If humour can be defined as "the sympathetic appreciation of the comic", i.e. the faculty which enables us to laugh—but to laugh affectionately and sympathetically, then Chaucer was indeed a great humorist. In his description of the Wife of Bath, he reminds us of Shakespeare's treatment of Sir Toby in Twelfth Night and of Falstaff in Henry IV. In fact, Chaucer makes us appreciate a character even when laughing at it. Moreover, Chaucer invariably makes more fun of the individual than of the institution to which he belongs. Mockery either discreet or uproarious never withered in him the gift of poetry.

Chaucer's humour springs from the rich fields of character. He derives pleasure from the "quaintness of individuality". By his keen observation and insight he detects incongruities in men and women and presents before his readers in an amusing manner. Some of the facts are quite trivial in themselves but become amusing in the way Chaucer tells them e.g. the Squire's locks which look as if they were laid in press, the hat of the Wife of Bath weighing 19 lbs., the Reeve's thin legs, the Franklin's weakness for sharp sauce, etc.

Chaucer's humour is his distinct quality. He says that in the literature of his time, when so few poets seem to have any perception of the fun in life, the humour of Chaucer is invigorating and delightful. There is great variety in his humour. It is kindly and patronising as in the case of the Clerk of Oxford, broad and semi-farcical as in the Wife of Bath; pointedly satirical as in the Pordoner and the Summoner; or coarse, as happens in the Tales of the Miller, the Reeve and the Pordoner. Chaucer’s humour is not a pure fun. It is seldom that the satirical intent is wholly lacking, as it is in the case of the Good Parson, but, except in rare cases, the satire is good-humoured and well-meant.

Chaucer's humour in the Prologue derives from the fact that he is himself one of the pilgrims, one of the original twenty-nine. He is both actor and spectator and both he and his audience enjoy the antics which this clever arrangement enables him to perform. As pilgrim-narrator, he often discloses to his readers something about a character which none of the other pilgrims could possibly know, but which adds something important to our impression of the person concerned. For example he reveals to the delight of the readers that the Merchant was in debt and the Prioress sang the divine service intoning through the nose while she would not like to do so outside her convent.

Chaucer's humour in the Prologue is also due to his unconventional descriptive style. He deliberately departs from the artificial, lifeless forms of traditional portraiture and addresses himself to strikingly realistic or lifelike portrayals which by their very realism of speech and idiom make the incident or the object delightful.

Chaucer's witty comments upon the pilgrims such as "This Manciple sette his aller cappe" or his lavish praise upon some knave such as The Shipman or his pun on some word such as Philosophere in the sense of true 'philosopher' and 'alchemist' are also conducive to a good deal of humour. About the Oxford Clerk Chaucer says:

But al be that he was a philosophere,
Yet hadde he but litel gold in cofre.

Not least among the manifestations of Chaucer's humour is the quality of exaggeration. The merry Friar with his twinkling eyes is the best beggar in his friary ; the Franklin has not his equal; in all the world there was none like the Doctor of Physic; the Shipman had no peer from 'Hulle to Cartage'; and in cloth-making the Wife of Bath excelled even the matchless weavers of Ypres and Ghent.

To conclude, Chaucer's humour is one of the greatest assets of his poetic art. As Compton-Rickett says, indeed for all his considerable power, pathos, his happy fancy, his lucid imagination, it is as a great humorist that he lingers longest in our memories, with humour, rich, profound and sane, devoid of spite and cynicism, irradiated by a genial kindliness and a consummate knowledge of human nature.

Chaucer as the Father of English Poetry

Chaucer has rightly been called "the father of English poetry". He founded English language and poetry alike. Alber calls him "the earliest of the great moderns" because he imparted modernity to English language and poetry, and "it is through him that its free secular spirit first expresses itself in our poetry". Matthew Arnold was right in asserting that "with him is born our real poetry". He was rightly recognised during the Renaissance as the Father of English poetry:

Father of verse ! who in immortal song
First taught the muse to speak the English tongue.

New Poetic Subject: As regards Chaucer's poetic material he unhesitantly took what suited him. He sometimes borrowed wholesale without change, and often adapted and reshaped his matter freely. Moody and Lovett write in this connection: "But what is more important is that Chaucer improved whatever he borrowed, and stamped it with his individuality of thought and style and structural skill. That part of his work we value most, however, such as the prologues to the Legend of Good Women and to The Canterbury Tales, was original in every sense, and some of the Tales have been so radically and vitally remodelled that they stand as genuinely original." Besides striking the note of originality, Chaucer turned his eyes to the life and people of his time. His realism reflects his modernity.

Humour and Pathos: Chaucer is the first genuine humorist in English poetry. Stopford A. Brooke writes: "Sometimes his humour is broad, sometimes shy, sometimes gay, but it is also exquisite and affectionate. His pathos does not go into the far depths of sorrow and pain, but it is always natural. He can bring tears into our eyes, and he can make us smile or be sad as he pleases."

Chaucer's Language and Versification: Chaucer is the first national poet of England, for he gave to the people a language, so reformed and reshaped, as to be a potent instrument for the expression of national life and thought. During Chaucer's time there was no standard form of English. There were four dialects — Southern, East Midland, Northumbrian and Kentish. Chaucer popularised the East Midland dialect by giving it a new form and shape. Chaucer made it the standard for future writers and the model of current modern English. He imparted to it smoothness, suppleness and simplicity and breathed into it a high poetic life. Chaucer wrote his memorable work The Canterbury Tales in the reshaped and reformed East Midland dialect. Lowes rightly remarks: "He found English a dialect and left it a language." Spenser called him "the well of English undefiled".

Chaucer imparted musical sweetness and liquidity to language. Stopford A. Brooke remarks: "His eye for colour was superb and distinctive. He had a very fine ear for the music of verse, and the tale and the verse go together like voice and music. Indeed, so softly flowing and bright are they, that to read them is like listening in a meadow full of sunshine to a clear stream riffling over its bed of pebbles."

Chaucer's style is noticeable for vigour, clarity and concreteness. His images are conspicuous for "uncomplicated naturalness". They are taken from the familiar areas of common experience; for example, the Monk's horse is "as broun as is a berie", the Friar's eyes twinkle "as doon the sterres in the frosty night", the Franklin's purse is as white as morning milk, and the threadbare Clerk's mount is "bene as is a rake". Chaucer uses'simple and direct adjectives to describe his pilgrims, for example: worthy, gay, bright, fair, fresh, perfect, sharp, wise etc. His descriptions are graphic and startling. The description of the Wife of Bath creates a graphic effect:

Booled was hir face, and fair, and reed of hewe.

Albert writes: "Chaucer's best descriptions of men, manners and places, as when giving details of conventional spring mornings and flowery gardens, have a vivacity that makes his poetry unique."

Instead of using courtly and elegant style Chaucer preferred the simple and racy vocabulary of colloquial English. James Winny writes: "In its racy turn of phrase and pithy commentary, the style of the General Prologue is close to the terse, pungent manner of the proverbial sayings which are scattered plentifully through his work. ...... By using this direct and richly vernacular style Chaucer is able to secure an effect of sensational reality, in which material objects take on a heightened power, as though seen with the intensity of imaginative insight."

Chaucer is the first man to use "naked words" in English; "the first to make our composite language a thing compact and vital". Stopford A. Brooke points out that he wrote The Canterbury Tales in "almost the English of our time. Chaucer made our tongue into a true means of poetry. He did more, he welded together the French and English elements in our language and made them into one English tool for the use of literature, and all our prose writers and poets derive their tongue from the language of The Canterbury Tales."

As a poetic artist, Chaucer is superb. In this respect he stands apart from other poets of his age. Gower wrote with a set object, and nothing can be less beautiful than the form in which he puts his tales. The author of Piers Plowman wrote with the object of reform of social and ecclesiastical affairs, and his form is harsh and uncouth. Chaucer wrote because he was full of emotion and joy in his own thoughts, and he did his best to arouse the same feelings and thoughts in the heart of his readers. He does not moralise. He does not reform. He is a pure poet. He, then, has the best right to the poet's name. He is, within his own range, the clearest of English artists.

As a versifier Chaucer is unique in contemporary poetry. He struck a modern note in versification because he discarded altogether the Old English irregular lines and alliteration—rim, ram, roff. He deftly adopted the French method of regular metre and end rimes. He introduced the heroic couplet into English verse and invented the rhyme royal.

Chaucer's Narrative Art or Chaucer as the Father of English Novel: Chaucer is a matchless narrator in verse. He is "often called the father of English poetry, it would be perhaps less flattering, but certainly true, to call him the father of English novel." His Troilus and Cressyde is the first English novel in everything except that it is written in verse. It is a love story and it contains all the elements of a modern novel. It has plot, dialogue, humour, irony, realism, conflict, dramatic element etc. In it Chaucer naturally told a story with delicacy, humour and psychological insight. The character of Cressyde is the first true psychological study of a complex woman and Pandarus is the first great comic character in English. S. D. Neil remarks: "Had Chaucer written in prose, it is possible that his Troilus and Cressyde and not Richardson's Pamela would be celebrated as the first English novel."

The Canterbury Tales is the best exposition of the spirit of novel. Almost all the tales are novels in miniature. What makes these tales novels in miniature is their realistic description of contemporary life and manners, singleness of plot, vivid characterisation with psychological insight, subtle sense of humour and dramatic element. In the words of W. J. Long, Chaucer's Tales "are stories as well as poems, and Chaucer is to be regarded as our first story-teller as well as our first modern poet."

Chaucer's method of narration is dramatic Action and dramatic vitality are the keynotes of his tales. Action, dialogue, gesture and costume are all there as in real life. Prologue "is the first act in the drama and gives us the dramatis personae of that "comedy which is not intended for the stage." F. N. Robinson comments on dramatic element in the Tales: "In fact, from one point of view, the pilgrimage is a continuous and lively drama, in which the stories themselves contribute to the action. Because of this sustained dramatic interest and the vivid reality of characters, as well as for the inclusive representation of English society, The Canterbury Tales has been called a Human Comedy. The implied comparison with Balzac's great series of stories of the life of modern France is not inappropriate."

Chaucer, as we have seen, created English language which became the future medium of English novel. Church says: "It is important to remember that from this fountainhead (Chaucer) there trickled, as a side-stream, the new medium of prose which was to become the appropriate vehicle for the novel proper." Chaucer anticipated the novel in the real sense. G. K. Chesterton humorously remarked: "If Chaucer is the father of English poetry, he is the grandfather of English fiction."

Chaucer's Contribution to English Language and Literature

Father of verse! who m immortal song
First taught the Muse to speak the English tongue

Chaucer was in many respects a pioneer, the first realist, the first humorist, the first narrative artist the first great character-painter, and the first great metrical artist in English literature. Further, he has been credited not only with the "fatherhood" of English poetry but has also been hailed as the father of English drama before the drama was born, and the father of English novel before the novel was born.. He is not only the first English poet, but a great poet in his own right.

Contribution to Language: - Chaucer found his English a dialect and left it a language. Chaucer found the English language brick and left it marble. When he started his literary career, the English speech, and still less, the English of writing was confusingly fluid and unsettled. The English language was divided into a number of dialects which were employed in different parts of the country. The four of them vastly more prominent than the others were: The Southern, The Midland, The Northern or Northumbrian and The Kentish.

Out of these four, the Midland dialect, which was spoken in London and its surrounding area, was the simplest in grammar and syntax. Moreover, it was the one patronised by the aristocratic and literary circles of the country. Chaucer employed in his work the East midland dialect, and by casting the enormous weight of his genius balance decided once for all which dialect was going to be the standard literary language of the whole of the country for all times to come. It is certain that if Chaucer had adopted some other dialect the emergence of the standard language of literature would have been considerably delayed. All the great writers of England succeeding Chaucer are masters of the language of which Chaucer is, before them, the great master.

Not only was Chaucer's selection of one dialect out of the four a happy one, but so was his selection of one of the three languages which were reigning supreme in England at that time-Latin, French, and English. In fact Latin and French were more fashionable than the poor "vernacular" English. Latin was considered "the universal language" and was patronised at the expense of English by the Church as well as the learned. French was the language of the court and was used for keeping the accounts of the royal household till as late as 1365. Chaucer chose English which was a despised language, and as the legendary king did to the beggar maid, raised her from the dust, draped her in royal robes, and conducted her coronation. That queen is ruling even now.

Contribution to Versification: - Chaucer's contribution to English versification is no less striking than to the English language. He sounded the death-knell of the Saxon alliterative measure and firmly established the modern one.

Chaucer may be designated as the father of modern English versification. In The Canterbury Tales he mostly uses lines of ten syllables each (with generally five accents); and the lines run into couplets; that is, each couple of lines has its end-syllables rhyming with each other. For example:

His eyes twinkled in his heed aright
As doon the sterres in the frosty night.

Not only this, Chaucer seems to be the first Englishman who realised and brought out the latent music of his language. "To read Chaucer's verse is like listening to a clear stream, in a meadow full of sunshine, rippling over its bed of pebbles." The following is the tribute of a worthy successor of his:

The morning star of song, who made
His music heard below,
Don Chaucer, the first -warbler, whose sweet breath
Preluded those melodious bursts thatfiU",
The spacious times of great Elizabeth
With sounds that echo still

He made English a pliant and vigorous medium of poetic utterance. His astonishingly easy mastery of the language is indeed remarkable. With one step the writings of Chaucer carry us into a new era in which the language appears endowed with ease, dignity, and copiousness of expression and clothed in the hues of the imagination.

The Content of Poetry: - Chaucer was a pioneer in the poetic field also. Not only the form of poetry, but its content, too, is highly indebted to him. He not only gave English poetry a new dress, but also a new body and a new soul. His major contribution towards the content of poetry is in his strict adherence to realism. His Prologue to the Canterbury Tales embodies a new effort in the history of literature, as it strictly deals with real men, manners, and life. The Prologue holds a mirror to the life of Chaucer's age and shows its manners and morals completely. He effectively replaces the shadowy delineations of the old romantic and allegorical school with the vivid and pulsating pictures of contemporary life.

Chaucer does not forget the universal beneath the particular, the dateless beneath the dated. The portraits of the pilgrims in the Prologue constitute not only an epitome of the society of fourteenth-century England, but the epitome of human nature in all climes and all ages. They are all with us today, though some of them have changed their names. The knight now commands a line regiment, the squire is in the guards, the shipman was a rum-runner while prohibition lasted and is active now in the black market and so on.

His Geniality, Tolerance, Humour, and Freshness: - Chaucer's tone as a poet is wonderfully instinct with geniality, tolerance, humour, and freshness. In spite of his awareness of the corruption and unrest in the society of his age Chaucer is never upset or upsetting. No one can read Chaucer without feeling that it is good to be alive in this world however imperfect may it be in numerous respects. He is a chronic optimist. He is never harsh, rancorous, bitter, or indignant, and never falls out with his fellow men for their failings. The great English humorists like Shakespeare and Fielding share with Chaucer the same broad human sympathy which he first introduced into literature Contribution to the Novel: - The novel is one of the latest courses in the banquet of English literature. But in his narrative skill, his gift of vivid characterization, his aptitude for plot-construction and his inventive skill Chaucer appears as a worthy precursor of the race of novelists who come centuries afterwards. His Tales are replete with intense human interest, and though he borrows his materials from numerous sundry sources, his narrative skill is all his own. His narration is lively and direct, if we make exception for the numerous digressions and philosophical and pseudo-philosophical animadversions having little to do with the tales proper, introduced after the contemporary fashion. It is difficult to find him flagging or growing dull and monotonous.

Chaucer's Prologue to The Canterbury Tales has been rightly called "the prologue to modern fiction." It has characters if not plot, and vivid characterization is one of the primary jobs of a novelist. According to Meredith "A novel should be a summary of actual life." So is, indeed, the Prologue. Several of the tales, too, are novels in miniature and hold the attention of the reader from the beginning to the end.

Contribution to the Drama: - Chaucer wrote at a time when secular drama had not been born. His works have some dramatic elements which are altogether missing in the poetry before him. His mode of characterisation in the Prologue to The Canterbury Tales is, no doubt, static or descriptive, but in the tales proper it is dynamic or dramatic. There the characters reveal themselves, without the intervention of the author, through what they say and what they do. Even the tales they narrate, in most cases, are in keeping with their respective characters, avocations, temperaments, etc. If the drama had been known in Chaucer's time as a branch of living literature, he might have attained as high an excellence in comedy as any English or Continental writer.

We can conclude the discussion with the words of David Daiches, 'With Chaucer the English language and English literature grew at a bound to full maturity. No other Middle English writer has his skill, his range, his complexity, his large humane outlook. His followers lack both his technical brilliance and his breadth of vision, leaving him the one undisputed master in Medieval English Literature'. Well said:

The morning star of song who made,
His music heard below,
Don Chaucer, the first warbler, whose sweet breath,
Preluded those melodious bursts that fill,
The spacious times of Great Elizabeth,
With sounds that echo still

Ecclesiastical Characters in the Prologue

In spite of the fact that in Chaucer's age, religion had a control over the personalities and soul of the individuals, yet lamentably, its impact was degenerate. The cloisters were advertising debasement, misusing the blameless people and were gaining cash under the cover of religion. Moralities and morals were blurring. The ministers had gotten famous for their covetousness, defilement and deceitfulness. They had overlooked their consecrated obligations and had gotten declined.

Of the thirty-one pilgrims of the Canterbury Tales, twelve were attached to religion in some way or other, and the manner in which Chaucer depicts them gives us some idea of the slack condition of many Church officials at the time and the poor opinion which the average man of education had of them. The bishops of the day were mainly shrewd men of business, quite respectable and hardworking; all of them English, owing their position to the joint efforts of King and Pope, but their energies were often devoted to public affairs rather than to the interests of their bishoprics. This was no new thing, but Wycliffe spoke and wrote fiercely against the corrupt clergy.

William Langland and John Wycliffe, as well as Chaucer, derided the practices of summoners, pardoners, and friar confessors, who were persecuting blackmailers protected by the law courts. How Chaucer exposes the corrupt clergy we can see it in his Prologue to the Canterbury Tales.

The Prioress is the first ecclesiastical figure in "The Prologue". She smiles amiably and sings in her nasal tone. Chaucer says ironically that she is aware of the manners of the society and knows how to carry morsel to her mouth. He says:

Wel koude she carie a morsel, and wel kepe
That no drope ne fille upon hir brest.

She wears fashionable dress with a golden broach, engraved with the words: "Amor Vincit Omnia" i.e. "Love conquers everything".

She truly signifies high-class religious-minded ladies of the 14th century. She is not an ideal Nun and typifies the traits of the contemporary prioress.

The Monk is a pleasure-loving fellow. An outridere, that lovede venerie,

He is fat like a lord, for he leads a relaxed life and passes his time in eating, drinking and merry-making. He is entirely misfit to his profession. He is fond of fine dresses. He wears fur-lined sleeves, gold pins and love-knot. A love knot in the gretter end there was

He does not like to study the strict rules and discipline of the cloister. He likes hunting and has fine horses and hounds in his stable.

The Friar is a wanton, greedy and corrupt fellow who neglects his duties and does not bother about religion. He is fond of singing, merry-making, drinking and visiting inns and public places. He builds relations with the rich Franklin and worthy women. He is a rogue, seducer of women and scoundrel. He encourages sins by setting an easy solution of apology, misuses his authority and exploits others in terms of their sin. He was also very expert in the art of begging.

For thogh a wydwe hadde noght a sho,
So plesaunt was his In principio

Yet wolde he have a ferthyng, er he wente

The Summoner is a nasty figure. Children are afraid of him. Of his visage children were aferd.

He loves garlic, red wine and onion. He is a hypocrite who allows people to carry on their sins and forgives them for a small donation to him. He knows the secret of young women and men and exploits them to his own interest.

The yonge girles of the diocise,
And knew hir conseil, and was al hir reed.

The Pardoner is a thorough cheat. His bag is full of relics which he sells to housewives and earns a lot.

He hadde a croys of latoun, ful of stones,
And in a glas he hadde pigges bones.

He deceives the simple folk. He sings merrily, sweetly and attracts the people in this way. Chaucer has a poor opinion of him and ironically calls him "a noble ecclesiastical".

In contrast to these corrupt religious characters, Chaucer gives a pleasant picture of the poor Parson, a shepherd, who protects his flock from the wolf.

A good man was ther of religioun,
And was a povre persoun of a toun;

He preaches sincerely, correctly and tries to practice what he preaches. He leads a simple, virtuous life of devotion and service. A bettre preest I trowe that nowher noon ys;

The Clerk is not an ecclesiastical character but he is studying at church. The Clerk is one of the idealized characters. He is well-versed in logic.

A clerk ther was of Oxenford also,
That unto logyk hadde longe ygo.

He does not run after showiness and worldly grandeur. He is a miser and poor. He is quick and meaningful in his talk. He is glad to learn and glad to teach. He is the picture of the poet's learning.

A very notable point in the portrayal of Chaucer's ecclesiastical characters is that the good ones are dull and drab; they are not as alive and interesting as the bad ones. This indicates that Chaucer was much more at home among real people who had their share of faults and failings which he enjoyed describing with all the artistic means at his command.People like the poor Parson and oxford clerk are idealized, unsubstantial figures whom we find without the warmth and vitality of the Friar and the Pardoner. Likewise, the Wife of Bath is a much more flesh and blood character than the Prioress.

To conclude, the profiteering clerics in the Prologue are easy going who lack spirit of sacrifice, respect for authority, acceptance of discipline, and at least a modicum of otherworldliness. The principal characteristics of Chaucer's monk, friar, pardoner and Summoner are greedy self-seeking, contempt for authority, evasion of discipline self-imposed in the vows of their orders, and a thorough-going worldliness, which not only sought the good things of life, but sought them at the expense of the needy. This great organisation, with its wealth, its power, and its conservative traditions, might have been expected to offer a safeguard against social decay but it was itself a fruitful breeding-ground for the very things which were disorganising feudal society.

"Chaucer's portraits do not illustrate a moral or philosophical thesis."

On first reading them, Chaucer's character sketches in the General Prologue certainly seem to serve as moral judgments on the portrayed individual. However, are these to be seen as functional as typifications of the entire social class that they represent or as portraits of contemporary individuals? I would argue that allegorist and literalist readings of the General Prologue are not mutually exclusive: that characters can exist for the reader on both levels. Insofar as they serve to illustrate an overall thesis, however, it seems sensible to concentrate of the characters as exemplars of their type and class.

Brewster states that "The only class system know to mediaeval theory" has "the familiar Three-fold division... into Knights, Clergy, and Ploughmen... Knights defend society, and maintain law and order; clergy defend men's souls and feed their minds; ploughmen provide food to maintain men's bodies." Although Chaucer chooses not to order his characters appearance in the General Prologue according to the class to which they belong, presumably because doing so would result in less opportunity for comparison, he appears to be sympathetic to such divisions.

The Knight, who we are first introduced to, obviously falls into the first category. Although Terry Jones sees him as something of a bloodthirsty mercenary, I feel he is projecting his own presentist negative attitude towards warfare onto a character Chaucer himself seems to be very sympathetic to. Indeed the Knight embraces and stands for values which Chaucer seems to wholeheartedly support: "trouthe and honour, freedom and curteusie." The rest of his household, his son the squire and the yeoman, seem to be morally worthy by association. His son, for all his youthful faults, is imbued with the same 'curteusie', and it seems so inevitable to me that he is going to mature into the Knight, that I see him as an image of the Knight as he was, before being ennobled by age and experience. As a fellow upholder of the law, the Sergeant of the Lawe can also be placed in this class, and he too is presented in largely sympathetic terms.

Chaucer's treatment of the ecclesiastical class is far less homogenous, ranging from his irony-free beautification of the Parson, to the little satirised Prioress and Monk, to the pilloried figure of the Friar. In fact, some view Chaucer's unfinished Canterbury Tales as the smoking gun, which reveals that the Church has him murdered for publishing such negative views of the clergy. However, his treatment of the clergy is not in any real sense radical or subversive; it merely reflects charges commonly levelled at the orders at the time. The Prioress is the first member of the clergy to appear and through her association with the Benedictine order we are invited to examine the behaviour of these characters in light of their vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Routine breaking of these supposedly sacred vows, along with the selling of indulgences and other such abuses are what eventually led to the Reformation.

The relative dearth of characters who can be considered ploughmen, figures who are directly concerned with the production of food, reflects the breakdown in feudal society and, more specifically, the breakdown in food supply due to the deaths of massive numbers of labourers at the hands of the Black Death. Although many contemporary figures attacked farm labourers of the day for demanding extortionate wages because of these conditions, Chaucer holds up his Ploughman as the epitome of simple, Christian living, "lyvynge in pees and parfit charitee". The Cook, with his very direct relationship to food production, is also characterised as an amenable fellow, but without the saintly virtues of the Ploughman However, the Peasant's Revolt of 1381 seems to have soured Chaucer's congeniality to the rural poor. This is evident in Chaucer's animalisation of the strong and brawny Miller. He compares his beard o the bristles on a sow. The fact that the Miller routinely breaks down doors with his head marks him out as a threshold-crosser, who does not respect the natural civic order. Chaucer time and time again employs physiognomy, the pop psychology of his day, in order to highlight the bestial and depraved side of his character. Similarly in the Pardoner physical and spiritual deformity go hand in hand.

The characters that do not fit in to this social framework are generally satirised as being overly concerned with the pursuit of profit or pleasure, the Merchant and Franklin being chief in each of these respective categories. The disinterested, asexual, and devoutly religious Clerk seems to be the moral example they should be following. In the five guildsmen, Chaucer mildly mocks middle-class self-importance, but neither holds them up as moral beacons or attacks them as degenerates.

As far as there is a philosophical thesis in The General Prologue, it centres on two qualities: caritas: charity and compassion, and cupiditas: greed and the inordinate desire for wealth. Chaucer seems to accept the cupiditas is a necessary evil insofar as it leads to a functional and productive society. For example, the Merchant's cupiditas is respected as it is honest and makes him a 'better' merchant. On the other hand, the Reeve's dishonest pilfering of his master's estate is seen as bestial, sub-human. His animal nature is reinforced by his association with his master's livestock: "His lordes sheep, his neet, his dayerye | His swyn, his hors, his stoor, and his pultrye." Little more than an animal, his fate is evinced by his constant position at the rear of the company of pilgrims: the furthest from salvation. This seems to recognise that there will be recompense paid in the afterlife for holding cupiditas as one's central tenet, and, conversely, reward for caritas.

It is important to note that Chaucer's characters are neither stereotypes nor, as DW Robertson puts it "elaborate iconographic figures designed to show the manifold implications of an attitude". They are not one-sided unequivocal creations and my own interpretation of what Chaucer saw as their moral virtues and vices is far from unequivocal. The General Prologue, and of course The Canterbury Tales itself, is a rich and complex text, often ambivalent and ironic. Although we are dealing with archetypal figures, we are dealing with them outside the moral boundaries and strictures of everyday life; pilgrims in amoral zone of 'pleye' and 'game'. In Malcolm Andrew's words, "The poet creates a fiction with decontextualises his pilgrims: the commentators employ a method which recontextualises them." In conclusion, Chaucer does not present us with a moral or philosophical thesis in these portraits. Nor does he provide an antithetical reaction against the hierarchal imposed moral and philosophical theses of church and feudal state. Instead, through his ambiguity and he offers us the opportunity to define and redefine the moral meaning of these brilliantly drawn portraits.

Elements of Drama and Novel in the Prologue

Chaucer had in him distinct characteristics of a novelist and a dramatist. His consummate art of story-telling in The Canterbury Tales does indicate that if he chose he could be one of the immortal novelists of the world. Chaucer proves himself a master of the art of characterisation, skilful in his handling of dialogue, delighting in action, and keenly alive to the value of effective situation and climax. Above all, he is the master of constructive art. He is able to weld different tales into harmonious groups.

The Prologue to the Canterbury Tales is the prologue of modern fiction. Its characterisation, realistic portrayal of life and a sort of structural unity give it the semblance of a novel in miniature. If we could take thirty per cent of Goldsmith, fifty of Fielding, and twenty of Walter Scott, and vitalise this compound with the spirit of the fourteenth century, we should get perhaps fairly near to another Chaucer. But it would be a Chaucer whose right hand wrote in prose and only his left in verse, and our formula, though it may be useful in suggesting the writers to whom Chaucer is most akin, and how modern he really is, would still be defective, for the charm of his poetry remains personal and individual. Chaucer like any other modern novelist was gifted with the ability of revealing the human heart and unravelling the complexities of sentiments.

Like a novelist Chaucer has a masterly art of description and narration. His portraits in the Prologue are no less vivid than the characters in any human comedy. The narrative style in the Prologue speaks of an inimitable precision and enviable literary style. The central incident is the pilgrimage which unifies the whole band of travellers to the shrine of St. Thomas into the inter-related people of a novel or the actors of a drama. Above all, it is Chaucer's stark realism and nearly complete objectivity which are the hall-marks of a modern novelist or a real dramatist of any age. The point is that Chaucer as it is evident to us in the Prologue does seem to be possessing the talents of a novelist and a dramatist. The prologues to the Tales are the counterparts of the soliloquies of Shakespeare or the monologues of Browning or the interior monologues of modern fiction writers. His negative capability matches the aesthetics of a true artist who presents his viewpoint not as a lyrical poet but as a passionate at the same time detached story-teller or playwright.

In Chaucer's works contains the seeds of the drama and novel. Had Chaucer been a contemporary of Shakespeare, he might well have written plays. Had he been a contemporary of Fielding, he might well have written novels. The power for both is implicit in the Canterbury Tales, and adds richness to that incomparable work. Throughout the Tales, there is not only creation, but interplay and clash of characters. The pilgrims, brilliantly pointed for us in the Prologue, are developed, and elaborated, some more, some less, as the poem proceeds, and always with a beautiful consistency. There is the mutual disparagement between the Miller and the Reeve, between the Summoner and the Friar; the attempt of the pardoner to make capital out of his story and his vigorous repulse by the landlord. The Wife of Bath in the immensely garrulous and entertaining dissertation upon marriage, which precedes her story, reveals herself as a full-length comedy character, and satisfies, incidentally, the curiosity of the reader as to why he was casually told, in the Prologue, that she was deaf in one ear. The Knight (perfect and gentle) finds the Monk's catalogue of historical disasters unspeakably tedious. By means of these passages of narrative and comment between the tales Chaucer keeps his characters alive, each one being aware of the rest, so that the tales themselves, though they are in fact the main body of the work, are yet but an incident in the whole.

Chaucer is indeed properly to be called a poet; but he bears a closer relation to the great English novelists than to Spenser. The scholarship which is preoccupied with exposing the derivativeness of Chaucer's poetry tends also to obscure the remarkable newness of what Chaucer has done. How new Chaucer's poetry is it is difficult for us to apprehend because so many of the remarkable developments in English literature since—and each original author has been a new development—have been developments from what Chaucer did for the first time. The Canterbury Tales and Troilus and Criseyde are, if one thinks back to what there was before them which they are developments from, surprisingly new works of art.

With the Canterbury Tales Chaucer inaugurates the English novel; and, moreover, the Great Tradition of it. In this dramatic-poetic novel we see the English novel actually in being, with the characteristics of our eighteenth and nineteenth-century masterpieces. Chaucer's preoccupations here are those of the great novelists. He explores the theme of the individual's relation to the society in which he lives; launches the comedy of the clash of character and the conflict of interest and motives; and shows the comic and ironic effects obtainable from the class distinctions felt by the newly emerged bourgeoisie associated with the growth of town life and of the trades and commerce (the Wife of Bath is the new bourgeois wife asserting her independence). He observes, as do Jane Austen and George Eliot, the changes in manners and outlook between the older generation and the new—between the Knight and his son, and Franklin and his—and, like them he develops to the highest artistic level what is only in an elementary form elsewhere in his contemporaries the kind of characterization which distinguishes the English novel from Bunyan to Henry James—characters which, while exquisitely realistic in detail, are morally and socially typical.

Chaucer's tolerant observation and relish of humanity gave him a power of representing it, which has been rarely surpassed in any respect save depth. It has been disputed whether this power is rather that of the dramatist or that of the novelist, a dispute perhaps arguing a lack of the historic sense. In the late sixteenth or early seventeenth century, Chaucer would certainly have been the one, and in the mid-nineteenth the other. It would be most satisfactory could we have his work. The author has, in fact, set himself a high task by adopting the double system above specified, and by giving elaborate descriptions of his personages before he sets them to act and speak up to these descriptions. It is a plan which, in the actual drama and the actual novel, has been found rather a dangerous one. But Chaucer discharges himself victoriously of his liabilities. And the picture of life which he has left us has captivated all good judges who have given themselves the very slight trouble necessary to attain the right point of view, from his own day to this.

Irony in The Prologue

Irony is a method of humorous or sarcastic expression in which the intended meaning of the words used is the direct opposite of their usual sense. It is also the feigning of ignorance in argument. The voice of the satirist speaking out of a mask is subtle irony. Behind the mask his face may be dark with fury or writhing with contempt, but his voice is calm, sometimes soberly earnest, sometimes lightly amused. The lips of the mask and its features are persuasive, almost real, perfectly controlled. Some of those who hear the voice, and see the polite lips, from which it issues, are persuaded that it is the utterance of truth and that the speaker believes everything he says. Aristotle said that irony was the opposite of boasting: it was mock-modesty, dissimulation, and self-depreciation.

Geoffrey Chaucer is frequently ironical in many respects. His irony is what metaphor is for later poets. Both irony and metaphor put into the same set of words a double meaning; whereas in metaphor they are linked by comparison, in irony they are linked by contrast. The linkage is important. In each case the two elements of the double meaning modify each other, though one may be dominant. In the case of irony the superficial 'false' meaning is still part of the total meaning. It modifies the "true" meaning, if only by asserting that even the underlying meaning is not the only competitor for our assent; or by establishing a limited validity even for simple mindedness. The obvious meaning is the contribution innocence makes to experience. More generally the duality of irony contributes a certain kind of uncertainty, and hence a need for toleration, not least for the poet himself, who uses irony to evade responsibility.

Chaucer’s irony is always gentle, seldom severe, and never savage. He is to all intents and purposes a comic ironist. His portraits in the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales are excellent examples of comic irony. In fact, throughout the Prologue the reader has to be on his guard against Chaucer's seeming enthusiasm towards each of his pilgrims, realising that his irony operates indirectly through praise that is characteristically excessive and generous, whether sincere or not.

In the Prologue his remarks about the Knight that 'He was a verray, parfit gentil knight' are straightforwardly respectful, but his generous tribute to the Monk 'A manly man, to been an abbot able' should leave us wondering whether he means that most abbots were appointed for their worldliness and self-indulgence. When he rounds off the description of the Merchant by remarking "For sothe he was a worthy man with alle" Chaucer's irony is obvious, for he has just disclosed the pilgrim's dishonesty and hypocritical manner. Similarly, that 'verray parfit praktisour' the Physician, although described in terms which recall the Knight, observes a code which inverts the standards of truth, honour and liberality which the Knight strives to uphold. Here Chaucer's seeming praise is doubly ironic.

The physician is not the genuine, perfect practitioner of a noble ideal but shrewd, miserly and self-regarding. The nun in Madame Eglentine is a charming imposture, imperfectly concealing a woman whose social ambitions lead her into an absurd confusion of purposes—a mimicking of courtly mannerisms that are completely inappropriate to her calling. She is a specimen of fascinating disparity between what she is and what she seems to be, and Chaucer exploits this comic incongruity in a very subtle manner. The Wife of Bath is subjected to irony when Chaucer while praising her charitable nature points out that she goes out of all charity if some other woman in the parish takes precedence over her in making the offering. The implication is that charity should be evidenced by humility, not by pride, by gentleness, not by anger.

Leaving aside such idealisation as the Knight, the Parson and the Plowman, it may be undeniably asserted that Chaucer takes men as he finds them, obtaining that kind of amusement in the ironic yet sympathetic observation of his fellows which yields itself only to the artist's vision. Although he has a loving relish for human behaviour and human weakness, it is wrong, as some critics tend to do, to play down his irony. A high proportion of his pilgrims are rascals, and Chaucer knows that they are. Nor can we ignore his clear attack on corruption in the Church, though here again the attack is done obliquely through the presentation of individual characters. The Monk and the Friar and the Summoner are amusing enough characters as Chaucer describes them, but the behaviour of the latter two, brilliantly presented and magnificently comic though it is, is the behaviour of petty blackguards. The Pardoner, perhaps Chaucer's greatest masterpiece of character drawing, implies a whole world of moral hypocrisy.

Lastly, there is an element of Socratic irony in the prologue. He not only uses irony in portrayal of other character but also his own character and says: My wit is short, ye may well understand. Chaucer's point of view is no doubt secular throughout the Prologue, and he is intrigued rather than shocked by the weaknesses of human nature. But irony always has moral implications, and Chaucer in the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales was not an ironist for nothing.

Satire in The Prologue

Satire is a genre of literature in which vices, follies, abuses, and shortcomings are held up to ridicule, ideally with the intent of shaming individuals, corporations, government or society itself, into improvement. Although satire is usually meant to be humorous, its greater purpose is often constructive social criticism, using wit as a weapon and as a tool to draw attention to both particular and wider issues in society. Satire differs from humour in that it has a definite moral purpose. The satirist deliberately alienates our sympathies from those whom he describes, and as the true humorist is apt to pass from comedy to romance, and from romance to tragedy, so the satirist not infrequently ends by finding rage and disgust overpower his sense of the ridiculous. The fact is that satire is not Chaucer's natural bent. His interest lies in portraiture rather than in exposure. His object is to point life as he sees it, to hold up the mirror to nature.

Chaucer's kinship as a satirist is with Fielding. They are alike in a certain air of rollicking good-fellowship and a determination to paint men and women as they know them. Both enjoy a rough prank, and have little patience with over-refinement. Both give the readers a sense of studies honesty and kindliness, and know how to combine tenderness with strength. Both with all their tolerance, have a keen eye for hypocrisy or affectation and a sharp tongue wherewith to chastise and expose it. Chaucer hates no one, not even the Pardoner.

In Chaucer we have no sustained satire of the Popean or the Swiftean type. His genius is like that of Shakespeare, having a high degree of negative capability. Hence, Chaucer gives us no impression of being a great satirist, although in his writings especially in the portraits of the Prologue we have sharp little sallies of satire. It would be rather more suitable to call Chaucer a comic satirist in relation to his Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. Comic satire predominates in extraordinarily rich Prologue.

There are, therefore, certain limitations of scope. The higher aristocracy are excluded, for the Knight is comparatively low ranking, and is in any case an ideal figure. The painfulness and rough comedy of the life of the great mass of the really poor find no place, and again their two representatives are idealized portraits. The characters of highest and lowest ranks were not suitable for comic treatment. In the Prologue we mainly see the middling people, and we see them through Chaucer's eyes from a slightly superior moral and social station. We can afford to laugh at them. We look through the eyes of a poet masculine, self-assured, delighted, who knows that there is "joy after woe, and after joy, sadness. He sees abuses but is neither surprised nor stung by them. Men are not angels, but neither are they devils. Chaucer gives us a vision of men and women in the world, and most of them have some relish of absurdity when looked at carefully especially when they require neither our loyalty nor our fear.

Chaucer does not see his company of pilgrims simply as an incongruous assortment of pantomime figures, to be enjoyed for their grotesquely comic oddity. The pervasive element of social satire in the General Prologue—most prominent in his account of the ecclesiastical figures—suggests Chaucer's serious concern at the debasing of moral standards. There are moments, as when he records the Friar's sneering contempt for the poor, which seem to show Chaucer's habitual good temper revolting against the cynical opportunism which had become widespread in ecclesiastical life. His usual attitude towards the moral weakness which he discloses is one of mocking. The Shipman is a thievish pirate, the Reeve a cunning embezzler, the Physician has a dishonest private understanding with his druggist, and the Man of Law 'semed bisier than he was'. The efforts of the Prioress to mimic courtly manners are detected and set down with the same intuitive sense of false appearance as allows Chaucer to penetrate the Merchant's imposing disguise. The mask of respectability is not roughly torn off, for while he is describing his pilgrims Chaucer is maintaining an outward manner that is awed and deferential; telling us that the Prioress was 'of greet desport', that the Monk was a manly man, 'to been an abbot able', or that the murderous Shipman was an incomparable navigator and pilot.

Because he does not insist upon their moral failings or hypocritical nature, revealing them with an ironic innocence of manner and leaving them to speak for themselves, Chaucer's approach to his pilgrims suggests a psychologist rather than a moralist' He presents vices and shortcomings within the context of human individuality, as a product of the curious pressures which stamp a unique personality upon each of the pilgrims. The Shipman's easy conscience is an integral part of the tough, self-reliant spirit of the man, which has acquired the wilfulness and moral unconcern of the elements in which he lives. His thefts and murders, the Franklin's Epicureanism, the Physician's avarice, interest Chaucer not as evidence of a breakdown of moral values but for what they reveal of individual character.

Thus Chaucer's satire is not directed against contemporary morals, but against the comic self-ignorance which gives man two' identities—the creature he is, and the more distinguished and inscrutable person he imagines himself to be.

Chaucer's Poetic style

The style of an author is his distinctive manner of writing or expressing thought in language. In commenting on Chaucer's style, it would be well to remember that he was writing in English at a time when that language was in a rather poor state of development. To Chaucer goes the credit of having developed the condition of his native language to such an extent, that only the addition of blank verse was required to make English poetry fully equipped. He took up a dialect and left it a language. He enriched it by-adapting words from foreign languages, especially French. He infused the rough English dialect with the refinement and polish of the French language. He brought flexibility to his native language.

Conversational and colloquial style: - As we read The Prologue to The Canterbury Tales, we are immediately struck by its conversational tone. The verse flows with a pleasing fluidity. It shows Chaucer's mastery of the decasyllabic couplet. We find ordinary speech, common proverbs and idiomatic terms, and even contemporary slang in his poetry. It provides a conversational viewpoint to Chaucer's style.

Chaucer's use of contemporary idiomatic terms and phrases, adds to the colloquial style. One such instance, which immediately comes to mind, is in the lines about the Monk :

He yaf not of that text a pulled hen And
But thilke text heeld he nat worth an oystre.

In The Prologue, we come across a racy and forceful style, which has the pungency of a proverb. It is especially evident in the fabliaux (comic verse), which present the comic aspects of ordinary life.

His owene hand he made laddres thre,
To climben by the rouges and the stalkes……
Unto the tubbes hanginge in the balkes ...

Chaucer's skill, in fact, lies in the smooth transition, which is effected from the "high" to the colloquial style.

Forceful directness and immediacy of style: - Chaucer's style has a directness and immediacy, which comes from the habitual employment of the verb 'to be' in describing the pilgrims. His statements are so plain and simple that they admit no qualifications.

"A Monk ther was", "his heed was balled", "whit was bard as is the dayesie"—these statements are clear, solid and irrefutable. The terms in which the pilgrims are described, are simple and direct. The most common of the adjectives used are, perfect, gay, fair, wise, and worthy. They often gain their strength and directness through masterly placing in a line. The Wife of Bath comes alive before us in the simplest, but so very graphic terms: Bold was hir face, and fair, and reed of hewe.

The Shipman's tanned face is vividly described in very ordinary words:

The hoote smoer hadde masd his hewe brown.
Forceful directness of the figures of speech

The simple immediacy which marks the adjectives used for the pilgrims is to be found in Chaucer's images, too. Chaucer has plenty of images and similes. But they are all simple, direct, and never elaborate. At the same time, they have vivid and arresting quality. His mouth as greet was a greet forneys says Chaucer, and we get a direct picture of the cavernous mouth of the Miller. The Squire is "as fresh as is the month of May". The Friar's neck is as white as a lily (flour-delys), and his eyes shine like "stars in the frosty night." The Miller's beard is as red "as any sow or fox", while the Franklin has a beard, "white as is a daisy." The graphic description of the tuft of hair on the wart of the Miller's nose, is unforgettable. It is red "as the bristles of a sow's ears". The Pardoner's eyes look like those of a hare, and he has a voice which resembles that of goat. The Monk's horse is "as brown as a berry", and the Franklin's purse is "white as morning milk", while the poor Oxford Clerk's horse is "lean as rake".

The images are derived from the common spheres of experience. They are uncomplicated and direct. Chaucer does not employ extended simile and metaphor in his poetry. His images are drawn from homely and familiar fields of life.

Use of intensifying terms to emphasise a point: - A special stylistic device used by Chaucer is the emphatic manner in which he underscores his point. Some of his statements have an air of clear finality. "He was a verray parfit, gentil knyght", sums up the Knight in simple and direct words. Some of the words which Chaucer uses frequently to intensify and emphasise a point, are ful, wd, al, certainly. They are all affirmative and positive terms. It seems to indicate a stylistic device through which Chaucer associates himself with the positive and generous outlook on life.

The Monk is "a lord ful fat and in good poynt" and "certainly he was a fair prelate". The Frankin had "full many a fat partrirch" in his house to satisfy his epicurean taste. The use of these intensive adjectives is at its most effective in the description of the five Guildsmen. Though they are described collectively, they are given a sharper reality by the emphasis implied in the terms, ful and al.

Ful fresshe and newe hir geere apiked was;
hir knives were chaped noght with bras
Bill al with silver; wrought ful clene and wel.

Chaucer emphasises on a point at times through arranging words in a way, which is not the normal manner :

God loved he best with al his hoote herte

The medieval stylistic device of alliteration is also to be found in Chaucer's poetry:

Ful long were his legges and ful lene
Ful byg he was of brawn, and eek of bones.

It gives the lines a musical effect. There are some words which Chaucer seems very fond of and which he uses fairly often. 'Wel koude he', wel knew he,' 'ful byg, etc., occur quite a few times in his poetry. Mostly, 'wel', 'ful', etc., are employed to enhance the metrical effect of the lines.

In conclusion, his style is direct, plain and conversational. His imagery is likewise direct and vivid, drawn from common and familiar fields of experience. He has a masterly ability of making a smooth transition from the 'high' to the colloquial style, without losing any fluidity of movement. He shows a sure judgement and confidence in the choice of the right words. The charm of fluent simplicity and perfect appropriateness of word to thought, make Chaucer's style an important aspect of his poetry.

Character of the Wife of Bath

The most vivid and famous portrait in The Prologue to The Canterbury Tales, is, perhaps, the Wife of Bath. She is one character in whom the realistic and the individualistic elements of portraiture outweigh the typical. She is the most entertaining character in The Prologue. We enjoy her sheer vitality, robustness and earthy essence. Chaucer accepted folly, vice and immorality as part and parcel of men as well as women. In presentation of the Wife of Bath, we certainly do have satire, but the satire is not violent or bitter and fierce.

A vivid character of flesh and blood: - The Wife of Bath is the essence of elemental vitality. She is the woman of earthy physical passion, firm boldness and dominating personality. She comes before us vividly. Her red face, bold expression, huge and voluptuous body attired in a riding coat, the gaps in her teeth, her new shoes, broad wimple adoring her head, and her heavy and fine kerchiefs, all add to a startlingly vivid character of flesh and blood. She would not tolerate any other woman of her parish to give the offering before her at church. She was fully insistent on her rights of precedence, as she was a rich and prominent member of her parish. If any confusion about precedence occurred, she would be 'out of all charitee'. The Wife of Bath did not suffer from any false modesty. She knew her place in society and laid full claims to it.

Her forceful personality and experience of the world: - It is not without significance that she is the finest weaver in the country. She is a prosperous and important member of her community. Naturally, she dresses in accordance with her position in society. Her appearance is neat as well as forceful. She wore the best of clothes, though she was slightly overdressed on Sundays. However, she would want to impress upon the world that she is a successful business woman. She wears her bright scarlet stockings neatly and straight.

Her kerchiefs are 'full fine of ground', i.e., of fine texture. Her knowledge of travelling and experience of pilgrimages is shown in her choice of suitable dress and mount for the occasion. She wears a protective outer skirt around her broad and generous hips, and is mounted on an ambling horse, which has been trained to walk in a manner most comfortable for the rider. She also wears spurs, and hence we can conclude that she rides astride and not side-saddle.

The Wife of Bath has a forceful personality which suits her generous physical attributes. She has a firm mind which knows its wants clearly. She also knows how to get what she wants. She is jolly, gossipy, and popular woman fond of men's company and well versed in the art of love. She has widely travelled. We are told that she had visited Jerusalem thrice, besides other places of pilgrimage.

Her amorous adventure: - Her physical vitality is best represented by her various amorous adventures. She is a much-married woman—she has had five husbands and is ready for the sixth. Her promptitude in getting husbands would not have surprised her fellow pilgrims. The Wife of Bath, with her eager willingness to get married, would have found husbands with even greater promptitude. She is, however, the dominant partner in marriage. She would not allow her husband to rule the home. She would have firm control over her home as well as her husband. In her Prologue to her tale, she remarks.

"I wol bistowe the flour of al myn age
In the acts and in fruyt of marriage"

She is entirely as secular figure, and confesses that she has never aspired to live the perfect life. She has no use for transcendental religion.

The Wife of Bath has experienced not merely marital love, but has had a number of affairs in her youth. Her experience of love is subtly summed up by Chaucer when he says at the end of her portrait:

Or remedies of love she knew per chauce,
For She koude of that art the old chauce..

Two striking features : gap teeth and deafness: - The most vivid physical attributes of the Wife of Bath are, perhaps, that she was 'some-del def' and 'gat-toothed'. Gap teeth indicated wide travel, amorousness, and an envious, faithless, irreverent, luxurious, and bold nature. The Wife of Bath has all these features. The reason for her getting somewhat deaf is given later. Her fifth husband in an attempt to assert his male superiority hit her across her ears. But beyond the damage to her ears, we may be quite sure that Wife of Bath would not have allowed her husband to gain any superiority.

Her war against male domination: - The Wife of Bath is a pure militant as far as women's liberation is concerned. She is not merely an aggressive, uninhibited, vulgar woman dominating the particular men fortunate or unfortunate enough to have been married by her. She embodies the eternal female in revolt against a male-ordered and male-centred civilization. Men's evils and vices were firmly attributed to the temptation signified by women. The Wife of Bath, despite all her vulgarity and boisterous coarseness, embodies the demand for respectability for woman as individuals. She is at once a representative of all that a man dislikes in a women—nagging, spending, gossiping, etc.—and what every woman desires for, which is domination over males.

Conclusion: - The Wife of Bath has an awe-inspiring personality, overwhelming in its impact and flamboyancy. It is apt that she should be on the pilgrimage to Canterbury, for a pilgrimage in the Middle Ages was a means of pleasure as well as an object of piety. The Wife of Bath is a clear-cut individual in her self-revelation before she tells her tale or gives her opinion on marriage, and tells her adventures in the marital field without a sign of inhibition. The Wife of Bath is the most complex character among the pilgrims.

The Prologue as a Picture of Fourteenth Century England

Chaucer is truly the social chronicler of England at the end of fourteenth century. His work is the most precious document for whoever wishes to evoke a picture of life as it then was. The fact is that Chaucer had intimate knowledge of the crosscurrents of English society of his time. His keen observation, vast study, extensive travel and variegated experience in the service of the state had familiarised him with the entire pageant of social life of those days. It was with the intention of describing his boundless knowledge of men and manners that he conceived the plan of the Canterbury Tales which encompass every aspect of life in the fourteenth century England.

The group of pilgrims described in the Prologue is itself an unequalled picture of the Society of Chaucer's time. Here are some thirty persons belonging to the most different classes. There is a Knight lately come from the foreign wars. He is a high-minded gentle-mannered, knightly adventurer, type of the courteous, war-loving chivalry which was passing rapidly away. With him is his son, a young Squire, curly haired and gay, his short, white-sleeved gown embroidered like mead with red-and-white flowers. He is an epitome of the gifts and graces of brilliant youth. Their servant is a Yeoman, in coat and hoof of a green, a sheaf of peacock-arrows under his belt, a mighty bow in his hand. He is the type of solid English yeomanry.

There is a whole group of ecclesiastical figures, representing in their numbers and variety the diverse activities of the medieval church. Most of them are satirical portraits, in their worldliness and materialism only too faithfully representative of the ecclesiastical abuses against which Wycliffe struggled. First of all there is a Monk, who cares only for hunting and good cheer. His bald head shines like glass, his bright eyes roll in his head. He rides a sleek brown palfrey, and has "many a dainty horse" in his stables. His sleeves are trimmed with fine fur at the wrists ; his hood is fastened under his chin with a gold love-not. As a companion figure to the hunting Monk, Chaucer gives us "Madame Eglantyne," the Prioress. She is a teacher of young ladies, speaks French "after the school of Stratford-atte-bowe." is exquisite in her table-manners, counterfeiting as well as she can the stately behaviour of court.

Other ecclesiastics are there, hangers-on and caterpillars of the church. The Friar, intimate with hospitable franklins, innkeepers, and worthy women, despises beggars and lazars. The Summoner is a repulsive person with "fire-red cherubim face". The Pardoner "come from Rome all note" has a bag full of pardons which he sells as relics of the holy saints to gullible people. Chaucer's treatment of these evil churchmen is highly good-natured and tolerant. He never takes the tone of moral indignation against them. But he does better, he sets beside them, as the type of true shepherds of the church, a "poor Parson”. Chaucer paints the character of the Parson, poor in this world's goods, but "rich of holy thought and work," with loving and reverent touch. The Parson's brother travels with him—a Plowman, a "true swinker and a good", who helps his poor neighbours without hire and loves them as himself. He reminds us of Piers the Plowman, in the wonderful Vision which is the antitype of Chaucer's work.

A crowd of other figures fill the canvas. There is a shipman from the west-country, a representative of those adventurous seamen, half merchant-sailors, half smugglers and pirates, who had already made England’s, name a terror on the seas and paved the way for her future naval and commercial supremacy. There is a poor Clerk of Oxford, riding a horse as lean as a rake, and dressed in threadbare cloak, who spends all that he can beg or borrow upon his studies. He represents that passion for learning which was already astir everywhere in Europe, and which was awaiting only the magic touch of the new-found classical literature to blossom out into genuine thought and imagination. There is a Merchant, in a Flemish beaver hat, on a high horse, concealing, with the grave importance of his air, the fact that he is in debt. There is a group of guild-members, in the livery of their guild, all worthy to be aldermen; together with the merchant, they represent the mercantile and manufacturing activity which was lifting England rapidly to the rank of a great commercial power. There is the Wife of Bath, almost a modern feminist figure, conceived with masterly humour and realism, a permanent human type. She has had "husbands five at church-door, "and though" somdel deaf," hopes to live to wed several others. She rides on an ambler, with spurs and scarlet hose on her feet, and on her head a hat as broad as a buckler.

Apart from the men and their manners, the Prologue also sheds light on contemporary clothing, food and occupations. Almost every character man or woman is in a typical dress and other personal array. Several of the pilgrims are conspicuously armed, others carry small items of equipment, like a silken purse or a pouch or a pair of sharp spurs or a musical instrument. Chaucer uses the details of clothing and other outfit not only to describe the pilgrim's appearance but also to throw further light on his or her character. Thus the Wife of Bath, with her ambition to be the first wife in her parish. The brooch of the Prioress bearing the motto Amor Vincit Omnia indicates that this nun has a character vacillating between secular and divine love.

Chaucer's descriptions of the pilgrims and their food vary at a great deal. We only read that the Knight on his campaigns had often "the bord bigonne," that the Squire "carf before his fader" at the table, and that the Prioress had elegant table manners, never slobbered, and liked to feed her little dogs on bread and milk. The Monk loved hunting and presumably ate venison and game. His special dish was a roast fat swan, a delicacy usually eaten only by kings, abbots, and such folk. We are not told that the Friar had any specially favourite dish, but instead of consorting with the poor, like St. Francis, he loved taverns and tapsters, and all "sellers of vitaille." The Summoner loved garlic, onions, leeks, and strong bood-red wine. This exuberant taste no doubt accounted for his bad, incurable complexion. The Clerk of Oxford quite frankly preferred books to food, and economised in order to add to his library. But the Franklin was a real epicure. His bread and ale were always first class, and his house was never without baked meats, both fish and flesh. It snowed meat and drink in his house, and he had all seasonable dainties provided, partridges, bream, pike, with suitable sauces. He kept practically open house, and was severe with his cook if the flavouring of his dishes was not absolutely to his taste.

The Cook who accompanied the party was the sort of man employed by a City company or at an Inn of Court or by an innkeeper. He was an expert, and could boil chickens and marrow bones, and cook well-flavoured tarts. He appreciated London ale, and could roast, seethe, boil, and fry and was a successful maker of meat-pies and blanc-mange.

The list of the Cook's capabilities gives us a good idea of the scope of entertainment possible for people of comfortable means, and a good deal of this variety could be obtained at biggish inns on well-known highways and in large towns.

Chaucer has made a direct transcription from common life; and, since ordinary things and ordinary people are the most representative, he has provided an invaluable document for those who wish to call up the social life of the time. But Chaucer does not attempt to chronicle contemporary events, nor concern himself with politics or public questions. Chaucer, like his pilgrims, is more interested in his own. His characters, like the majority of people in all time, are wrapped up in their own affairs, and untroubled by the storms around them, except insofar as their private interests are touched. Nevertheless, they are distinctive of their time and country. The Knight stands for the finest chivalry of the Crusades. The clergy are characteristic of his time. Chaucer painted from the life, are the actual men whose vices and corruption Wycliffe and his followers denounced so vehemently.

Finally, it must be borne in mind that as a painter of his society Chaucer acts more as a poet and artist than as a chronicler. His treatment of English men and manners of the fourteenth Century is not as a social reformer but as a tolerant humanist and his attitude of toleration carries more conviction than the denunciation of a moralist.

The Prologue : As a portrait gallery

The Prologue has rightly been called a 'portrait-gallery'. The pilgrims, who collect at the Tabard to set out on their journey to Canterbury, belong to a variety of classes and professions. Chaucer is the first English poet to present such a lovely procession of men and women, who are differentiated from one another by the subtlest touches of characterization. The characters come alive on the pages of The Prologue. They are vital and realistic.

Cross-section of the fourteenth century English society: - The Prologue is often referred to as a social chronicle, and Chaucer as a social historian. Though The Prologue is much more than a mere social chronicle, there is truth in the remark that it gives a cross-section of English society in the fourteenth century. Through the clever device of a pilgrimage, Chaucer has been able to assemble the representatives of the widest possible section of the society of his day. Only the aristocracy and the lowest rungs of society are left out—both classes would have been out of place on such a pilgrimage.

The Knight heads the procession of pilgrims. He has the highest social position among Chaucer's pilgrims. He belongs to the Chivalric code. He is accompanied by his son, who is also his Squire, and by his Yeoman, as was customary for the knights of the medieval times. The Knight has distinguished himself in battle, both in heathen and Christian lands. His son, too, has shown his prowess in wars. He represents the devotee of courtly love. The Yeoman is a forester and a loyal servant to the Knight and the Squire.

After the chivalric order, comes the ecclesiastical order, i.e., the representatives of the regular clergy. We have a Prioress, a Monk, and a Friar. Each presents the various degrees of corruption and degeneracy which was prevalent in the religious orders of the day. The Prioress' mind seems to be divided between the demands of the religious and the attractions of the secular aspects of life. The motto on her brooch, 'Love Conquers All', clearly indicates the confusion. The Monk hunts and enjoys sumptuous food, contrary to his vows of seclusion and abstinence. The Friar is typical of the order as found in Chaucer's time. He makes money by misusing his authority.

After the ecclesiastical characters representing the regular clergy, we have a procession of middle class representatives. Among them are the representatives of trade, the learned professions, a sailor, and other occupations. The Miller typifies his class of the day in his ability to cheat and make money. The Municipal is clever enough to outwit his learned masters. The Reeve cheats both his lord and the tenants.

The rising interest and stability in trade is represented by the Merchant, whose main desire is to keep the seas free of piracy. The Shipman represents England's widening power over the seas. He is typical of the sea captains of the day in his ruthlessness and lack of conscience. There is a Franklin who is hospitable and well off. The learned professions are represented by The Doctor of Physic and The Oxford Clerk. Typical of his age and, perhaps, typical of some doctors through all ages, Chaucer's physician is not too worried by making money out of an epidemic. He likes gold, we are told. The Lawyer, too, is adept at entailing property for his own benefit. The rising middle class is represented by the five prosperous guildsmen whose wives are ambitious of great status and respectability.

If the corruptness of the clergy is once again evident in the lecherous Summoner and the Cheating Pardoner, we have the good Christian spirit exemplified in the Parson and his brother the Ploughman. But the Summoner and The Pardoner exemplify the corruption and degeneracy of morals in Chaucer's time. The Summoner teaches the people the exact opposite of what he is supposed to tell them. He is quite ready to ignore the sins of people if they are willing to bribe him. The Pardoner sells false relics and bogus pardons. Both are partners of an equal temper.

Perhaps the most vibrant personality in The Prologue is the Wife of Bath. While she is more individualised than typical, she also represents the rising middle class. She is a first-rate weaver of cloth, and a very rich woman. A much married woman, she indicates the existing social conditions in which rich single women were never left single for long.

Typical, universal and individual traits of the characters: - The pilgrims represent different classes and professions of the time. They embody the traits which are considered typical of then: particular position in society and their profession. Incidentally, Chaucer's pilgrims represent the 'best' in each profession. The Doctor's greed for making money at the time of an epidemic is at once typical of the medieval doctor and also seems to be an individual trait of the particular doctor.

Particulars of dress, moral qualities, behaviour, special features, idiosyncrasies, etc., serve to individualise the pilgrims. The Squire's pleasantly embroidered dress and his constant singing, give an individual touch. The Knight's fustian doublet indicates his sober nature while contrasting him with its hair like the bristles of a sow's ears. We 'see' the thinness of the Reeve and the Franklin's beard, which is white as a daisy. The Wife of Bath is a vibrant personality who wears scarlet stocking and huge kerchiefs. She laughs and jokes and exhibits exuberant energy. The fearsome ugliness of the Summoner comes out clearly in his red face full of pimples. He gets drunk and is fond of garlic and leek. The Pardoner, has thin hair and shining eyes like hare's. His voice is thin as a goat's. The Monk wears rich clothes, which at once typifies the fourteenth century monks while individualising him. The Prioress has exquisite table manners.

The details are not only typical of each pilgrim's class. They often belong to basic human nature. We may not find such a Miller now, but the traits embodied in the Miller could easily be found in some other person. The vibrant sexuality and boisterous sense of fun of the Wife of Bath can be found in some human beings in all ages and nations. This is true of most of the traits shown by Chaucer in his pilgrims. He has given in each one certain basic feature which are common to human beings through the ages. And he has dealt with all possible facets of the human personality in his pilgrims. We see a mixture of the good and the bad, and all shades of grey as well. We see the Chaucer's tolerant vision and joy in God's creation.

Lastly, Chaucer shows the full realisation that God has created all kinds of human beings, and there is no cause for man to disapprove or criticise violently. He accepted the imperfections in human beings, and presented them in all their variety without castigating their vices or frowning upon their follies. He was an amused and tolerant spectator of God's plenty. He took keen joy in the created world. Life to him was a vast field of delights, and this is very much evident in The Prologue.

"Three poets, in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn.
The first in loftiness of thought surpassed;
The next, in majesty; in both the last.
The force of Nature could no further go.
To make a third, she joined the former two."

John Dryden

"O mighty-mouth'd inventor of harmonies,

O skill'd to sing of Time or Eternity,

God-gifted organ-voice of England,

Milton, a name to resound for ages;"

Alfred, Lord Tennyson

JOHN MILTON (1608-1674)

John Milton was born in London on December 9, 1608, into a middle-class family. He was educated at St. Paul's School, then at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he began to write poetry in Latin, Italian, and English, and prepared to enter the clergy.

After university, however, he abandoned his plans to join the priesthood and spent the next six years in his father's country home in Buckinghamshire following a rigorous course of independent study to prepare for a career as a poet. His extensive reading included both classical and modern works of religion, science, philosophy, history, politics, and literature. In addition, Milton was proficient in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, Spanish, and Italian, and obtained a familiarity with Old English and Dutch as well.

During his period of private study, Milton composed a number of poems, including "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," "On Shakespeare," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and the pastoral elegy "Lycidas." In May of 1638, Milton began a 13-month tour of France and Italy, during which he met many important intellectuals and influential people, including the astronomer Galileo, who appears in Milton's tract against censorship, "Areopagitica."

In 1642, Milton returned from a trip into the countryside with a 16-year-old bride, Mary Powell. Even though they were estranged for most of their marriage, she bore him three daughters and a son before her death in 1652. Milton later married twice more: Katherine Woodcock in 1656, who died giving birth in 1658, and Elizabeth Minshull in 1662.

During the English Civil War, Milton championed the cause of the Puritans and Oliver Cromwell, and wrote a series of pamphlets advocating radical political topics including the morality of divorce, the freedom of the press, populism, and sanctioned regicide. Milton served as secretary for foreign languages in Cromwell's government, composing official statements defending the Commonwealth. During this time, Milton steadily lost his eyesight, and was completely blind by 1651. He continued his duties, however, with the aid of Andrew Marvell and other assistants.

After the Restoration of Charles II to the throne in 1660, Milton was arrested as a defender of the Commonwealth, fined, and soon released. He lived the rest of his life in seclusion in the country, completing the blank-verse epic poem Paradise Lost in 1667, as well as its sequel Paradise Regained and the tragedy Samson Agonistes both in 1671. Milton oversaw the printing of a second edition of Paradise Lost in 1674, which included an explanation of "why the poem rhymes not," clarifying his use of blank verse, along with introductory notes by Marvell. He died shortly afterwards, on November 8, 1674, in Buckinghamshire, England.

Paradise Lost, which chronicles Satan's temptation of Adam and Eve and their expulsion from Eden, is widely regarded as his masterpiece and one of the greatest epic poems in world literature. Since its first publication, the work has continually elicited debate regarding its theological themes, political commentary, and its depiction of the fallen angel Satan who is often viewed as the protagonist of the work.

The epic has had wide-reaching effect, inspiring other long poems, such as Alexander Pope's The Rape of the Lock, William Wordsworth's The Prelude and John Keats's Endymion, as well as Mary Shelley's novel Frankenstein, and deeply influencing the work of Percy Bysshe Shelley and William Blake, who illustrated an edition of the epic.

The Rise of Puritanism in the Age of Milton

The Age of Milton, the age in which the great poet matured and created, covers roughly the first seventy years or so of the 17th century. Thus in a way Milton is the connecting link between the glorious age of Queen Elizabeth, the Puritan age which followed, and the Restoration Age. It was an age of disillusionment, of increasing gloom and pessimism, and this melancholy and gloom of the age colours the literature of the period. In order to appre-ciate the spirit of Milton's works it is essential to form an idea of his age.

Nature of Puritanism: - It was during this period that Puritanism emerged as the great controlling, moral and social force. Let us here first consider what we exactly mean by Puritanism and then proceed to examine the political, social and religious causes that gave rise to it, and its impact on the literature of the period.

In the broadest sense Puritanism may be regarded as the renaissance of the moral sense of man. The Greco-Roman renais-sance of 15th and 16th centuries was largely pagan and sensuous. It did not touch the moral nature of man, it did nothing for his religious, political and social emancipation. The Puritan movement, on the other hand, was the greatest movement for moral and politi-cal reform. Its aims were:

(1) Religious liberty i.e., that men should be free to worship according to their conscience
(2) Civil liberty i.e., they should enjoy full civil liberty.

The Puritans wanted to make men honest and to make them free. They insisted on the purity of life. In matters of religion the Puritans were fanatics. They were extremists. There had been Puritans even during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. They did not accept the Anglican Church, which was essentially a compromise between Catholicism and Protestantism. They considered its creeds and public worship as too much like Popery. They advocated Church reform. Moreover, they had very strict view about life and conduct. They laid down very austere ideals of life. They were against common pleasures, even innocent ones, like drama, considered singing and dancing as immoral, and hence in the beginning the term 'Puritan' was a term of contempt applied to such extremists. We find frequent satirical references to them in the plays of Shakespeare. The general tendency of the Puritan was anti-social. "Beauty in his eyes was a snare and pleasure a sin; the only mode of social intercourse which he approved was a sermon." As Macaulay puts it, he hated bear-baiting, not because it gave pain to the bear, but because it gave pleasure to the spectator. The Puritans thus stood for

(1) Church reform,

(2) For the reform of social life according to their austere ideals,

(3) For the ideal of liberty, both religious and political—man should be free to worship according to his own conscience unhampered by the state.

Various Causes of Its Rise

Political: - The wise, moderate policies of Queen Elizabeth had appealed to all sections of society and Puritanism could not make much headway. But conditions changed with the coming of James I to the throne; the wise Elizabethan compromise soon broke down. A number of causes led to widespread discontent and the emergence of the Puritans as a strong national force. First, there was the theory of the divine right of kings, the theory that the king could do no wrong. James I had exalted ideals of kingship and aimed at despotic powers, but he was not fitted to play the role of flawless divinity. He was ill-mannered, grotesque, and tactless in appearance, and soon made the English Court the laughing stock of Europe. This divine right theory was not palatable to the English people, it smacked of tyranny and shocked the innate English love of indepen-dence. Puritans regarded it as a direct attack upon their personal and political liberty.

Immorality and Corruption: -Secondly, the immorality and profligacy of the king and his courtiers also fed the flames of discontent. The corruption in high places did much to alienate the sympathies of the common man, and greatly strengthened the moral and social influence of the Puritans, who despised the Court, "as a place of infamy, alien to all good morals". Immorality of the king and the Court is a frequent object of satire in the contemporary literature.

Economic: -Thirdly, James and his ministers were extravagant, they were constantly in debt and constantly in need of money. When James approached the Parliament for money, it demanded more rights and privileges for itself—that it should control religion and finance, and even give advice on foreign policy. James then tried to raise money by granting trade monopolies to his favourites. This raised the hostility of the traders, merchants and manufacturers. It was an encroachment on their rights, and economic virtues of thrift, sobriety and economic living appealed to this middle-class element. Thus emerged a union of interests against James I. This makes the Jacobean Age, a period of stress and strain giving rise to a sense of frustration, and disillusionment.

Internal Dissensions: -The absence of foreign wars also did much to foster internal dissensions. After the defeat of the Spanish Armada, there was no longer any danger of a foreign attack. A foreign war has the great merit of diverting the attention of the people. Now freed from the fears of foreign war, more and more people turned to the discussion of domestic politics. Criticism of the policies of the King and of the immorality and artificiality of his court was widespread. Thus was fostered the critical and satirical temper which is reflected in the plays of Ben Jonson. Social evils were rampant, and satirical references to the follies of the age are frequent in the literature of the period. The rift between the king and his people widened. The court became more uxurious and extravagant, the people were more and more alienated, the appeal of Puritanism increased, and it became a significant force in national life.

Tactlessness of Charles I: - James I was sufficiently clever and died just sufficiently soon, and thus in his reign there was no open conflict between the king and his people. But he left behind him serious problems for his son Charles I (1625). Charles was handsome, cultured and graceful, just such a king as was likely to win the heart of his people. However, he was tactless and did not attach much importance to public sentiments. He surrounded himself with evil counsellors— and with their help tried to enforce the divine right theory of kings. His absolutism roused the apprehensions of the people. In politics he was entirely unscrupulous. Moreover, he had a Catholic queen and was himself suspected of having Catholic leanings. His policies both religious and political, both in Scotland and Ireland, were complete and abject failures. The treasury was already bankrupt and he and his courtiers were not only profligates but also highly extravagant. In dire need of funds, he appealed to the Parliament which demanded even greater privileges for itself. No compromise was possible between the despotic Charles and the Parliament consisting mainly of elements hostile to the King. The stress and strains in national life increased resulting in the Civil War between the King and the Parliament which broke out in 1641.

Frustration and Disillusionment—Loss of Faith:- The age of Milton is an age of uncertainty, misgiving, despondency, anxiety, frustration, pessimism and inner gloom, and in all these respects in sharp contrast to the glorious and exuberant age of Elizabeth when the nation marched from achievement to achievement with zest and confidence. There are a number of political and social causes for this mood of mis-giving and apprehension which overtook the nation during this period. The personal unpopularity of the king, James I, uncouth and awkward, who made the English court the laughing stock of all Europe, the lowering of standards of national morality and conduct, loss of national dignity, slackness of discipline, plots and intrigues both political and religious, increasing fear of French and Papal interventions, all contributed to the atmosphere of uncertainty and misgiving, and this in its turn bred pessimism and frustration. Further, there was a clash of ideals and philosophies; the old world, the medieval world, with its scholastic learning and metaphysics was breaking down under the impact of new philosophy. Another cause was the influence of Machiavelli whose work The Prince enjoyed wide popularity. His materialistic doctrines along with his Satanic philosophy—that the world order is not moral, but essentially immoral—caused much bewilderment and confusion, and loss of faith in existing values and ideals. All this finds expression in the literatures of the day, more specially its Drama.

London: The Centre of National Life: - In the end, a word may be added regarding the prominence of London during the age and its influence on the literature of the period. It was the centre of the English court and so the abode of the fashionable and cultured upper classes. As the court patronised art and learning, the city was also the haunt of the men of letters of the age. Practically, all the prominent writers of the day made London their home. Shakespeare, Donne, Ben Jonson, Milton—to name only the greatest—were all Londoners. They would meet in taverns, discuss literature or current politics, and frequently come to blows. Tavern brawls were frequent, and even leading personalities were involved in them. The setting of Jonson's Comedies is London, and London fashions, follies and frivolities are frequent objects of his satire.

Literary Trends: - The atmosphere of conflict, stress and strain, which enveloped the nation even before the death of Queen Elizabeth, in 1603, had an adverse effect on literature. The decline from the high Elizabethan standard is apparent in several ways:

(a) The output, especially of poetry, is much smaller, and the fashion is toward shorter poems, especially the lyric. The poetry of the period is largely lyrical, and Donne and Ben Jonson are the two most outstanding and original lyricists of the age. Milton who links up the Puritan age with the Restoration is a class by himself,

(b) There is a marked decay in the exalted poetical fervour of the previous age. In the new poetry there is more of intellectual play than of passion and profundity. And especially in prose, there is a matured melan-choly that one is apt to associate with advancing years,

(c) There is a marked increase in prose activity, and prose is an almost invariable accompaniment of a decline in poetry.

In an age which, by comparison with the Elizabethan age, produced relatively few great writers, Milton stands as the one man who may claim a place among the very greatest. His prose is among the finest controversial writing in the language, and his poetic achievement has generally been considered to be second only to that of Shakespeare.

Besides Milton, there are the Metaphysicals and the Caroline lyricists. The term Metaphysical was first used by Dr. Johnson, who applied it to Cowley and Donne. It denotes the work of a group of poets who came directly or indirectly under Donne's influence. Donne's poetry is a poetry of revolt, revolt against Elizabethan tradition. Usually lyrical in nature, his work shows a surprising blend of passion and thought; his poems are full of learned imagery and striking conceits, and, at their best, reveal great psychological insight and subtlety of thought. To this school belong such great poets as Crashaw, George Herbert, Vaughan, and Marvell.

While most of the Metaphysical poets were of a religious and mystical cast, the Cavalier lyricists best represented by Herrick, Lovelace, and Suckling, deal with the theme of love. They followed Ben Jonson in their classical restraint and concise lucidity. Their work is simple and graceful in structure and finely polished in style.

The prose output during the age is copious and excellent in kind. There is a notable advance in the sermon; pamphlets are abundant; and history, politics, philosophy, and miscellaneous kinds are well represented. Milton's Areopagetica is an immortal monument of English prose. In addition, there is a remarkable advance in prose style and the dramatists contribute a great deal to this advance. Jonson uses prose in his comedies. The controversies and conflicts of the day, both political and religious, result in the rise of satire and pamphleteering, and this in turn contributes to the advance of prose.

Many things combined to cause the decay of drama at this time. Chief among these was the strong opposition of the Puritans. In temper, the age was not dramatic. The actual dramatic work of the period is small and unimportant and characterised by immorality, obscenity, sensationalism, violence, and a free exploita-tion of unnatural themes, such as incest. However, Milton's Samson Agonistes occupies a unique place in the history of English drama. It is the only successful classical Tragedy in the English language.

Paradise Lost: Summary and Critical Analysis

The fable or story for the epic is taken from the Bible; it is the simple and common story of the fall of Adam and Eve form the grace of God due to their disobedience of Him. Paradise Lost encompasses a little more of the biblical story. In heaven, Lucifer (who became Satan after his being thrown to the hell), was unable to accept the supremacy of God, and led a revolt against His divine authority. After a terrible war with His Angels, he was finally thrown to hell, where they lay nine days in a burning lake.

Then Lucifer arose from the burning pitch and resolved- though at the same time despairing – that "all was not lost," that he would take revenge on God. Arousing his friends, he did his best to bring them to spirits, and decided that his purposes could be achieved by guile rather than by force; he decided to take revenge on God by spoiling his latest creation the Eden and the human beings there. The devils built an elaborate palace, Pandemonium, in which Satan organized a conference to decide on immediate action. Moloch advised war. Belial recommended a slothful existence in Hell.

Mammon proposed peacefully improving hell so that it might equal and rival Heaven. Beelzebub, second in command, arose and informed that God and created Earth, which he had peopled with good creatures called humans. It was Beelzebub's proposal to investigate this new creation, seized it, and seduces its inhabitants to the cause of the fallen angels, and saw Satan approaching Earth. God's angel Gabriel under the command of God, appointed two other angels to safeguard Adam and Eve, but they arrived too late to prevent Satan. He had already influenced Eve's dreams. Eve, in her strange dream had been tempted to taste of the fruit of the Tree of knowledge. After the sinful act of disobedience had been committed, God sent the angel Raphael to the garden to warn them. Raphael told Adam and Eve in detail the story of the Great War between the god and the bad angles (much of such stories are told in such conversation and flashback). He told of the creation of the world and how Earth was created in six days and angelic choir singing the praises of God or the seventh days. He cautioned Adam not to be too curious. Adam then told how he had been warned against the Tree of knowledge of God and Evil, and how Eve was created from his rib. After the departure of Raphael, Satan entered the body of a sleeping serpent. In the mourning Eve proposed that they work apart. Adam, remembering the warning of Raphael, opposed her wishes, but Eve prevailed and the couple parted. Alone, Eve was accosted by the serpent, which flattered her into tasting the fruit of the Tree of knowledge. Eve gave the fruit to Adam, who was at first horrified, but who in his love for Eve, also ate the fruit. Just after eating the forbidden fruit, the couple knew lust for the first time. They knew sickening shame. The guardian angel came to earth to pass judgment. Christ sentenced the serpent to be forever a hated enemy of mankind. He also announced punishment of Eve; her sorrow would be multiplied by the bearing of children and that she would be the servant of Adam to the end of time. Adam, said Christ, would eat in sorrow, would eat bread only by toiling and sweating. This was the curse to man. But more important, he lost God's grace. As Christ announced the punishment, Death and sin, left the gates of Hell to join their father Satan on Earth. Satan sent sin and Death as his ambassadors on Earth. He went back to hell to see that his followers had all become hissing snakes. God made great changes on earth. He replaced the eternal spring with the changing seasons; he created the violence and misery of storms, winds, hail, ice, floods and earthquakes; he sentenced Adam and Eve to expulsion form Eden. Adam and Eve thought of committing suicide, but Michael, the angel sent by God, gave them new hope; he gave Adam a vision of life and death, the rise and fall of kingdoms and empires, and also showed them how in the future Adam and Eve's progeny would go through their evil days, to the flood when God would destroy all life except the good seeds preserved by Noah, and be finally redeemed through Christ's incarnation, death, resurrection and ascension as the redeemer. After Michael gave Adam and Eve this vision, they were pacified, especially because they saw that their children would be saved. They walked form the heights of paradise to the barren plains below. Metaphorically, they fell from the original bliss of god's grace to the present state of mortality, guilt, shame and suffering.

This simple story of 'fall' has become a locus of many themes after Milton used in his epic. He took an apparently very simple story of the "Fall" form the Bible, but he blended within it his puritan thoughts, renaissance humanism, his political as well as domestic ideals, and many such meanings. The 'invocation' is the very beginning of the epic in which Milton prays to the Muse, the Christian spirit, to help him write well. The ninth book is the climactic part of the epic narrative, as well as a book that contains several thematic issues of the whole epic.

The most obvious theme of Paradise Lost is justifying the fall of man, God's punishment and his reopening of the path of salvation to them; in short, the epic justifies how God is right in his treatment of man throughout all these. Milton has explored the sin which brought about the downfall of man. The prime cause of the fall is disobedience to God; the cause of Eve's disobedience is her passion overwhelming her right reason. Adam is also guilty of disobedience; his sin is dread of loneliness and also the surrender of his God given reason to passion. Due to love, he immediately decides to share Eve's fate. Milton emphasizes the importance of reason. Man is noble by nature, but he has free will, and hence free to choose and capable of action, morally good or bad for which he alone is responsible. Milton does not believe in Calvinism according to which God has decided everything, and a man's destiny has been fixed before his birth. Milton is a great humanist pinning his faith in the liberty and adventure of man. Milton therefore believes that God was justified in leaving Adam and Eve exposed to evils, and leaving their reasoning free; only that defines human beings as supreme creatures. God was also right in punishing Adam and Eve. The purpose of Paradise Lost is, therefore, to assert eternal providence and justify the way of God to men.

Milton believes in the orthodox idea of redemption. When men will be redeemed through Christ, they will rise to a more excellent state than Paradise form which Adam and Eve were turned out. Thus Adam did a useful act while sinning. Tillyard says, "Paradise Lost is a mental pilgrimage; the loss of one paradise and the finding on this earth of a paradise within ourselves that is happier far". The paradise in which Adam and Eve lived before eating the forbidden fruit was like a prison. It might have satisfied God, but it would have kept man spiritually undeveloped. So long as knowledge was withheld from man, his obedience to God was meaningless. Moreover the virtue which Adam and Eve possessed in Paradise was a “fugitive and cloistered virtue”, and therefore it was no virtue in the real sense. What man lost by disobedience was only a state of innocence and ignorance. Men gain spiritual rebirth by controlling their passions. And they will find a Paradise within them ‘happier far’. Man has all the powers of working out the best, and moves upward, and finds the paradise within himself. This could not be possible by paying homage to God in a state of ignorance in Eden’s paradise. Eve sins through weakness of reason whereas Adam through weakness of will.

Milton’s style in writing the Paradise Lost has been called a ‘grand style’, which means it is an elevated, serious, highly crafted, and different from common speech. It is in fact so unfamiliar to common language, even the usual literary language, that Dr. Johnson accused Milton of ‘pedantry’. The charge is basically based on his writing that was heavily Latinated. Indeed many critics have complained that Milton spoilt the English language. But in other ways he has contributed to the development of the English language as a literary language. Milton’s ‘grand’, style can be discussed under four or five heads: rhythm and music, word game and figures of speech, diction and decorum, syntax, and remoteness and sublimity of language and theme.

The meter or rhythm of Milton’s epic poem is usually called the blank verse, but it is not the common blank verse (lines in iambic pentameter without rhyme); Milton adapted it to his own convenience and purpose. The lines in Paradise Lost do contain ten syllables usually, but the lines contain any number of stresses from three to eight. So, it would not be appropriate to say that this is done by using traditional techniques of variation. Furthermore, the stresses differ in degree and position. The pause or caesura is another even more important feature of rhythm in Milton. The pause falls at different places of the lines, and the weight of different pauses is also different; there are light or shorter pauses and heavy or longer pauses give different effects to the narrative.

Milton’s diction is heavily Latin. Even when he uses English words, they have the Latin connotations beneath. The words are so meticulously chosen that many critics have blamed his diction as too labored. Milton somehow ‘invented English that is extremely unfamiliar and pedantic. He uses words in such ways that there are always both literal and symbolic meanings, with both English denotations and Latin connotations. His descriptions are florid and highly picturesque. He uses images to reinforce the theme. He shifts tone along with the change of description and setting. That usually helps him shift the emotional intensity, or avoid monotony.

Paradise Lost Book I

Summary

Book I of Paradise Lost begins with a prologue in which Milton performs the traditional epic task of invoking the Muse and stating his purpose. He invokes the classical Muse, Urania, but also refers to her as the "Heav'nly Muse," implying the Christian nature of this work. He also says that the poem will deal with man's disobedience toward God and the results of that disobedience. He concludes the prologue by saying he will attempt to justify God's ways to men.

Following the prologue and invocation, Milton begins the epic with a description of Satan, lying on his back with the other rebellious angels, chained on a lake of fire. The poem thus commences in the middle of the story, as epics traditionally do. Satan, who had been Lucifer, the greatest angel, and his compatriots warred against God. They were defeated and cast from Heaven into the fires of Hell.

Lying on the lake, Satan is described as gigantic; he is compared to a Titan or the Leviathan. Next to Satan lies Beelzebub, Satan's second in command. Satan comments on how Beelzebub has been transformed for the worse by the punishment of God. Still he adds that it is his intention to continue the struggle against God, saying, "Better to reign in Hell than serve in Heaven" (263).

With effort, Satan is able to free himself from his chains and rise from the fire. He flies to a barren plain, followed by Beelzebub. From the plain, Satan calls the other fallen angels to join him, and one by one they rise from the lake and fly to their leader. As they come, Milton is able to list the major devils that now occupy Hell: Moloch, Chemos, Baalem, Ashtaroth, Astarte, Astoreth, Dagon, Rimmon, Osiris, Isis, Orus, Mammon, and Belial. Each devil is introduced in a formal cataloguing of demons. These fallen angels think that they have escaped from their chains through their own power, but Milton makes it clear that God alone has allowed them to do this.

This devil army is large and impressive but also aware of its recent ignominious defeat. Satan addresses them and rallies them. He tells them that they still have power and that their purpose will be to oppose God, adding, "War then, War / Open or understood, must be resolv'd" (661-62).

This speech inspires the devil host, and under Mammon's direction, they immediately begin work on a capital city for their Hellish empire. They find mineral resources in the mountains of Hell and quickly begin to construct a city. Under the direction of their architect, Mulciber, they construct a great tower that comes to symbolize the capital of Hell, Pandemonium. The devil army, flying this way and that, is compared to a great swarm of bees. When the work is done and the capital completed, they all assemble for the first great council.

Analysis

Milton begins Paradise Lost in the traditional epic manner with a prologue invoking the muse, in this case Urania, the Muse of Astronomy. He calls her the "Heav'nly Muse" (7) and says that he will sing "Of Man's First Disobedience" (1), the story of Adam and Eve and their fall from grace. As the prologue continues, it becomes apparent that this muse is more than just the classical Urania, but also a Christian muse who resides on Mt. Sinai, in fact the Holy Spirit. In these first lines, Milton thus draws on two traditions — the classical epic exemplified by Homer and Virgil and the Christian tradition embodied in the Bible as well as Dante's Divine Comedy and Edmund Spenser's The Faerie Queene.

Milton further emphasizes in the prologue that his theme will be Man's disobedience to God's will, implying not only Adam's disobedience, but all mankind from first to last. He does add that his subject will include the "greater Man" (4) who saved all others from the original disobedience. Moreover, his intention will be to "justify the ways of God to men" (26) through the aid of "Eternal Providence" (25). By "justify," Milton means more than simply to explain; he means that he will demonstrate that God's actions in regard to man are just. This goal suggests that Milton was not bothered by any sense of false modesty, an idea underscored by his statement that he will write in a high style and attempt a purpose never tried before. The one truly poignant line in this prologue is Milton's request of the muse, "What in me is dark / Illumine" (22 — 23), with its oblique reference to Milton's blindness, a subject he will return to more directly in the prologue that begins Book III. At no point in this prologue and invocation does Milton mention Satan, who, though he is the main character of the poem, is not the actual subject.

Following the invocation and prologue, Milton continues in the epic style by beginning in medias res, in the middle of things. Satan is first seen lying in the pit of Hell. That a great religious epic focuses on Satan, presents him first, and in many ways makes him the hero of the poem is certainly surprising and something of a risk on Milton's part. Milton does not want his audience to empathize with Satan, yet Satan is an attractive character, struggling against great odds. Of course, Milton's original audience more than his modern one would have been cognizant of the ironies involved in Satan's struggles and his comments concerning power. The power that Satan asserts and thinks he has is illusory. His power to act derives only from God, and his struggle against God has already been lost. To the modern audience, Satan may seem heroic as he struggles to make a Heaven of Hell, but the original audience knew, and Milton's lines confirm, that Satan's war with God had been lost absolutely before the poem begins. God grants Satan and the other devils the power to act for God's purposes, not theirs.

Also, at this point in the narrative, Satan is at his most attractive. He has just fallen from Heaven where he was the closest angel to God. He has not completely lost the angelic aura that was his in Heaven. As the poem progresses, the reader will see that Satan's character and appearance grow worse. Milton has carefully structured his work to show the consequences of Satan's actions.

The catalogue of demons that follows Satan's escape from the burning lake follows an epic pattern of listing heroes — although here the list is of villains. This particular catalogue seems almost an intentional parody of Homer's catalogue of Greek ships and heroes in Book II of the Iliad. The catalogue is a means for Milton to list many of the fallen angels as well as a way to account for many of the gods in pagan religions — they were originally among the angels who rebelled from God. Consequently, among these fallen angels are names such as Isis, Osiris, Baal, and others that the reader associates not with Christianity but with some ancient, pagan belief. Of the devils listed, the two most important are Beelzebub and Belial. (For a complete description of each devil, see the List of Characters.)

The final part of Book I is the construction of Pandemonium, the capital of Hell. A certain unintentional humor pervades this section of Book I as well as Mammon's argument in Book II. In both cases, a sense of civic pride seems to overcome the devils, and they act on the idea that "Hell is bad, but with a few improvements we can make it lots better, even attractive." In both Mammon and the hellish architect, Mulciber, the attitude of the mayor whose small town has been bypassed by the Interstate comes out. They both seem to think that with improvements Hell may be nice enough that others may want to relocate.

Milton's real goal here, though, is to establish Hell's capital, Pandemonium — a word which Milton himself coined from the Latin pan (all) and demonium (demons). Thus, the capital of Hell is literally the place of all demons. With the passage of time, the word came to mean any place of wild disorder, noise, and confusion. This idea is subtly emphasized with Milton's choice of Mulciber as the architect. Mulciber was another name for Hephaestus, the Greek God of the Forge, who was tossed from Olympus by a drunken Zeus. Mulciber is consequently a figure of some ridicule and not the most likely architect to build a lasting monument.

One other aspect of the construction of Pandemonium is worth consideration. Mammon and the other devils find mineral resources including gemstones in their search for building materials. This discovery of resources suggests that the Hell Milton has imagined is a multifaceted place. In the first scene, as Satan and the others lie chained on the burning lake, Hell seems totally a place of fiery torture and ugliness. The construction of Pandemonium shows that there is more to Hell. Geographic features such as a plain and hill, mineral resources such as gemstones, and even the possibility for beauty seem to exist in Hell. Other aspects of Hell will be brought forward in later books. All in all, Milton depicts a Hell that has more than one essence, or, at least in the opening books, seems to.

Paradise Lost Book-I : Speeches of Satan

Introduction

Satan of Book-I Paradise Lost, is one of the glorious examples of political leadership and political oratory. His speeches are the key to his character and his art of oratory excels the best of Roman rhetoric. He is the leader of the rebel-angels in Heaven and the uncrowned monarch of Hell. By following his lead, the fallen angels are deprived of "happy fields, where joy forever dwells." Satan has now the task of retaining their loyalty and does so by the sheer magic of his high-pitched oratory. There is a certain pathetic grandeur of injured merit in them which wins the hearts of his followers. Around the character of Satan, Milton has thrown a singularity of daring, a grandeur of sufferance and a ruined splendour, which constitute the very height of poetic sublimity.

Satan is the first to recover from the stupor into which all the rebel angels fall. Soon he notices his first lieutenant, Beelzebub, weltering by his side. He finds that his compeer is much changed. So he makes a cautious approach, for he is not sure whether his friend is in a mood to blame him or he still loves him.

First Speech: "What though the field be lost…tyranny of Heaven."

The speech is an embodiment of Satan's resilience in face of a mortifying defeat. This rout, instead of humbling his aspiring pride has fuelled his design of usurpation and revenge against God. He's aghast at seeing the diminished glory of his minions, the fallen angels who revolted at his command. The deplorable state of Beelzebub and his lost lustre incites Satan to admonish him for his irresolute spirits and weak convictions. Satan in his speech ushers forth convincing arguments to dissuade the bleak hopelessness of his fallen angels. He accepts his defeat 'field be lost' but questions whether it has trampled his armaments of 'unconquerable will', 'study of revenge', 'immortal hate and courage!'

God's glory shall remain a pipe dream as Satan shant surrender to Him. Satan has faith in his strengths which cannot be suppressed by the 'wrath or might' of God Himself. His speech resounds with this consolation which is so convincing to Satan himself that he broaches to battle the Supreme again. He reprimands the cowardly stance of his army which smacks of ignominy far worse than their defeat itself. Satan deters his legion from pleading God's mercy and extolling His power. He mocks His clout as a mere façade aptly proved by God's apprehensions when Satan's mighty terror shook His sovereignty.

Satan assures his fallen cherubs that the fiery mettle of angels as ordained by their fate can never perish but remain immortal. And with the benefit of hindsight he along with his minions must rage another war against the 'tyranny of heaven' that they equal both in arms and in foresight. To war anew, Satan believes portends greater hope of victory and can turn out to be their coup. Satan wishes to execute this 'eternal war' by dint of 'force or guile' but for him the option of reconciling with God is closed sine die, as he's fervent in his convictions to overthrow the tyranny of heaven- God!

A critical Note: By Satan's vaunting of "All is not lost" one is compelled to wonder whether God's victory is a mere pyrrhic one, as He is unable to smother the soul, the ignition of Satan's rebellion which even after a crushing defeat still remains fervent in his spirits-'the unconquerable will, revenge, immortal hate and courage.' This ironic defeat or apparent victory of God provokes Satan to pervert God's holy plans such as instigating the lamentable fall of Adam and Eve.

Even in his last speech of Book-1, Satan sends this message to his legion that the supreme shall learn from his tactics of guile and deceit that he "who overcomes by force hath overcome but half his foe", which quite aptly explains the situation.

Second Speech: "Fallen cherub…resolution from despair"

Analysis: Beelzebub despite Satan's claims of victory after a 'sad overthrow and foul defeat' is tormented by the thought of eternal punishment. He confides to Satan his fear of God's 'vengeful ire' that only their painful suffering can satiate. Satan is quick to allay his apprehensions and without a note of fear in his speech paints his coward whimpering as contemptible. Whether they are coerced to suffer His errands or bear His punishments, 'to be weak is miserable'. Satan further instigates his fallen angel to flout God's high will and seek out evil undertakings as it shall be their 'sole delight.'

In this speech Satan displays his confirmed aversion towards God and defies His plan to' bring forth good' out of their sinister stratagems. Rather he proposes to blight such intention of God and seize upon any means of evil to derail His objectives and aggrieve him beyond measure. Satan wishes to consume malicious joy out of wrecking Almighty's 'destined aim.'

Satan's next lines of his speech further stamp his fortitude against distinct signs of despair and hopelessness. In these lines he's salvaging a break, an opportunity in 'the gloomy deep' to plan retaliation. To Beelzebub he lays bare the various opportunities which he presumes to be propitious to his plot. God, the angry victory, he claims has withdrawn His good angels-'ministers of vengeance' and so they have retreated back to the gates of heaven. The 'sulphurous hail' has ceased to blow, the 'fiery surge' emanating from the edges of heaven has drawn to a close, and the thunder has dissipated its shafts- this occasion could have resulted either because of God's disdain or His ire has been satiated for a while, but be that as it may 'Let us not slip the occasion'.

While still floating above the ebb and flow of the fiery waves, Satan glimpses a 'dreary plain' beyond the lake of fire. He commands his troop to fly towards the vantage ground-'that seat of desolation' to repose awhile if any respite is feasible. Then reconvene their 'afflicted powers', in order to forge various ways to affront the Almighty, to make amends for the loss, and to triumph over 'this dire calamity'. Finally, he beckons his minions to salvage strength and support from faith, failing which learn and gain from despair a resilient resolve.

A critical Note: What Beelzebub fears is exactly what Satan is putting into practice. By contriving to play foul and offend Almighty, he's in fact obeying His high will, and as its endorsed in the text that only by the 'high permission of all-ruling heaven', which has kept him loose and unfettered, Satan is able to execute his 'dark designs.' That is to say he's in fact carrying out God's 'errands in the gloomy deep' to 'heap on himself damnation' without truly knowing it. This is Beelzebub's apprehension of the eternal punishment which Satan's believes he has overcome by his wits.

Third Speech: "Is the region, this is the soil…what more lost in Hell?"

In this speech lies the key to Satan's dogged tenacity against God and His instruments of eternal punishment. Satan invokes every ounce of his strength to withstand his antagonists and uses firm reasoning to wake up his dispirited angels from the slough of despondency. Many have referred to his reasoning as 'satanic logic' which though connected to such an infamous personage, yet bears relevance in our daily lives.

Satan in a rhetorical fashion comes to term with his new abode and the deprivation of Heaven-'this mournful gloom for that celestial light', and accepts his fate with profound indifference as if the odds aren't that formidable as they seem. He asserts that God 'who now is Sovran', has the prerogative to execute what He considers right; yet as we are far away from His dominion, this should serve as our consolation in this misery. This 'Sovran' if we measure by the yardstick of reason shall find us as His equals, and only due to His power-'whom thunder hath made greater?' does He claim authority.

Satan confronts his present predicament and bids farewell to the 'happy fields'. Welcoming the 'infernal abode' as its new sovereign, he proclaims that his mind, his spirits, his convictions shall remain undeterred even at the prospect of changing 'place or time'. He explains his logic by asserting that mind can envisage the torments of hell as the pleasant bliss of heaven or can imagine heaven as a seat of gloom -'Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven'. Such is the strength of mind that it drives Satan to persevere in his pursuit of revenge, without any regard to his greatest nemesis.

Satan pictures his dilemma as a boon in disguise because hell shall offer a breeding ground for their evil escapades and as God cannot expel them out of it or purge hell of its 'new possessor' – they 'may reign secure'. His single-minded aim is to be in power, to govern, to reign and his such resolution eclipses the miserable despair he has been plunged into- 'To reign is worth ambition, though in hell…than serve in heaven'.

With such sense of autonomy, Satan invigorates the beleaguered spirits of his 'associates' to partake each other's grief and once again join forces to recoup from heaven what their might is capable of, or on the flip side be deprived of what is still left of hell.

A critical Note: It is interesting to observe the shrewdness of Satan, when he dictates 'we may reign secure', 'we' on the face of it, might denote Satan and his troop but its connotations are obviously pertaining to the sole monarchy of Satan himself. Perhaps he knows there can be only one sun in the firmament (Titus Andronicus, Shakespeare). Such is the convincing sway of his rhetorical reasoning that hardly his minions can see through his design. His persuasive art is further attested by the mortal rebellion his legion waged and for him ' have their lot in pain'- The same sentiment I read in the words of Mephistopheles, ''unhappy spirits that fell with Lucifer, conspir'd against our god with Lucifer, and are forever damn'd with Lucifer' (Doctor Faustus, Marlowe). Satan hence can be regarded as the epitome of cunning politicians and wining speakers.

Fourth speech: "Princes, Potentates…be forever fallen!"

Satan in this speech tolls the final knell of his legions' apprehensions and numbed spirits. He summons his army with noble epithets as Princes, Potentates, Warriors, which is enough to massage their ego and obliterate their melancholic dispositions.

He commands them to accept the bereavement of heaven because their cowardly visage doesn't become 'eternal spirits', nor is it befitting of them to rest their beaten heroism in this gloomy place. Their current milieu shall not be as soothing and peaceful as it would have been in 'the happy fields'.

He further attacks their wretched and humble stoop, by which they have apparently vowed to revere the God Almighty. God is, as Satan claims planning to ambush and quash them in their slumped posture. And finding it as an advantage His henchmen with their 'thunderbolts' shall spellbind all of them to the underbelly of this gloomy chasm. Hence, Satan's final cry- "Awake, arise, or be forever fallen!"

A critical note: Satan sure knows his way around the angels as he quite shrewdly concocts panic alarms to make them subservient to his will, if they wish to survive the looming danger. He strikes a balance in his extol and condemnation of the angels and makes them believe if they don't arise, they shall be forever fallen. This 'forever fallen' however, is their irrevocable fate which can't be obscured whether they arise or remain 'in this abject posture'.

Fifth speech: "O myriads of immortal spirits…must be resolved."

Satan has successfully wrenched the 'fellows of his crime' out of their regretful stance. Seeing their absolute obedience, in face of overwhelming pains, Satan is conquered by tears and tries to confront their mutual loss- 'amerced of heaven'. His pride falls meek as he mourns and sighs for their cataclysmic defeat, yet he remains sane enough to dispute the cause of their fall. Satan reinforces in their minds that though their defeat shall be counted as a calamity for its done untold damage to them, it yet cannot be rendered as a dishonorable event.

One would have doubted the very omen of their rout for his legion is a union of gods themselves. As if this doesn't sound preposterous enough, the more perplexing is the helplessness of these mighty gods to regain their 'native seat' in heaven. Satan apprehends the cause of their defeat which he presumes either could be the conflicting counsels among the angels or his dread of danger that made him shrink away from the revolt at hand.

Finding these self-accusations unfounded, Satan reprehends Almighty for keeping his supreme power under wraps, which seduced him to challenge God's might-'tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall'. God might have achieved his stature as a monarch either by old repute, consent or custom, but had He abjured displaying royal pomp, and not concealed his strength, Satan and his minions wouldn't have undertaken such a drastic crusade.

Satan appeases his legion to look at the bright side of their defeat, for with benefit of hindsight they are now conscious of Almighty's power and their own. As his reasoning suggests it would be futile to declare an open war with Him yet again, so the only course of combat is –'to work in close design, by fraud or guile'. If they resort to force, their battle shall be half won as Satan's reasoning suggests and so the combative maneuvers shall be underhanded intrigues and furtive treacheries.

To begin their stealthy warfare, Satan mentions the report of God fostering a new generation, which shall be lavished with favours reserved for Sons of Heaven. Their first expedition shall be to inquire of God's holy plan and in such a pursuit hell shant hold divine spirits captive, nor the abyss teeming with darkness, blind their motives.

Satan calls for a profound deliberation on this matter, and urges his army to forswear the dreams of harmony as the price to gain it is slavish submission. Hence he hails war and advocates its resolution.

A critical Note: Satan is desperate to go at lengths and sacrifice his followers for his ambition. As his methods of warfare change, one gets an insight into his degenerating self. From glorious battles, he is shifting to despicable tactics of covert intrigues and deceit. Instead of fighting God like a true warrior, Satan is scheming to pervert God's creations that had no role in his downfall. His change of heart marks his collapse from an angelic Lucifer to a wicked Satan.

Next interesting point Of Satan's speech is his belief that peace demands absolute submission. This if read in modern times, suggests the sacrifice of media, capitalism, and individual sovereignty to the diktats of authority. Surely, this perspective shall find many takers but I believe peace doesn't entertain an authority in the first place. It can entail the freedom of an individual to give voice to his opinions and let the other fellow contest it with rational justifications.

And if the former is proved wrong, instead of hanging him, lawful penalty can be meted out as per the degree of his falsehood. The case shouldn't become a deterrent for people to leash their thoughts but be an example of how to avoid indecent practices as perjury, outrageous slander, and scandals etc.

Satan if had not chosen insurgence as a tool to question God's tyranny, but a peaceful discourse, then world would have been different. But then again, Satan's avaricious ambition to oust God from his stature, strove him to forgo peaceful measures, and finally exclaim 'Peace is despaired, for who can think submission.'

Conclusion

Thus in five speeches Satan finishes his primary manipulation in the first book of Paradise Lost. In doing so, he has used rhetorical devices in his speeches, so that they may appear logical to his followers, because they have a good deal of deception in their very nature. So much in manner kingly, or like a politician he tries to manipulate the rebel angels that their state is not so despairing as not to wage another war against God, and indeed he succeeds in this pursuit by the aid of his eloquence and tricky speeches. It can be said that it is his speech that makes him become more Satanic, because whenever he talks he talks evil, as if vomiting out all the disease he has inside him, consequently inflicting the multitude that stands in front.

Major themes in "Paradise Lost"

Milton's subject in Paradise Lost was the failure of human kind to live according to divine order and its slow deliverance (God-given) from the consequences of the fall. The myth with which he chose to deal, and in which he believed literally, was, like many other parallel myths and folktales, and exploration of the moral consequences of disobedience. The discovery of the knowledge of good and evil is neither accidental nor happy. The central character Adam has no heroic destiny. Through Eve's corruption all humankind is corrupted and as both are finally obliged to understand, the spiritual struggle to regain paradise equity and equability (self-control) extends through each generation their descendants. In a profound sense Adam and Eve fall from the ideal into the human condition. The great theme of the poem is obedience to a creative order of an omnipotent God. The will of God is imprinted in the harmony of nature, and disaster of the fall is as ecological as it is moral. Despite the temptation we see the rebellion of Satan as a heroic gesture of liberation and the fall of Adam as a species of attentiveness towards his wife, Paradise Lost insistently attempts to assert the ultimate justness of a loving God's 'Eternal Providence.'

Milton's Paradise Lost God is powerful; He creates man from his own image. They were in Eden and Satan live in Hell. Satan revolted against the God and challenged the authority of God so sent in the Hell. Adam is lesser than angels; Eve is created as Adam's partner. They were sent on the paradise in Eden Garden and said that please don't go near to this tree of knowledge and prohibited to eat the fruit of knowledge. But they committed the sin to eat that prohibited fruit. It is in conman human nature, that if someone said that it is prohibited thing than we attract to do that thing. Eve was tempted by Satan because Satan wants to take revenge with God and he knows very well that if he wants to take revenge with God he has to harm His creation. As he is not able to harm him directly he tempts Eve ate that apple and for love of Eve Adam ate that apple willingly and in conscious manner. Knowledge makes man more unnatural, when both ate that apple they came know about the good and evil, sexuality and other things. In Paradise Lost, Milton has used many themes to write further about the epic. But main theme of Paradise Lost is Disobedience of Adam and Eve. The purpose of Paradise Lost is religious and has three parts (1) Disobedience (2) Eternal providence (3) Justification of God to men.

Disobedience:- The first part of Milton's arguments hinges on the disobedience and its opposite obedience. The universe that Milton imagined with heaven at the top hell at the bottom and earth in between is a hierarchical place. God literally sits on the thrown at the top of Heaven Angels are arranged in groups according to their proximity to God. On the Earth Adam is superior to Eve humans rule over animals. Even in the Hell, Satan sits on a thrown, higher than demons. The proper way of the world was for inferiors to obey superiors because superiors well superior. A king was not because he was chosen but he was superior to his subject. It was therefore, not just proper to obey the kind was merely required. Satan's rebellion because of jealousy is the first great act of disobedience and commences all that happens in the epic.

The crucial moment in the poem results from the disobedience and a breakdown of hierarchy. Eve argues with Adam about whether they should work together or apart. The problem here lies with both humans. Eve should not argue with her superior, Adam, but like arise, Adam should not yield his authority to his inferior, Eve. Likewise, when Adam also eats the fruit, he disobeys the God. Further, he disobeys by knowingly putting Eve ahead of God. Disobedience and disruption of the correct order result in sin and death.

Justification of ways of God to Man: - Eternal providence moves the story to a difference level. Without the fall, this divine love would never have been demonstrated because Adam and Eve disobeyed God. By obeying God, he can achieve salvation. The fall actually produces a new and higher love from God to Man.

Eve's revolt: - There is an argument between Adam and Eve for Division of work. Adam insists that Eve should be closed to him and they have work together. Eve wants to work independently without Adams supervision. She wants to ;live independent life. "If so near.....good works in her husband to promote"

She furthers her argument saying that their presents are barrier to their work assign by God. Adam tries to pursuit Eve not to part from him because they have threat to their live from the enemy. But Eve is not convinced by the argument and ultimately decides to part from Adam.

Stan's Revolt: - His revolt for God because is disobeying Him. He speaks against God so he was punished and thrown into the Hell. He knows that he is not capable to take revenge with God so he harms the creation of God. Satan takes the advantage of Eve and Adam's separation. He seduces Eve in the form of serpent. Satan enters in Eden garden unobserved during midnight to take revenge against God. Satan's motto is to destroy the creation of God.

John Milton's Grand Style

In his Oxford lecture 'On Translating Homer: Last Words', Mathew Arnold used this now famous phrase. 'Such a style, he maintained, arises when a noble nature, poetically gifted, treats with simplicity or with severity a serious subject'. Arnold refers to Homer, Pindar, Virgil, Dante, and Milton as exponents of grand style. It was a lofty or elevated style suitable for epic, a style Arnold himself attempted in, for instance in 'Sohrab and Rustum'.

Now, we discuss the devices used in 'Paradise Lost' by Milton which have caused his style to be characterized as the Grand Style.

Erudite Style, Full of Allusion: - The language of 'Paradise Lost' is that of a scholar writing for scholars. A beautiful illustration of the poet's fondness for allusions is provided by his description of Satan's forces, which dwarfed the mightiest armies known to history or legend:

- the giant brood mentioned by Hesiod
- the heroic race that fought at Thebes and Troy mentioned by Homer
- the knights of king Arthur mentioned by Geoffrey of Monmouth
- the Crusaders who fought the Saracens mentioned in history, and
- the warriors of Charlemagne mentioned in the Italian epics.

The whole treasury of poetry and the whole storehouse of learning are at his command.

Suggestive Quality in Style: - In Milton's poetry more is meant than meets the ear. He means more than what he says. As the poet's difficulty throughout the poem is to describe what cannot be exactly described—Heaven, Chaos, Hell, God, Angels, Devils-he throws out a broad hint or two of their intended shapes and appearance and asks the reader to imagine the rest. Thus Satan's huge figure, which nobody can have an idea of, is described with a few suggestive strokes: 'head uplift above the wave', 'eyes that sparkling blazed', and other parts in bulk as large 'as whom the fables name of monstrous size'. Hell is described

As one great furnace flam'd: yet from those flames
No light, but rather darkness visible........
Oh how unlike the place from whence they fell.

We have to suggest a lot to form a whole picture of the Hell.

Unusual Structure of Sentences: - Milton's common practice is to place a noun between its two qualifying adjectives, though the English grammar requires both to be placed before the noun: the upright heart and pure', 'the dismal situation waste and wild', 'ever burning sulpher unconsumed'. Sometimes he uses one part of speech for another, such as verb as noun in 'the great consult began'; adjective as noun 'the palpable obscure' etc. In spite of the violation of the accepted rules of grammar, one cannot deny that 'Paradise Lost' is a poem for scholarly readers. The violation of grammar is not so much criticized as the beauty of his style is appreciated.

Use of Similes: - A striking feature in 'Paradise Lost' is Milton's use of similes. These are expanded to draw complete pictures. They had dignity of the narrative, and do not merely illustrate but also decorate the epic theme and character.

Elevated Speeches: - The lofty tone is maintained in the speeches of Satan, as for instance in the speech to Beelzebub. One cannot help noting the rhetorical eloquence with which Satan encourages the fallen angels.

Conclusion: - Milton maintains a constant elevation and dignity of style corresponding to the greatness of theme, and Mathew Arnold is absolutely right when he refers to Milton as a poet of grand style. Thus vocabulary sentence, imagery, allusion, Latinisms all mingle and unite to form the majestic garment of Milton's thought and feelings.

Three poets, in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn.
The first in loftiness of thought surpassed;
The next, in majesty; in both the last.
The force of Nature could no further go.
To make a third, she joined the former two."

Paradise Lost: Milton's Use of Epic Similes

Epic similes are used in literary works to create elaborate comparisons beyond the original point of similarity Milton uses a number of epic similes in his poem Paradise Lost. As Harding suggests in his article "Milton's Bee-Simile," Milton could have used epic similes in order to raise his poetry to the level of his Greek predecessors. The similes create sympathy for the characters by comparing Satan and the fallen angels to objects and creatures that reduce their severity. As Paradise Lost progresses, Milton's use of epic similes gradually diminishes those that they describe, making the reader more sympathetic to Satan and the Fallen Angels as well as aligning humanity to the fallen characters.

The Greek poet Homer is thought to have originated the epic simile in his poem The Iliad, to which we can make connections to Milton. Milton's bee-simile is an excellent example of a "shared" epic simile between Homer and Milton. There are various functions of Milton's epic similes: foreshadow, exaggeration, emotion / intellectual functions, aesthetic, relief and illustrative. The first simile in which something greater is happening is that when Satan is compared to the sun. Milton's comparison of Satan to the sun is not as straightforward. A "sun new risen" often represents light, life, and all that is good. If the sun represents good and Satan embodies evil, then why does Milton align the two? This is the first instance where Satan appears sympathetic. We become entranced with Satan's character as something alike the goodness of the sun, causing us to create sympathy for him, his angels, and his mission.

Milton often uses epic similes in his descriptions of the Fallen Angels that create sympathy for these sunken characters. Milton compares the fallen angels to fallen leaves. The image Milton creates with this simile is extremely depressing and shows just how far the angels have fallen from their previous glory. Like the leaves from the trees, the angels too have fallen and are strewn about in hell; they are lifeless and piled on top of each other.

Just lines after the fallen leaves simile, Milton compares the Fallen Angels to a swarm of locusts, further instilling the reader's sympathy in the fallen characters. The leaves simile portrays the Fallen Angels as pathetic, fallen beings who are strewn on top of the Earth. The locust simile is unsettling and creates sympathy in a different way than the leaves simile. The reader's initial impulse could be that locusts are evil due to various biblical implications. The movement in the locust simile suggests that the angels have become restless in anticipation for Satan's plan of action. This image of the angels swarming their leader, trapped in unfamiliar bodies, creates a great deal of sympathy.

Milton also uses epic similes to compare Satan to various creatures and with each comparison Satan becomes further diminished. The first epic simile of Satan is found in book one and compares Satan to a large sea monster known as the Leviathan. The Leviathan is referenced many times in the Bible. The Leviathan, like Satan, also takes form as a giant serpent. This comparison foreshadows Satan's last state of existence in Paradise Lost when he appears as a serpent in books nine and ten. Satan as the Levitation is a disturbing image. In the Bible, the Leviathan is large, has many heads, and dwells in the sea. This simile implies Satan's power and fury as the angels awaken to find they have fallen into hell. Milton does not create any sympathy for Satan in this first simile. Milton offers another simile of Satan in book one that describes him as a sympathetic leader. Although this simile comes not far after the Leviathan simile, there is a drastic difference in how Satan is described. Milton writes,

He, above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent
Stood like a tower; his form had not yet lost
All her original brightness nor appeared
Less than archangel ruined and the excess
Of glory obscured, as when the sun new arisen (Milton 1.589-594).

This is the first simile in which we see Milton's attempt to create sympathy for the fallen characters. Before this he was compared to a giant sea monster, here Satan is likened to solar eclipse. Milton writes that Satan is "shorn of his beams/or from the behind the moon/in dim eclipse" (Milton 1.596-97) Satan is compared to the sun trapped behind the moon. In a solar eclipse, one can only see the outer rays of the sun protruding from behind the moon's shadow.

In book nine, back in Paradise, we see Satan's transformation. Satan says,

"O foul descent, that I who erst contended/
With gods to sit the highest, am now constrained/
Into a beast and mixed with bestial slime/
This essence to incarnate and imbrute/…
But what will not ambition and revenge/ Descend to?" (Milton IX.163-69).

We see that Satan has become aware of his "imbrutement." What makes this transformation sympathetic is how little Satan has learned after his fall. To end his speech Satan says, "spite when with spite is best repaid" (Milton IX.177). Satan's disfigurement has only convinced him further that "Who aspires must down as low as high he soared"(Milton IX169-70). Milton wonders why he is being punished for his ambition rather than recognizing his own evils.

Milton's similes bring sympathy and understanding to those characters that they describe and also align the characters within the comparisons to humankind. Satan begins his journey as an angel in heaven, and ends his journey as a tormenting serpent. As Satan digresses, he becomes more concrete. We see Adam and Eve follow a similar path. Before the fall, man and woman are unfamiliar because their lives are surrounded by perfection and bliss. Once they have fallen, they experience emotions that are easier for us to understand: lust, jealously, revenge. The further Satan falls from heaven, the closer he becomes to humankind and the further Adam and Eve fall, the closer they become to Satan. We cannot picture Satan atop a tree, perched as a large bird or Satan whispering temptation into Eve's ear as a toad. These comparisons are what make Satan relatable; they make Satan more than an angel dispelled from heaven. Satan becomes earthly, sympathetic, and arguably more human. In this context, one should remember Addison's famous observation about the essential characteristic of Milton's epic similes:

"When Milton eludes either to things or persons he never quits his similes until it rises to some very great idea, which is often foreign to the occasions that gave birth to. He runs on with the idea till he has raised out of it some glorious image to inflame the mind of the readers and to give it that sublime kind of entertainment which is suitable to the nature of a heroic poem".

Paradise Lost as a Classical Epic

An epic is a long narrative poem, ordinarily concerning a serious subject containing details of heroic deeds and events significant to a culture or nation. Homer and Virgil were the two great masters of the Classical epic. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid have invariably served as models for all writers of the classical epic. Milton was a great classical scholar and he sought to write an epic. He dreamt of immortality and he aspired to be one with Homer and Virgil as the author of a classical epic. Milton turned his great classical and Biblical learning to a poem to "assert eternal providence, and justify the ways of God to men".

"I may assert Eternal Providence,
And justify the ways of God to men."

Milton achieved eminent success in making Paradise Lost as classical epic. In spite of certain drawbacks and defects, Milton's epic is entitled to take its rightful place among half a dozen classical epics in the world. The first essential feature of the epic is its theme. The theme of an epic must have a national importance or significance; that is, the epic must be a true and faithful mirror of the life and of a nation. Homer represented the national life, thought and culture of the Greeks in the Iliad, and Virgil gave expression to the hopes and aspirations of the Romans in the Aeneid. The Fall of Man is the theme of the epic.

"Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world, and all our woe,"

The epic action has three qualifications. First, it should be one action, secondly, it should be an entire action, and thirdly, it should be a great action. In short, the action of an epic should be one, entire and great. All these three qualities of epic action are followed by Milton.

The action of Paradise Lost is one and there is a unity of action. The central action is the Fall of Man, and everything in the epic as, the battle of angels, the creation of the world, is subordinated to this central action. There are digressions at the beginning of the third and seventh books, but they do not affect the unity and central action of the poem. The whole action of Paradise Lost is single and compact. In the second place, its action is entire which means that it has a beginning, middle and an end. The action in Paradise Lost is contrived in hell, executed upon earth, and punished by heaven. In the third place the action ought to be great, by greatness of the action, Aristotle means that it should not only be great in its nature but also in its duration. The entire action of Paradise Lost has a stamp of grandeur and greatness about it. Milton's subject is greater than Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid. It does not determine the fate of one single person or nation; but of the whole human race.

Milton plunges into the middle of the action. Milton, in imitation of the great poets, opens his Paradise Lost, with an infernal council plotting the fall of man.

The characters of the epic must have dignity and variety. In Paradise Lost, we have a wide variety of characters marked with qualities. In Paradise Lost, we have human as well as superhuman characters. Adams and Eve are human characters, whereas God, Christ and Satan are superhuman characters.

An epic must have a hero with great qualities. Identification of the hero is different in Paradise Lost. Adam can be called the hero of the epic. He is not a warrior or a conqueror but a noble figure.

An epic is a serious poem embodying sublime and nobler thoughts. Milton's Paradise Lost is a sublime and noble poem characterized by loftiness of thought and sentiment.

An epic is not without a moral. Moral forms an integral and intrinsic part in Milton's poem. It seeks to "vindicate the ways of God to man, to show the reasonableness of religion and the necessity of obedience to the Divine Law".

Milton, in conformity with the epic practice, begins Paradise Lost by invoking the Muse to help him in his great task. But since Milton seeks the aid of the Heavenly Muse, the Holy spirit,

"And chiefly thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples the upright heart and pure, Instruct me, for thou know'st:"

He requests:

"- -: what in me is dark Illumine, what is low raise and support,"

In an epic poem the poet narrates very little in his person. The characters themselves carry forward the mission of the poet.

Lastly the language of an epic must be sublime and rose above the language of common vernacular.

"- What though the fields be lost?
All is not lost"

Aristotle observes that a sublime style can be formed by three methods - by the use of metaphors, by making use of the idioms and by lengthening of the phrase by the addition of words. Milton employs all these three methods to give the air of grandeur to his epic. His similes and metaphors are epical. Latin words are frequently introduced. The style of Paradise Lost is the truest example of grand style. On one place, Satan says:

"The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heav'n"

On the other place:

"Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven."

Milton's Paradise Lost is a successful classical epic. Paradise lost has thus many excellences as an epic but the defects in it also not be forgotten. The introduction of allegorical persons like sin and death, the frequent allusions to heathen mythological fables, the intervention of grotesque incidents, the frequent indulgence in puns and useless display of learning and the unnecessary use of technical terms as in the description of Pandemonium are some blemishes in the style of the poem.

One other point must also be noted. An epic is an objective poem, and personal reflections are out of place in it. But the most sublime parts of Paradise Lost reflect the individuality of the poet. However this has added to the interest of the work as a poem though it is not, strictly speaking, permissible in an epic.

The Theme & Moral Purpose of "Paradise Lost" Book-I

Introduction: - An epic worthy of the name should deal with an action or story which has universal or even cosmic appeal. All epics of antiquity deal with personalities and events of divine or superhuman dimensions. The Iliad dealt with Gods and heroes, lovely women and romantic lovers, doughty deeds on the battle-field and heroic achievements and death. But the ancient epics dealt with men and events which we know could not have happened as described. Much of it is pure imagination, much of it is fantastic or incredible and many other parts are beyond human agencies. They help us to realise that we are surrounded by invisible powers which can shape us to some extent, and which exert a continuous influence over us for good and ill. Faith in God and a divine order is thus inculcated, and we do not feel as strangers or helpless beings in this world. Death is the final end of all mortal men. But before death comes, we are impelled to do something worthy of our higher natures so that it may remain as an object of inspiration to all mankind. Thus, epics give us delight, instruction, edification and consolation.

Milton's Subject: Fall of Man: - Milton was a profound student of the classics, and from a very early period of his life, he was seized with the ambition to write an epic poem. But the course of his life was chequered by many interests, conflicts and crosses which prevented him from taking up the work on which he kept on brooding. At last he hit upon the subject of the fall of Man as narrated in the Bible as a fit theme for his epic, and planned and completed his Paradise Lost. The actual story of Adam and Eve, of their blissful state of innocence in paradise and the manner of their fall from it is very briefly narrated in the Genesis. Taking it as the kernel of his work, he decided to enrich it in all possible ways with the resources of his poetical faculties, his wide knowledge, learning and scholarship. Coleridge commenting on the theme of Paradise Lost said:

"It represents origin of evil and the combat of evil and good, it contains matter of deep interest to all mankind, as forming the basis of all religion and the true occasion of all philosophy whatsoever."

The fall of man is a subject of universal interest. Unlike other epics of ancient times, he could treat it in such a way as to ring conviction to the modern mind. But as mythology is a very essential aspect of all epics, he decided to make use of all his classical lore to embellish and illustrate his own narrative. As an epic should provide for the free play of all the nova rasas as we call them, he developed a plot which provided scope for them in ample measure. Biblical history is a part of the Sematic racial heritage; and the ancient Hebrews had come into contact with the pre-classical body of knowledge which goes back to a much more ancient past than that of ancient Greece and Rome. At the same time, according to the Christian religion, all mankind has been cursed as a result of the disobedience and fall of Man. Also that religion connects it with the coming of Jesus Christ as the Saviour of mankind from the sin of which Adam and Eve were guilty. A.C. George states:

"We can state the essential theme of Paradise Lost as the sustained opposition between love and hate, God responds to the destructive challenge of Satan with the creative expression of love." "Milton has combined two traditional elements - the story of the challenge and response through an indirect agent. The former theme is the direct physical conflict of the Celestial Battle, and the latter is Satan's challenge of God-indirectly through God's own creature man. The second theme arises out of the first."

Another interpretation is that the theme of Paradise Lost is "the Fall of Man" from Paradise on account of his sin. Milton has tried to show that every action of man has its consequences. His principal concern is that man must make the right use of every moment of life because his actions are irrevocable. Milton's object in this poem was also to emphasize the role of Christ as the Redeemer of mankind and to justify the ways of God to men.

The doctrine of Free Will has been insisted on by Milton frequently and emphatically. The kind of action or state of mind Milton felt desirable was one perfectly controlled by the conscious will. Any deed, however significant, performed instinctively or without the full significance of the issue realized, was of little value. Milton has not condemned the element of desire in human nature but the difference between love that is genuine and passion that is not controlled by reason has been brought out.

God's Pity on Mankind: - As every sin has to be punished so was it the lot of mankind to suffer death although they had been promised immortality by God. But God himself took pity on mankind after a time, and resolved to come down in human shape to save men from hell and death. So Christ is represented as the Son of God, according to Christian belief, who came on earth and suffered Himself to be crucified, thus taking on himself the sin of mankind. This is known as the doctrine of vicarious suffering. God as man, suffered despite being pure and guiltless. By following Christ men were thus giving a chance of regaining their lost Paradise. This is the main topic which Milton has elaborated in his two great epics called Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. The first deals with the entire story of the Universe from the moment of the creation of the world and of Adam and Eve, down to the disobedience of Adam tempted by Satan.

Two Groups of Angels: - To explain how Satan came to be an evil spirit, we have another mythological story of how there was formerly great war between one group of angels devoted to God and another group of angels led by Lucifer who wished to overthrow God so that he himself might become the most supreme of spirits, in the end, Lucifer was defeated and hurled down by God with all his hosts into a bottomless pit there to suffer for ever. But Lucifer, thereafter called Satan rankled in his defeat and planned to seek revenge against the Almighty. On hearing that God had created Man to take the place of the fallen angels, he decided to tempt him and wean him away from God. He found an opportunity to do so, since God put Adam and Eve in Paradise and gave him the lordship of all creation with one exception alone. This was that they should not taste of the fruit of the tree of knowledge which grew in Eden.

Satan seized the opening, and after recognising his shattered hosts and placing them in suitable dwellings in Hell, came out, and taking the form of a serpent, entered Eden and caused the fall of both Adam and Eve by persuading Eve to eat the fruit of knowledge. With knowledge, Adam and Eve lost their innocence, and God cursed them not only with the loss of their immorality and happiness but also drove them out of Eden to wander over the earth and earn their bread by the sweat of their brow.

Various Episodes: -Into this main Biblical story, Milton has woven many episodes, drawn from the entire range of ancient lore to give his poem both substance, bulk and shape and impressive majesty and sublimity.

Vastness of the Theme: - Critics have admired Milton's courage in dealing with the universal subject. The scene of action is the universal space; time is represented by eternity. The characters are God and His creation. The epic deals with the fortunes of the whole human race and not of a particular country and nation.

The Problem of Evil: The Conflict between Good and Evil: - The problem of evil is a very old subject. Philosophers have given different views regarding the origin of the evil. Some regarded it as something external. Others regarded it as something eternal. For Satan, evil is the disobedience of the order of God. It is the will of the Man asserting himself. In fact, Satan brought freedom to Man. He gave consciousness of personality to Man. Man began to act with free choice and judgement. Now this freedom meant facing the consequences of one's choice. Adam and Eve have, therefore, to leave paradise because they followed their own free will. Milton condemned the act of Man. He did not appreciate man's free will and judgement because he was a very strict Puritan. His stress was on the results of the evil which led man to his ruin.

Some critics feel that there are two themes which are quite balanced, namely, the Fall of Angels and Fall of Man. The first half deals with Satan's efforts to do something against God. The second half is the drama of Adam and Eve. But this cannot be accepted. Milton clearly said that his story dealt with the Fall of Man. Satan's story is subsidiary to the main story of Adam and Eve.

Milton's Failure to Justify the Ways of God to Man: - Some critics believe that the poet instead justifies the ways of Satan to men, he has not justified the ways of god on the poetic level. Milton has tried to do so through arguments which are unconvincing. Moreover, the punishment given to Adam and Eve is out of proportion to their sin of disobedience. Hanford points out that the justification of divine ways lies in the representation of Adam as a free agent and in the revelation of the working of God's Grace which allows to him and his descendants the opportunity for a new exercise of moral choice and of consequent salvation even after the Fall. The poet has gone out of his way again and again to insist on the fact of Adam's freedom. Neither personally nor as a part of the system did the idea greatly move or interest him.

Poetic Justice: - The theme of the epic is the justification of "God's ways to Man. "Milton justified the punishment of Adam and Eve for the crime they committed. They are expelled from Paradise. However, Milton is not a pessimist. He believe in spiritual development from Hope to Faith. God through His Goodness redeems man from sin. His son namely Christ offers his own sacrifice for the sake of Adam and Eve. At the end of the Paradise Lost, Adam and Eve feel repentant. They are punished in Heaven by God through the angel named Michael. David Daiches states: "Milton's heart was not fully in this sort of justification. Whatever he might have consciously thought."

However, he adds that the true justification lies in the way in that virtue can only be achieved by struggle, that the Fall was inevitable because a passive and ignorant virtue, with the challenge of an imperfect world, cannot release the true potentialities of human greatness.

Conclusion: - Milton's Puritanism and his great faith in the Bible made him choose his subject which was of interest to all men. His great achievement lies in making such a serious subject which is agreeable and acceptable to all. In fact, his sublimity (greatness and grandeur) can only be maintained at high level on a very lofty subject,

Character of "Satan"

Satan occupies the most prominent position in the action of Paradise Lost. Though the main theme of the poem is the “Man’s first disobedience” yet it is the character of Satan which gives a touch of greatness to this epic. All the poetic powers of Milton are shown on the delineation of the majestic personality of the enemy of God and Man, i.e. Satan.

As it is shown in Paradise Lost Book-I that the character of Satan is a blend of the noble and the ignoble, the exalted and the mean, the great and the low, therefore, it becomes difficult to declare him either a hero or a wholly villain.

In Paradise Lost Book-I we can hardly doubt his heroic qualities because this book fully exhibits his exemplary will-power, unsurpassable determination, unshakable confidence and unbelievable courage. However, the encyclopaedia of religion removes some of the confusion from our minds regarding Satan's character in the following words:

"Satan means the arch-enemy of men, the adversary of God and of Christianity, a rebel against God, a lost arch-angle."

Milton also confirms the remarks and tells us that Satan is an archangel. When God declares the Holy Christ his viceroy, Satan refuses to accept God's order because he himself is a confident for it, his false strength and pride leads him to revolt against God for the fulfillment of his lust for power but he and his army suffers a heavy defeat and throw headlong into the pit of hell.

Milton's description of Satan's huge physical dimension, the heavy arms he carries, his tower like personality and his gesture make him every inch a hero. In his first speech, Satan tells Beelzebub that he does not repent of what he did and that defeat has brought no change in him at all. He utters memorable lines:

"What though the field be lost?
All is not lost – the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield."

Actually he is not ready to bow before the will of God and is determined to wade and eternal war by force and will never compromise. He proudly calls himself the new possessor of the profoundest hell and foolishly claims to have a mind never to be changed by force or time. As he says:

"The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven."

Although Satan undergoes perpetual mental and physical torture in hell yet he is fully satisfied because he is at liberty to do whatever he likes, without any restriction. The following line clearly indicates his concept of freedom.

"Better to reign in Hell, the Serve in Heaven."

It can be said without any doubt that Satan gives an evidence of great leadership qualities which are certainly worthy of an epic hero and Beelzebub appreciates him for his undaunted virtues as the commander of undaunted virtue as the commander of fallen angels. His speech to the fallen angels is a sole roof of his great leadership because it infuses a new spirit in the defeated angels who come out of the pit of hill with their swords and are ready to face any danger regardless of their crushing and humiliating defeat at the hands of God. We fully laud Satan's views on the themes of honour, revenge and freedom, but we cannot help sympathizing him because he embodies evil. He is the embodiment of disobedience to God.

As the poem proceeds, the character of Satan degenerates and he fails to produce any impression to true heroism because he is morally a degraded figure. When we closely examine his addressed to his followers, we find that it is full of contradictions and absurdities, because he tries to throw dust into the eyes of his comrades. In fact, on the one hand, he says that they will provoke war against God and on the other hand, he wants peace which is only possible through submission. Then, on reaching the earth, he enters into a serpent and is completely degrades. Pride is the cause of his fall from Heaven – Pride that has 'raised' him to contend with the mightiest. But where is that pride when the Archangel enters into the mouth of a sleeping serpent and hides himself in its "Mazy folds". Here from the grand figure that he is in the beginning, he degenerates into a man and cunning fellow, and then he tries to tempt Eve by guile. So, Satan degenerates from the role of a brave hero to that of a cunning villain as C. S. Lewis remarks:

"From hero to general, from general to politician, from politician to secret service agent, and thence to a thing that peers in at bed-room or bath-room window and thence toad, and finally to a snake – such is the progress of Satan."

So, it can easily be said in the light of above mentioned facts that Satan is out and pouter hero in Book-I of Paradise Lost, but in Book-IX he appears before us every inch a villain because of his evil design and he himself says that his chief pleasure lies in the destruction of mankind which lowers him in our estimation as a hero.

The Influence of Reformation and Renaissance on Milton

Introduction: - The Renaissance and the Reformation had their impact on England in the sixteenth century. Milton's work reflects the influence of both the Reformation and the Renaissance. He homogenised Reformation and Renaissance into a perfect whole. When he started writing, the initial exuberance ushered in by the Renaissance and the Reformation was already on its way out. His poetry is the first and the last example of the happy and effortless harmonisation of the two mutually antagonistic enthusiasms which stirred the England of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Milton Blends the Two: - The spirit of the Reformation provides the content and spirit of Milton poetry, and the spirit 6f the Renaissance classicism its moulded pattern. Milton did in the seventeenth century what the poets of the French Pleiade had done in the sixteenth. "No poet", says Grierson in The First Half of the Seventeenth Century, "realised so completely the Renaissance ideal of poetry cast in classical moulds-carried out so entirely and majestically the programme of the Pleiade. Milton and Milton only, succeeded in producing living and beautiful poems in correct classical forms. And into these classical forms he poured the spirit of the Protestant movement." In fact Milton's Puritanism (a product of the Reformation) and his Hellenism (a product of the Renaissance) were more closely harmonised in his genius than the division of theme and form would suggest. Milton seems to have enlivened Puritanism with Hellenism and tempered his Hellenism with Puritanism. Milton was neither a godless pagan nor a Puritan formalist nor was he both simultaneously. He imbibed the true spirit of both tendencies and wrote under the unified impact of both.

The Reformation Elements: - In Milton's poetry the Reformation element is found as his soft and steady puritanism. Puritans were those who "protested" against even the Protestants who in their turn had protested against the Pope and the Popish religion. The Reformation signifies the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century which gave rise to the various Protestant or Evangelical organisations of Christendom. The movement was European in extent and was widely successful in the reign of Henry VIII, and later Elizabeth I. But some splinter sects rose against the Protestant Church of England which they thought was not yet fully reformed, and who urged to take Christianity back to the religion of Jesus Christ. These Puritans devotedly and rather superstitiously revered the Bible, condemned the Protestant bishop (episcopacy) and every institutionalised religion, emphasised every man's inner light, hated all arts such as painting, sculpture and music and even drama, all show and luxury, shied at the least appearance of evil, favoured highly formalised and rigorous conduct, and, in general, turned against all literature and aesthetic pursuits. Now, Milton was born in a Puritan family. His schooling and surroundings, his social and political affiliations, and a number of other factors combined to instil in him a love of Puritan ideology and way of life. However, he was a man of too strong an individuality to accept any formal "ism" in its totality. He was a deeply religious man, and even at the age of twenty-three he could write:

All is, if I have grace to use it so;
As ever in my great Task Master's eye.

Milton's puritanism has not much to do with the stoic creed of ordinary puritans. The Renaissance elements of his intellectual set-up effectively controvert these tendencies and any fanatic adherence to a rigorous code of conduct and ultimate values. His version of puritanism was tinged by his love of the classics, the love of nature, the love of beauty, and Renaissance humanism insisting on the world of man, and love of "the human face divine." Moreover, unlike most Puritans, Milton emphasises the spirit rather than the conduct. And this emphasis brings him into affinity with the Cambridge Platonists who were themselves mostly Puritans. Milton believed that "the Spirit which is given to us is a more certain guide than Scripture.'' In his pamphlet Of True Religion he states that along with external Scripture there is an internal Scripture, "the Holy Spirit written in the Hearts of believers". Milton departed from the Puritan creed even in some important doctrinal points. For instance, he did not subscribe to the doctrine of predestination and refused the Son an equal status with the Father. In more general terms, he tried to reconstruct the Puritan creed on the basis of the humanistic ideology of the Renaissance.

The Renaissance Elements: - The Renaissance in England gave rise to a large number of tendencies. It brought in its wake love and appreciation of the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, a keen love of beauty and art, and a new stress on human life and pursuits. Milton is obviously affected by all these ramifications of the spirit of the Renaissance. In short, the Renaissance spirit in Milton was influenced and modified by his ingrained puritanism. The Renaissance elements show themselves in Milton in two ways:

(i) They provide, as we have already-said, the classical framework for most of his major poetical works.

(ii) They leaven, humanise, Hellenise, refine, and somewhat secularise his puritanism and mitigate its severity. Almost all of Milton's poetic works are embodiments of the Renaissance and the Reformation elements.

Puritan Element in Paradise Lost: - The very theme of Paradise Lost shows the Puritan or Hebraic element in Milton. The fact that he chose the Fall of Man as the theme of his great epic shows the Puritan in him. Wars and adventurous deeds did not interest the Puritan poet.

Not sedulous by nature to indite"
War!, hitherto the only argument
Heroic deemed... (Book IX-27-29)

The theme is the most heroic of all great English poems. He based his great work on the story of the Fall of Man, as given in the Bible. To him this story was not fictitious or legendary, but literally and historically true. It was indeed his Puritan character that led him to this theme, but it gave full scope for the expression of his stupendous genius. Though he has introduced wars and adventurous deeds into the body of the epic, according to the classical tradition, the central theme of the poem is disobedience to God's command and the consequent Fall of Man. The conflict in the epic is not external; it is a spiritual conflict 'Man's first disobedience.' The theme of the epic, thus, is religious; it is based on the Bible.

In Paradise Lost, Milton's object is not only to "assert Eternal Providence and justify the ways of God to men," but much more. For the poem contains profound observations on religion, morality, politics, government, war and peace and the relationship between man and woman, arts, sciences, explorations and on practically all the important aspects of life. All are sanctified by 'whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave."

"Paradise Lost" based upon classical model: - The division of the epic into twelve books, the relieving similes, the councils, the heroic catalogues and the heavenly messengers, are only some of the technical devices that show Milton's indebtedness to the classics.

The form of the epic and treatment of the religious theme are entirely in classical tradition. Milton had declared that he would write an epic in the style of Homer, and every element in the form of Paradise Lost is in the classical style. We have in Paradise Lost all the ingredients of the classical epic-invocation to the Muse, plunging into the very middle of the action, description of war, gradual development of action leading up to the climax - viz, plucking the fruit of the forbidden trees, resulting in the Fall of Man, and then the resolution of the conflict ending in Man's loss of Paradise. Thus the plan and design of Paradise Lost follows meticulously the classical models of homer and Virgil.

In telling the story of the Fall of Man, Milton fully expresses the spirit of the Renaissance. One of the fundamental attributes of Milton's character was his love of freedom and spirit of independence. In the story of Adam there was the conflict between pre-destination and free will. Without entering into theological controversy we may say that Milton was all for freedom, and pointed out how Adam plucked the fruit out of his free will (induced no doubt by Eve), though he had been commanded by God not to do so. And as a result of disobedience he fell under the wrath of Gold. The moral thesis of Genesis is submission to the Almighty, which makes out disobedience to be sinful. But Milton, who wished to emphasize this moral, had an independent spirit and had lived independently. He had acclaimed and advocated the rebellion against the prelates and even the king, and celebrated the glories of regicide. In spite of himself, he was in deep sympathy with Satan, the great rebel of Heaven and the enemy of God. This spirit of rebellion is embodied in the character of Satan, and it is in Satan that Milton put most of himself, his pride and temperament.

In Paradise Lost we have a combination which is absolutely unique in the literature of the time; a poem which has all the deep spiritual fervour of Puritanism, decorated and diversified by every ornament and beauty which could possibly be borrowed from classical literature and mythology. The reader will feel a sense of confusion arise at times from the strange mixture of Christian and pagan ideas. It is essentially the Hell of the ancient Greeks and Romans which Milton describes where the river of Lathe, Cocytus and Styx flow, and it is the Greek Fury, named Medusa who guards the fort. The dreadful figures of Sin and Death are modelled on ancient classical monsters, while Chaos is surrounded by the classical figure of Ades, Orcus and Demogorgon. This makes us wonder what Milton really did believe in, but the fact is that the Christian Bible does not supply a clear picture of Hell and is not very definite as regards the geography or population of the lower region. On the other hand, the classical conception was clear-cut, vivid and pictorial and hence Milton did not hesitate to draw boldly from it so that the nakedness and deficiencies of the Puritan conception would be well hidden under gaudy pagan robes.

Impact of Classical Scholarship in the Style of "Paradise Lost": - In the style of Paradise Lost again, we find the unmistakable impress of classical scholarship. His use of similes, "his use of history and geography, his knowledge of the ancient and modern literature, his love of art and music, his culture and refinement-all point to the influence of the Renaissance and Hellenism on his receptive mind. There is no poetic work so stupendous in its scope, so sublime in its style and moral outlook, which can be compared with Milton's Paradise Lost.

A typical Renaissance figure Milton was impregnated with the classics but he equally drew his inspiration from the Bible and from Hebrew lore. His epic shows his familiarity with the literature, history and the lore of medieval and Renaissance Europe. He understood the technique of music, architecture, engineering, soldiering, astronomy and uses illustration from all of these to add majesty and variety to his work.

One of the most significant features of the use he makes of his learning in the manner in which he adapts classical lore to his Christian purpose and mingles reference to the classical with the use of the Bible and Hebrew mythology, i.e. He is inspired by a 'Muse' (classical) but the Muse is 'heavenly', the one which inspired Moses: he combines his appeal to the Muse for help with connected appeal to the New Testament of Holy spirit. His Hell is the Gehenna of the Jews but at the same time the Hades of the Greeks. His devils will be the Gods of Paganism (Palestinian, Egyptian, Greek), and in the remarkable 'naming' section he offers us a full display of his learning in the various mythologies. God-like Zeus - uses thunder and is the Thunderer. Sin and Death are allegorical figures from Milton's Christian imagination, but the description of Sin's birth is adapted from the classical accounts of the birth of Pallas Athene, while the revolting description of Sin herself is modelled on the account given of Scylla by Ovid and Virgil. The description of the position in space of the Earth's Universe-hanging by a golden chain from Heaven - is taken from Homer's story of the golden chain of Zeus, etc.

Conclusion: - Paradise Lost is great by reason of its vast imaginative range, and its deep moral earnestness. It was the influence of the Renaissance, with spirit of humanism and classicism that gave to the poem its epic form and its imaginative grandeur; while its subject-matter and its moral earnestness are due to the influence of the Reformation with its spirit of Hebraism.

Autobiographical Elements in "Paradise Lost"

Paradise Lost is an epic, and an epic is a work of objective art. As such, there is hardly any scope for the poet to express himself in an epic poem. But Milton was a self-centred individual and so, in spite of the fact that he was writing an epic, his personality expressed itself all through the poem. In fact, he revealed himself in all his works, whether he was writing an ode or an elegy or an epic, or a masque or a drama. Coleridge rightly points out: "John Milton is in every line of Paradise Lost." The whole poem is coloured by the personality of Milton. Milton is in truth the only living being who exists in his own works. He projects himself, his feelings, knowledge and aspiration into the characters of his epic, both the primitive human creatures and the superhuman beings, whether celestial or infernal.

Self-revelation in "Paradise Lost": - Being a great epic poem, Paradise Lost should be just as impersonal as that of the drama. But we find that the whole poem is coloured by the personality of Milton; we see Milton, the Puritan, Milton, the classical scholar, Milton, the hater of autocratic government and kingship, Milton, the despiser of women. Throughout the poem some passages stand out among the remaining ones because they form part of the spiritual autobiography of the poet. It is unlikely that they crept in unconsciously, for their anticipations occur in his earlier utterances in prose or verse. His tirades against the corrupt practices of the Roman Catholic Church, his poor opinion of women, his condemnation of the rosy path of dalliance with particular reference to courtly revelries, and his poignant references to his blindness and solitude.

Milton, the Champion of Popular Liberty: - Milton was particularly independent in character, and could not fit himself into the discipline of an old established University. Whatever savoured to him of oppression in civil life or in religion was to his dislike. In his own way he was as determined a rebel against constituted authority and as ardent an apostle of liberty. This, unconsciously, he puts into the mouth of Satan reflects a great deal of the ideals and aspirations of Milton. It is in the passage where Satan speaks of the joy of independence, and of the hatred which he bears to the tyranny of Heaven's Ruler, that he reaches the most commanding heights of noble eloquence. The reason for this is obvious, for Milton was the great champion of popular liberty in his own day, and gave up the best years of his life, as well as his eyesight, to the cause of England's fight against oppression. Milton cannot impart to Satan some of his own sentiments and putting him in the position of the champion of liberty against autocratic rulers. The very idea of kingship had become hateful to Milton.

Thus, Satan is a projection of Milton's own self. The greatest character of Paradise Lost is a projection of Milton's own self. Satan embodies Milton's courage, love of freedom, republicanism and hatred of tyranny. Just as Milton opposed the autocracy of King Charles I and became a stern republican, so also Satan defied the authority of God and rebelled against Him. Again, the defeat of the republican's cause, with which Milton identified himself did not and could not curb his spirit so also the defeat of Satan could not damp his unconquerable spirit of defiance. It seems Milton himself speaks when Satan says:

What though the field be lost
All is not lost; the unconquerable will
And courage never to submit or yield.
What else is not to overcome.

The wonderful eloquence of the council in Hell is an echo from a period of passionate parliamentary life. It cannot be denied that "the debate in Hell would have been lacking in power and verisimilitude if the poet had not lived through the period of the long parliament." Moreover, the war in heaven is the civil war of England, characterized by bitterness of feeling and language peculiar to internal broils.

Milton's Self in Adam: - Another part of Milton's self is exhibited in Adam, who is pious, God-fearing and grave, but susceptible to feminine charm. Through Adam, Milton expresses his feelings towards woman. Adam expresses a bitter cry wrung from Milton by the unforgotten miseries of his first marriage. The scene of reconciliation between Adam and Eve is reminiscent of a similar scene between Milton and his first wife.

Style Bears Stamp of Milton's Mind: - The style of Paradise Lost bears upon it the unmistakable stamp of Milton's mind. The blank verse of Paradise Lost is the verse of a great poet and a great musical artist. On the one hand, it soars high into the lofty region of imagination and on the other; it possesses a grand music. His achievements in constructing his new blank verse are unique indeed. He made his verse perfectly suited to his lofty subject-matter.

The Biblical and classical allusions which abound in Paradise Lost indicate the scholarship and learning of Milton. The style of Milton, unique in itself, has all the stamp of Milton's personality. The word "Miltonic" has acquired a special significance, and is now synonymous with "sublime". It is not only the theme of the poem that lifts the reader to a lofty moral plane, but its style also reaches the highest watermark of grand style in English poetry. Milton's constant use of Latinism in his construction and phraseology is not merely a device to impart grandeur to his style, but it is a necessary mode of his self-expression. Though such Latinisms are alien to the genius of English language, they are a part of Milton's intellectual equipment, and come naturally to a man, whose mind was nourished on the classics as Milton's was.

Unconscious symbolism in "Paradise Lost": -The Cavaliers and High Church party were described as Philistines, Moabites, and Hitties, who were indulging in persecution of God's chosen people. Milton unconsciously adopts some of this attitude of Paradise Lost. He gives a list of all the heathen gods, and the tribes who worshipped them, and identifies the angels who fell from heaven with these gods. This leads him into a detailed account of many of the episodes in the history of the Israelites, and one cannot help feeling that Milton is continually thinking of his own party when he talks about God's chosen people, and of his opponents in politics, church, and the ideal worshippers.

Conclusion: - The whole of Paradise Lost is full of autobiographical passages. His high seriousness, his proud and resolute will and his grave sadness at the folly of mankind are interwoven in the whole of his story. Both the theme and the style of Paradise Lost are expressions of Milton's personality, his thought, his learning, and his moral, political and religious outlook. The figure of Satan is partly an embodiment of Milton's own spirit of freedom, republicanism and stern determination and courage in the teeth of adversity. Apart from the revelation of Milton through the characters of Satan and Adam, there are occasional references in Paradise Lost to Milton's blindness. Milton had become totally blind when he wrote Paradise Lost and had fallen upon evil days. The lines describing his misfortune are full of pathos, because they come from the very heart of Milton. Thus the poem is full of passages that recall the life of the poet.

Paradise Lost : Christ as a Hero

The story of mankind's fall from Eden as written by John Milton in his epic poem Paradise Lost portrays a classically heroic Satan and a modern hero in Christ. While Satan fits the model of an epic hero as classic heroes are not the true savoirs of the people. He is directly contrasted by Christ, who is not a gloriously strong warrior like the antique heroes. The complex character of Satan has power beyond measure when compared to man but ultimately falls due to his refusal to bow down before God. Christ is not depicted as a warrior at all, but still remains as the savoir of humankind who falls. However, this fall is not due to any of his flaw. His willingness to die for man is his greatest heroic strength.

Satan takes on the role of protagonist which presents him as a false hero. He is the most essential character to the entire story. Epic heroes such as Odysseus and Achilles were written with very similar traits: strength beyond that of normal men, natural leaders and warriors, followers who believed in them, deities remaining watchful of their actions, yet imperfect to the death. Like Satan, these heroes were the protagonists of their respected epics. This essentially appeals us into viewing him a hero. In Book I, he delivers a reuniting cry to his fellow fallen angel. He is the main character leading his men in a revolution against all powerful system. He is angry that God holds Christ in higher regard than His angels. His evil is brought to human level which enables us to understand him emotionally while his power is elevated to that of a hero, allowing us to see him as a powerful warrior capable of waging war. This deep building of the Satan character gives the illusion that he is a hero. He fits into the criteria for what the hero of an epic poem should be. But he is missing one trait to prevent him from being a true hero: sacrifice for the greater good.

Satan's desires are never noble. He is fighting for a cause he truly believes in as he struggles against what he considers oppression, but the actuality is that his cause is an evil one - the corruption of mankind. God explains that Satan was made "just and right, sufficient to have stood, though free to fall" (3. 98-99), indicating that his path is not the only one available for Satan. He does not need to serve evil. But he chooses that path, and with no greater noble cause to fight for, he is unable to be a true hero. Instead, his path is selfish as he chooses only to serve himself. Not once does he ask for God's redemption in order to serve Him again, nor does he try to serve God's will on Earth. Satan chooses, using his own free will, to continue down the path of bringing evil into the new perfect world that God has created for man. Without a noble cause, Satan is unable to be a true hero.

Christ is not a classic hero, but he is made to be the most heroic character in Paradise Lost. Milton introduces Christ and immediately depicts God warning Him of Satan's attempt to "by force... destroy, or worse, ...pervert" (3. 91-92). And while Satan looks to serve only himself, Christ shows willingness to take the ultimate sacrifice when he proclaims "I offer, on me let thine angel fall" (3. 237) and "on me let Death wreck all his rage" (3. 241). This is where Christ becomes the hero because he literally offers himself up to die. While the classic hero would fall because of a very human flaw, Christ 's fall was because of mankind's flaws. He is separated from all of the classic heroes and placed above them because he did not save his people as a warrior, killing many armies. He followed God's most noble wish. Achilles died for his country, yet Christ died for all of mankind. Milton intentionally uses this fact to show Christ as not as epic hero, but a true savoir to humanity. This is what makes him a new hero, as Milton cleverly is able to justify by making his achievements so much more valuable to all of mankind than any classic hero.

To put Satan and Christ into heroic perspective, God must also be examined. In simple terms, Satan rose up against his oppressor in attempt to overthrow a government he felt was unjust. He fought against the Almighty being from which everything was created, including Satan's own ability to fight against Him. He is not like the Greek and Roman gods that can be fought against while remaining heroic because His will decides what is heroic or if any being is even able to fight against Him. In contrast to Satan's use of his free will to rise up against God, there is Christ, Jesus Christ, who chooses to be the sacrificial lamb for mankind. This separates him from any other hero in the fact that his death led to salvation, not his personal downfall.

John Milton's Paradise Lost does put a new perspective on what an epic poem's hero can be. Although Satan could be identified as the hero, it seems evident that, according to Milton, classical heroes with similar traits as Satan should not be considered true heroes at all. In the context of Paradise Lost, heroes of that nature are just men. Like all of man, they are sinners, and their true value comes from whether they can use their God enabled free will to do something God deems positive. Christ was the true hero of Paradise Lost, as he showed everything that Satan could not. When he was needed by God, he stepped up voluntarily and acted as an instrument of salvation for humanity. While not portrayed as a larger-than-life warrior, the character of Christ sacrifices himself to be a true hero, breaking all the traditions of an epic hero.

Milton as an epic poet

No Metaphysical Influences: - Milton’s instincts and training kept him almost untouched by metaphysical influence — though we might ask, for instance, if “Himself is his own dungeon” (Comus, Line 385) is less metaphysical than Andrew Marvell’s “mine own precipice I go”. Milton conceived of poetry as “more simple, sensuous, and passionate" than logic and rhetoric, but these terms are not an adequate description of his own work. Milton was, to put it roughly, as Spenserian who became the greatest of European neo-classical poets. In other words, he belonged to what had once been, and through him continued to be, the main stream, of English poetry. He moved rapidly from a thin and "conceited" Elizabetnan sweetness towards concentration, order, rationality, and restraint, Corm's was a unified mosaic of the earlier and later styles of Milton and his whole century.

His Steady and Sonorous Style: - "The poetry of Milton's earlier years was sensuous, ornate and beautiful, showing decorative features derived from the exuberant literature of the Elizabethan- period. The sonnets written during the 1640s and 1650s show his style growing more direct. In Paradise Lost he brought together the exuberant fancy of his early poems and this new sense that poetry must speak directly about life with dramatic 'immediacy if it is to have the strongest possible effect. The basic movement of Paradise Lost is -steady and sonorous, but the story moves steadily forward all the time without the ornate decorative movements that are so charming but undramatic in a work like Comus. Milton imparts information rapidly, even to the point of distorting the syntax of his blank verse lines so L as to crowd related classes or epithets close together.

Decorative imagination: - Paradise Lost reveals at almost every point a steady forward impulse. Yet the decorative imagination such as characterised Milton's early poems is not excluded. Here, as in so many other respects, Milton learned how to bring all his gifts into plays, ordering them and subordinating them to the grand pattern of his narrative. For example, epic similes introduce the Arthurian legends with their chivalric elements that had fired Milton's youthful imagination. The elves aryl fairies of Elizabethan poetry could be similarly admitted, as could the ornate decorativeness of Spenser. But because these elements are introduced through epic similes they are related to the main story and illuminate it. They exist in a clearly subsidiary position as vivid side-lights on the main action. yet, just as the mellifluous classical names of places and people (for which Milton had shown his fondness as early as in the Nativity Ode of 1629) relate Milton's epic to all human experience and earlier literature, so the imaginative descriptive side of Paradise Lost links it not only with the work of other writers but also with the ideas and areas of study which had found expression in Milton's youthful poems."

Paradise Lost – His Masterpiece: - Milton's Paradise Lost is the greatest epic poem in English literature. Indeed, with its sublime imagery, its harmonious verse, its Titanic background of heaven, hell, and the limitless void that lies between, it is unsurpassed in any literature. It is a colossal epic, not of a man or a hero, but of the whole race of man. The splendour of heaven, the horror of hell, the serene beauty of paradise, the sun and planets suspended between celestial light and gross darkness, are described with an imagination that is almost superhuman.

Harbinger of Tradition "Paradise:- Lost shows Milton as Christian humanist using all the resources of the European literary tradition that had come down to him–biblical, classical, medieval renaissance ; pagan, Jewish and Christian. Imagery from classical fable and medieval romance, allusions to myths, legends and stories of all kinds, geographical imagery deriving from Milton's own fascination with books of travel and echoes of the Elizabethan excitement at the new discoveries, biblical history and doctrine, — all these and more are found in this great synthesis of all that the western mind was stored with • by the middle of the seventeenth century. Like The Faerie Queene, Milton's epic is a great synthesizing poem, but Milton's synthesis is more successful than Spenser's because he places his different kinds of knowledge — biblical, classical, medieval, modern– in a logical hierarchy, and never mingles, as Spenser often does, classical myth and biblical story on equal terms. If all the resources of classical mythology are employed in order to build up an overwhelming picture of the beauty of Eden before the Fall, that is because Milton is saying that here, and here only, were all the yearnings of men for ideal gardens fully realised. The description of Eden in Book IV is, indeed one of the finest examples of Milton's use of pagan classical imagery for a clearly defined Christian purpose.

Milton's imaginative Power: - Milton's imaginative control of his scenes extends even` to illustrative details and exact features of language. The epic similes are nearly always exactly linked in style and subject with the main events of the story at the moment they occur, while often providing an ironic commentary upon them.

Milton's imagination was always at ease when dealing with immensity, and the scale of Paradise Lost is surely immense. More than any other English poet he is at home with huge panoramas on a cosmic scale. He had a curiously aerial imagination, and the breath taking account of Satan's flight through Chaos at the end of Book II illustrates this. Even in his earliest poems Milton's view frequently broadens out beyond the limits of a particular scene to become a great panorama on a cosmic scale. Here is a stanza from the Nativity Ode:

> So when the sun in bed,
> Curtained with cloddy red
> Pillows his head upon an orient wave.
> The flocking shadows pale
> Troop to th'infernal
> Each fettered ghost skips. to his several grave,
> And the yellow-skirted Pays
> Fly after the night-steeds, leaving their moon-loved maze.

This stanza is typical of Milton's imaginative practice and anticipates several features of the style of Paradise Lost. The idea of the sun in bed may be far-fetched and Milton writes effortlessly about things on this grand scale. His mind easily slips from this gorgeous, baroque scene to the world of ghosts and shadows and then to a fairy world in the final two Master of Grand Style: - With Milton's sense of beauty was combined a stateliness of manner which gives a high dignity to his poetry. He is a master of what is known as the grand style. He wielded the blank verse with an exceptional mastery. His poetry is distinguished also by its music. The reader who is deaf to the harmonies of Milton has no music in himself. "After Shakespeare, Milton is the greatest English poet; which means that he is the greatest English poet outside the drama but within the tether of epic poetry.

'Free Will' in Milton's Paradise Lost

Milton's epic, Paradise Lost allows its readers a penetrating insight into the debates and anxieties of 17th century England. It is deeply informed by the poet's own political sympathies with the Puritan revolutionaries and his experience of the rule of James I and Charles I. The rise of capitalism and imperialism in Britain too at the same time brought in an increasing consciousness of individuality and agency fuelling the debates on man's free will and potential. However, the most powerful and radical contemporary debate of Milton's concern, would have been the Puritan rejection of the authority of the king and the church and the redefinition of man's relationship with God in terms of the personal and the individual. Puritanism in its bid to free Christianity of the bondages of ecclesiastical interpretation and the monopoly of the Church asserted the right of every man to exert his free will in interpreting the Bible. The same, however, even in destabilizing the idea of authority and social hierarchy made necessary a re-thinking of the very idea of free will itself. The issue of free will and authority in Paradise Lost read in such a context becomes fraught with larger ideological and historical debates, and of great political implication.

A period of such religious transition as that to which Milton belonged could not have been but ridden with anxieties of disorder and loss of faith, also evident is the fact that the emphasis on free will permeating the text of Paradise Lost is much a product of Milton's ingenuity. It can be argued nonetheless that though intense, Milton's definition of free will remains inevitably and inherently wanting, in that it becomes more of an instrument to reiterate God's authority as supreme and absolute rather than man's own agency. As explicit in God's speech -

What pleasure I from such obedience paid
When Will and Reason(Reason also is choice)
Useless and vain, of freedom both despoiled
Made passive both, had serv'd necessity
Not mee (Bk III, Paradise Lost)

The exercise of free will becomes a mode of servility to God; in fact it becomes a pre-condition for devotion and obedience. "Free will allows subjects to respond creatively to their calling for obedience and love and interpret it in their personal way." Such a restricted understanding as this, derived from Milton's representation of the potential of free will in Paradise Lost, suggests some problem in his definition of the term itself.

As can be seen in Adam's parting words to Eve in the separation scene, "God towards thee has done his part do thine", the exercise of agency should according to Adam and the sympathetic voice of the Miltonic bard ideally always be informed by a sense of total obligation towards God, and a fear of death or punishment. Even the exercise of reason becomes suspect

Lest by some fair appearing good surprised
She dictate false, and misinform the will
To do what God expressly hath forbid. (Bk IX, Paradise Lost)

Everything therefore in the Miltonic scheme of things, even reason gets subordinated to the command of God. Here again one must mention as above that "reason is choice".

Free will remains a convenient and non-existent ideal in terms of Milton's human rights agenda, where the only creatures to be exercising it are seen as Satanic or the causal agents of "all our woe". Many critics hail the pre-lapsarian Eden as home to absolute freedom of will however the very example of the punitive relegation of Satan to Hell contradicts the belief.

Adam has been taken as the intellectual superior of Eve. Such a hierarchizing undermines her credibility at making decisions as equally informed as Adam's. At the same time this frames Eve as more susceptible to giving in to temptation. Therefore all of her independent decisions and assertion of individuality becomes suspect. Eve's decision that they work apart is an assertion of free will informed by a personal consciousness of the need for efficiency and to earn their supper. However, it gets branded as an act of transgression in the larger scheme of things as it conflicts with the wishes of Adam, her "intellectual" superior and her voice is never sympathized with but seen as the voice of challenge or opposition to the feudal patriarchal world order, where God is to man what man is to woman, while the woman remains subjugated twice over.

Satan in his fall affords us with an interesting comparison with Eve. It is inescapable that both are in their social locations relatively inferior, Satan to Christ, and Eve to Adam. As embodied in the speech of the snake, the real temptation for both, Eve and Satan is then to rise above their given locations, to become equals with Adam and God respectively, "For unequal who is free?" What thus gets constructed as the sinful temptation is, as in Satan's words, "vent'ring above my lot". The construction of free will purely in terms of obedience to God, then gets exposed as a kind of control mechanism to ensure that all creatures:

Stand fast; to stand or fall
Free in thine own arbitrament it lies
Perfect within, no outward aid require;
And all temptation to transgress repel (Paradise Lost Book VIII)

The actual scene of temptation and the instance of Eve's exercise of free will suggests the presence of certain restrictions on her exercising her free will. "But his forbidding commends thee more" reveals how restrictions themselves take the form of temptation, not even in terms of absolute defiance of authority but as an assertion of the absolute freedom of will and aspiration to knowledge that she feels denied. Eve in stating,

For good unknown, sure is not had
And yet unknown is as not had at all exposes the problems in Milton's definition of free will in terms of its counter, i.e. disobedience, by using the same method of inversion of discourse to define "good" in terms of knowing it from bad. In her understanding of good being proved faulty is also automatically proved erroneous Milton's understanding and adumbration of the idea of free will.

Contextualizing what we have thus argued our understanding of free will as depicted in Paradise Lost to be, we can see how such a construction of agency works vis-à-vis Milton's political position. While the emphasis on individual agency is in keeping with the wider social currents and ethos of his time, the subordination of will to the command of God institutes a system of self-imposed morality in the absence of institutionalized systems of enforcement, i.e. the church; the threat of damnation for the sin of impertinence sets an example against the assertion of equal rights that may challenge patriarchy or the dominant. However conducive it might be to Milton's politics, such an understanding of free will remains essentially incomplete and restricted as argued above.

Humanism in "Paradise Lost"

Humanism is an outlook or system of thought attaching prime importance to human rather than divine or supernatural matters. Humanist beliefs stress the potential value and goodness of human beings, emphasize common human needs, and seek solely rational ways of solving human problems. It is in fact Renaissance cultural movement that turned away from medieval scholasticism and revived interest in ancient Greek and Roman thought.

"Paradise Lost" has held its place for three centuries as the greatest poem in the English language. It has been the touchstone of literary appreciation, the test by which the reader's taste and understanding have been judged. It came into the world unheralded and unsung, but within a few years it cut out all its contemporaries and the ancients too. To what amazing quality or combination of qualities can this supreme triumph be attributed? Many would answer: the style; and indeed no man, not even Shakespeare, handled the English language with such superb and dignified mastery, with such unerring skill and such sonorous effect as Milton. But no work of art survives merely because of style; it is the perfect combination of manner and matter, the language and the thought-content, which gives such work immortality and raises it to the rank of a classic. It was humanistic touch that made it to survive.

Milton was indeed a humanist. He was brought up in the tradition of Plato; the speculations of the Greek philosophers were his rod and staff, the dramas of the great tragedians his daily bread. He was a Renaissance scholar who had discovered afresh the vitality of the Greek outlook. The stories of Greece were parables that spoke that his inmost being. He had the Greek thirst for knowledge, the Greek love of beauty, the Greek devotion to liberty, the Greek insistence on the primacy of man. He was of the breed which strove with gods outside the walls of Troy and on the high seas. And when he decided to put himself wholly into one mighty utterance which the world would not willingly let die, he chose a theme which would have delighted his Greek predecessors. It had just that slightly ironic flavour which they appreciated, that emphasis on a human problem, that wide sweep which covered the three worlds that are found in the writings of the Greek masters. But Milton had something which the Greeks did not have–the assurance that the problem was not insoluble and–if only the Greeks would understand–it was a solution which continued to uphold the dignity of man, for one greater Man–yes, a Man, could restore us and regain the blissful seat.

Thus we see the fruition of the humanist outlook in Paradise Lost. The story revolves around that weak, helpless creature called Man. But, in spite of his frailty, he is the centre of the universe. For him a whole cosmogony has been devised, for him worlds have been created, and his welfare concerns regions beyond ours. For his salvation councils are held in Heaven and for his destruction pandemonium prevails in Hell. This gives Man a dignity and a status which is entirely different from the position afforded to him in Greek epic or drama. In Paradise Lost, Man is not the victim of some inexorable, inexplicable fate against which he is pitted in unequal struggle, nor can it be said of men that

Like flies to wanton boys are we to the gods,
They kill us for their sport.

Adam's position in Paradise Lost has been much misunderstood, though Eve's role has been better appreciated. But Adam represents the real human element. He is, as his name implies, truly a man. In his long conversations with the angels are the questions which have always troubled man: Who am I, whence have I come, and what is my destiny? With the creation of the new and strangely fascinating creature Eve, a whole realm of problem and perplexity bursts upon Adam; love, without which man cannot exist which does not enter alone; for in his train are tears and doubts and immemorial pain; and companionship, failure and forgiveness. With the bitter experience of Eden comes the hard lesson that humanity refuses to learn but must learn, if it should survive in God's universe–that obedience to the moral law is the guarantee of peace and security and that the price of disobedience is the loss of Paradise, the Paradise of an innocent and undefiled mind.

Most readers of Paradise Lost have been perplexed by one difficulty, that Milton seems to be on the side of Satan; in the titanic struggle between good and evil he seems to admire the infernal enemy rather than the All-wise and All-good. While it is true that much of Milton's colossal energy has gone into the creation of Satan, it is not correct to say that he is on Satan's side. He is interested in Satan more perhaps than in God, because in Satan he finds the same conflict as in Man, the same dualism, the same upsurging of the good, the same punishment of it and conscious choice of evil that have disfigured humanity. Indeed it is an intensely human Satan that Milton has created, a being who can feel the pangs of envy when he sees Adam and Eve imparadised in one another's arms and realises that he can never know that bliss. So, in this sense, Milton is Satan, Milton is Adam, and now the triumphant instrument of God's punishment.

So to all lovers of humanity, to all believers in the dignity of the human race, to all champions of human rights and liberties, Milton has left his legacy–the soul-stirring, challenging, elevating message of Paradise Lost. That such a challenge is needed more than ever today we need not doubt. Nor do we need to question Milton's answer to our perplexity, that human problems cannot be solved merely on the human plane. In the acceptance of this truth lies our only hope, and the fulfillment of Milton's vision of a new Heaven and Earth wherein the just shall dwell,

And after all their tribulations long
See golden days, fruitful of golden deeds
With Joy and Love triumphing and fair Truth.

Paradise Lost Book IX : Summary & Analysis

Summary

In the prologue to Book IX, Milton says that his work must now take a tragic tone and that this Christian epic, though different, is nonetheless more heroic than earlier epics like the Iliad and the Aeneid. Again, he calls on Urania as the muse of Christian inspiration to help him complete his work and show the true heroism that lies in the Christian idea of sacrifice. Then Milton returns to his story.

Satan returns to Eden eight days after being forced out by Gabriel. He has studied all the animals and has decided to approach Eve in the form of a serpent which he considers to be the "subtlest Beast of all the Field" (86).

The following morning, Adam and Eve prepare for their daily work tending the Garden. Because the Garden's growth seems to surpass their labors, Eve suggests that on this day they work apart. She thinks they can accomplish more working individually. Adam argues the point with Eve, saying that Raphael has warned them of dangers and that she is more vulnerable by herself. He and she continue this argument — she proposing that they work alone; he proposing that they work together — until Adam finally relents; however, he makes Eve promise to return to their bower soon, but Milton comments that she will never return to Adam in the way that she was that morning.

Satan in the form of the serpent is surprised and excited to find Eve alone tending flowers. He watches her and for a few moments becomes enraptured and forgets his evil nature. Then he remembers what his purpose is — to destroy God's creation. The serpent approaches Eve upright upon its tail. His various acts fail to attract Eve's attention because she is used to dealing with animals. However, when the serpent speaks, complimenting Eve on her beauty, playing on both her vanity and curiosity, Eve is suddenly interested. She is especially curious about how the serpent learned to speak.

Satan replies through the serpent that he learned speech by eating the fruit of a particular tree in the Garden. He acquired speech and the ability to reason and has, therefore, sought Eve out to worship as the most beautiful of God's creations.

When Eve inquires which tree gave the serpent his abilities, he takes her to the Tree of Knowledge. Eve tells the serpent that God has forbidden Man to eat from that tree, and she chooses to obey God. Satan, using the same sophistic reasoning he has used throughout the story, tells Eve that God has tricked her and Adam. He has eaten of the tree and is not dead; neither will they die. Instead the tree will give them knowledge, which will make them like God. This fact makes God envious and has caused him to demand that Adam and Eve not eat of the tree. Eve is taken in by the words of the serpent, and after some rationalizing, she convinces herself that she should eat the fruit. And she does.

Now Eve suddenly worships the Tree of Knowledge as a god, even as all nature weeps for her fall. Her thoughts turn to Adam, and she decides that he must eat the fruit also. She cannot bear the idea that she might die and Adam would be given another wife. When Eve approaches Adam, he drops the wreath of flowers that he was weaving for her hair. Eve quickly tells him what she has done, and Adam just as quickly makes his own decision. He allows his physical love and passion for Eve to outweigh his reason. He knowingly eats the fruit and is immediately affected with carnal desire for Eve. The two humans exit to engage in "amorous play" (1045). The description here is not of love but lust.

After sex, Adam and Eve fall into a deep sleep. They awake and are overcome with shame and guilty knowledge. They both are weeping, and they launch into arguments with each other. Adam says Eve is at fault; she replies in kind. Milton describes them as spending "fruitless hours" (1188) in bitter accusation. Each is willing to blame the other, but neither is willing to accept responsibility. Paradise is gone and in its place guilt, blame, and shame. Milton says that both of them have given way to "Appetite" (1129), and reason is lost. Paradise has ended; the earth has begun.

Analysis

Milton's fourth invocation differs from earlier ones in that he does not call on Urania, except obliquely, and he does not mention his blindness. Rather he offers an explanation for his epic and says that the tone must now become "Tragic" (6). The word "tragic" had two connotations for Milton. First, it carried the simple moral meaning of something terribly bad or unfortunate. Christians since the Middle Ages had always considered the falls of Lucifer and Adam tragic. But "tragic' also refers to the dramatic concept of tragedy as first defined by Aristotle and developed through the centuries to its high achievement in Elizabethan England. Milton knew the nature of dramatic tragedy from his study of the Greeks (he patterned Samson Agonistes on Greek tragedy) as well as from reading Shakespeare and other Elizabethan dramatists (he wrote an essay On Shakespeare for the Second Folio).

By the seventeenth century, tragedies had assumed a basic format. The play would have a noble hero who had a tragic flaw in either personality or actions. The fortunes of the hero would reverse during the play from good to bad with the hero recognizing his own responsibility for these consequences that resulted from his flaw. The end of the play would result in the death of the hero. Throughout the play, fate would, in one form or another, control the action, and, at the end, the audience would experience a catharsis or purging of emotions, resulting from their empathy with the hero. They should feel pity for the hero and fear for themselves.

To see that Paradise Lost has an underlying tragic structure is not difficult. Adam is a noble character. He has a flaw in his passion for Eve that overrides his reason. He makes the mistake of eating the fruit. He recognizes, eventually, his responsibility for his actions. Death, though not occurring in the epic, is the main result of Adam's action. Fate (God) knows what will happen throughout the poem. And finally, Milton wanted his audience to experience pity for Adam and all mankind but fear for the consequences of their own sinful lives. So when Milton speaks of changing his "Notes to Tragic" (6), he means more than a passing remark.

Yet for all of these connections to tragedy, Paradise Lost is not a tragedy; it is a Christian epic with a tragic core. Adam is a noble hero, but as Milton notes in this prologue, he is not a hero like Achilles, Aeneas, or Odysseus. He is, in Milton's words, a hero of "Patience and Heroic Martyrdom" (33). Ultimately too, Adam is regenerated and reconciled rather than just killed. Paradise Lost will end on a hopeful — even joyful — note, since through Adam's fall, salvation and eternal life will come to Man through God's mercy and grace. This felix culpa or "happy fault" is not the stuff of tragedy.

Moreover, even as an epic, Milton says that he was attempting something different in Paradise Lost. He did not want to glorify warfare as in earlier epics like the Iliad. Instead, in his only description of warfare (Book VI), he creates parody rather than magnificence. Rather Milton's goal was to write a Christian epic, specifically a Protestant Christian epic with a new sort of hero, one who wins ultimately through patience and suffering. At the time Milton wrote this particular invocation, he still prayed to the Muse (Urania, Christian inspiration) to help him complete his work and to let it gain acceptance in a time when such a work's fate was unclear.

After the invocation, Milton begins this book with Satan who has been absent for the three books in which Adam and Raphael talked. Satan has degenerated as a character. In his speech in Eden, he is unable to make his thoughts logical. He thinks Earth may be more beautiful than Heaven since God created it after Heaven. He thinks he might be happy on Earth but then argues that he could not be happy in Heaven. He fusses about Man being tended by angels. Satan's ability to think, which seemed potent in Book I, now appears weak and confused. An even greater indication of Satan's character degeneration is that he is now self-delusional. In the early books, he lied but only to get others to do his bidding. In this speech, he lies to himself. He questions whether God actually created the angels, he sees Man as God's revenge on him, and he says that he took half of all the angels out of Heaven. Satan who seemed somewhat heroic in his rebellion now seems to be a dangerous con man who has come to believe his own lies. In the early books, the reader can at least see reasoning as well as envy behind Satan's actions, but, here in Book IX, Satan has become the delusional psychopath who believes his own lies. The concept of heroism cannot be stretched to include Satan's attitude and thinking at this point in the epic.

Milton reinforces Satan's degeneration with visual images. Satan creeps along the ground of Eden in a low-lying mist and ultimately takes on the form of the serpent who crawls along the ground. The shape changes Satan has made in Paradise Lost show a pattern. From angel to cherub, from cherub to cormorant, then to lion and tiger, and finally to toad and snake, Satan has progressively made himself more and more earthbound and lowly. The irony of these shifts in shape is not lost on Satan. As he searches for a serpent to enter, he complains of the bestial nature of the animal that he must

"incarnate and imbrute,
That to the highth of deity aspired" (166-167).

That is, as he tries to become like God, he takes on lower and lower forms. The next scene of Book IX involves the argument between Adam and Eve over whether they should work alone or separately. Some commentators have seen Eve's arguments as a kind of calculated sophistry akin to Satan's that demonstrates Eve's complicity in her own fall. Her argument, however, is more of innocence. She has played the proper womanly role during Raphael's visit, and now she simply wants more freedom and responsibility. Perhaps she wants to show that she can be Adam's equal. To read Eve as a conniver is to overlook her naiveté and innocent desire to be more like Adam.

Satan's attitude when he finds Eve alone shows that the two humans made the wrong decision in separating. When Satan sees Eve by herself, he is pleased that she is not with Adam, who would have been a "Foe not informidable" (486). Eve's only real defense against Satan seems to be her basic beauty and goodness. Satan is so astounded when he first sees her that for a brief period he forgets his purpose and stands "Stupidly good" (465). The scene makes two points: First, the goodness expressed just by Eve's physical person is overwhelming. And second, Satan has lost the capacity for real goodness. He may be momentarily struck dumb and be "stupidly good," but he quickly recovers and is not in any way deflected from his evil purpose.

Satan's temptation of Eve is a cunning masterpiece. As a prelapsarian serpent, he is able to approach her standing upright upon his tail, a

"Circular base of rising folds, that tow'r'd Fold above fold, a surging maze" (498-99).

* Prelapsarian means characteristic of or belonging to the time or state before the fall of humankind

The images of circuitous, folding mazes occur intermittently throughout Paradise Lost and reach their culmination in this image of the serpent rising to tempt Eve with his body a coiling labyrinth. Visually, Eve is pure, simple innocence; the serpent, unfathomable, complex evil. Eve will soon be lost in his labyrinthine argument and plot.

Satan as serpent first uses his physical beauty and speech to impress Eve, who finds him beautiful. A number of writers have found sexual undertones in the description of the serpent:

"pleasing was his shape,
And lovely" (503-04).

An old Jewish tradition even had it that Eve made love with the serpent. Milton's subtle sexualizing of the serpent followed this tradition and adds another element to Eve's fall. William Blake, in his illustration for this scene, certainly noticed sexual imagery. At first glance, Eve appears to kiss the serpent, but is, in fact, taking a bite of a very phallic apple in the serpent's mouth. The fruit hanging from the Tree of Life in Blake's illustration suggests nothing so much as male genitalia.

Eve is also taken with the fact that the serpent talks. Further, the snake is not in the angelic form of the tempter in Eve's dream, so she is not put on guard by the creature. (Milton has made it clear earlier that Adam and Eve were never threatened by any animal in Eden.) Satan first flatters Eve. He licks the ground. He says he worships her beauty. The reader recalls that Eve narcissistically became enamored of her own image in the water at her creation. She is vain, but she is also secondary to Adam. Here a talking snake praises her beauty and says he worships her. She is interested though not enraptured.

But when the serpent takes Eve to the Tree of Knowledge, his arguments come so fast and so deviously that she cannot follow them. At first, she does what she should. She tells the serpent that she cannot eat from the tree. He argues that he has eaten and did not die. Then he adds that God wants her to eat of the tree and, contradictorily, that he envies what the humans might learn if they did eat. The arguments come so fast that Eve cannot answer, let alone think through them. Her innocence in comparison with Satan's cunning overcomes her reason. She is no match for Satan, and so his sophistic arguments seem reason to her. Unlike Adam, Eve buys into the arguments without grasping what is really happening. Eve eats the fruit, and eats, for the first time, gluttonously, letting her appetite take control of her reason.

After she eats, Eve at first feels elated. She thinks that she has reached a higher level but shows this ironically by starting to worship the tree. Her thoughts turn to Adam. Initially, she thinks she might keep this new power for herself and perhaps become his equal. At this point, Eve is conniving; already the fruit has changed her innocence. Even her reason for telling Adam shows this fact. If the fruit indeed leads to death, she does not want to die and leave Adam to another woman. She selfishly wants him to be in the same condition she is.

Adam's temptation and fall is much less complicated than Eve's. When Adam drops the flowery chaplet that he has been making for Eve, he symbolically drops all that he has in Eden. He immediately realizes what Eve has done. Adam makes a conscious decision to eat the fruit because he cannot give up Eve. He allows his physical passion for her to outweigh his reason, and so he eats. Adam's decision is willful, unlike Eve's, which was based on fraudulent argument and weak reason.

After the fall, the two are overcome by lust. Adam says to Eve,
"if such pleasure be
In things to us forbidden, it might be wish'd,
For this one Tree had been forbidden ten" (1024-26).

The language of the entire scene is charged with sexual imagery and innuendo. Their appetites are in control, and reason is lost. After their lovemaking, they fall into a troubled sleep — no more innocent dreams. When they wake, they are cognizant of what they have done, and their arguing is that of real people. If their argument at the end of Book IX is compared with their discussion of whether to work alone or together at the beginning, the difference in Man before and after the fall is clear. The opening discussion is reasoned and pleasant; the closing, irrational and bitter.

Paradise Lost Book IX: Human Nature as Central Issue

"Paradise Lost" is a poem about the nature of man. The Biblical story of the fall and its consequences serve as a framework to get the desired aim. The exposure of human nature is made through the characters of Adam and Eve. Both are like and unlike human beings.

Prior to Satan's entry into the Garden of Eden, they are unlike human beings. The degree of innocence, simplicity, credulity, nobility, gentleness, obedience, submission and purity, which the reader finds in them, is hard to be found in human beings. They are more angels-like and less like us. However, after Eve's debate with Adam over the separation of their labour still repentance that they become attractive and representatives of universal human nature.

It is first of all Eve who attracts our attention. She argues with Adam over the division of work. Her dissatisfaction, doubts and complaints are familiar thinking processes of human psychic make up. The complaining wife tries to convince her contended husband that their work to maintain the Garden of Eden is beyond their capacity that all their efforts to keep the garden well-trimmed have failed, hence, there is pressing desirability to divide their labours. The important thing to note is the presence of germs of evil in Eve's mind, which is another, proof of her being a real human being. She, on the one hand, calls God unjust by complaining of excessive work while on the other hand, finds faults with Divine Plan, which enjoins them to work together. In short, her complaints and suggestions are natural to human mind.

Adam's disagreement corresponds to the thinking of the typical God fearing human being. His arguments are sensible and logical but they are thoroughly coloured with religious sentiments like a gentle husband, he advises Eve not to criticize Divine Scheme because it is not binding on them to keep on working and to do nothing else. He further expresses his apprehension like a true Christian. He thinks that the 'crafty importer' would prefer to seduce one of them instead of seducing both. It is worth noting that Adam is too gentle to attract reader's attention. Unlike Eve, he loves to live a life of obedience and submission. At the same time, Adam has a noble disposition, but neither he is authoritative nor assertive. The reader gets some dim glimpses of his Uxuriousness (excessively devoted to one's wife).

Eve exposes typical female psychology by insisting upon her original plan. She wrongly interprets Adam by saying that if they confine themselves within a small area and remain all the time in a state of fear; their life cannot be called happy. Like a kind-hearted man, Adam reassures her that he does not doubt Eve's virtuosity. What he means to say is that union is strength; when together they would administer to withstand any trial easily. He idealizes Eve that it is in her presence, he feels stronger and more courageous.

Eve reveals obstinacy in her behaviour. She once again gives clear indication of the presence of germs of evil in her mind. She advances a novel argument that God has not made them so imperfectly that they should be incapable of meeting danger or temptation individually. The implication of Eve's argument is that if she fails to resist the temptation singly. It would mean that God made her imperfect. She becomes representative of universal human nature by showing her inclination towards evil. There is blend of both good and evil in Eve, though good dominates. Eve becomes more attractive human being than Adam as she behaves, talks and thinks, like an average human being.

Adam is more reasonable and convincing than Eve in his arguments. He rightly feels there is danger inherent in the fact that man may lose control over his own faculties or the devil might drag him into fraud and deception through something that seems too good and fair and that freewill requires to be exercised under the constant control of reason. Thus instead of endorsing Eve's desire for independence and liberty he advises her to remain within the limits of divine rules and regulations. He knows that whosoever violates the human limits will be punished by God. His apprehensions are that of a true Christian. He also becomes a spokesman of human nature.

By now it becomes clear that exposure of human nature is central to "Paradise Lost". Both Adam and Eve are the proto-types of universal human nature. Hence, both are like human beings therefore attract our attention and appreciation.

Paradise Lost Book IX: Drama of fall of Adam and Eve

The climax of "Paradise Lost" is the fall of Adam and Eve. They become the victim of forbidden fruit, on the temptation of Satan. In the guise of serpent he secretly entered the Garden of Eden in order to frustrate God's plan about the new creation. The whole of this episode is described in a dramatic and epic style. Exchange of dialogue, interaction of characters, suspense and the interplay of the feelings of frustration, independence, warning, partition, flattery, praise, benefits, tough reasoning, silent thinking taste, effect of fruit, pride, superiority, pathos, love, relish companionship with Eve, nakedness, lustfulness and quarrel are the sources of dramatic element in Book IX of "Paradise Lost". But the major source is the internal and external conflict of characters. It is important to note here that the element of epic grandeur is never lost.

The first dramatic situation is the scene when Eve advances her suggestion that she and Adam would accomplish more if they were to divide their labour. She also criticizes on the ground that the work, which they do in Paradise, is somewhat more than their capacities permit. Her dissatisfaction with the order of things is a pointer towards her tragic and ominous fall. Adam in his turn dismisses Eve's suggestion in a gentle way. He says that they are stronger when united. He also expresses his doubts about the wisdom of Eve's plan; she may be found by "the malicious foe". Hence, Adam insists that "the attempt itself" should be abided. Eve agrees about the existence of such an enemy but she is hurt at Adam's opinion that she could be shaken or reduced. The argument with Adam ends when he allows her to work independently whenever she likes. Adam is embarrassed where Eve is happy at her newfound independence.

This newfound emancipation is the concept of liberty, which has been a point of discussion for critics. As far as Milton is concerned, he does not approve of this kind of liberty. The event of the fall would not have taken place if Adam and Eve have remained together.

Moreover, separation of Adam and Eve is directly against God's plan that had devised an interdependent life programme for them. Violation of interdependent relationship becomes a tragic flaw. We compare this concept of liberty with the concept of liberty enunciated by Satan in Book 1, there is a clear-cut difference. Satan rebels against God on account of injured merit. He thinks that God was rewarding him in view of his qualities and merits. Satan's rebellion germinates from his intense hatred for God. He prefers to reign in hell than serve in Heaven, Satan's concept of liberty is, in short a, direct challenge to God's authority. On the other hand, the concept of liberty expressed in Book IX and enacted through the character of Eve is a matter of difference of opinion with God's way of doing things. If we take these two concepts of liberty together, one thing at least is sure that God does not approve any of these.

The next scene portrays Satan and Eve. Here the drama is at its height. If the scene with Adam is exposition, the scene with Satan is the development of action. Finding Eve alone at the early hours of the day, Satan becomes happy and makes his way towards her. Milton writes about Satan's advancements in descriptive. This descriptive passage serves the purpose of pause in action and enhances the effect of suspense because it prepares us for the great events that are to follow. Reaching Eve, Satan flatters her in the manner of a court poet. Satan tells her that she is a "Goddess among gods".

Eve is flattered by her praise but at the same moment she is surprised at the serpent's capacity for speech. She becomes curious and desires to know more about the reptile's power of speech. This gives Satan an opportunity to continue his dialogue with her. He gives an account how he came to eat the fruit of "A godly Tree". He describes the physical as well as intellectual pleasures, which he got from the fruit of that tree. Eve is compelled by her inquisitive nature and she asks him to show her the tree. On seeing the tree Eve bends her head because it was the forbidden tree. Eve tells the serpent that she has been forbidden to taste its fruit. Here the serpent shows a great psychological understanding of the character of Eve. He delivers a powerful rhetorical speech. He turns his attention away from Eve to the tree, itself. Headdresses the tree in the following words:

"O sacred, wise and wisdom-giving plant. Mother of Science…"

In this way he withdraws his pressure from Eve for a moment, but at once catches her and starts with his usual manner of flattery.

He calls her "Queen of this universe" and informs her that there is no need to believe in the threats of death. The serpent traps her in his arguments in such a way that there is no way out left for her. He asks her if the tree offers knowledge of good how can it be just of God to refuse such knowledge. And if it offers knowledge of evil, why they should be effused since one Evil is known, it may be "easier to shun".

He further tells her that God would praise their courage for eating the fruit of this tree. Eve is completely nonplussed at the argument of the famous temptation speech. But before committing the fatal sin, she pauses and thinks. Her thinking at that moment is a kind of soliloquy. What she reasons out is much more effective than the temptation speech of Satan. She argues that the prohibition is unreasonable since it prevents her from judging the very problem, which it raises. Ignorance of evil keeps her away from the full importance of goodness. But the irony is that her conclusion is based on Satan's lie that he had tasted the forbidden fruit. She unmindful of all things plucks the fruit and greedily eats it. The immediate effect of eating the fruit is that there is an upheaval of Nature, which sighs through all his works.

Nevertheless, it is Satan's encounter with Eve that Milton has exposed some of the prominent facets of human nature namely internal and external conflict between opposing forces, curiosity, vanity, love of flattery, self-projection, self-interest, failure to distinguish between the appearance and reality, greed etc. Since most of these aspects of human nature, we find in Eve's personality, she appears more attractive than Adam. She is closer to normal, average and common human beings.

Paradise Lost Book IX: The Temptation Scene and its Implication in the Development of Paradise Lost

Satan is a con artist of a very high order. He adopts the right channel to seduce Eve. He flatters her in the persuasive manner. That Eve is trapped to Satan and it does not seem unnatural. His attack is well planned and well executed. Eve's failure to see beyond false appearance is the predicament of almost each and every human being.

Satan hypnotizes Eve and succeeds in bringing her reason under his control by yelling fibs that his comprehension got sound and his vision broadened after he tasted the forbidden fruit. Accordingly, her curiosity inflated to the maximum. Like Faustus, she surrenders and gladly submits to Satan's guidance. Her response or reaction is not surprising though it is shocking and painful.

It is an open secret that in the course of their life the human beings get strayed and run after false, illusive and hollow ideals. "Paradise Lost" is fundamentally a poem about the nature of man.

The last act of the drama of fall also depicts several shades of human nature. It is once again Eve who becomes Milton's mouthpiece. After tasting the forbidden fruit on the one hand, she develops a sense of superiority while on the other hand exposes typical female jealously. She is worried that if death comes and claims her life. Adam might marry another Eve.

On catching sight of Eve with a branch of tree of knowledge in her hand, Adam's temptation is different from that of Eve. In Adam's case his passions overrule his reason. He tastes the forbidden fruit out of sheer love for Eve. His act of disobedience confirms him a real human being of flesh and blood. Afterwards, their last sexual act bickering, realization, shedding of tears, feeling of remorse and repentance are typical to human beings.

Milton: Treatment of woman in "Paradise Lost"

Adam and Eve are the very first human couple and the parents of the whole human race and the masterpiece of God's art of creation, primarily lived in Eden which is an indescribable beautiful garden in Heaven. God had given them the liberty to enjoy everything available there, with only one restriction that they were not to eat the forbidden fruit there, but they could not act upon this curb, therefore, God punished them for their disobedience and expelled them from Paradise.

When we make a careful and critical analysis of "Paradise Lost" Book IX, we discover that in spite of having many common features of character and personality both Adam and Eve have a world of difference between them as well. Both of them are made of clay, have steadfast faith in God and equally love each other yet at the same time they are divided in opinion about their work, passion and the fear of an enemy.

As far as Eve is concerned, she possesses female charm and attraction, a suggestive and justifying mind, a rational and convincing manner of conversation, but at the same time she is highly confident, short sighted, jealous and deluded about her powers.

Adam, on the other hand, is an embodiment of sagacity, moderation, contentment, foresightedness, knowledge, mankind, passionate love and sacrifice.

When Eve rationally suggests that they should work separately because when they are together, they waste most of their time in petty things. Adam foresightedly objects the idea and reminds her of the danger of her being seduced by Satan. At this, she pounces upon him for suspecting her faithfulness. She also under-estimates their enemy. Adam tries his best to convince her that they should not separate from each other but she remains unmoved. At last, he retreats and reluctantly allows her to work after her own heart and, thus, they part from each other for the very first time and this very alienation, in fact, leads to their expulsion from Heaven.

Satan, who possesses a great determination and an unyielding power and ever-scheming mind, is, in fact, afraid to face Adam because of his physical strength, intellectual powers, great courage and impressive manlihood. He, therefore, is always in search of an opportunity to find Eve alone, so that, he may succeed in his evil and revengeful designs against God and His master creature. After assuming the shape of a serpent, which is the most cunning of all animals, he managed to enter Eden where he finds his target, that Eve is all alone, busy with her work. He very cleverly starts praising and flattering her that she is "the sole mistress", "the queen of this universe", "the empress" and "the humane goddess". When she, in the state of utter amazement, asks him how he can speak while he is a serpent he relates a fake story of his tasting the forbidden fruit of knowledge and its miraculous effects.

When she tells him about the warning of God that tasting the fruit of knowledge could result in death, he washes her brain by saying that this fruit will raise her to the stature of God and that she will not die because he is a living example before her eyes. She is fully entrapped by the oily tongue of Satan, tastes the forbidden fruit due to short sightedness and over confidence. After eating the fruit she thinks if she dies, God will create another Eve for Adam and he will live a long life of everlasting enjoyment with the new Eve. This very thought arises in her an intense feeling of jealousy for the first time and she mounts to Adam to tell him about her blunder.

On the other side, Adam restlessly waits for her with garland of beautiful and attractive flowers to welcome her back, but she does not reach at the fixed time. He goes out in search of her and finds her on the way with a bough of apples in her hand. She tells him all about the talking-serpent and her act of tasting the forbidden fruit. Adam leaves a deep sigh of grief and scolds her, but at the same time his passionate love for Eve over powers him and he expresses his uncontrollable sentiments of love in the following famous romantic and emotional words:

The link of nature draw me; flesh of my flash,
Bone of my bone, thou art, and from thy state
Mine never shall be parted; bliss or woe.

Thus Adam also eats the forbidden fruit deliberately just for the sake of his love for Eve for Adam feels himself incomplete without Eve. Thus he prefers a woman to obedience of God.

In the end, we can conclude that both Adam and Eve are responsible for their sin of disobedience and their consequent expulsion from Heaven. It is, however, clear that Eve is entrapped by the glib-tongue and the praising words of Satan while Adam falls a prey to his passionate love for Eve in the Victorian style, but she develops it in a new direction.

"Oh goodness infinite, goodness immense!
That all this good of evil shall produce,
And evil turn to good; more wonderful
Than that which by creation first brought forth
Light out of darkness! Full of doubt I stand,
Whether I should repent me now of sin
By me done, and occasioned; or rejoice
Much more, that much more good thereof shall spring;
To God more glory, more good-will to men
From God, and over wrath grace shall abound."

Milton: Pandemoniun in "Paradise Lost"

0 John Milton, Poetry 2:59:00 AM

Some angels rushed towards a nearby hill, Pandemonium, a hill not far from there that emerged fire and smoke. All the rest of the hill shone with a bright crust, which was a sure sign that in its interior was buried metallic ore or sulphur. Towards that hill a company of numerous angels moved with great haste like groups of miners, hurrying in advance of the royal army to dig trenches in some battlefield or to build a fortification.

Those angels were guided thither by Mammon. He first taught human beings to pillage the earth, in order to obtain treasures buried. Soon had his companion made a huge opening in the hill and dug out large pieces of gold.

Let nobody feel surprised by the riches that exist in Hell. The soil of Hell perhaps is most appropriate for gold. And here let those who boast of human achievements and who describe, with a feeling of wonder, the Tower of Babel and the Pyramids of Egypt, learn how the greatest monuments, which have been built by human strength and skill and which have become famous, are easily surpassed by the work of worthless Spirits who can do in an hour what countless human beings, with unceasing labour, can hardly accomplish in a long period of time.

Nearby on the plain a second large group angles prepared many cells beneath which burns liquid fire. With wonderful art they melted the massive ore, separating each metal, and skimmed the scum or the impurities. A third group of angels had, with equal promptitude, set up, within the ground, moulds of various kinds and shapes, and filled each hollow recess with the melted gold transported there from the cells by a wonderful device.

Soon out of the earth, a huge structure emerged like a mist. This structure was built like a temple. It was set with round-shaped columns. It had pillars of the Doric style of architecture and the pillars were overlaid with a golden beam. Nor was there lacking cornice or frieze inscribed with sculptures in relief. The roof was carved with gold. Neither Babylon nor Cairo ever attained such splendour in all their glory, even in building temples dedicated to their gods. The rising structure now became complete, having reached its full and impressive height, and at once the doors, opening their brassy leaves, revealed over a wide area within, large spaces on the smooth and level pavement. From the arched roof, many rows of star-like lamps and bright fire-baskets hung as if by some mysterious magic. These lamps were fed with naphtha and asphaltus, and their light fell as if form a sky.

The multitude of angles entered the building hastily, admiring it. Some of them praised the building and some praised the architect. This architect’s sill was known in Heaven by a large number of high buildings, having towers, where angels holding their rods of authority dwelt and sat, like princes whom the supreme ruler, God, had raised to such power and to each of whom He had given the authority to rule according to his status and rank. The name of this architect was also well-known and much respected in ancient Greece; and in Italy he was known by the name of Mulciber. It was told in a fable how this architect had fallen from heaven, having been thrown by angry Jove clean over the bright walls. He had kept falling from morning to noon, and from noon to dewy evening, for the whole of a summer’s day; and with the setting sun he had alighted from the height, like a falling star, on the island of Lemnos in the Aegean sea. Such is the story people relate mistakenly because he, with that rebellious throng of angles, had fallen from Heaven long before that. Nor was it of any use to him now that he had erected building with high towers in Heaven. Not could he escape from his present fate in spite of all his contrivances, but was thrown headlong with his hard-working companion to build a palace for Satan and his followers in Hell.

Milton: Hell in "Paradise Lost"

0 John Milton, Poetry 3:02:00 AM

This is how Milton describes Hell as Satan sees it after his fall from Heaven:

At once, as far as Angles ken, he views

The dismal situation waste and wild:

A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,

As one great furnace flamed; yet from those flames

No light, but rather darkness visible

Served only to discover sights of woe,

Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace

And rest can never dwell, hope never comes

That comes at all; but torture without end

Still urges, and a fiery deluge, fed

With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.

Such place Eternal Justice had prepared

For those rebellious; here their prison set,

As fat removed from God and light of Heaven

As from the centre thrice to the utmost pole.

Oh how unlike the place from whence they fell!

This description is brief but vivid and effective. We are to visualize a region which is sinister, barren and wild. The place is a horrible dungeon or pit burning like a huge furnace. Yet from the burning flames comes no light. The flames give out just as much light as is needed to make the darkness visible. The flames of Hell give no light. All around him Satan discerns sights of misery and unhappy dark spaces, where peace and rest can never dwell. It is a place where even hope which comes to all beings, is never felt. This region is far away from God. The contrast between this place and the Heaven conveyed to us is:

Oh how unlike the place from whence they fell!

The place is perpetually afflicted with "floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire".

Thus Milton's Hell is a place of darkness where flickering light of fire serves only to make more dark. Geologically it is a volcanic region, "fed with ever-burning sulphur" in inexhaustible quantities. Satan and his followers have fallen into a "fiery gulf", a lake that burns constantly with liquid fire. The shore of this lake marks the beginning of a plain to which Satan flies after raising himself from the lake.

---------------------------- till on dry land

He lights—if it were land that ever burned

With solid, as the lake with liquid fire,

And such appeared in hue, as when the force

Of subterranean wind transports a hill

Torn from Pelorus, or the shattered side

Of thundering Aetna, whose combustible

And fuelled entrails thence conceiving fire

Sublimed with mineral fury, aid the winds

And leave a singed bottom al involved

With stench and smoke:

This means that in one case it is "liquid fire", and in the other "solid fire". The heat of the land is naturally as intense as is that of the boiling lake. Satan walks uncomfortably over the boiling soil. Heat is everywhere. In the background, we are later told, is a volcanic mountain:

There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top

Belched fire and rolling smoke, the rest entire

Shone with a glossy scurf—undoubted sign

That in his womb was hid metallic ore,

The work of sulphur.

All these description are certainly terrifying. Milton's object in describing Hell is two-fold; firstly, to indicate the torments which the fallen angels have to endure in contrast to the bliss and joy of Heaven which they have lost for ever; and, secondly, to infuse a feeling of horror in the readers. The modern reader, with his scientific background and scientific notions, may not feel as awed or horrified by these descriptions as readers of Milton's time might have felt. But even the modern reader has to recognize, not only the graphic quality of the description, but its oppressive and overwhelming effect.

The size of Hell, the nature of its tortures or the degree of heat that Satan feels, such thing can be felt to the reader's imagination, simulated by words which carry frightening associations for all of us. Hell is a place of absolute darkness, fierce heat, hostile elements and most terrible sight of all, the entire space is "valued with fire". Its all-enclosing dreadfulness typifies the dwarfing awareness of remorse, distance from God and pain from which its inhabitants cannot escape. Though terrible it is not formless; sea and land exist and from its soil the precious metals are refined which go into the construction of Pandemonium.

ALEXANDER POPE

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck, and tilt at all I meet.

The Augustan Age

Introduction: - According to Hudson the epithet ―Augustan was applied as a term of high praise, because the Age of Augustus was the golden age of Latin literature, so the Age of Pope was the golden age of English literature. This epithet serves to bring out the analogy between the first half of the eighteenth century and the Latin literature of the days of Virgil and Horace. In both cases writers were largely dependent upon powerful patrons. In both case a critical spirit prevailed. In both cases the literature produced by a thoroughly artificial society was a literature, not of free creative effort and inspiration, but of self-conscious and deliberate art. It is also known as the ―classic age. Hudson writes: The epithet ―classic, we may take to denote, first that the poets and critics of this age believed that the writers of classical antiquity presented the best models and ultimate standards of literary taste, and secondly, in a more general way, that, like these Latin writers, they had little faith in the promptings and guidance of individual genius, and much in laws and rules imposed by the authority of the past. Some remarkable political and social changes began to take place in England during the closing years of William III and the accession of Queen Anne (1702). That had a great impact on the development of literature during this period. The literature of this era was partly new and partly a continuance of that of the Restoration.

This age may be divided into two periods: the first stretching from 1700 to 1750 in the neo-classic Age, and the second, the transitional period which spans from 1750 to 1798. The classical tendencies lost their hold during the second period and there was a transition from classicism to romanticism. The period of transition is also known as the Age of Gray and Collins.

Political and Social Milieu: - Politically, this age witnessed the rise of two political parties: the Whigs and the Tories. Their political opinions and programmes were sharply divided. The Whig party stood for the pre-eminence of personal freedom and the Tory party supported the royal Divine Right. The Tories objected to the foreign wars because they had to pay taxes to prolong them, while the trading class Whigs favoured the continuance of war because it contributed to their prosperity. In order to propagate their ideologies and programmes both the parties utilized the services of literary men. And the politicians bribed the authors to join one or the other political party. The politicians took the authors into their confidence. Thus began the age of literary patronage. Consequently, most of the writers showed a strong political bias. It was, in other words, a party literature. Literature was honoured not for itself but for the sake of the party. The politics of the period helped to make it an age of political pamphleteering. And the writers were too willing to make the most of it. In order to get prominence in political struggle both parties issued a large number of periodicals. The periodicals were the mouthpieces of their respective political opinions. Thus began the age of journalism and periodical essay. The rise of periodical writing allowed great scope to the development of the literary talent of prose writers of the time. The real prose style—neat, simple, clear and lucid— was evolved during this period. In the words of Albert: "It was the golden age of political pamphleteering and the writer made the most of it".

Coffee Houses and Literary Activities: - People were keenly interested in political activity. A number of clubs and coffee houses came into existence. They became the centers of fashionable and public life. The Coffee houses were dominated by either of the parties. A Whig would never go to a Tory Coffee house and Vice Versa. The Coffee houses were the haunts of prominent writers, thinkers, artists, intellectuals and politicians. They figured prominently in the writings of the day. The Coffee houses gave rise to purely literary associations, such as the famous Scribblers and Kit-cat clubs. In the first number of The Tattler, Richard Steele announced that the activities of his new Journal would be based upon the clubs. The discussions in coffee houses took place in polished, refined, elegant, easy and lucid style. Thus coffee houses also contributed to the evolution of prose style during the eighteenth century.

Interest in Reading and Publishing Houses: - The rising interest in politics witnessed the decline of drama. It resulted in a remarkable increase in the number of reading public. Consequently a large number of men took interest in publishing translations, adaptations and other popular works of the time. They became the forerunners of modern public houses. They employed hack writers (the writers who write for money without worrying about the quality of their writing) of the period. They lived in miserable hovels in the Grub Street.

The Rise of the Middle Class: - This period of literature saw the emergence of a powerful middle class. The supremacy of the middle class made it an age of tolerance, moderation and common sense. It sought to refine manners, and introduce into life the rule of sweet reasonableness. The church also pursued a middle way and the religious life was free form strife and fanaticism. The powerful dominance of the middle classes led to moral regeneration in the eighteenth century. The people were fast growing sick of the outrageousness of the Restoration period. People had begun once more to insist upon those basic decencies of life and moral considerations, which the previous generation had treated with contempt. The middle class writers were greatly influenced by moral considerations. Moreover, William III and Queen Anne were staunch supporters of morality. Addison in an early number of The Spectator puts the new tone in writing in his own admirable way: —I shall endeavor to enliven morality with wit and wit with morality. It was an era of the assimilation of the aristocracy and the middle class. The middle class appropriated classicism with its moralising needs. The emergence of middle class led to the rise of sentimentalism, feelings and emotions, which influenced the literature of the latter half of the eighteenth century.

Evangelical Movement: - Religion in the age of Pope was deistic, formal, utilitarian and unspiritual. In the great Evangelical Revival, known as Methodism, led by Wesley and Whitefield, the old formalism and utilitarianism was abandoned. A mighty tide of spiritual energy poured into the Church and the common people. From 1739 the Evangelical Movement spread rapidly among the poor all over England, and it became particularly strong in the industrial towns.

Literary Characteristics of the Age: - The political and social changes exhibiting the supremacy of good sense, rationality, sanity and balance left an imperishable mark on the literature of the Age of Pope and Dr. Johnson. The literature of the period bore the hallmark of intelligence, of wit and of fancy, not a literature of emotion, passion, or creative energy. The main literary characteristics of the age are given below:

(a) Age of Prose and Reason: - It is an age of prose, reason, good sense and not of poetry. A large number of practical interests arising from the new social and political conditions demanded expression not simply in looks, but in pamphlets, magazines and newspapers. Poetry was inadequate for such a task. Hence prose developed rapidly and excellently. Indeed, poetry itself became prosaic, as it was not used for creative works of imagination, but for essays, satires and criticism. The poetry of the first half of the eighteenth century as represented by the works of Pope and Dr. Johnson is polished and witty but lacks fire, fine feeling, enthusiasm and imaginative appeal. In short, it interests us as a study of life but fails to delight or inspire us. Matthew Arnold rightly calls if the eighteenth century —an age of prose. The poetry of this period, according to Hudson, —lacked inevitably the depth and grasp of essential things which alone assure permanence in literature, and the quest for refinement in style resulted too often in stilted affectations and frigid conventionalism.

(b) Age of Satire: - The predominance of satire is an important literary characteristic of the age. Nearly every writer of the first half of the eighteenth century was used and rewarded by Whigs or Tories for satirising their enemies and for advancing their special political interests. Pope was an exception but he too was a satirist par excellence. W. J. Long writes: —Now satire—that is a literary work which searches out the faults of men or institutions in order to hold them up to ridicule—is at best a destructive type of criticism. A satirist is like a labourer who clears away the ruins and rubbish of an old house before the architect and builders begin on a new and beautiful structure. The work may sometime be necessary, but it rarely arouses our enthusiasm. While the satires of Pope, place them with our great literature, which is always constructive in spirit; and we have the feeling that all these men were capable of better things than they ever wrote.

(c) Age of Neo-Classicism: - The Age of Pope and Johnson is often called the neo-classic age. We should clearly understand the meaning of the word —classic. The term —classic refers to writers of highest rank in any nation. It was first applied to the works of Greek and Roman writers like Homer and Virgil. In English literature any writer who followed the simple, noble and inspiring method of these writers was said to have a classic style. Period marked by a number of celebrated writers who produce literature of a very high order, is also called the classic period of a nation�much literature. The age of Augustus is the classic age of Rome. The age of Dante is the classic age of Italian literature. The age of the classic age is like those of Homer and Virgil. The writers of this period disregarded Elizabethan literary trends. They demanded that their poetry should comply with exact rules. In this respect they were influenced by French writers, especially by Boileau, who insisted on precise rules of writing poetry. They professed to have discovered their rules in the classics of Aristotle and Horace. Dryden, Pope and Johnson pioneered the revival of classicism which conformed to rules established by the great writers of other nations. They preferred only set rules to the depth and seriousness of subject matter. They ignored creativity, depth, vigour and freshness of expression. The true classicist pays equal consideration to the depth and seriousness of subject matter, and the perfect and flawless expression. The neo-classicist disregards the subject matter expresses the hackneyed and commonplace subjects in a polished and finished style modelled on the stylistic patterns of ancient writers. Grierson in his famous book The Background of English Literature asserts that the hallmark of ancient classical literature is a harmonious balance between form and substance. This harmonious balance between form and substance was disturbed in the Age of Pope and Johnson. The writers of this period care for form, not for the weight of matter. They care only for manner, for artistic finish and polish, but not for genuine poetic inspiration. The content thought and feeling are subordinated to form.

(d) Age of Good Sense: - Good sense is one of the central characteristics of the literature of this period. In the words of W. H. Hudson: —Good sense became the ideal of the time, and good sense meant a love of the reasonable and the useful and a hatred of the mystical, the extravagant and the visionary.

(e) Follow Nature: - Another important characteristic of the age was the belief that literature must follow nature. Pope wrote in The Essay on Criticism:

The rules of old discover'd, not devis'd,

Are Nature still, but Nature methodiz'd;

Nature like Liberty is but restrained

By the same laws which first herself ordain'd

. . . . . .

Learn hence for ancient rules a just esteem

The follow Nature is to follow them.

By nature the Augustans meant to copy man and manners of society. Pope said, "The proper study of mankind is man". Addison also wrote "Wit and fine writing consist not so much —in advancing things that are new, as in things that are known, an agreeable turn".

(f) Town and City Life as a Theme of Literature: - Another feature of the literature of the age is that it has a limited theme. It is a literature of the town and the fashionable upper circles of the city of London. Pope, Johnson, Addison, Steele etc., though urban in outlook and temperament, show remarkable interest in the middle classes and, thus, broaden the scope of literature. The theme of literature before them was strictly confined to fashionable and aristocratic circles. In the works of middle class writers classicism shows itself slightly coloured by a moralising and secretly sentimental intension.

(g) The Heroic Couplet and the Poetic Diction as Tools of Writers: - The use of heroic couplet was predominant during this period. The heroic couplet was recognised as the only medium for poetic expression. In it the poets put all the skill and wrote with an unimaginable correctness and precision. The language of poetry became gaudy and inane. The common words or ordinary language were deliberately kept out from poetic literature. The result was that literature of the Augustan Age became artificial, rational and intellectual.

Alexander Pope as a Poet

Alexander Pope was born in London on May 21, 1688, disadvantaged from the start by being born into a Roman Catholic family (at a time when Catholics were severely restricted in their liberty and property by the English government). Barred from an English university education by his religion, he nevertheless received some schooling at a couple of Catholic institutions, but soon supplemented this with his own extensive reading in Greek and Latin authors. He began writing verse by doing translations of these authors, and imitations and adaptations of others such as Chaucer, Waller, and Cowley.

Pope is by far the most important poetic figure of the age called after him (1700-1740). His importance lies in the fact that he exercised the greatest influence on the classical poetry of the century. His poetry was intellectual, didactic and satiric, and was almost written in heroic couplet. It is never of the highest class, but within its limits, it stands unrivalled in the language

Pseudo Classicist: - The true classicism is meant to be a combination of poetic ardor and excellence of form. In Pope the true poetic ardor and energy is absent but he is exceedingly careful about the technique of form and style. When we look at the contents of Pope's poetry we do not find anything worthwhile. Satire, didactic poetry, and a flimsy mock-heroic poem---are all his poetic achievements. They are mere products of intellect, and artificially constructed; they do not reproduce true classical spirit. Hence it is not correct to describe Pope as a true classicist. (Milton, with his poetic impulse and perfection of form, is a true classicist.) The classicism of Pope is the shadow of classicism; it is false or pseudo-classicism.

Intellectual Poetry: - Pope's poetry was of his age, and it reflected in full measure the spirit of the age. It is intellectual and its appeal is to the mind rather than to the heart. It is full of wit and epigram, the brilliancy of which is unsurpassed. Pope is next to Shakespeare, in contributing quotable lines of verse, which are remarkable for their pregnancy, neatness and brevity. Here are some of his famous quotes.

> To err is human, to forgive divine.
> Never elated when someone's oppressed,
> Never dejected when another one's blessed.
> We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow.
> Our wiser sons, no doubt will think us so.
> For fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

The Rape of the Lock: Summary

Canto 1 : Summary

The Rape of the Lock begins with a passage outlining the subject of the poem and invoking the aid of the muse. Then the sun ("Sol") appears to initiate the leisurely morning routines of a wealthy household. Lapdogs shake themselves awake, bells begin to ring, and although it is already noon, Belinda still sleeps. She has been dreaming, and we learn that the dream has been sent by "her guardian Sylph," Ariel. The dream is of a handsome youth who tells her that she is protected by "unnumber'd Spirits"—an army of supernatural beings who once lived on earth as human women. The youth explains that they are the invisible guardians of women's chastity, although the credit is usually mistakenly given to "Honour" rather than to their divine stewardship. Of these Spirits, one particular group—the Sylphs, who dwell in the air—serve as Belinda's personal guardians; they are devoted, lover-like, to any woman that "rejects mankind," and they understand and reward the vanities of an elegant and frivolous lady like Belinda. Ariel, the chief of all Belinda's puckish protectors, warns her in this dream that "some dread event" is going to befall her that day, though he can tell her nothing more specific than that she should "beware of Man!" Then Belinda awakes, to the licking tongue of her lapdog, Shock. Upon the delivery of a billet-doux, or love-letter, she forgets all about the dream. She then proceeds to her dressing table and goes through an elaborate ritual of dressing, in which her own image in the mirror is described as a "heavenly image," a "goddess." The Sylphs, unseen, assist their charge as she prepares herself for the day's activities.

Commentary

The opening of the poem establishes its mock-heroic style. Pope introduces the conventional epic subjects of love and war and includes an invocation to the muse and a dedication to the man (the historical John Caryll) who commissioned the poem. Yet the tone already indicates that the high seriousness of these traditional topics has suffered a diminishment. The second line confirms in explicit terms what the first line already suggests: the "am'rous causes" the poem describes are not comparable to the grand love of Greek heroes but rather represent a trivialized version of that emotion. The "contests" Pope alludes to will prove to be "mighty" only in an ironic sense. They are card-games and flirtatious tussles, not the great battles of epic tradition. Belinda is not, like Helen of Troy, "the face that launched a thousand ships" , but rather a face that—although also beautiful—prompts a lot of foppish nonsense. The first two verse-paragraphs emphasize the comic inappropriateness of the epic style (and corresponding mind-set) to the subject at hand. Pope achieves this discrepancy at the level of the line and half-line; the reader is meant to dwell on the incompatibility between the two sides of his parallel formulations. Thus, in this world, it is "little men" who in "tasks so bold... engage"; and "soft bosoms" are the dwelling-place for "mighty rage." In this startling juxtaposition of the petty and the grand, the former is real while the latter is ironic. In mock-epic, the high heroic style works not to dignify the subject but rather to expose and ridicule it. Therefore, the basic irony of the style supports the substance of the poem's satire, which attacks the misguided values of a society that takes small matters for serious ones while failing to attend to issues of genuine importance.

With Belinda's dream, Pope introduces the "machinery" of the poem—the supernatural powers that influence the action from behind the scenes. Here, the sprites that watch over Belinda are meant to mimic the gods of the Greek and Roman traditions, who are sometimes benevolent and sometimes malicious, but always intimately involved in earthly events. The scheme also makes use of other ancient hierarchies and systems of order. Ariel explains that women's spirits, when they die, return "to their first Elements." Each female personality type (these types correspond to the four humours) is converted into a particular kind of sprite. These gnomes, sylphs, salamanders, and nymphs, in turn, are associated with the four elements of earth, air, fire, and water. The airy sylphs are those who in their lifetimes were "light Coquettes"; they have a particular concern for Belinda because she is of this type, and this will be the aspect of feminine nature with which the poem is most concerned.

Indeed, Pope already begins to sketch this character of the "coquette" in this initial canto. He draws the portrait indirectly, through characteristics of the Sylphs rather than of Belinda herself. Their priorities reveal that the central concerns of womanhood, at least for women of Belinda's class, are social ones. Woman's "joy in gilded Chariots" indicates an obsession with pomp and superficial splendor, while "love of Ombre," a fashionable card game, suggests frivolity. The erotic charge of this social world in turn prompts another central concern: the protection of chastity. These are women who value above all the prospect marrying to advantage, and they have learned at an early age how to promote themselves and manipulate their suitors without compromising themselves. The Sylphs become an allegory for the mannered conventions that govern female social behavior. Principles like honor and chastity have become no more than another part of conventional interaction. Pope makes it clear that these women are not conducting themselves on the basis of abstract moral principles, but are governed by an elaborate social mechanism—of which the Sylphs cut a fitting caricature. And while Pope's technique of employing supernatural machinery allows him to critique this situation, it also helps to keep the satire light and to exonerate individual women from too severe a judgment. If Belinda has all the typical female foibles, Pope wants us to recognize that it is partly because she has been educated and trained to act in this way. The society as a whole is as much to blame as she is. Nor are men exempt from this judgment. The competition among the young lords for the attention of beautiful ladies is depicted as a battle of vanity, as "wigs with wigs, with sword-knots sword-knots strive." Pope's phrases here expose an absurd attention to exhibitions of pride and ostentation. He emphasizes the inanity of discriminating so closely between things and people that are essentially the same in all important (and even most unimportant) respects.

Pope's portrayal of Belinda at her dressing table introduces mock-heroic motifs that will run through the poem. The scene of her toilette is rendered first as a religious sacrament, in which Belinda herself is the priestess and her image in the looking glass is the Goddess she serves. This parody of the religious rites before a battle gives way, then, to another kind of mock-epic scene, that of the ritualized arming of the hero. Combs, pins, and cosmetics take the place of weapons as "awful Beauty puts on all its arms."

Canto 2 : Summary

Belinda, rivaling the sun in her radiance, sets out by boat on the river Thames for Hampton Court Palace. She is accompanied by a party of glitzy ladies ("Nymphs") and gentlemen, but is far and away the most striking member of the group. Pope's description of her charms includes "the sparkling Cross she wore" on her "white breast," her "quick" eyes and "lively looks," and the easy grace with which she bestows her smiles and attentions evenly among all the adoring guests. Her crowning glories, though, are the two ringlets that dangle on her "iv'ry neck." These curls are described as love's labyrinths, specifically designed to ensnare any poor heart who might get entangled in them.

One of the young gentlemen on the boat, the Baron, particularly admires Belinda's locks, and has determined to steal them for himself. We read that he rose early that morning to build an altar to love and pray for success in this project. He sacrificed several tokens of his former affections, including garters, gloves, and billet-doux (love-letters). He then prostrated himself before a pyre built with "all the trophies of his former loves," fanning its flames with his "am'rous sighs." The gods listened to his prayer but decided to grant only half of it.

As the pleasure-boat continues on its way, everyone is carefree except Ariel, who remembers that some bad event has been foretold for the day. He summons an army of sylphs, who assemble around him in their iridescent beauty. He reminds them with great ceremony that one of their duties, after regulating celestial bodies and the weather and guarding the British monarch, is "to tend the Fair": to keep watch over ladies' powders, perfumes, curls, and clothing, and to "assist their blushes, and inspire their airs." Therefore, since "some dire disaster" threatens Belinda, Ariel assigns her an extensive troop of bodyguards. Brillante is to guard her earrings, Momentilla her watch, and Crispissa her locks. Ariel himself will protect Shock, the lapdog. A band of fifty Sylphs will guard the all-important petticoat. Ariel pronounces that any sylph who neglects his assigned duty will be severely punished. They disperse to their posts and wait for fate to unfold.

Commentary

From the first, Pope describes Belinda's beauty as something divine, an assessment which she herself corroborates in the first canto when she creates, at least metaphorically, an altar to her own image. This praise is certainly in some sense ironical, reflecting negatively on a system of public values in which external characteristics rank higher than moral or intellectual ones. But Pope also shows a real reverence for his heroine's physical and social charms, claiming in lines 17–18 that these are compelling enough to cause one to forget her "female errors." Certainly he has some interest in flattering Arabella Fermor, the real-life woman on whom Belinda is based; in order for his poem to achieve the desired reconciliation, it must not offend (see "Context". Pope also exhibits his appreciation for the ways in which physical beauty is an art form: he recognizes, with a mixture of censure and awe, the fact that Belinda's legendary locks of hair, which appear so natural and spontaneous, are actually a carefully contrived effect. In this, the mysteries of the lady's dressing table are akin, perhaps, to Pope's own literary art, which he describes elsewhere as "nature to advantage dress'd."

If the secret mechanisms and techniques of female beauty get at least a passing nod of appreciation from the author, he nevertheless suggests that the general human readiness to worship beauty amounts to a kind of sacrilege. The cross that Belinda wears around her neck serves a more ornamental than symbolic or religious function. Because of this, he says, it can be adored by "Jews" and "Infidels" as readily as by Christians. And there is some ambiguity about whether any of the admirers are really valuing the cross itself, or the "white breast" on which it lies—or the felicitous effect of the whole. The Baron, of course, is the most significant of those who worship at the altar of Belinda's beauty. The ritual sacrifices he performs in the pre-dawn hours are another mock-heroic element of the poem, mimicking the epic tradition of sacrificing to the gods before an important battle or journey, and drapes his project with an absurdly grand import that actually only exposes its triviality. The fact that he discards all his other love tokens in these preparations reveals his capriciousness as a lover. Earnest prayer, in this parodic scene, is replaced by the self-indulgent sighs of the lover. By having the gods grant only half of what the Baron asks, Pope alludes to the epic convention by which the favor of the gods is only a mixed blessing: in epic poems, to win the sponsorship of one god is to incur the wrath of another; divine gifts, such as immortality, can seem a blessing but become a curse. Yet in this poem, the ramifications of a prayer "half" granted are negligible rather than tragic; it merely means that he will manage to steal just one lock rather than both of them.

In the first canto, the religious imagery surrounding Belinda's grooming rituals gave way to a militaristic conceit. Here, the same pattern holds. Her curls are compared to a trap perfectly calibrated to ensnare the enemy. Yet the character of female coyness is such that it seeks simultaneously to attract and repel, so that the counterpart to the enticing ringlets is the formidable petticoat. This undergarment is described as a defensive armament comparable to the Shield of Achilles and supported in its function of protecting the maiden's chastity by the invisible might of fifty Sylphs. The Sylphs, who are Belinda's protectors, are essentially charged to protect her not from failure but from too great a success in attracting men. This paradoxical situation dramatizes the contradictory values and motives implied in the era's sexual conventions.

In this canto, the sexual allegory of the poem begins to come into fuller view. The title of the poem already associates the cutting of Belinda's hair with a more explicit sexual conquest, and here Pope cultivates that suggestion. He multiplies his sexually metaphorical language for the incident, adding words like "ravish" and "betray" to the "rape" of the title. He also slips in some commentary on the implications of his society's sexual mores, as when he remarks that "when success a Lover's toil attends, / few ask, if fraud or force attain'd his ends." When Ariel speculates about the possible forms the "dire disaster" might take, he includes a breach of chastity ("Diana's law"), the breaking of china (another allusion to the loss of virginity), and the staining of honor or a gown (the two incommensurate events could happen equally easily and accidentally). He also mentions some pettier social "disasters" against which the Sylphs are equally prepared to fight, like missing a ball (here, as grave as missing prayers) or losing the lapdog. In the Sylphs' defensive efforts, Belinda's petticoat is the battlefield that requires the most extensive fortifications. This fact furthers the idea that the rape of the lock stands in for a literal rape, or at least represents a threat to her chastity more serious than just the mere theft of a curl.

Canto 3 : Summary

The boat arrives at Hampton Court Palace, and the ladies and gentlemen disembark to their courtly amusements. After a pleasant round of chatting and gossip, Belinda sits down with two of the men to a game of cards. They play ombre, a three-handed game of tricks and trumps, somewhat like bridge, and it is described in terms of a heroic battle: the cards are troops combating on the "velvet plain" of the card-table. Belinda, under the watchful care of the Sylphs, begins favorably. She declares spades as trumps and leads with her highest cards, sure of success. Soon, however, the hand takes a turn for the worse when "to the Baron fate inclines the field": he catches her king of clubs with his queen and then leads back with his high diamonds. Belinda is in danger of being beaten, but recovers in the last trick so as to just barely win back the amount she bid.

The next ritual amusement is the serving of coffee. The curling vapors of the steaming coffee remind the Baron of his intention to attempt Belinda's lock. Clarissa draws out her scissors for his use, as a lady would arm a knight in a romance. Taking up the scissors, he tries three times to clip the lock from behind without Belinda seeing. The Sylphs endeavor furiously to intervene, blowing the hair out of harm's way and tweaking her diamond earring to make her turn around. Ariel, in a last-minute effort, gains access to her brain, where he is surprised to find "an earthly lover lurking at her heart." He gives up protecting her then; the implication is that she secretly wants to be violated. Finally, the shears close on the curl. A daring sylph jumps in between the blades and is cut in two; but being a supernatural creature, he is quickly restored. The deed is done, and the Baron exults while Belinda's screams fill the air.

Commentary

This canto is full of classic examples of Pope's masterful use of the heroic couplet. In introducing Hampton Court Palace, he describes it as the place where Queen Anne "dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea." This line employs a zeugma, a rhetorical device in which a word or phrase modifies two other words or phrases in a parallel construction, but modifies each in a different way or according to a different sense. Here, the modifying word is "take"; it applies to the paralleled terms "counsel" and "tea." But one does not "take" tea in the same way one takes counsel, and the effect of the zeugma is to show the royal residence as a place that houses both serious matters of state and frivolous social occasions. The reader is asked to contemplate that paradox and to reflect on the relative value and importance of these two different registers of activity. (For another example of this rhetorical technique, see lines 157–8: "Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / when husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last.") A similar point is made, in a less compact phrasing, in the second and third verse-paragraphs of this canto. Here, against the gossip and chatter of the young lords and ladies, Pope opens a window onto more serious matters that are occurring "meanwhile" and elsewhere, including criminal trials and executions, and economic exchange.

The rendering of the card game as a battle constitutes an amusing and deft narrative feat. By parodying the battle scenes of the great epic poems, Pope is suggesting that the energy and passion once applied to brave and serious purposes is now expended on such insignificant trials as games and gambling, which often become a mere front for flirtation. The structure of "the three attempts" by which the lock is cut is a convention of heroic challenges, particularly in the romance genre. The romance is further invoked in the image of Clarissa arming the Baron—not with a real weapon, however, but with a pair of sewing scissors. Belinda is not a real adversary, or course, and Pope makes it plain that her resistance—and, by implication, her subsequent distress—is to some degree an affectation. The melodrama of her screams is complemented by the ironic comparison of the Baron's feat to the conquest of nations.

Canto 4 : Summary

Belinda's "anxious cares" and "secret passions" after the loss of her lock are equal to the emotions of all who have ever known "rage, resentment and despair." After the disappointed Sylphs withdraw, an earthy gnome called Umbriel flies down to the "Cave of Spleen." (The spleen, an organ that removes disease-causing agents from the bloodstream, was traditionally associated with the passions, particularly malaise; "spleen" is a synonym for "ill-temper.") In his descent he passes through Belinda's bedroom, where she lies prostrate with discomfiture and the headache. She is attended by "two handmaidens," Ill-Nature and Affectation. Umbriel passes safely through this melancholy chamber, holding a sprig of "spleenwort" before him as a charm. He addresses the "Goddess of Spleen," and returns with a bag of "sighs, sobs, and passions" and a vial of sorrow, grief, and tears. He unleashes the first bag on Belinda, fueling her ire and despair.

There to commiserate with Belinda is her friend Thalestris. (In Greek mythology, Thalestris is the name of one of the Amazons, a race of warrior women who excluded men from their society.) Thalestris delivers a speech calculated to further foment Belinda's indignation and urge her to avenge herself. She then goes to Sir Plume, "her beau," to ask him to demand that the Baron return the hair. Sir Plume makes a weak and slang-filled speech, to which the Baron disdainfully refuses to acquiesce. At this, Umbriel releases the contents of the remaining vial, throwing Belinda into a fit of sorrow and self-pity. With "beauteous grief" she bemoans her fate, regrets not having heeded the dream-warning, and laments the lonely, pitiful state of her sole remaining curl.

Commentary

The canto opens with a list of examples of "rage, resentment, and despair," comparing on an equal footing the pathos of kings imprisoned in battle, of women who become old maids, of evil-doers who die without being saved, and of a woman whose dress is disheveled. By placing such disparate sorts of aggravation in parallel, Pope accentuates the absolute necessity of assigning them to some rank of moral import. The effect is to chastise a social world that fails to make these distinctions.

Umbriel's journey to the Cave of Spleen mimics the journeys to the underworld made by both Odysseus and Aeneas. Pope uses psychological allegory (for the spleen was the seat of malaise or melancholy), as a way of exploring the sources and nature of Belinda's feelings. The presence of Ill-nature and Affectation as handmaidens serves to indicate that her grief is less than pure ("affected" or put-on), and that her display of temper has hidden motives. We learn that her sorrow is decorative in much the same way the curl was; it gives her the occasion, for example, to wear a new nightdress.

The speech of Thalestris invokes a courtly ethic. She encourages Belinda to think about the Baron's misdeed as an affront to her honor, and draws on ideals of chivalry in demanding that Sir Plume challenge the Baron in defense of Belinda's honor. He makes a muddle of the task, showing how far from courtly behavior this generation of gentlemen has fallen. Sir Plume's speech is riddled with foppish slang and has none of the logical, moral, or oratorical power that a knight should properly wield.

This attention to questions of honor returns us to the sexual allegory of the poem. The real danger, Thalestris suggests, is that "the ravisher" might display the lock and make it a source of public humiliation to Belinda and, by association, to her friends. Thus the real question is a superficial one—public reputation—rather than the moral imperative to chastity. Belinda's own words at the close of the canto corroborate this suggestion; she exclaims,

> "Oh, hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize > Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these!" (The "hairs less in sight" suggest her pubic hair).

Pope is pointing out the degree to which she values outward appearance (whether beauty or reputation) above all else; she would rather suffer a breach to her integrity than a breach to her appearance.

Canto 5 : Summary

The Baron remains impassive against all the ladies' tears and reproaches. Clarissa delivers a speech in which she questions why a society that so adores beauty in women does not also place a value on "good sense" and "good humour." Women are frequently called angels, she argues, but without reference to the moral qualities of these creatures. Especially since beauty is necessarily so short-lived, we must have something more substantial and permanent to fall back on. This sensible, moralizing speech falls on deaf ears, however, and Belinda, Thalestris and the rest ignore her and proceed to launch an all-out attack on the offending Baron. A chaotic tussle ensues, with the gnome Umbriel presiding in a posture of self- congratulation. The gentlemen are slain or revived according to the smiles and frowns of the fair ladies. Belinda and the Baron meet in combat and she emerges victorious by peppering him with snuff and drawing her bodkin. Having achieved a position of advantage, she again demands that he return the lock. But the ringlet has been lost in the chaos, and cannot be found. The poet avers that the lock has risen to the heavenly spheres to become a star; stargazers may admire it now for all eternity. In this way, the poet reasons, it will attract more envy than it ever could on earth.

Commentary

Readers have often interpreted Clarissa's speech as the voice of the poet expressing the moral of the story. Certainly, her oration's thesis aligns with Pope's professed task of putting the dispute between the two families into a more reasonable perspective. But Pope's position achieves more complexity than Clarissa's speech, since he has used the occasion of the poem as a vehicle to critically address a number of broader societal issues as well. And Clarissa's righteous stance loses authority in light of the fact that it was she who originally gave the Baron the scissors. Clarissa's failure to inspire a reconciliation proves that the quarrel is itself a kind of flirtatious game that all parties are enjoying. The description of the "battle" has a markedly erotic quality, as ladies and lords wallow in their mock-agonies. Sir Plume "draw[s] Clarissa down" in a sexual way, and Belinda "flies" on her foe with flashing eyes and an erotic ardor. When Pope informs us that the Baron fights on unafraid because he "sought no more than on his foe to die," the expression means that his goal all along was sexual consummation.

This final battle is the culmination of the long sequence of mock-heroic military actions. Pope invokes by name the Roman gods who were most active in warfare, and he alludes as well to the Aeneid , comparing the stoic Baron to Aeneas ("the Trojan"), who had to leave his love to become the founder of Rome. Belinda's tossing of the snuff makes a perfect turning point, ideally suited to the scale of this trivial battle. The snuff causes the Baron to sneeze, a comic and decidedly unheroic thing for a hero to do. The bodkin, too, serves nicely: here a bodkin is a decorative hairpin, not the weapon of ancient days (or even of Hamlet's time). Still, Pope gives the pin an elaborate history in accordance with the conventions of true epic.

The mock-heroic conclusion of the poem is designed to complement the lady it alludes to (Arabella Fermor), while also giving the poet himself due credit for being the instrument of her immortality. This ending effectively indulges the heroine's vanity, even though the poem has functioned throughout as a critique of that vanity. And no real moral development has taken place: Belinda is asked to come to terms with her loss through a kind of bribe or distraction that reinforces her basically frivolous outlook. But even in its most mocking moments, this poem is a gentle one, in which Pope shows a basic sympathy with the social world in spite of its folly and foibles. The searing critiques of his later satires would be much more stringent and less forgiving.

Critical Analysis of "The Rape of the Lock"

The occasion of the poem Alexander Pope's The Rape of the Lock was the quarrel between two aristocratic Roman Catholic families. Lord Petre, in a moment of youthful frolic had cut off a lock of hair from Miss Arabella's Fermor's head which caused a violent quarrel. The gentle satire was written to reconcile quarreling families.

Thus The Rape of the Lock was dedicated to Miss Arabelle Fermors belonging to a distinguished Catholic family. It was dedicated to her as it was to reconcile her family with that of Lord Petre who had cut off a lock hair from the lady's head which caused a violent quarrel.

Coming to the title the word Rape in the title means violence on women. In the poem no woman is the victim of rape but it is the lock of a woman named Belinda that is raped by a fashionable Baron. So, the title brings out the triviality of the subject-matter and is hence appropriate. Again the title of the poem bears literary reminiscent. The title is reminiscent of Shakespeare' Roman matron, Lucrece where the rape of the Roman matron Lucrece by Emperor Tarques arouses a most shameful and painful event. It also satirically refers to the rape of Helen of Sparta by Paris, the Trojan prince.

The poem also reflects the picture of the contemporary society. The Rape of the Lock mirrors eighteenth century elegant society and life in London with all it's the fashions, follies, frivolities and vices. The poem is a witty social document which mirrors false ideology. Morality intrigue debauchery corruption social scandals mostly sexual pleasure and fashion of the ladies the tawdriness of the morality of the beau-demon is revealed through the poem.

Pope in the manner of epic poets, Homer, Virgil and Milton, sets forth his mock epic with a proposition announcing the subject and in invocation to the muse to help him sing how a dreadful consequence arises from a love affair and a fierce quarrel results from a very trivial incident. However, Pope's The Rape of the Lock is a mock heroic poem which imitates the elaborate form and ceremonious style of the epic genre and it applies to a common place or trivial subject matter. Pope's The Rape of the Lock is the perfect of mock-heroic poem. The characteristics of a mock heroic poem -the discrepancy the triviality of the subject matter, the Invocation to the muse, epic similes, the sonorous and grand speeches, use of epic machinery, journey to the underworld the of amber a voyage on board are present here.

The proposition, the Invocation to the muse, epic machinery of sylphs and gnomes, the journey description of Belinda's toilet in grand manner, the heroic battle between the sexes make the poem an epic. First of all The term epic machinery mean the agency of the fairy being called Sylphs Gnomes Deities and Demons and angels made to act in a poem. The machinery as pope said signifies the part that the fairy being played in the epics and dramas by intervening in human affairs and assisting the moral portages. Pope uses it to admirable humorous purposes in his mock-heroic. In conformity with classical epics where the gods and other supernatural being are seen intervening in human affairs and taking sides and ending. Assisting and fighting for this protégés. Pope introduces the sylph machinery for enhancing the comic effect. Again, it is Rosicrucian. Rosicrucian Doctrine is the name given to secret brotherhood supposed to have been founded by Christian Rosankrents. The doctrine of the Rosicrucian was a mixture of religion and magic. In the poem Sylphs, gnomes, nymphs, salamanders are mentioned as being obtained from the Rosicrucian source.

Pope invokes to the muse in the epic convention which sets forth the theme of his mock-epic. The Invocation prepares us for an impending dreadful mischief arising from love affairs and its terrible result. At the same time it admits the triviality of the subject. Invocation to the muse is an epic convention Pope invokes the muse to learn the secret cause of the Lord's assault on the gentle maid. He also wants the muse to enlighten how a little man could dare such a bold task and how a soft female heart could harbor such violent anger.

Pope in a mock heroic vein presents Belinda, the heroine of The Rape of the Lock, as a representation of the flawed manners, degraded morals false pretense and absurdities rampant in the life of the 18th century London. When Belinda sleep is prolonged beyond the meaning hours, she has a mysterious vision of a beautiful youth which sent by Ariel the guardian sylph. Ariel whispers to her ears continuing her against a dreadful event which might be fall her before sunset. Pope with an epic grandeur describes Belinda's toilet to satire the fashion and frivolity of the woman in the 18th century aristocratic society. Her toilet table displays a number of silver uses arranged in a mystic order. Toilet goods included a casket containing ornaments set with bright game a box of perfumes, combs made of ivory and tortoise shell, powders, pins puffs, a mirror some love-letters Bibles. Pope with an epic grandeur describes Belinda's toilet to satirize the fashion and frivolity of the women of the 18th century aristocratic society. The articles of luxury are conceived of as the articles of worship with which Belinda worship, thus the poet treated a trivial subjection a grand style to register the cut and satire vivacity of the scene. When Belinda dons her safety aids with the help of Betty at her toilet it reminds us of Achilles arming himself for battle in Iliad. The arming of Achilles is an indispensable epic convention and the woman putting on make-up in terms of martial idiom effectively evokes the mock-heroic atmosphere.

Major Themes

Gender Roles: - Pope constantly manipulates traditional gender roles in The Rape of the Lock. He portrays Belinda, the poem's protagonist, alternately as an epic hero preparing for battle (I.139-44), a cunning military general reviewing his troops (III.45-6), and a Moor bellowing in rage (V.105-6). The poem thus describes Belinda in specifically male terms: heroism, battle, anger. Other women in the poem similarly demonstrate masculine characteristics. Thalestris displays her prowess on the battlefield while Clarissa provides a weapon to the otherwise impotent Baron. By contrast, the men act with feminine delicacy, fainting during the battle. Pope figures the Baron in mostly feminine terms. He is a fop, willing to prostrate himself before the altar of Love, and he cannot act on his desire without the explicit assistance of a woman. When Belinda conquers him in battle, she stands above him in a position of dominance. Even the poem's more mechanical elements partake in this reversal of gender roles. The mythological sprites literally switch genders after they die, transforming from human women to male spirits. All this gender manipulation calls attention to the perverse behaviors of this fictional society. The poem certainly alludes to the expected behavior of each gender role: women should act with modesty while men should embody heroic and chivalric ideals. However, these characters flout the rules of traditional society.

Female Sexuality: - Pope frequently focuses on female sexuality and the place of women in society throughout the corpus of his poetry, and it was a popular topic in the early eighteenth century (just think of Jonathan Swift's misogynistic poems). The Rape of the Lock does not, however, feature a Swiftian tirade concerning the evils of women. It instead makes a considered exploration of society's expectations for women. The rules of eighteenth-century society dictate that a woman attract a suitable husband while preserving her chastity and virtuous reputation. Pope renders this double-standard dramatically in his depiction of Belinda's hair, which attracts male admirers, and its petticoat counterpart, which acts as a barrier to protect her virginity. Of course, a woman who compromised her virtue—either by deed or reputation—usually lost her place in respectable society. Pope examines the loss of reputation in the poem's sexual allegory, i.e., the "rape" of the lock. By figuring the severing of Belinda' hair as a sexual violation, Pope delves into implications of sexual transgression. After the Baron steals her curl, Belinda exiles herself from the party, retiring to a bedchamber to mourn her loss. Pope thus dramatizes the retreat from society that a sexually-compromised woman would eventually experience. Though Belinda is ultimately celebrated, not ostracized, by her community, her narrative provides Pope with the opportunity to explore society's views on female sexuality.

The Deterioration of Heroic Ideals: - Pope's use of the mock epic genre in The Rape of the Lock affords him the poetic occasion to lament the deterioration of heroic ideals in the modern era. Though he depicts conventional epic themes such as love and war, his comic tone indicates that the grandeur of these matters has suffered since the days of Homer and Virgil. The "amorous causes" in Pope's poem have little in common with Hector's love for Andromache or Paris' theft of Helen in The Iliad or Penelope's devotion to Odysseus in The Odyssey (I. 1). By contrast, the love Pope portrays is that of the Baron for Belinda's icon (her hair), not Belinda herself. Similarly, the "mighty contests" that once populated epic poetry now arise "from trivial things" (I.2). Achilles' rage at Agamemnon for affronting his honor with the theft of Briseis has diminished to the anger of a young beauty at the theft of her hair, which will certainly grow back. Pope thus presents a society that is merely a shadow of its heroic past.

Religious Piety: - The Rape of the Lock demonstrates Pope's anxieties concerning the state of religious piety during the early eighteenth century. Pope was Catholic, and in the poem he indicates his concern that society has embraced objects of worship (beauty, for example) rather than God. His use of religious imagery reveals this perversion. The rituals he depicts in the first and second cantos equate religion with secular love. During Belinda's toilette, the poem imbues the Bibles and billet-doux (love letters) on her dressing table with equal significance. The Baron's altar to Love in the second canto echoes this scene. On the altar—itself an integral part of Christian worship, in particular Catholic Mass—the Baron places "twelve vast French romances, neatly gilt" to honor Love, rather than gilded Bibles (38). Pope symbolizes this equation of religious and erotic love in the cross that Belinda wears. This central symbol of Christianity serves an ornamental, not religious function, adorning Belinda's "white breast" (7). The cross remains sufficiently secular that "Jews might kiss" it and "infidels adore" it (8). Of course, Pope leaves ambiguous the implication that the Jews and infidels are admiring Belinda's breasts and not the cross. This subversion of established principles of Christian worship critiques the laxity of early eighteenth-century attitudes towards religion and morality.

Idleness of the Upper Classes: - The idleness and ignorance of the upper classes is integral to Pope's critique of contemporary society in The Rape of the Lock. His satire focuses largely on the foibles of the aristocracy and gentry, who he depicts as interested only in trivial matters, such as flirting, gossip, and card games. Pope's rendering of ombre as an epic battle demonstrates the frivolity of upper-class entertainment. In reality an excuse for flirting and gambling, the card game represents the young aristocrats' only opportunity to gain heroic recognition. This is not, of course, true heroism, but rather a skill that serves no purpose in the outside world. Chief among the upper classes' other pastimes is gossip, but Pope limits their conversation to the insular world of the aristocratic lifestyle. They care most about "who gave the ball, or paid the visit last," the irrelevant structures of upper-class socializing (III.12). Few discuss the world beyond the society of Hampton Court: "One speaks the glory of the British Queen, / And one describes a charming Indian screen" (III.13-4). This couplet alludes to the worldly pursuits of trade and empire that are occurring outside of these aristocrats' small social world.

Ephemeral Nature of Beauty: - Beauty's ephemeral nature reinforces Pope's critical project in The Rape of the Lock. His poem attempts to dissuade society from placing excessive value on external appearances, especially since such things fade over time. Clarissa's lecture in particular questions the value that society places on appearances. She notes that men worship female beauty without assessing moral character. Pope demonstrates that this is essentially a house without foundation: because "frail beauty must decay," women must have other qualities to sustain them (V.25). Though Clarissa is complicit in the general frivolity and pettiness that Pope censures in the poem, her articulated scruples with regard to appearances serve his social critique.

Man's Place and Purpose in the Universe: - In his prefatory address to the reader of An Essay on Man, Pope describes his intention to consider "man in the abstract, his Nature and his State, since, to prove any moral duty, to enforce any moral precept, or to examine the perfection of imperfection of any creature whatsoever, it is necessary first to know what condition and relation it is placed in, and what is the proper end and purpose of its being." Pope explores man's nature and his place in the world throughout the poem. The first epistle explains man's relation to the universe. Pope explains that man's place in the "Vast chain of being" is in a middle state, below the angels but above beasts and fowl (I.237). Because man is an integral part of God's creation, he cannot and should not try to comprehend God's design. The second epistle depicts man's relation to the individual. Pope argues that man is governed by the principles of self-love and reason. Self-love and the passions are the origins of human action while reason regulates human behavior. The third epistle examines man's relation to society. The bonds that unite man to others are governed by instinct or reason. Man's relationship with nature is largely instinctual, based on a primordial knowledge of the things necessary to survival (nourishment, sex, etc.). By contrast, man's relationship to other men and to God is based on reason, and consequently, man established the institutions of government and religion. The former proves his love for other men and the second his love for God. The fourth epistle investigates man's relation to happiness, which, Pope argues, is man's ultimate aim. Though Pope does not provide a universal solution to "the proper end and purpose" of man, he does reveal one of the defining characteristics of humanity: man will always seek to understand his purpose in the world.

The Rape of the Lock” as a Social Satire

Satire is humorous criticism intended to point out the flaws in the social and cultural fabric of a given society. Social satire focuses on aspects of society itself, including current events, prevailing attitudes, and political institutions. Social satire has existed for centuries, originating with the ancient Greeks and Romans. It is still a popular venue for social criticism in modern times. The Rape of the Lock exposes in a witty manner the follies and absurdities of the high society of the times. All the recognised weapons of satire have been employed by Pope in a most effective manner. The principal targets of satire in this poem are the aristocratic ladies and gentlemen of Pope's day.

Pope gives us an amusing picture of the society-ladies of his time. He tells us that the vanities of society-ladies do not end even with the death of the ladies. Apart from making fun of their late-rising, Pope tells us that the aristocratic ladies of those days were excessively fond of gilded chariots and of Ombre. He also gives us a satirical division of ladies of different temperaments into different categories—fiery termagants, yielding ladies, grave prudes, and light coquettes. He mocks at the extravagant aspirations of the ladies who imagined matrimonial alliances with peers and dukes and dreamt of "garters, stars, and coronets". Pope ridicules the fickleness and superficiality of the ladies 'by referring to their hearts as moving toy-shops and their varying vanities.

The poet ridicules women's excessive attention to self-embellishment and self-decoration. In a famous satirical passage, Belinda is described as commencing her toilet operations with a prayer to the "cosmetic powers". "Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet doux" lie in confusion on Belinda's dressing table. Ariel's conjectures regarding the disaster that threatens Belinda are stated in some of the most amusing lines in the poem. Ariel wonders whether Belinda shall break Diana's law, or some frail China-jar receive a flaw; whether she shall stain her honour, or her new brocade; whether she shall forget her prayers, or miss a dance-party; whether she shall lose her heart or her necklace. The paired calamities here are not merely ridiculous contrasts; they show the moral bankruptcy of the ladies of the time.

The superficiality of the ladies of the time and a lack of any depth of feeling in them are ridiculed in the lines in which the domestic pets of the ladies are equated with their husbands. The death of a domestic pet caused as much grief to a lady of fashion as the death of her husband would have caused not even the breaking of a China-vessel in the house had the same effect.

The poet makes ironical references to a lady's love of a coach-and-six, her interest in scandalous books, her desire to be invited to entertainments, and her readily making an appointment with a lover. Some very pungent satire is to be found in the lines which describe the strange shapes in the Cave of Spleen:

> Here sighs ajar, and there a goose pie talks;
> And maids turned bottles, call aloud for corks.

The poet is here making a sarcastic reference to the suppressed sexual desires of women and their unexpressed cravings or sexual gratification. Women's tendency quickly to give way to sorrow and grief is ridiculed in the lines which describe the contents of the bag and of the phial which Umbriel brings from the Cave of Spleen. The contents are sighs, sobs, soft sorrows, melting griefs, and flowing tears.

The moral bankruptcy of the ladies is further ridiculed when Thalestris points out the need for sacrificing everything, even chastity, for the sake of maintaining a good reputation. Virtue might be lost, but not a good name:

Honour forbid ! at whose unrivalled shrine
Ease, pleasure, virtue, all our sex resign.

The same attitude of mind is expressed in the lines in which Belinda declares that she would not have felt so offended if the Baron had stolen any other hair from her but spared that particular lock of her hair:

Oh, hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize
Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these !

The gallants of the time are not spared by Pope. They are the target of mockery which is as sharp and keen as the satire on the ladies. One of the most amusing passages is the one in which the Baron is described as building an altar of love and setting fire to it with his amorous sighs and with tender love letters. The Baron's worship of love here is comparable to Belinda's worship of the cosmetic powers. No less amusing is the satire on gallants like Sir Plume. Sir Plume's affectations are ridiculed with reference to his amber snuff-box and his spotted cane.

The conversation of the ladies and the knights at the court amuses us by its emptiness and shallowness. The talk generally centred round dance-parties, court-visits, and sex-scandals. The pauses in conversation were filled by snuff-taking, fan-swinging, singing, laughing, ogling, etc. The two principal diversions of the time, the game of Ombre and coffee-drinking, have also their share of ridicule. All these ceremonies expose the normal vacuum in which they are performed. Each ceremony highlights a social absurdity because of the extravagant importance that it receives at the cost of serious concerns of life.

Finally, The Rape of the Lock is a comic assault on a society preoccupied with superficialities. It is a commentary on polite society in general, and on fashionable women in particular. It exposes all values, especially trifling and artificial ones. It ridicules the laziness, idleness, frivolities, vanities, follies, shams, shallowness, superficiality, prudery, hypocrisy, false ideas of honour, and excessive interest in self-embellishment of the aristocratic ladies of the eighteenth century. It ridicules also the foppery, amorous tendencies, bravado, snuff-taking, and affectations of the aristocratic gentlemen of the time. Humour, wit, irony, sarcasm, innuendo, persiflage, insinuations are all employed as weapons of attack. An occasional touch of obscenity makes the satire spicy.

The Rape of the Lock : Representative Poem of the Age

An incredible masterpiece, however general in its claim, is the most ordinary result of its time. It is established in the contemporary society and social life and reflects that life is in its pith and totality. It is an extraordinary poem by all cannon of arts and it does all that splendidly. Its center chiefly catches the regular peculiarities of the highborn class of his age.

The Rape of the Lock is a mirror to this sort of society of which Master Petre and Belinda are the delegate figures. Belinda is displayed as amazing beguiling like the sun, and lap-canines were an alternate key part of their lives. She is representative women of the time. What is her life, and how can she use her day? There is not the scarcest flash of earnestness or truthfulness, goodness or glory of human life in any of her words and activities. Belinda is a wonderful woman; she has an assembly of admirers; she is a coquette and a flirt.

At the same time regardless of all their flirtation and the contempt they indicated for their significant others, these women of the court did furtively pine for adoration as Ariel, the watchman sylph, uncovered about Belinda:

'A natural beau prowling at her heart. They furtively harbored desire to get hitched to rulers and dukes, or men holding some high titles. What's more longing for their rich prospects ladies like Belinda rest late and are accustomed to climbing late from their cots.'

At the point when Belinda rises, she is locked in promptly with her can which takes up an expansive piece of her time. The excellence of Belinda and the involved subtle elements of her latrine are all situated hence with inimitable beauty, yet behind such a lot of entrancing depiction, there is an invading feeling of vanity and void.

Their hearts are toy-shops

In Canto III, Pope gives a point by point portrayal of the scene where Belinda's lovely bolt of hair is to be assaulted. There is Hampton Court, the royal residence of the English Queen perfectly arranged on the banks of the stream Thames, where

Britain's statesmen oft the fall foredoom,
Of outside dictators and of fairies at home.

The writer in an extremely unpretentious way parodies the exercises of the royal residence. The Queen's interviews with her priests and her bringing tea with the lights of her administration are compared. The genuine and the paltry have been said in one breath, as though taking insight is as normal and pointless a matter as taking tea. The interests of the court are likewise revealed.

Not women just, however the men of honor of the keen set are similarly frivolous. Master Petre and his colleagues are the delegates of the trendy society of the time. They are all unmoving, vacant minded society, and appear to have nothing else to do yet making adoration to or playing with women. The fight between the women and men of honor shows void and vanity of their lives. They visit clubs and espresso houses, and there they enjoy unfilled outrageous talks. "At each expression a notoriety passes on".

Pope depicts the card-diversion in point of interest, on the grounds that card-recreations appeared to involve a vital place in the everyday exercises of in vogue women and refined men of the period.

Sir plume is an alternate fashionable man of his word, surpassing all others in his vanity and utter void. When he is asked for by his woman love Thalestris to convince Lord Petre to surrender the valuable hairs of Belinda, he articulates words which are unsurpassed in their emptiness.

Sir plume is an alternate fashionable man of his word, surpassing all others in his vanity and utter void. When he is asked for by his woman love Thalestris to convince Lord Petre to surrender the valuable hairs of Belinda, he articulates words which are unsurpassed in their emptiness.

Conclusion: Pope completely bears the witticism of its age. In his origination of subject and determination of the tile, Pope shows his incredible wit. This was the sort of life headed by the in vogue individuals of the privileged societies in the time of Pope, and Pope has depicted it in dazzling colors from one perspective and with scorching parody on the other. While it demonstrates the effortlessness and interest of Belinda's latrine, he shows the vanity and uselessness of everything. There is nothing profound or genuine in the lives and exercises of the stylish individuals, all is vanity and void and this Pope has uncovered with symbolization and splendor. The Rape of the Lock reflects the fake age with all its outward quality and internal vacancy. It the mirror of a specific part of life in the period of Pope. It was, says, Lowell, a mirror in a drawing room, however it gave back a dependable picture of society.

Supernatural Machinery in "The Rape of the Lock"

Alexander Pope explains that "machinery" is a term invented by the critics to signify the part which deities, angels, or demons play in a poem. He goes on to say that the machinery in his poem is based on the Rosicrucian doctrine of spirits. According to this doctrine the four elements are inhabited by sylphs, nymphs, gnomes, and salamanders. The sylphs, whose habitation is in the air, are supposed to be the best-conditioned creatures imaginable.

Pope tells us in the poem that beautiful women return, after their death, to the elements from which they were derived. Violent tempered women become salamanders or spirits of the fire. Women of gentle and pleasing disposition pass into nymphs or water-spirits. Prudish (Narrow-minded) women become gnomes or earth-spirits. Light-hearted coquettes are changed into sylphs or spirits of the air. Pope attributes to the mischievous influence of the gnomes many unguarded follies of the female sex which he holds up to ridicule.

The first and perhaps the foremost occupation of the sylphs is the protection of fair and chaste ladies who reject the male sex. It is they who guard and save the chastity of maidens who are on the point of yielding to their lovers. They save these maidens from falling victims to the allurements of "treacherous friends" and dashing young men whose music softens their minds and dancing inflames their passions. The gnomes fill the minds of proud maidens with foolish ideas which make them indulge in vain dreams of being married to lords and peers. These gnomes teach young coquettes to ogle and pretend blushing at the sight of fashionable young men who cause their hearts to flutter.

It is the sylphs, however, who safely guide the maidens through all dangers. Whenever a maiden is about to yield to the seduction of a particular young man, another who is more attractive and tempting appears on the scene and the fashionable maiden at once transfers her favour to the new comer. This may be called fickleness in women but it is all contrived by the sylphs.

In most of the famous epics gods and angels play a vital role in the action of the poems thus showing that the human world is not independent or even adequate and that supernatural powers have an important bearing on this world. Pope thought that his mock-epic would be incomplete without a parody of this established practice of epic poets in introducing machinery. The machinery of his poem comprises the sylphs led by Ariel (named after Shakespeare's immortal creation in The Tempest).

Ariel tells us in the poem that to him and his followers has been assigned the humble but pleasant duty of serving fashionable young ladies. The functions of these sylphs are described humorously and include saving the powder from being blown off from the cheeks of ladies, preventing scents from evaporating, preparing cosmetics, teaching the ladies to blush and to put on enchanting airs, suggesting new ideas about dress.

The sylphs are "light" by any heroic standards. They feel scared when a crisis approaches. Yet they are in every detail Belinda's intimates and counsellors. They explain the various complicated conventions and anxieties that make up Belinda's day.

The sylphs The Rape of the Lock poem are both a mirror and mock-apotheosis of customs and conventions of the society of the time. Belinda is told in a dream that sylphs guide and protect her through the dangers of life. Ariel's account of the predicament of the "tender mind" in a circle of rakes reduces his use of noble words such as "innocent", "honour", and "purity" to the level of a muddle and a sham. He is there, he tells her, to protect her purity according to sylphic theology. Defended by sylphs, the "melting maids" are safe, for what we call "honour" is really no more than Providence. Reassuring Belinda in this way, Ariel is in effect undermining her moral position, taking away with one hand the credit he gives with the other. He explains how a woman's defence is achieved. A maid would fall to Florio if Damon were not at hand to divert her attention, and if, an old folly were not expelled by a new. A maid "shifts the moving toy-shop of her heart" with her varying vanities. It is the sylphs that make her do that.

The machines are present at every crucial situation in the play. The sylphs are present in the course of Belinda's journey by boat to Hampton Court. They have been warned by Ariel to remain alert and vigilant, fifty of them having been deputed to take charge of Belinda's petticoat. They are in attendance on Belinda when she plays Ombre. They hover around her when she sips coffee. And they withdraw only when Ariel sees "an earthly lover lurking at her heart". A gnome, called Umbriel, goes to the Cave of Spleen and returns with a bag full of sighs, sobs, screams, and outbursts of anger, and a phial filled with fainting fits, gentle sorrows, soft griefs, etc.—all of which are released over Belinda. And the sylphs are present to witness the flight of Belinda's lock of hair to the sky. In short, the machinery of the poem is constantly kept in the reader's view, to the very last.

The use of machinery serves various other purposes in the poem. It imparts qualities of splendour and wonder to the actors and the actions in the story. Like Homer's gods, Pope's sylphs move easily in and out of the lower world; they surprise without offending our sense of the probable; and they give to ordinary human impulses a sensuous or concrete form. What they really stand for feminine honour, flirtation, courtship, the necessary rivalry of man and woman—are seen in its essence, and a human impulse seen in its essence is always beautiful.

These "light militia of the lower sky" increase dramatic suspense, and therefore story depth, since they foreknow and warn of the central disaster. They reflect the implied belief that humanity and its sensible world do not exhaust the total of a comprehensive statement. They are also spirits of the dead, acting as guardian angels to the living. The sylphan machinery is exquisite, but it must also be recognized as demonic. In tempting Belinda to transcend the flesh-and-blood world by lifelong chastity, Ariel offers her a Satanic substitute for Christianity.

The Rape of the Lock as a Mock Epic Poem

The epic is long a narrative poem of supposed divine inspiration. It treats a subject of great and momentous importance for mankind. The characters of the story are partly human and partly divine. The language and style, in which the incidents are related, are full of elevation and dignity. Mock-epic belongs to the class of literature called "burlesque". A burlesque is a parody on a large scale, in which not a single poem, but a whole type of style of literature is parodied, the language and thought proper to a serious theme reproduced in setting forth something ridiculous or trivial. In the Rape of the Lock all the epic traditions are parodied.

"The Rape of the Lock" opens with the proposition of the subject matter and Pope's invocation to the Muses to seek divine inspiration to compose the literary art. Such a grand treatment of a trivial subject matter like the clipping of the lock of Belinda provokes laughter when the poet says:

"I sing – this verse to Caryll, Muse! Is due:
This, ev'n Belinda may vouchsafe to view:"

Instead of grand passions and great fights between heroes in which the immortals take part, we have as the theme of The Rape of the Lock a petty amorous quarrel assisted by the spirits of the air. The epic portrays an age round the personality of a god or a semi-god, and its characters are heroes. The Rape of the Lock, on the other hand, gives us a picture of a fashionable society. The central figure in that picture is a pretty society girl, and the other characters are a rash youth, a foolish dandy and a few frivolous women. Instead of deep and genuine passions as found in ancient epics, we come across a succession of mock passions in The Rape of the Lock.

The action of The Rape of the Lock turns on a trivial incident—the cutting off a lock of hair from a lady's head. Such a thing had taken place in reality. One lord Petre cut off a lock of hair from the head of Lady Arabella Fermor. There was a quarrel between the two families, and Pope was requested to make a jest of the incident, and 'laugh them together'. This was the occasion of the composition of the poem. Pope did give to the world a fine work of wit—the best mock-heroic poem in the English language, but we do not know whether the families were reconciled.

The theme of the poem is suggested in the invocation, as in an epic poem, but the theme is ridiculously trivial, in comparison with the grand theme of an epic. The action opens with a mock-heroic manner with the awakening of Belinda, the heroine of the poem. Belinda is the very goddess of beauty, and the luster of her eyes surpasses that of the sun, who peeped timorously through the white curtains in Belinda's room:

"Sol through white curtains shot a timorous ray,
And opened those eyes that must eclipse the day."

The whole structure of The Rape of the Lock is cast in the epic mood, but it could not be a serious epic because the incident is trivial—so we have the mock-heroic or heroi-comical poem. The poem is divided into Cantos like an epic poem, and there are ironic parallels to the main Incidents of the epic. The poem begins with an invocation in epic tradition:

"Say, what strange motive, Goddness! could compel
A well-bred lord to assault a gentle belle?"

As in epics, in The Rape of the Lock, too, divine beings are portrayed. Belinda is in the divine care of the sylphs:

"Fairest of mortals, thou distinguished 'care,

Of thousand bright inhabitants of air".

But then the sylphs are fragile, airy beings and they are helpless before the caprices of men. Despite all their concern for Belinda, her beautiful lock of hair is raped by the naughty Baron. There is the mischievous gnome who, like Milton's Satan, is intent upon making Belinda miserable and thereby all her admirers. The gnome addresses the wayward Queen who rules the sex from fifteen to fifty, thus:

"Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin,
That single act gives half the world the spleen."

The epic always uses the supernatural element. In The Iliad there are gods and goddesses; in The Rape of the Lock, there are the sylphs and gnomes. These aerial spirits are small and insignificant things, and are, therefore, exactly in keeping with the triviality of the theme. They guard the person of the heroine and when there is a fight between the followers of Belinda and those of the Baron; they take part in the fight, like the gods and goddesses in the Trojan War:

"Propped on their bodkin spears, the spirits survey,
The growing combat or assist the fray."

An epic poem must contain some episodes also. In keeping with this practice Pope has introduced the episode of the game of Ombre which is described in great detail. There is also the hazardous journey of Umbriel to the Cave of Spleen. Then there is the battle between the lords and ladies just like the battles in epic poetry. But in the true mock-heroic style this battle is fought with fans and snuff instead of with swords and spears.

There are single combats also between Belinda and the Baron and between Clarissa and Sir Plume. Belinda's toilet is another engaging account in which Pope has attributed in a perfect mock-heroic manner, the solemnity of a religious observance to the luxurious toilet of a lady of fashion and frivolity. Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux, are all brought to the same table and the slight and the series are all strangely synthesized.

The Rape of the Lock is a rare instance in which the slight theme is given an exalted treatment for satirical purposes. All through the poem, a pose of importance is given to all that is thoroughly unimportant and insignificant and practically meaningless and farcical. The very conception of writing an epic on the rape of a lock of hair is funny and bears testimony to the poet's effort to make the little great and the great little.

In The Rape of the Lock the balance between the concealed irony and the assumed gravity is nicely trimmed: the little is made great and the great made little. It is the triumph of insignificance, the apotheosis of foppery and folly, the perfection of mock heroic.

Rape of the Lock - Significance of Cave of Spleen

Spleen was the Augustan name what Elizabethan described as melancholy. It is less of a disease than a fashionable affectation. Fashionable ladies, poets, and playwrights pretend to suffer from it so as to give an impression that the victims are serious thinkers of creative writers. Pope exalts Spleen to the level of Goddess and cave of Spleen to the level of underworld and personifies her as the Queen of underworld. This suits his scheme to mock the epic conventions systematically because the serious epics like “Illiad” and “Aenied” show heroes taking a voyage to the underworld. In mockery of this convention, however, Pope packs a lot of social criticism, especially the criticism of fashionable vanities and affectations of the fashionable women.

Sylphs were in attendance to Belinda when she plays Ombre. They hover around her when she sips coffee. They withdraw when Ariel sees "an earthly lover lurking at her heart". A gnome, called 'Umbriel' holds the place of Ariel. After the rape of the lock of Belinda, Umbriel wanted to inflict her with Spleen. So he took a journey to the underworld to the cave of spleen.

It is reported that the Queen of Spleen as a fickle and eccentric goddess holds full control over the fashionable ladies ranging from fifteen to fifty. She, the Goddess of Spleen is the aspiration behind the affectation of melancholy as well as the pretension to the poetry by the female sex.

The effect of Spleen on the women varies according to their temperament. While some consults the physician for their treatments. Some begin to write scandalous plays and those who are proud give them an air and try to delay their visit as to show their importance.

While speaking of the cave of Spleen, Pope gives a vivid picture of the fantastic vision to which the men and women plagued with spleen are exposed to. At the moment we see flaming devils and snakes erected on their coils, lustrous ghosts, opening sepulchers and red fires and the other moment we visualizes the lakes of liquid gold, scenes of paradise, transparent places and angles coming to solve the difficulties in human life. Thus the description of the cave of Spleen is highly symbolic and conveys the accurate picture of the people suffering from Spleen.

Moreover, Pope points out the illusion from which morbidly melancholic people suffer. Such people are often plagued with fantastic ideas or visions and often imagine themselves transformed into various objects.

Then, there are two hand maidens who wait upon the Goddess of Spleen, are Ill-Nature and Affectation. Apparently, it is seemed that Pope has delineated the pictures of two hand-maidens just to emphasize the splendour of Goddess of Spleen. But since Spleen, Ill-Nature and Affectation are the typical feminine vices in Pope's time, therefore, the delineation of their portraits provide the vivid picture of the fashionable women who affected so many things.

Ill-Nature is presented as an ugly, wrinkled and decayed woman who pretends to be virtuous and pious but essentially a vicious creature who takes delight in murdering reputations of the other people. The black and white lines of her dress presents the contrast between her pretension and reality – the white colour suggests purity, innocence and religiosity and the black colour suggest malice, envy and scorn. In fact, Pope has satirized the double role of the woman's nature of his times that pretends to be pious and virtuous just to maintain their good reputation i.e. the woman of his age gives importance to their reputation than their virtues. In other words they are hypocrite.

The, Pope delineates the portrait of the Affectation, the second hand maiden of the Goddess of Spleen. Affectation is personified as an old woman who is beautiful, young and tender though she is fairly old. Delineation of the portrait of the Affectation provides a vivid picture of the fashionable woman. It includes a sharp, ironical commentary on the vanity, frivolity and hypocrisy of fashionable women.

> There Affectation, with a sickly mien,
> Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen,
> Practiced to lisp, and hang the head aside,

Faints into airs, and languishes with pride,
On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe,
Wrapt in a gown, for sickness, and for show.
The fair ones feel such maladies as these,
When each new night-dress gives a new disease.

Then, the bag, which the Goddess of Spleen gives to gnome, Umbriel, is the clever mimicry of the bag in which Ulysses entrapped the winds. The bag contains all the violent and noisy emotions while the Phial contains the noisiest sort of sufferings. This bag is indicative of female weaknesses. Thus, Pope seems to imply that the women are capable of all sorts of antics to demonstrate their sufferings.

To sum up, the visit to the cave of Spleen is introduced for the sake of mock-heroic effect, which gives an opportunity to the poet to satirize the evil nature and the affectations of ladies and gentlemen of his society. Furthermore, it also serves the action of the poem.

Technique & Plot-Construction in "The Rape of the Lock"

The Rape of the Lock has greatly been admired for its development of the theme and its pattern of construction. The successive scenes, says a critic, are given with so firm and a clear touch—there is such a sense of form—that it is impossible not to recognise a consummate artistic power. The poem has the merit that belongs to any work of art which expresses in the most finished form the sentiments and characteristics of a particular class of society. It contains the truest and liveliest picture of eighteenth century high society. Its subject is of a more elegant nature, as well as more artfully conducted, than that of any other mock-epic poem.

The poem opens judiciously with the guardian-sylph warning Belinda against some unknown, imminent danger. The account which Ariel gives of the nature and activities of these inhabitants of the air, namely, the sylphs, is exquisitely fancied. Several strokes of satire have been inserted into this account with great delicacy. The transformation of women of different tempers into different kinds of spirits has a great appeal. The description of the toilet, which follows, is given in magnificent terms. Belinda's dressing is painted in as pompous a manner as Achilles arming. Canto 1 ends with a circumstance artfully contrived to keep this beautiful machinery in the reader's eye: "The busy sylphs surround their darling care", etc.

The mention of the lock of hair, on which the poem turns, is rightly reserved for the second Canto. The sacrifice of the Baron, to implore success for his undertaking, is another example of Pope's judgment in heightening the subject. The succeeding scene of sailing upon the Thames is most gay and delightful. The machinery is again introduced here, and with much propriety. Ariel summons his denizens of the air who are painted with a rich exuberance of fancy. A different sylph has charge of each part of Belinda's dress. But as many as fifty sylphs are deputed to guard Belinda's petticoat which, though a "seven-fold fence," has often been known "to fail". The celebrated raillery of Addison on the hoop-petticoat has nothing equal to Pope's description of the difficulty of guarding a part of dress of such high consequence: "Oft have we known that seven-fold fence to fail."

Pope shows great delicacy in his satire when he employs, with the ; utmost judgment and elegance, all the implements and instruments of the toilet as means of punishment to those spirits who shall be careless of their duties—of punishment such as sylphs alone could undergo. If Virgil has earned such high commendation for exalting his bees, by the majesty and magnificence of his diction, Pope deserves equal praise for the pomp and luster of his language on so trivial a subject.

The same mastery of language appears in the lively and elegant description of the game of Ombre in the third Canto. Here, again, Pope artfully introduces his machinery:

Soon as she spreads her hand, the aerial guard Descend, and sit on each important card. The majesty, with which the kings of spades and clubs, and the knaves of diamonds and clubs are spoken of, is very amusing to the imagination; and the whole game is conducted with great art and judgment. It is finely contrived that Belinda should be victorious, as the victory represents a change of fortune in the dreadful loss she was speedily to undergo, and gives occasion to the poet to introduce a moral reflection from Virgil, which adds to the pleasantry of the story:

> O thoughtless mortals: ever blind to fate,
> Too soon dejected, and too soon elate.

To this scene succeeds a coffee-table. It is doubtless as hard to make a coffee-pot shine in poetry as a plough; yet Pope has succeeded in giving elegance to so familiar an object. The guardian spirits are again active, and importantly employed. But nothing can excel their behaviour, and their wakeful solicitude for Belinda, when the danger grows more imminent, and the catastrophe approaches: "Swift to the lock a thousand sprites repair". The methods by which they try to preserve her from the intended mischief are such as could only be executed by sylphs. Still further to heighten the piece and to preserve the characters of the machines to the last, one of the sylphs intervening to protect the lock is cut into two by Fate with its shears. The line: "But airy substance soon unites again" is an admirable parody on that passage of Milton, which describes Satan wounded.

The parodies are some of the most exquisite parts of this poem. The introduction of parodies on serious and solemn passages of Homer and Virgil give much life and spirit to mock-epic poetry. The parodies of the speech of Sarpedon in Homer, and of the description of Achille's sceptre, together with the scales of Jupiter from Homer and Virgil are judiciously introduced in their several places. The mind of the reader is engaged by novelty, when it so unexpectedly finds a thought or object it had been accustomed to survey in another form, suddenly arrayed in a ridiculous garb. A mixture of ridiculous and comic images, with serious and important ones, add also no small beauty to this kind of poetry, as in the passage where real and imaginary misfortunes are coupled together with reference to captured kings, frustrated lovers, aged ladies, fierce dictators, and the moon-goddess.

In the same Canto (IV), the Cave of Spleen, the pictures of the attendants, Ill-nature and Affectation, the effects of the vapour that hangs over the palace of Spleen, the imaginary diseases she occasions, the speech of Umbriel to this malignant deity, the phial of female sorrows, the breaking of the phial with its direful effects, and the speech of the disconsolate Belinda—all these circumstances are poetically imagined, and are far superior to any of Boileaii and Garth. How natural it is for Belinda in her dismal and solitary situation to wish to be taken to some place where gilt chariots are never seen, where nobody plays Ombre, and where nobody tastes bohea (black tea). Nothing is more common for poets than to introduce omens as preceding some important and dreadful event. Pope enumerates, with exquisite satire, the alarming prodigies which occur before the rape of Belinda's lock. The direfulness of the impending evil is aggravated by the muteness of Poll, and the unkindness of Shock.

The chief subject of the final Canto is the battle that ensues, and the efforts of the ladies to recover the hair. The battle is described, as it ought to be, in very lofty and pompous terms. The weapons used are the most proper imaginable in a mock epic—the lightning of the ladies' eyes, intolerable frowns, a pinch of snuff, and a bodkin. The machinery is not forgotten. Triumphant Umbriel claps his glad wings on viewing the fight. When the snuff is flung at the Baron, the gnomes carry it directly to the Baron's nose.

Then comes the grand catastrophe of the poem. The invaluable lock, which is so eagerly sought, is lost beyond recovery. And here the poet makes a judicious use of that famous fiction of Ariosto, that all things lost on earth are treasured on the moon. The denouement of this is well-conducted. What has become of this important lock of hair ? It is made a constellation with that of Berenice. As it rises to heaven, the sylphs behold it in its flight and feel pleased with its progress through the skies. The machinery of the poem is constantly kept in the readers view, to the very last. Even when the lock is transformed into a constellation, the sylphs, who had so carefully guarded it, are here once again artfully mentioned, as finally rejoicing in its honourable transformation.

John Dennis was, however, not much impressed by the construction of this poem. According to him, the machinery of the poem renders the action extravagant, absurd and incredible instead of making it wonderful and delightful. The machines, he says, do not in the least influence that action; they neither prevent the danger of Belinda, nor promote it, nor retard it, unless perhaps for one moment, which is ridiculous. There is no opposition of the machines to one another in the poem. Umbriel, the gnome, is not introduced till the action is over, and till Ariel and the spirits under him have quitted Belinda.

Dennis is of the view that there is no such thing as the fable or characters in the poem. The sentiments, according to him, are both trivial and extravagant. Dennis considers Umbriel's journey to the Cave of Spleen to be irrelevant: "How absurd was it then for this to take a journey down to the central earth, for no other purpose than to give Belinda the spleen, whom he left and found in the height of it."

The Character of Belinda in "The Rape of the Lock"

There are several aspects of the personality of Belinda as portrayed by Pope in The Rape of the Lock. She is a coquette, an injured innocent, a sweet charmer, a society belle, a rival of the sun, and a murderer of millions. She has, indeed, a Cleopatra-like variety.

The primary quality of Belinda is spiritual shallowness and an incapacity for moral awareness. Ariel acquaints us with her flirtatious character when he says that it is not known whether the beautiful Belinda will allow her chastity to be violated, or some delicate China-jar will break; whether she will stain her honour or her new brocade; whether she will lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball. The first possibility in each of these pairs of calamities shows that Belinda is not likely to exercise sufficient caution in protecting her maidenly purity. These lines show how easily a lady like Belinda might lose her chastity in a world of womanisers and how irreparably.

She has transformed all spiritual exercises and emblems into a coquette's self-display and self-adoration. For instance, she wears a sparkling cross which is a religious symbol but which is put by her to the uses of ornamentation. For all her professed purity, Belinda is found to be secretly in love with Baron. There consists her "fall". When the sylphs warn her of the approaching scissors and the danger to her hair, she seems to be indifferent to the warning. A thousand spirits of the air rush to her to guard her lock. A thousand wings, by turns, blow back her hair. Thrice the sylphs jerk the diamond in her ear; thrice she looks back; and thrice the foe draws near. Her behaviour leads Ariel to make the surprising discovery that, in spite of all her pretence, she is amorously inclined toward a gallant:

Sudden he viewed, in spite of all her art,
An earthly lover lurking at her heart.

When Baron has clipped her lock, Belinda's reaction is described in a beautiful mocking vein.

Then flashed the living lightning from her eyes,
And screams of horror rend the affrighted skies.

We see Belinda as a true Fury. While lamenting the loss of her lock, she deplores the fact that she was attracted by the pleasures of court-life. She says that it would have been better if she had stayed and said her prayers at home instead of roaming with youthful lords. She recalls the omens which she witnessed in the morning but which she ignored. She would not have felt so hurt if, instead of the curl which lent such glory to her head, some other hair had been stolen by the Baron.

Belinda behaves like a spoilt child. At the outset we learn that she is a lazy woman who continues to sleep till the hour of twelve in the day and who, on waking up, at that hour, falls asleep again, to be awakened ultimately by the licking, tongue of her pet dog. When she finally rises from bed, she goes through a love-letter which is waiting for her and makes her forget the vision that she has seen. Soon she gets busy with her toilet. She regards her toilet as a religious ceremony to be scrupulously gone through. She begins her toilet with a prayer to the "cosmetic powers". Apart from her laziness and her excessive preoccupation with her toilet (including the pains that she takes to curl her hair), she has a thirst for fame which leads her to engage herself in an encounter with two adventurous knights at the game of Ombre. Having won a victory at Ombre, she feels jubilant and her exultant shouting fills the sky. She undoubtedly possesses a superb skill in playing the game of Ombre, but the manner in which she rejoices over her victory shows not only her vanity and superficiality but a childish temperament. The poet appropriately points out the shallowness of human beings in becoming too quickly depressed and too quickly joyous. Belinda does not realise that this day of victory would soon be converted into a day of disgrace for her, though the disgrace would be as trivial as the victory.

Belinda's outbursts, when a lock of her hair has been clipped, also show her as a spoiled child. A trivial incident fills her with an uncontrollable rage. She utters "louder shrieks" than those uttered by women who have lost their husbands or their lap dogs. She experiences greater resentment and anger over the "rape" of her hair than youthful kings who are captured alive in battle, scornful old maids who have lost their charms, passionate lovers, who have been deprived of the pleasures of love, and even aged ladies whose desire to be kissed has been frustrated. Later, when Umbriel pours over Belinda the contents of the bag which he has brought from the Cave of Spleen, Belinda begins to burn with an inhuman wrath. When Umbriel breaks the bottle, Belinda feels grief-stricken. The sorrowful head sinks on her breast, and she begins to heave sighs. She now recalls with deep distress on the kind of life she has lived.

Pope's attitude to Belinda is very mixed and complicated: mocking and yet tender, admiring and yet critical. The paradoxical nature of Pope's attitude is intimately related to the paradox of Belinda's situation. If Belinda is to find her role of woman, she must lose the role of a virgin, and the more graceful her acceptance of loss the greater the victory she achieves through it. Because Pope is dealing with this paradox, his attitude must be mixed and complicated.

There is no doubt that Belinda undergoes a "fall", at least in the eyes of Ariel. Yet this fall is only a fall from the self-love. It is merely a fall into a more natural human condition and best regarded, perhaps, as a kind of fortunate fall: Belinda simply falls in love, and thus a situation is created whereby she can escape from the meaningless virginity and honour represented by the sylphs.

"The Rape of the Lock" : Relationship between Literature and Society

The Rape of the Lock is a poem in which Alexander Pope shows himself emphatically as the spokesman of his age. This poem pictures the artificial tone of the age and the frivolous aspect of femininity. "It is the epic of trifling’s; a page torn from the petty, pleasure-seeking life of fashionable beauty. In short, the veritable apotheosis in literary guise of scent patches and powder." We see in this poem the elegance and the emptiness, the meanness and the vanity, the jealousies, treacheries and intrigues of the social life of the aristocracy of the eighteenth century.

At the very outset we become acquainted with the idleness, late-rising, and fondness for domestic pets of the aristocratic ladies of the time. Belinda wakes up at the hour of twelve and then falls asleep again. We also become acquainted in the very beginning of the poem with the superficiality of the ladies who loved gilded chariots, and affected a love of the game of Ombre. Their ambition to marry peers and dukes, or men holding other high titles, is indicated, too, in the opening Canto:

> Then gay ideas crowd the vacant brain,
> While peers and dukes, and all their sweeping train....

The poem brings out the coquetry, the art, the artifice, and the “varying vanities” of the ladies of the time. These ladies learnt early in their life how to roll their eyes and to blush in an intriguing manner. Their hearts were like toy-shops which moved from one gallant to another:

> With varying vanities, from every part,
> They shift the moving toy-shop of their heart.

One gallant could drive put another gallant, and one coach could drive out another coach. "Levity" was the hallmark of these women. Their manners and behaviour were artificial and affected. They knew the art to lisp, to hang their heads aside, to faint into airs, and to languish with pride. They used to sink on their rich quilts and pretend sickness so that young gallant men should come to inquire after their health and in this way also see the costly gowns which they were wearing.

The women of the time felt glad to receive love-letters. When Belinda gets up from her bed her eyes first open on a love-letter. Another of the vanities of these ladies was to keep domestic pets such as dogs and parrots. Belinda has her Shock and her Poll. Among the ill-omens that Belinda recalls after losing a lock of her hair is the indifference of her two domestic pets: "Nay, Poll sat mute, and Shock was most unkind!"

Aristocratic ladies treated toilet as their chief concern. One important passage in The Rape of the Lock describes Belinda at her dressing-table. Before commencing her toilet operation, she offers a prayer to the "cosmetic powers". At her dressing-table are "the various offerings of the world"— India's glowing gems, Arabia's perfumes, speckled and white combs, files of pins, "puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux." Later in the poem, we are told how these ladies "take such constant care to prepare the bodkin, comb and essence!" They take special pains to curl their hair; they bind their locks in paper durance; and they strain their tender heads with fillets.

The ladies lose their tempers over trifles. Screams of horror from Belinda rend the affrighted skies, and a "living lightning" flashes from her eyes. Thalestris is described as the "fierce virago". The ladies in the poem are depicted as very aggressive, and it is they who start the battle. Women have been jealous of one another from time immemorial. Clarissa stealthily hands over a pair of scissors to Baron in order to assist him in his wicked design. It is in all probability Clarissa's jealousy of Belinda's beauty, and fame that prompts her to offer this assistance to Baron.

The ladies have no moral scruples. "Honour" is a word with little meaning for them; and "reputation" is more important to them than honour. The loss of "honour" does not matter if "reputation" is not lost. Several passages in the poem reveal the moral disarray of their lives. A lady's missing a dance-party is as serious a matter as her forgetting her prayers. A lady's losing her necklace is as serious as losing her heart. The death of a lap-dog or the breaking of a rich China-vessel is as serious a matter to the lady as the death of her husband. There is a complete confusion of moral values in their minds. Belinda herself has no real sense of feminine virtue or honour. She is in love with Baron, and for this reason Ariel gives her up when he sees "an earthly lover lurking at her heart". Her lament over the loss of a lock of her hair is sheer hypocrisy. Besides, she feels unhappy because the loss of this particular lock of hair was vital to her charm. She would not have been much hurt if Baron had stolen any other hair:

> Oh, hadst thou, cruel, been content to seize
> Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these !

The aristocratic young men of the time were, like the ladies, lacking in any serious purpose or morality. Florio and Damon are representatives of those gallants and fops who vie with one another to capture the hearts of the ladies. There is a keen competition among them to win feminine favours. Wigs strive with wigs, and sword-knots strive with sword-knots. The attitude of these fops to love is amusingly described in the manner in which Baron tries to pacify heaven in order to win Belinda's heart. Baron builds an altar to Love. This altar consists of twelve vast French romances, three garters, and half a pair of gloves and all the trophies of his former loves. He lights a fire with the tender love-letters that he has received, and breathes three amorous sighs to raise the fire.

The life of the fops is as empty and shallow as the life of the ladies. This is emphasized by the role played by the empty-headed Sir Plume with bit "unthinking face". He is proud of his "amber snuff-box" and "the nice conduct of a clouded cane". He can hardly speak a dozen words without uttering half a dozen oaths. The manner in which a "beau" or a "witling" perishes in the battle of the sexes shows the same thing . "One died in metaphor, and one in song." Taking snuff and wearing wigs were the foremost fashions among the men of that time.

Lastly, we are given a satirical picture of judges, jury men, and merchants. The judges are in a hurry to sign the judgment and the jury-men are in a hurry to pronounce a verdict of-"guilty" because they want to get back home for dinner. The merchants spend feverish hours at the Exchange. Other aspects of the life of the time which are mentioned in an amusing manner are the wits of heroes and of beaux, courtiers' promises, cages for gnats, chains to yoke a flea, dried butterflies, and heavy books of casuistry (excuse).

The Rape of the Lock : Treatment of Women

The Rape of the Lock has rightly been described as a representation of the petty pleasure-seeking life of a fashionable beauty. The poem is a satire on beautiful aristocratic women of the eighteenth century whose lives centred round petty interests and the quest of shallow pleasures. The principal target of attack is Belinda, a fashionable beautiful lady of the upper classes of the eighteenth-century English society. There can be no doubt about the beauty of this lady. Early in the poem, she is compared to the sun.

She wears a sparkling cross which even Jews and infidels would like to kiss. If she has any faults," they would be hidden by her graceful ease and her sweetness of temper. Her care-free disposition is expressed thus: "Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay." She nourishes two locks of hair which greatly enhance the already irresistible charm of this lady. Indeed, the poet invests her almost with the character of a divinity. At one point the praise of her attractions may be a mere mask for Pope's satiric attack on her personality as a coquette; at another it is praise which no irony can fully undermine. Nor can there be any doubt that she belongs to the fashionable world.

But, although Belinda is a woman of superb beauty and charm, the poet fully reveals to us her petty, pleasure-seeking nature. She suffers from all the vanities, follies, and lack of moral scruple of the aristocratic ladies of the time. She is a lazy woman who continues to sleep till the hour of twelve in the day and who, on waking up at that hour, falls asleep again, to be wakened subsequently by the licking tongue of her pet dog, Shock. When she does ultimately get up from bed, she goes through a love-letter which is waiting for her and which makes her forget the dream that she has seen. Next, she gets ready for her toilet. Thus we see that her day begins at noon, and that too when she is awakened by her lap-dog's licking her face. Keeping pets, encouraging and receiving love-letters, and self-embellishment were some of the principal interests of Belinda and the whole class of the society to which she belonged.

Wearing a white robe, the beautiful Belinda now addresses a prayer to the "cosmetic powers". Then she looks at her heavenly reflection in the mirror, and naturally feels pleased by her beauty. By her side stands Betty to assist her in the sacred ceremony of toilet. Numerous caskets are opened and they reveal their precious contents brought from different countries of the world. This description fully exposes Belinda's vanity and her love of fashion. But, of course, these were the characteristics of all aristocratic ladies of the eighteenth century. Nor have aristocratic women shed these characteristics in our times.

Belinda's emergence from her house is compared to the rising of the sun. The eyes of everyone are fixed on her because of her superior charm. She gives her smiles to everybody but shows no special favour to anyone. Men who look at her are captured by her locks of hair with their bright ringlets which embellish her ivory-white neck. The adventurous Baron, Lord Petre, is prepared to use force or fraud to rob her of these locks. The whole of this description shows Belinda as the leading light of the fashionable world and as a woman whose chief desire is to win admiration. The manner in which Ariel describes the nature of the calamity which might befall Belinda also shows her superficial nature and her lack of moral scruple. It is not known, says Ariel, whether she will allow her chastity to be violated, or some delicate China-jar will crack; whether she will stain her honour, or her new brocade; whether she will forget her prayers, or miss a masked ball; whether she will lose her heart or her necklace; or whether Heaven has decreed that Shock must fall.

The coach carrying Belinda and her party takes them to Hampton Court. The gallant young men and the beautiful young ladies come here to enjoy the pleasures of the royal court. Their conversation covers a wide range of trivialities, much of it attacking the moral character of various persons: "At every word a reputation dies." We next become acquainted with Belinda's thirst for fame which leads her to engage herself in an encounter with two adventurous Knights at the game of Ombre. Her breast expands with the pleasure of an anticipated victory in this contest. Having won, she feels jubilant and her exultant shouting fills the sky. She undoubtedly shows a splendid skill in playing the game of Ombre, but the manner in which she gloats over her victory shows not only her vanity but superficiality of mind. After the game of Ombre, Belinda participates in the ceremony of coffee-drinking. Toilet, gossip, Ombre, and coffee drinking— these occupy much of Belinda's time in the day. She does not seem to have any intellectual interests whatever.

For all her professed purity, Belinda is found to be secretly in love with Baron. When Ariel finds "an earthly lover lurking at her heart", he feels amazed and retires from the scene with a sigh. Ariel realises that he can no longer protect her, because spirits like him can protect only maidens who have pure minds and who have no room in their hearts for earthly lovers. Baron then cuts off a lock of Belinda's hair. Another side of Belinda's personality is exposed. She grows furious. While lamenting the loss of her lock, she deplores the fact that she was so attracted by the pleasures of the court-life. She recalls the omens which she witnessed in the morning and which she ignored. Thrice from her trembling hand the patch-box fell; the China-vessels shook without wind; Poll sat mute, and Shock was most unkind. Not only is the cause of Belinda's lament trivial, but the very lament is hypocritical. She would not have felt so hurt if, instead of the curl which lent such glory to her head, some other hair had been stolen by the Baron.

The primary quality of Belinda is spiritual shallowness and an incapacity for moral awareness. She has transformed all spiritual exercises and emblems into a coquette's self-display and self-adoration. Even the Cross, which is a religious symbol, is used as an ornament. And she does all this with a frivolous heedlessness. The part or rather parts, which Belinda plays in the poem, are at once contemptible, ridiculous, endearing, precarious, poignant, and petty. It is difficult even to believe that, in spite of all her attractions, she is a true lady. If she were, she would not act as she does over the clipping of her lock or exercise her spleen to such a vigorous degree. She lacks the knowledge of the common fate of coquettes like herself. Even so, her reaction to the rape is, from the point of view of her society, perfectly natural. Baron's act is a rude breach of the rules of courtship. She is faced now with the necessity of making a much more serious and deliberate decision. Her immediate response had been marked by prudery, hypocrisy, and affectation.

In spite of the accessory elements pointed out above, the fact remains that the poem is chiefly and largely the picture of the life of a petty-minded, pleasure seeking fashionable beauty.

"The Rape of the Lock" as a source of perpetual delight

There is no finer gem than The Rape of the Lock in all the lighter treasures of English fancy. Compared with any other mock-heroic poem in the English language, it shines in pure supremacy for elegance, completeness, point, and playfulness. It diverts us by its mimicry of greatness, and astonishes by the beauty of its parts, and the fairy brightness of its ornaments. It is a jewel of many facets, each shining brilliantly. The poem takes us into an enchanted, brilliant world in which, keeping the Cave of Spleen well aside, almost nothing is dull.

The most striking quality of this poem is its sparkling wit. The poem is in effect a satire upon the fashionable world of the eighteenth century, and more especially upon feminine frivolity. The vanities of the women of the time are exquisitely ridiculed. Their pre-occupation with self-embellishment is satirised in the famous passage which describes Belinda's toilet. Their moral bankruptcy is exposed in the amusing lines in which we are told that, for a lady, staining her new brocade was as disastrous as staining her honour, and losing a necklace was as calamitous as losing her heart. The breaking of a China-vessel or the death of a lap-dog was as great a misfortune for a woman as the death of a husband. Some very amusing satire is to be found in the lines which describe the strange shapes in the Cave of Spleen: "And maids turned bottles, call aloud for corks." Virtue was not a prime consideration.

Almost every aspect of the fashionable society of the time is mocked at by Pope, and the mockery sends us into laughter. Much of the pleasure of this poem results from this mockery. Fun is the key-note of the poem.

Pope also gives us many pictures of the elegance and glitter of that society. These pictures are also a source of delight to the reader. Belinda is a woman of superb beauty and charm. She is certainly an object of mockery in the poem, but she also earns our homage and adoration. She is regarded as the rival of the beams of the sun. She wears a sparkling cross which even Jews and infidels would, kiss. She has a Cleopatra-like variety of appearance and character. Her beauty and charm are emphasised when she gets busy with her toilet. Robed in white, she sees her heavenly reflection in the mirror. Her beauty is greatly enhanced by the various decorative aids which she employs. We are fascinated by her beauty as described in this famous passage dealing with her toilet. Although the hint of satire here also is unmistakable, these lines possess great poetic charm which is a source of much pleasure to us:

> Now awful beauty puts on all its arms;
> The fair each moment rises in her charms,
> Repairs her smiles, awakens every grace,
> And calls forth all the wonders of her face;
> Sees by degrees a purer blush arise,
> And keener lightnings quicken in her eyes.

Belinda's cheerful temperament adds to her attractions. She is not only cheerful herself but "maintains thousands more in equal mirth." At the end of the poem, her beautiful lock is turned into a constellation in the sky, adding "new glory to the shining sphere." We see Belinda in many different lights— as coquette, injured innocent, sweet charmer, society belle, rival of the sun, and murderer of millions. The parts Belinda plays in the elaborate social drama of manners are certainly ridiculous and even contemptible, but they are also endearing. She outshines all her sex in divine attributes and importance. The dazzling personality of Belinda greatly contributes to the appeal of the poem.

Pope ridicules not only the ladies but also the fashionable young men of the time. The Baron's worship of Love is an example of the ridicule. No less amusing is the satire on gallants like Sir Plume, with his amber snuff-box, his spotted cane, and his "unthinking face".

The machinery of the poem is another source of the pleasure which this poem affords. Basically the machinery of the sylphs and gnomes is intended to heighten the mock-epic effect of the poem. But the sylphs have a beauty and charm of their own. The occupations and tasks of the sylphs are described in exquisitely witty lines, often of great poetic beauty. The sylphs illustrate the sensuous richness with which Belinda is surrounded. The myth of the sylphs enables the poet to show his awareness of the absurdities of a point of view which, nevertheless, is charming, delightful, and filled with a real poetry. The sylphs are exquisitely related to traditional beliefs, both trivial and profound. Probably the largest single way in which Pope imparted qualities of splendour and wonder to his actors and actions was through his brilliant adaptation of epic machinery. They really stand for feminine honour, flirtation, courtship, the necessary rivalry of man and woman and it is seen in its essence.

Lastly, It would, however, be wrong to regard this poem as a work of beauty and grace devoid of any substance. Its airy and fanciful character certainly predominates, but it also has a serious moral purpose which cannot be ignored. Dr. Johnson complimented Pope on having put a moral in this poem which may be regarded as a condemnation of the ill-humour, spleen, vanity, and intolerance of women, and a plea for good-humour and a sane, rational approach to things. Clarissa's speech is most vital in this connection. The glories of social position and privilege are, in Clarissa's view, achieved in vain "unless good sense preserves what beauty gains." The best course for women is to make good use of their power and "keep good humour still whatever we lose." The poem is also a condemnation of the mentality of fops and dandies. Certain moral reflections are found scattered in the poem. For instance:

O thoughtless mortals ! ever blind to fate,
Too soon dejected, and too soon elate.

JOHN DONNE, 1572-1631

A contemporary of Marlowe and Shakespeare, Donne (pronounced as "Dun") shares with them the spirit and the quality of the Renaissance. The contradictions of the age are reflected in the career and achievement of Donne. The inconsistency of the Elizabethans is mirrored in the complex personality of Donne, a poet of intellectual ingenuity and theological ingenuousness. It is not difficult to explain the versatility and the varied achievements of the poet, in the light of the age to which he belonged.

Birth, parentage, early life and marriage: - John Donne, born in 1572, was the eldest son of a London iron-merchant. His mother was the sister of John Heywood, the dramatist. After receiving education privately, Donne matriculated at Oxford in 1584. Probably he went to Cambridge for higher education, but obviously he could not take a degree on account of his opposition to the oath of thirty-nine articles. Of the years from 1584 to 1592, we know very little. He was admitted as a law student to Lincoln's Inn in May 1592. Like many young members of the Inns of Court, he was fond of pleasure and company: "Not dissolute but very neat, a great visitor of ladies, a great frequentor of plays, a great writer of conceited verses."

John Donne tells us that during that period, he "of study and play made strange hermaphrodites". During these formative years, Donne studied both law and religion. He also wrote a number of songs, elegies and satires before his twenty-fifth year. There is no doubt that he visited Italy in order to proceed to Jerusalem but prevented from doing so, he passed over into Spain, where he studied the laws, the language and the arts of Spain. His collection of books contained many Spanish writers. The earliest portrait of Donne, dated 1591, bears a Spanish motto. The spirit of Italian life and literature and influence of Spanish philosophers and theologians dominated his early poetry. He also came across other Catholics who, like him, felt terribly the harassment and persecution they were subject to. John Donne wrote of this period: "I had my first breeding and conversation with men of suppressed and afflicted religion (Catholicism), accustomed to the respite of death and hungry of an imagined martyrdom." These were the days of inner conflict. His soul was torn between Catholicism and Anglicanism. Ultimately, by 1597 he must have embraced the Church of England, when he entered the service of Sir Thomas Egerton. But before 1597, Donne enlisted as a volunteer in two combined military and naval expeditions. The Cadiz Expedition of 1556 and Azore Expedition of 1597 show that he was an adherent of the Earl of Essex His. The Storm and The Calm describe the experiences of his voyage. It was during the expedition that he came in contact with Thomas, the eldest son of Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. He served Egerton for four years as Secretary. He would have got promotion and advancement in public service had he not committed the indiscretion of contracting a run-away marriage with Anne More, daughter of Sir George More of Losely and niece of Egerton's second wife. Possibly Donne miscalculated, as he thought this marriage would strengthen his claims to promotion. On the contrary, Egerton dismissed him from service. The reconciliation with More, his father-in-law, saved him from a long imprisonment.

Donne's conversion of Anglicanism:- A word may be said about his conversion to Anglicanism. Brought up among the Catholics in early age, his belief in the old faith struggled against the impact of the Established Church. Donne was no hypocrite; he knew the shortcomings of the Church of Rome; his intellectual spirit detached itself from Catholicism. His conversion to Anglicanism was not due to opportunism or expediency but intellectual persuasion. Even then, in later life he felt, to some extent, a sort of spiritual unrest:

Show me, dear Christ, thy spouse so bright and clear...

Donne's hasty and imprudent marriage meant the loss of a promising and stable public career. The years from 1601 to 1609 were full of fluctuating fortunes, when Donne had to depend on the generosity of his patron, Sir Robert Drury, the Countess of Beford, Lord Hay, Robert Carr, Earl of Somerset, who helped him in different ways. The Pseudo Martyr (1610) shows him definitely on the Anglician side, trying to defend the oath of allegiance.

Two loves of Donne: - Donne had two loves—poetry, the mistress of his youth, and Divinity, the wife of his mature age. Equally remote he stood from the ascetic ideal. He believed in the joy of living and the seduction of poetry. Donne followed the middle path between blind faith and reformation.

To adore or scorn an image, or protest,
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right is not to stray;
To sleep or run wrong is.

Donne's satiric genius found expression in his satire on heresy and on women. In The Progress of the Soul (1601), he traces the progress of the soul of heresy from the fall of Eve to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The career of Donne entered a prosperous phase by his entering the Ministry of the Church of England in 1615. His steps to the altar, had cost him much misery and anguish. His pursuits were now controversial but devout. His sermons and poems written during this period reflect the complexity of his character, his varied erudition and his alert mind. The letters in verse written to different persons reflect his moods and interests. These metaphysical compliments and hyperboles need not make us forget the intensification of religious feeling and inner experience which found expression in the Holy Sonets. His Divine Poems, likewise, show the conflict of faith and reason, of hope and despair, and the penitence of a soul which has undergone a purgation of emotional experience. And yet the last poems queerly blend harshness with a sonorous harmony.

Some of his poems are in the amorous Cavalier tradition; such is his celebrated song Go and Catch a Falling Star, which avers that no-where lives a woman true and fair. In something of the same tradition is the poem Love's Deity, beginning:

I long to talk with some old lover's ghost
Who died before the god of love was born.

In a somewhat different strain, one more like his religious poems, is A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning. It is for his religious poetry, however, that Donne is most admired. Among the best of these are masterful sonnet Death, with the inspired couplet:

One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
And Death shall be no more, Death, thou shah die:

and the powerful A Hymn To God The Father, spun out of amazing puns on the poet's own name: 'When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done....".

Donne—the Dean of St Paul's

In 1619, Donne, the Chaplain, accompanied his friend the Earl of Doncaster to Germany. He was promoted to the post of Dean of St. Paul's in 1621. His sermons attracted large audiences. During his serious sickness he composed a few devotional poems including the hymns Since I am Coming and Wilt thou forgive. Donne felt greatly comforted by the first hymn: "The words of that hymn have restored me to the same thoughts of joy that possessed my soul in my sickness when I composed it". During his second sickness in 1630, he gave orders for his own monument which still stands in St. Paul's. He died in London on 31st March 1631.

Conclusion: - Donne left a deep and pervasive influence on English poetry. The metaphysical lyricists owed a great debt to him. Sometimes, his followers excelled him in happy conceit, passion and paradoxical reasoning. And yet he gave a sincere and passionate quality to the Elizabethan lyric. He interwove argument with poetry. In spite of its intellectual content, his poems attract us with a sense of vision, an intensity of feeling, and a felicity of expression. He is one of those great poets who have left a mark on the history of English poetry. Look at the compliments in verses below:

> That never any one could before become,
> So great a monarch, in so small a room,
> He conquered rebel passions, ruled them so,
> As under-spheres by the first Mover go,
> Banished so far their working, that we can
> But know he had some, for we knew him man.
> Then let his last excuse his first extremes,
> His age saw vision, though his youth dream'd dreams'
> —Sir Lucius Carie

The Age of John Donne

The age of Donne was an age of transition, standing midway between the age of Shakespeare and the Jacobean age (1572-1631). The age of Donne would effectively and substantially cover the first thirty years of the seventeenth century. This age stands midway between the age of Shakespeare-and the age of Milton. There is, however, some over-lapping which cannot be avoided because literary periods or ages cannot be separated chronologically.

It was a period of remarkable literary activity, a sort of prolongation of the Elizabethan age. The revival of learning had influenced not only Italy and Germany but also England. The classics were studied minutely and from a new angle. The re-discovery of the literature and culture of the past-known as humanism-gave the writers a new outlook on life. Life was a gay game and not a sorry penance. The new ideal man was to be a perfect courtier, a perfect soldier, a perfect writer and, above all, a perfect gentleman. For this, he had to undergo comprehensive training and a rigorous discipline.

(A) Historical and Political Perspective

The age of Donne was a period of transition. Many changes in the political, social and economic domains were being effected. Colonial expansion and increase in industry and trade made people materialistic. The study of medieval literature developed the minds of the readers. Though education was not so widespread, the common man spared no opportunity of obtaining knowledge from any source. Medieval beliefs held their ground both in Donne and his contemporaries.

The Reformation was a direct challenge to Rome. Why should Pope be supreme in the matters of religion? Religion, after all, is a personal matter and no dictation should be tolerated from-outside. Nationalism in its wider connotation was responsible not only for a new literature, but also a new faith. The abuses and weaknesses of the Catholic religion were laid bare. The new Church of England came into being. Donne, like some of his contemporaries, felt within himself the conflict of faith. His scepticism, his humanism and his learning made him challenge the faith of his ancestors. The result was that after a good deal of heart-searching and vacillation, Donne embraced the Established Church of England by 1598. But it was not until he was ordained in 1615 that he became a confirmed Anglican.

Peace and prosperity of Queen Elizabeth: - The heritage of Queen Elizabeth, who died in 1603, was one of peace and prosperity. It was also one of centralization. Although her monarchy had not been an absolute one, she delegated her authority wisely, and patriotism was loyalty to the Queen. Religion and politics were closely linked. Elizabeth, as the supreme head of the Church of England, maintained religious tolerance as the Puritan and Catholic minorities strengthened. Elizabethan developments in science were great, and included new discoveries in navigation, astronomy, cartography and medicine. England came to accept the Copemican view of the earth instead of the Ptolemic system.

James I and disillusionment: - James I, formerly James V of the Scotland, took over the English throne in 1603 at the death of Elizabeth. Though widely hailed at first, Englishmen rapidly became disillusioned with him. James did not understand the people he ruled, nor the nature of his office. He allowed his favourites and the Spanish government to influence him; his failure to recognize the rising power of Parliament, his reversion to rigid views of absolute monarchy, and the luxury and the corruption of his rule, and religious schisms widened and Puritanism and Roman Catholicism became more militant in their fight against the established Church of England. Political strife, intermingled with growing religious dissension, was brought to a head by his insistence on the oneness of Church and state.

Pessimism and optimism in the age of Donne: - In such circumstances, the spirit of the age became one of doubt and scientific analysis. The stretching of space in astronomy and geography, and the recognition of the great, unexplored territories in an expanding world threw man's place in the scheme of things into doubt. Both pessimism and optimism were offshoots of this need and quest for authority, the former as a natural manifestation of man's insecurity in a world increasingly governed by scientific law indifferent to man's position in the universe; the latter, as a natural assertion of man's greater control of his environment and a better life. It was an age of psychology, of biography, and of self-analysis at all social levels, as the works of Izaak Walton, John Donne, or Robert Burton show; it was also an age of scientific materialism as the works of Bacon and Newton show.

The conflict between the Church and the State: - The conflict between Church and State led men to wonder which was superior, with the answer resting in man's own conscience. The questioning of civil authority, of where true sovereignty should lie, made it possible to rebel against a king. The growth of the middle class, the rise of political parties, and the estrangement of the Puritans led to a long civil war. Charles I, who began his rule in 1629, following the death of his father, was beheaded in 1649, whereupon a Commonwealth was begun by the Puritans, leading to the eventual military dictatorship of Oliver Cromwell, who, nevertheless, brought some measure of peace and stability to a turbulent England. Yet the idea of a military dictatorship was abhorrent to Englishmen and upon Cromwell's death in 1660, Parliament invited Charles II, in exile in France, to return to England and resume the rule of the Stuart kings.

The discovery of the physical world in the age of Donne: - The discovery of the physical world was another aspect of this age. Columbus discovered America and Vasco de Gama found a new route to India. The English ships sailed round the world and revealed the riches and the glories of ancient but hitherto-unknown lands. Donne was intensely interested in the extension of the limits and the knowledge of the physical world. His comparisons, references and allusions to different lands and the maps of new regions show conclusively that he was inspired by the wonder and the expanding horizon of the world he lived in:

Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone
Let maps to other, worlds on worlds have shown.
Let us possess one world, each hath one, and is one.

The creative faculty of writers was encouraged to imagine new worlds and islands on the basis of the new discoveries.

(B) Social, Economic and Intellectual Perspective

The seventeenth century was fundamentally an age of transition and revolution. The old medieval world of ideas was undergoing rapid transformation. But there was an element of underlying continuity of tradition. So, one of the basic features of this age is the presence of a tension between the old and the new. The medieval thinker was religious. His outlook on science was theological and metaphysical. He was interested in the origin and the final end of man.

The approach of the new science was quite different The scientific thinker was interested in the world itself. He expressed a concern with the sequence of phenomena. He, therefore, appealed to observation and experiment. Thus, there was far-reaching repercussion on the creative minds of the age. For example, John Donne indicated the scepticism of the conflict between the old and the new. In his poem, The First Anniversary, he indicated that the earth was shaking under his feet. His central problem was the relation of man to God. Previous explanations of this problem had already been displaced by the new trend in scientific thinking. The dichotomy between religion and science, reason and faith, in no small measure affected the intellectual altitude of the seventeenth century. Jacobean pessimism had its origin in this dichotomy. If we consider the representative minds of the seventeenth century, we might say that "normality consists in incongruity".

In domains of human experience, we note the medieval and the Renaissance attitude co-existing in the seventeenth century. This is especially evident in many of the attitudes of the seventeenth century life. The Petrarchans praised love and in the Elizabethan lyrics we find the influence of Petrarch. But the medieval attitude to love was ambiguous. On the one hand, it condemned all love of created beings; on the other hand, love had to be tolerated as a necessary passion. Courtly love represented this evil aspect of love. But the attitude of the church was modified partly by Neo-Platonism. The Neo-Platonics were acutely aware of the love of God, through the world of the senses. They saw in human love a reflection of the divine love. According to Neo-Platonics, love held the world together.

Typical Renaissance poets apply these philosophical conceptions to the realm of erotic love. Beauty was the divine idea in the material object and love was the perception of that idea. The Renaissance Neo-Platonist found ideal truth in the beauty of his mistress and he could transcend into higher things by his love for her. The lover loved with a religious fervour. Thus, in the period of Renaissance, Neo-Platonism gavel to the conception of love a totally different significance than the one which medieval religion had given to it. An attitude of lyrical irony towards this new significance, is the essence of Donne's love lyrics. Donne expresses both attitudes to love. In fact, John Donne sums up the intellectual situation of the seventeenth century in his poem The First Anniversary:

And new philosophy calls all in doubt.
The element of fire is put out;
The sun is lost, and the earth, and no man's wit
Can well direct him when to look for it.

And freely men confess that this world is spent
When in the planets and the firmament
They seek so many new; they seek that this
Is crumbled out again to his atomies,
It is all in pieces, all coherence gone;
All just supply and all relation.

Empirical science: - Empirical science was a new development bringing about rapid changes in the sphere of science. There was unfettered exercise of reason and judgement. Copernicus gave a new view of astronomy. His views were further supported by Galileo with his telescope. This development gave a rude set-back to the old Ptolemic cosmology which changed the whole mental horizon of Europe. Its pressure did not attract so far literary figures of the day. Donne did not refute the old Ptolemic cosmology.

Habit of reading: - Habit of reading was increasing gradually in this period. There was considerable increase in the number of books printed annually. But many of the books were yet circulated in manuscripts among the authors, friends and acquaintances. The poems of Donne and Herbert were read chiefly in manuscript. But Browne's Religio Medici was printed. The writers of this period reveal an astonishing versatility and range of knowledge.

University education: - There was no change in the pattern of University education. The under-graduates used to study the traditional subjects like logic and metaphysics. The aim of education was for imparting theological knowledge and thus producing priests. There were theological contro-versies at Cambridge.

(C) Literary Perspective

Donne, the founder of a new school of poetry: - A wave of romance swept the minds of creative writers. There was a spirit of adventure in literary output, in the efforts to create new literary forms and metres, the desire to reject the old traditions and conventions of theme and expression in literary writing. Donne was wholly unconventional in theme and expression. His independent spirit refused to submit to Petrarchan convention and Platonic idealism. His love poetry is fresh and original; he goes deep into his heart and dissects his own Elizabethan feelings. Donne's revolt against the sweetness and harmony of verse is illustrated by the ruggedness and dissonance of his lines. He went to the colloquial, to that which was nearest to the speech of men, for revealing his feelings. And yet he did not abandon the Elizabethan conceit. He gave it a new form, a new vitality. He made his poetry dramatic and rhetorical. For example, he asserted:

For God's sake, hold your tongue and let me love.

Donne is original not only in the matter of love but also in the concept of woman. Except his beloved, all women are false and faithless:

Nor can you more judge woman's thoughts by tears,
Than by her shadow, what she wears,
O perverse sex, where none is true but she,
Who's therefore true, because her truth kills me.

Probably in his early youth, he had known many women inside out. He knew love as sex attraction, as an impulse for physical gratifica-tion. He boasted of his conquests and ridiculed jealous husbands in his poems. But at the same time, he was not oblivious of love as the marriage of true minds, as the merging of one soul into another. His passionate pleas to his beloved for union in Love's infiniteness is a case in point. True love is neither subject to time nor decay :

All other things to their destruction draw,
Only our love hath no decay.

Conclusion: - Every great writer is both a creature and creator of the age. In certain aspects, he is influenced by his times; in certain ways, he gives a new ideal to the age in which, he is born. Donne reflects in his poetry the aspiration, the adventure and the conflict of the age. He reacts to the humanism and the religious fervour of his time. He also gives a new direction to the literary activity of his age. He, in a sense, founded—the "metaphysical lyric" which was practised by a score of writers. He also set up new traditions in versification. By and large, Donne must be regarded as an original poet, a poet who gave much more than what he borrowed from his age:

So the fire,
That fills with spirit and heat the Delphic quire,
Which kindled first by the Promethean breath,
Glow'd here a while, lies quench't now in the death;
The Muse's garden with Pedantic weeds
O'rspred was purg'd by thee; the lazie seeds
Of servile imitation thrown away;
And fresh invention planted, thou did pay
The debts of our penurious bankrupt age.

An intellectuality of temper made Donne grapple with his sensations and emotions and transform them into intellectual moulds. In this lies his unification of sensibility, otherwise his thinking is unsystematic. There is an indiscriminate mixing of the old and the new, and he arrives at no synthesis as scientific thinker, although it is with him that the new temper of the Renaissance culture, and the scientific temper, enters poetry. Of all the poets of the Jacobean age, he most successfully articulated the scientific ideas of his time. It was an age of intellectual and cultural transition and Donne was analytically concerned with the forces shaping contemporary thought and sensibility. It was this duality of his mind which, more than anything else, made him the founder of a new school of poetry.

The English Metaphysical Poets and Poetry

Introduction: - The term "metaphysical" as applied to Donne and his followers is, more or less, a misnomer. However, it has come to stick. It was Dryden who first applied the term in relation to Donne's poetry. "He affected," complained Dryden, "the metaphysics, not only in his satires but in his amorous verses." Dr. Johnson borrowed Dryden's ideas, and in his "Life of Cowley" called Cowley a poet of the metaphysical school of Donne.

He derided Cowley's pedantic exhibition of his learning and vocabulary in his poems. But the exhibition of their learning was only one of the many characteristics of the metaphysical poets. Their love of daring imagery, enigmatic expression, and a peculiar sensualism uneasily wedded to a mystical conception of religion, their intellectualism and taste for the expression of novel ideas in a novel manner, were some other qualities. The term "metaphysical" denotes, according to Saintsbury, "the habit, common to this school of poets, of always seeking to express something after, something behind, the simple, obvious first sense and suggestion of a subject." In this way Donne and his followers strike a note of variance from Spenser and the Spenserians and Elizabethan poetry in general.

Composite Quality: - According to Grierson, metaphysical poetry, in the full sense of the term, is a poetry which like Dante's Divine Comedy and Goethe's Faust "has been inspired by a philosophical conception of the universe and of the role assigned to the human spirit in the great drama of existence." It arises when the physical world loses its stability, and the people lose faith in the orthodox patterns of thought and belief. At such times sensitive poets turn their attention inwards, and through self-analysis aim at better understanding of themselves, their situation in the world, and their relation to a philosophic or idealised "otherworld." The age in which Donne lived witnessed a gradual crumbling ?: the old order of things, the disturbing progress of science, and the scepticism which went with it. "The new philosophy", said Donne, "calls all in doubt". The realisation that the earth is not the centre of the universe, and the inference that man is not the greatest of all :reatures, dealt a rude blow to the orthodox Christian complacency. Donne's search for some principle of coherence in a world of chaos led ~.im to the reconciliation of opposites-resolution of doubts and the :-.tegration of the world of reality with the world of the imagination, of sensual cynicism and highflown mysticism, and even of carnal and spiritual longings. This led him surely to the employment of what have been dubbed "metaphysical conceits" and an occasional display of rot-of-the-way, recondite learning. The subtler points of his feeling found outlet quite often in obscure and enigmatic expression which has been the delight of some, and the despair of many readers. In spite of Donne's obscurity and persistent intellectualism it may be said to his credit as a love poet that he imported into English love poetry a vigorous element of hard realism (which sometimes amounts even to cynicism). In this respect he scored a big advance over Spenser and his school who glorified Platonic love and celebrated almost unearthly and highly conventional mistresses of the Petrarchan tradition. Donne's "ead was accepted by a large number of poets succeeding him. Among them may be mentioned Herbert, Vaughan, Carew, Crashaw, Trasherne, early Milton, and Cowley. These poets are often classed together as "metaphysicals" or "metaphysical poets". Apart from them the influence of Donne and his school may also be discerned in the work of a sizable number of poets who flourished in the Caroline period. In fact the metaphysical vein was in evidence as a major current in the stream of English poetry till the age of Dryden, when it gave place to nee-classicism ushered in by him.

Now let us consider some salient characteristics of the poetry of the metaphysical school.

"Undissociated Sensibility": - The most important characteristic of the metaphysicals is their possession of, or striving after, what T. S. Eliot calls "undissociated sensibility" (the combination of thought and feeling) which Milton was to "split" later. However, Prof. L. C. Knights in his essay "Bacon and the Dissociation of Sensibility" in Explorations puts forward the view that sensibility came to be dissociated much earlier by Bacon. The metaphysicals are "constantly amalgamating disparate experiences" and forming new wholes out of materials so diverse as "reading Spinoza, falling in love and smelling the dinner cooking." Donne has the knack of presenting together different objects which have between them a quite remote though undeniable similarity. He connects the abstract with the concrete, the remote with the near, the physical with the spiritual, and the sublime with the commonplace and sometimes during moments of the most serious meditation breaks into a note of sardonic humour or pathetic frivolity. This juxtaposition and, sometimes, interfusion of apparently dissimilar or exactly opposite objects often pleasantly thrills us into a new perception of reality. And Donne, says Hayward, is a "thrilling poet." Donne wrote :

Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one,
Inconstancy naturally hath begot

A constant habit.

These "contraries" meeting in Donne's poetry "vex" not only the poet but also, sometimes, his readers. His successors handled these contraries rather crudely, with very unpleasant effects.

Metaphysical Wit and Conceits: - Dr. Johnson was the first critic to point out the tendency of the metaphysical poets to yoke radically different images forcibly together. This tendency arose, according to T. S. Eliot, from their undissociated sensibility. But it may be objected that Donne and his followers do not really seem to be serious and spontaneous in the tendency noted by Dr. Johnson. When Donne compares a pair of lovers to a pair of compasses, is he not speaking with his tongue in cheek? Such a tendency is a true manifest ation of the metaphysical wit. Hobbes in his Leviathan defined wit as the capability to find out similarities between things which may look very dissimilar. When Carew said that Donne ruled, as he thought fit,

The universal monarchy of wit

He was most probably referring to wit in this sense. All the metaphysicals have an incorrigible aptitude for witty comparisons, juxtaposition, and imagery, and what may be called "the metaphysical conceit"'....some strained or far-fetched comparison or figure of speech. Dr. Johnson defined the wit of the metaphysicals as a kind of discordia concors, combination of dissimilar images. Let us consider some instances of this discordia concors. In Donne's Twicknam Garden we meet with the expression "spider love." Now, we are used to splendid, decorative, or moving images in connexion with the subject of love; but the word "spider" is quite contrary to our expectation. In the same poem the lover's tears are called the wine of love. The poet invites lovers to come equipped with phials to collect his tears! In another poem we have the very quaint line:

A holy, thirsty dropsy melts me yet.

The word "holy" is highly serious, "thirsty" stands for a simple revsical need, and "dropsy"...the name of a disease...has a clinical tKcTig. Again, consider the lines :

Go tell court-huntsmen, that the king will ride;
Call country 'ants to harvest offices.
See how the king and country ants are juxtaposed.

Learnedness: - The poetry of the metaphysicals has the impress of very vast learning. Whatever be the demerits of the metaphysical poets, even Dr. "rhnson had to admit that for writing such poetry it was at least -ecessary to think and read. However, it may be said that this poetry is r-ain-sprung, mot heart-felt. It is intellectual and witty to a fault. Dr. "onnson noted, that the metaphysical poets sometimes drew their conceits from "recesses of learning not very much frequented by common readers rf poetry." Learning is an asset for a poet. Our quarrel with the -netaphysicals is not that they are learned but that, sometimes, they show off their learning just to impress the reader. An imaginative and learned writer, says Edmund Blunden, "calls for annotation, but the object of his difficult a'llusions is to give shape to his ideas of the world, of the soul, not to de/cide matters of astronomy, physics, geography and natural history/' Many of Donne's followers do not always prove so "imagin ative."

Paradoxical Ratiocination: - According to Grierson, the hallmarks of metapjhysical poetry are pftssionate feeling and paradoxical ratiocination. The same critic observes that the metaphysicals "exhibited deductive reasoning carried to a high pitch." Too often does Donne state at the beginning of a poem a hopelessly insupportable proposition, which he defends soon after. Consider the poem "The Indifferent" which opens as below:

I can love both fair and brown.

Whatever qualities a woman has are made into so many reasons for loving her! Again, note this in his poem "The Broken Heart":

He is stark mad, who ever says,
That he hath been in love one hour.

With his tremendous ratiocinative ability Donne defends this proposition. In "The Flea" the proposition presented to his mistress is:

This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed. and marriage temple is.

It seems an unpromising subject, but there are twenty-seven lines of packed argument to drive it home. This excessive intellectualism not unoften makes for obscurity. See, for instance, the following clever lines:

You that are she and you, that's doubk she,
In her dead face half of yourself shall see.

Commenting on these, Tucker Brooke says: 'Tte meaning can be made out, but the satisfaction of his mental ingenuity in so doing is the only reward the reader will receive." Lucas compla'ns: "Donne treats poetry as a trapeze for mental frisks." Clay Hunt disapproves such "pyrotechnics of wit."

Diction and Versification: - In style and versification Donne and his followeis reacted against the cloying sweetness and harmony of the school of Spenser. The metaphysicals deliberately avoided conventional poetic expressions as they had lost their meaning through O'eruse. According to Wordsworth the language of poetry should "the natural language of impassioned feeling." The metaphysicals employed very "prosaic" words as if they were scientists or shopkeepers. The result is that in'their work we often stumble against ragged and unpoetic words we seldom expect in serious poetry. The versification of the metaphysicals is also, like their diction, coirse and jerky in contrast to the honeyed smoothness of much of Elizabethan poetry. Their revolt, according to Grierson, is due to two motives:

(i) The desire to startle; and
(ii) The desire to approximate poetic to direct, unconventional colloquial speech.

Donne could "sing" whenever he liked, but often he seems to be bending and cracking the metrical pattern to the rhetoric of direct and vehement utterance." He very often throws all prosodic considerations to the winds and distributes his stresses not according to the metre but according to the sense. "In his work", say Tucker Brooke, "the Pierian flood is no clear spring: it is more like a Yellowstone geyser: overheated, turbid, explosive, and far from pure." Donne and other metaphysicals' metrical infelicity has been adversely commented upon by all.-But, to be fair, we may say that Donne writes as one who will say what he has to say without regard to the conventions of poetic diction or smooth verse; but what he has to say is subtle and surprising and so are often the metrical effects with which it is presented.

Religious Poetry of the Metaphysicals: - Most of the metaphysical poets wrote on religion. Indeed, we owe most of our good religious poetry to them. It must be emphasised that all the metaphysicals do not write exactly alike. All of them are strongly marked individuals. The English metaphysical poetry from Donne to Traherne should be treated not as a type but as a movement. Donne's religious poetry has all the qualities we have detailed above. Herbert followed Donne in most respects. He has been called the "saint" of the metaphysical school. His approach to God and Christ is full of, what

Edmund Gosse calls, "intimate tenderness." But he does use the imagery and conceits of the Donnean type. His Temple was the most popular Anglican poem of the age. Herbert had two distinguished followers— Vaughan and Crashaw. They acknowledged their debts to Herbert, but they had tempers fundamentally their own. Vaughan is temperamentally a mystic though he uses conceits after the manner of Donne and Herbert-conceits such as "stars shut up shop" when the arrival of the morning is described. He is at his best while dealing with such themes as childhood, communion with nature, and eternity. His thoughts concerning childhood, in his poem The Retreat are largely echoed by Wordsworth in the Ode on the Intimations of Immortality in Childhood. His poem The World has a daring image:

I saw eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light.
All calm as it was bright.

Crashaw's poetry is uneven work. Whereas Herbert is a gentle stream, Crashaw is an impetuous torrent. He is quite undisciplined and given to moods of religious exaltation and excitement. He has a taste for daiing images and metaphysical conceits. The eyes of Mary Magdalene in The Weeper are described as

Two walking baths; two weeping motions;
Potable and compendious oceans.

"He sings", says a critic, "the raptures of soul visited by divine love in terms as concrete and glowing as any human lover has ever used to celebrate an earthly passion." Herein, again, his debt to Donne is discernible. It is the mystic vein in Thomas Traherne which tempts a critic to classify him with Vaughan among the metaphysicals. Traherne is not a great poet, however. He contemplates the beauty of God's universe till it stirs in him a mystic response. Like Vaughan he idealises childhood as the age in which a human being is nearest God. Crashaw was the only Roman Catholic among the metaphysical poets; and Andrew Marvell, Milton's secretary, the only Puritan. Unlike most Puritans. Marvell was not a hide-bound fanatic; rather he appears in the colour of a Christian humanist dating from the Elizabethan age. He as a poet has been assigned a quite high status by the school o modern critics led by F. R. Leavis. But in him we find English poetry already on its way to the neo-classicism of Dryden's school. His greatest poem "To His Coy Mistress" is secular (and not religious) in theme and execution. He urges his "coy" mistress to shed her coyness and make the best of the opportunity granted by Time to them to make merry.

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime...
But at my back I always hear Time's winged chariot hurrying near;
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.

The following lines have tragic pathos wedded to a metaphysical conceit:

The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.

The Contribution of the Metaphysical Poets to English Literature:

(1) The metaphysical poets have given to the English language its best religious poetry. The moods of incisive introspection and mysticism could best be expressed not through commonplace, conventional poetic images and language but unconventional and bold imagery which would jolt the mind and spirit of the reader into an intimate rapport with the mood of the poet. Herbert, Donne, Vaughan, Crashaw, and Traherne are the most important among the religious English poets of all ages.

(2) In the field of love poetry, too, the contribution of the metaphysicals is considerable and quite important from the historical point of view. When Donne appeared on the stage, Spenser and his followers were following the Petrarchan tradition of highly sentimental and idealised love poetry which had not much to do with reality. Donne demolished this claptrap and started a vein of highly realistic, frankly sensual, and sometimes, downright cynical, amatory verse. He was critical of the Elizabethan sonneteers and lyricists who put their mistresses, real or imaginary, on the pedestal of a deity, and pretended to woo them as their "servants,"' dying or living in accordance with their moods of rejection or acceptance of their supplications. Donne was frank enough.

Love's not so pure and abstract as they use
To say which have no mistress but their Muse.
Love sometimes would contemplate, sometimes do

(3) Even in the ruggedness and occasional vulgarity of their r-ction and versification the metaphysical did some service to English poetry in that they made the poets realise that the "smoothness of rrmbers" alone does not make for great poetry. What was needed was a hard core of sense and deft handling of experience related to the poet himself who reserved for himself the liberty to employ whatever diction and style he thought was eminently suitable for his purpose. After Donne and his followers the mere music of poetry could not capture for it any appreciative audience.

(4) The intellectualism of the metaphysical poetry and the compositeness of its imagery, and even the crabbed nature of its style, secured for it a continuous stream of readers from generation to generation. In the modern times all these qualities appear agreeable to a large number of readers. The modern poets, particularly T. S. Eliot, living in an age of crumbling values (like the age of Donne), have found a guide and a source of inspiration in Donne. It is not surprising, then, that in the modern critical canon Donne is rated as one of the best English poets.

John Donne: a love poet

Donne was the first English poet to challenge and break the supremacy of Petrarchan tradition. Though at times he adopts the Petrarchan devices, yet his imagery and rhythm, texture and colour of his love poetry is different. There are three distinct strains of his love poetry – Cynical, Platonic and Conjugal love.

Giving an allusion to Donne's originality as the poet of love, Grierson makes the following observation: "His genius temperament and learning gave a certain qualities to his love poems … which arrest our attention immediately. His love poems, for instance, do have a power which is at once realistic and distracting."

Donne's greatness as a love-poet arises from the fact that this poetry covers a wider range of emotions than that of any previous poet. His poetry is not bookish but is rooted in his personal experiences. Is love experience were wide and varied and so is the emotional range of his love-poetry. He had love affairs with a number of women. Some of them were lasting and permanent, other were only of a short duration.

Donne is quite original in presenting the love situations and moods. The "experience of love" must produce a "sense of connection" in both the lovers. This "sense of connection" must be based on equal urge and longing on both the sides.

"The room of love" must be shared equally by the two partners.

Donne magnifies the ideal of "Sense of connection" into the physical fulfillment of love.

"My face in thine eyes thine in mime appears"

This aspect of love helps him in the virtual analysis of the experience of love. Donne was a shrewd observer who had first hand knowledge of "love and related affairs. That is why in almost all his poems, he has a deep insight.

His love as expressed in his poetry was based not on conventions but on his own experiences. He experienced all phase of love – platonic, sensuous, serene, cynical, conjugal, illicit, lusty, picturesque and sensual. He could also be grotesque blending thought with passion.

Another peculiar quality of Donne's love lyrics is its "metaphysical strain". His poems are sensuous and fantastic. Donne's metaphysical strain made his reader confused his sincerity.

Donne's genius temperament and learning gave to his love poems power and fascination. There is a depth and rang of feeling unknown to the majority of Elizabethan poets. Donne's poetry is startlingly unconventional even when he dallies, half ironically, with the hyperboles of petrarch.

Donne is realistic not an idealistic. He knows the weakness of Flesh, the pleasure of sex, the joy of secret meeting. However he tries to establish a relationship between the body and the soul. Donne is very realistic poet.

Grierson distinguished three distinct strains in it. First there is the cynical strain. Secondly, there is the strain f conjugal love to be noticed in poems like "valediction: forbidding mourning". Thirdly, there is platonic strain. The platonic strain is to b found in poems like "Twicknam Garden", "The Funeral", "The Blossoms", and "The Primroses". These poems were probably addressed to the high-born lady friends. Towards them he adopts the helpless pose of flirtations and in high platonic vein boasts that:

Different of sex no more we know
Than our Guardian Anglles doe

In between the cynical realistic strain and the highest spiritual strain, there are a number of poems which show an endless variety of mood and tone. Thus thee are poems in which the tone is harsh, others which are coarse and brutal, still other in which he holds out a making threat to his faithless mistress and still others in which he is in a reflective mood. More often that not, a number of strains and moods are mixed up in the same poem. This makes Donne as a love poet singularly, original, unconventional and realistic.

Whatever may be the tone or mood of a particular poem, it is always an expression of some personal experience and is, therefore, presented with remarkable force, sincerity and seriousness. Each poem deals with a love situation which is intellectually analyzed with the skill of an experienced lawyer.

Hence the difficult nature of his poetry and the charge of obscurity have been brought against him. The difficulty of the readers is further increased by the extreme condensation and destiny of Donne's poetry.

The fantastic nature of the metaphysical conceits and poetry would become clear even we examine a few examples. In "Valediction: Forbidden Mourning" true lovers now parted are likened to the legs of a compass. The image is elaborated at length. The lovers are spiritually one, just as the head of the compass is one even when the legs are apart. One leg remains fixed and the other moves round it. The lover cannot forget the beloved even when separated from her. The two loves meet together in the end just as the two legs of the compass are together again, as soon as circle has been drawn.

At other times, he uses equally extravagated hyperboles. For example, he mistakes his beloved to an angel, for to imagine her less than an angle would be profanity.

In Donne's poetry, there is always an "intellectual analysis" of emotion. Like a clever lawyer, Donne gives arguments after arguments in support of his points of view. Thus in "Valediction: Forbidden Mourning" he proves that true lovers need not mourn at the time of parting. In "Canonization" he establishes that lovers are saints of love and in "The Blossome" he argues against the petrarchan love tradition. In all this Donne is a realistic love poet.

John Donne as a metaphysical poet

Metaphysical poetry, in an etymological sense, is poetry on subjects which exist beyond the physical world. In other words, it is a type of poetry dealing with abstract or philosophical subjects such as love, religion, God, beauty, faith and so on. But in reality the poetry which comprises the ideas or aspects that – physical love leading to spiritual union or religious, argumentative presentation of emotion, terseness of expression, use of conceit and wit in profusion, skillful use of colloquial language instead of Elizabethan lucid diction with the abrupt opening can be considered to be metaphysical. Originally the term 'Metaphysical Poetry' was coined by John Dryden and later popularised by Samuel Johnson and the features of the school which unite the various authors are quite numerous. As well as making widespread use of conceit, paradox and punning, the metaphysical poets drew their imagery from all sources of knowledge particularly from science, theology, geography and philosophy. However, John Donne is the founder of the school of metaphysical poetry and the other practitioners of the type of poetry are Crashaw, Cowley, Denham, Davenant, Herbert, Marvell, Vaughan and Waller.

The most striking quality of Donne's poetry is the use of metaphysical conceit which is a figure of speech in which two far-fetched objects or images of very different nature are compared. It surprises its readers by its ingenious discovery and delights them by its intellectual quality. Such conceits are available in his poetry. Such a famous conceit occurs in the poem titled "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning". The conceit reads as:

> "If they be two, they are two so
> A stiff twin compasses are two;
> They soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
> To move, but doth, if th' other do."

Here in the poem the two lovers are compared to the two feet of a compass. The lover is compared to the moving foot and the beloved to the fixed foot consecutively to show the ideal relationship between them. It is made clear that in this relationship the woman's part is passive and her place is in the home, while the man's duty is to move in the world of affairs. She stays in the centre apparently unmoving, but certainly as the outer foot moves around describing the circle, the inner foot moves too, revolving on the point which is the centre. The two, in fact, move in harmony and neither is unaffected by the movement of the other. At first sight such a comparison seems to be impossible but after the discovery of the underlying meaning it delights the readers.

Another leading feature of Donne's poetry is his dramatic presentation that arrests the attention of the readers very quickly. Like other famous poets, Donne has the capacity of opening a poem abruptly adding a dramatic quality to the poem. As we find such abruptness in opening the poem "The Canonization". The line goes as:

"For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love,
Or chide my palsy, or my gout,"

Upon reading or hearing those opening lines, we can easily understand that the poem begins somewhat in the middle of a conversation. Now the more we advance, the more clear it becomes that why the speaker of the poem makes such a request to the unidentified listener.

Closely related to the dramatic directness and abruptness of opening is Donne's dexterous use of colloquial speech. This dramatic quality is strengthened by its colloquial tone. In the song: "Go and Catch a Falling Star" we can trace such a quality:

"Go, and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root,"

On perusing the two lines we will see that like many other poems Donne has employed colloquial language to make the poem more lifelike. From the lines it is clear that a conversation is going on between two people.

Through all the love poems of Donne, there runs a belief that physical passion is a good thing and he recognises the claim of body side by side with the souls. His love poems enhance its attraction and novelty by blending physical, spiritual and mystical love. Although there is a complexity in the poem, "The Ecstasy" Donne deals twin aspects of love - physical and spiritual; love here is concretised through physical enjoyment of sex and then turns in its pure essence, spiritual. The setting of the two lovers provides the physical closeness by their love is enriched by the mutual understanding of their souls and like heavenly beings that influence the actions of men through manifestation. The soul must express themselves through the bodies. The greatness of the poem lies in reconciling the opposites – physical love and spiritual love, the physical aspects of love must precede the spiritual union. Donne's poetry lies far reconciling dichotomy between psychical and spiritual shifting quickly from the physical to the spiritual fashion.

"The Sun Rising" is another poem illustrating the peculiar blend of passion and thought, feeling and ratiocination. The delight of satisfied love is the feeling in the poem, but it is expressed in intellectual terms and not merely in an emotional tone. How well the fusion of feeling and thought is expressed in the finality of:

"She is all States, and all Princes, I
Nothing else is."

Passion is conveyed in images which are erudite, logical and of an intellectual nature. In the poem, we again see Donne's ratiocinative style, reasoning step by step towards his conclusion, which in this case, is that love is self-sufficient and unaffected by outside force.

Terseness is another characteristic of all the metaphysical poets. It is true in the case of Donne in particular. And the use of such terseness results in obscurity. Such compactness is traceable in "Go and Catch a Falling Star".

"No where Lives a woman true, and fair."

In the compact idea Donne wants to show that just as it is impossible to catch a falling star in the sky, so a woman with both honesty and fairness is rare to find out as they first seem to be honest but later they are found to be different.

In addition to that, the poems "The Canonization", "Twicknam Garden", "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning", "Go and Catch a Falling Star" and "The Sun Rising" in one or other way deal with the abstract idea which is most dominating feature of the metaphysical poetry and is a must for this type of poetry.

Donne was the greatest of the metaphysical poets. In some of their poems he was equalled by Vaughan and Marvell and in religious poetry by Herbert. But the body of his work is poetry of a quality which, when compared with that of any other of these poets, is unsurpassed. When his images are understood in their function of communicating a state of mind, and his ideas in their power to give expression to emotion, Donne's poetry is appreciated for its wit, beauty and perception. In conclusion, considering all the characteristics of Donne's poetry as discussed above, Donne can be regarded as a true metaphysical poet. Although he was considered a minor poet till the 20th century, he is regarded as one of the major English poets by T.S. Eliot and other major modern poets.

Conceit in Donne's poetry

Many of John Donne's poems contain metaphysical conceits and intellectual reasoning to build a deeper understanding of the speaker's emotional state. A conceit can be defined as an extended, unconventional metaphor between objects that appear to be unrelated. Metaphysical conceit is a highly ingenious kind of conceit widely used by the metaphysical poets. It often exploits verbal logic to the point of the grotesque and sometimes creates such extravagant turns on meaning that they become absurd. The metaphysical conceit is characteristic of seventeenth century writers influence by John Donne, and became popular again in this century after the revival of the metaphysical poets. However, Donne is exceptionally good at creating unusual unions between different elements in order to illustrate his point and form a persuasive argument in his poems.

By using metaphysical conceits in "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning", Donne attempts to convince his beloved (presumably his wife) that parting is a positive experience which should not be looked upon with sadness. In the first stanza, Donne compares the speaker's departure to the mild death of virtuous men who pass on so peacefully that their loved ones find it difficult to detect the exact moment of their death. Their separation must be a calm transition like this form of death which Donne describes. The poet writes,

"Let us melt, and make no noise"

Then we find another example of conceit which was not found in any poems of any poets before. Here he compares the two lovers to the pair of legs of compass. Like the compass they have one central point (love) and two sides (bodies) which note in a circle. Here he says,

"If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses are two,
Thy soule the fix foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if the 'other doe"

Similarly, in the poem, "The Good-Morrow", we find some startling and shocking or fantastic conceits which had never before found. Here he says, the lover is a whole world to his beloved and she is a whole world to him, not only that they are two better hemispheres who constitute the whole world. Here the poet says,

"Where can we finde two better hemispheres, Without sharpe North, without declining West?"

Again he says that as the four elements, earth, air, fire and water were supposed to combine to form new substance, so two souls mix to form a new unity. The strength and durability of this new unit is dependent upon how well the elements of the two souls are balanced, as we see from these lines from The Good-Morrow:

> What ever dyes, was not mixt equally;
> It our two loves be one, or, thou and I > Love so alike, that none doe slacken, none can die.

In the poem "The sunne Rising" there are a lot of conceits in almost every stanza. The poet says that the lover can eclipse and cloud the sun with a wink . He says,

> "I could eclipse and cloud them with a winke"

Again he says that the beloved lying in the bed by the lover's side is to his both west and East Indies; the beloved is all states and the lover is all princes. He says,

> She's all states, and all Princes, I,
> Nothing else is"

In the poem, "The Canonization", we find the use of conceit. Organic imagery is a strong point of this poem. In the second stanza, the poet says,

> "Alas, alas. who's injur'd by my love?
> What merchant's ships have my sighs drown'd?"

The poet assumes that a lover. ship have the power to drown ships, that his tears may flood the grounds, that his "colds" may bring about the season of winter, and that his "heats" may bed to the list of deaths by plague. (These are all fantastic hyperboles. The poet is, of course, mocking at the Petrarchan exaggeration). Then he says,

> "We' are Tapers too and at our own cost die"

The beloved is one fly, the lover is another fly. And they are tapers too. In then are to be found the Eagle and the Dove. They provide a clue to the riddle of the phoenix because they are one representing both sexes. These are all fantastic conceits.

In the poem "The Extasie", we find conceits. Here he says that the souls of the lovers have left their bodies temporarily and are communicating with each other (like two armies facing each other). And the images of the two lovers in each other's eyes are regarded as the lovers "propagation" or the issue which they have produced. And the two souls of the lovers have become one and the resultant soul is abler or finer than each taken singly. Moreover, the bodies are spheres, and the lovers' minds or souls the intelligences which move the sphere.

In the poem "The Flea", we find another use of conceit where the Flea is thought to be their marriage temple as well as their marriage bed because it sucks a tiny drop of blood from the lover's and the beloved's body. And according to the poet it means that they two have got married. Here he says,

> "Marke but this flea ,and marke in this,
> Low little that which thou deny'st me is;
> Mee it suck'd first, and now sucks thee,
> And in this flea, our two bloods mingled bee;"

The killing of the flea will mean destroying three lives- those of the poet, his beloved and the insect. It will also be an act of sacrilege because a temple will be destroyed. He says that the beloved should surrender her body to the poet because she will, by doing so, lose just as little honour as the life she has lost by a drop of her blood having been sucked by the flea.

In summing up we can say that John Donne's poetry is abound with metaphysical conceits. Conceits are the effortless creation of John Donne. To him, conceits come to his poetry as leaves come to the tree. And for the use of conceits he stands supreme and mostly for such uses of conceit, he becomes the best metaphysical poet.

Donne: A Religious Poet

The intensity of Donne's feeling and the inner conflict is reflected in his religious poetry. His religious sonnets and songs are intensely personal and sincere. Donne was a Catholic by birth. He felt humbled and persecuted like other Catholics of his age. Religion, for most of the people, was a matter of accident.

Those who liked antiquity and tradition turned to Rome, those who disliked formality and ritual turned to Geneva. But, religion should be, according to Donne, a matter of deliberate choice, made after careful study and consideration. Many of the principles Rome did not stand his intellectual inquiry. It is difficult to fix the precise date of his conversion. It is, however, Convenient to assume that by 1598, when Donne entered Sir Thomas Egerton's service, he must have embraced the Church of England. Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, could never have employed a distinguished Catholic for important public duty.

Donne's conversion to Anglicanism greatly influenced his poetry. Grierson calls this conversion, a "reconciliation, an acquiescence in the faith of his country—the established religion of his legal sovereign". Probably, the Renaissance spirit, leaning towards nationalism, was partly responsible for Donne's change of faith. But the conversion caused Donne some pangs and heart-searching. Dr. Johnson says: "A convert from Popery to Protestantism gives up so much of what he has held as sacred as anything that he retains; there is so much laceration of mind in such a conversion, that it can hardly be sincere and lasting". Undoubtedly, Donne felt this laceration of the mind and this conflict between the old and the new faith. "Show me dear Christ thy spouse so bright and clear". There was also the other conflict in Donne—the conflict between ambition and asceticism, between the prospects of civil service and the claims of a religious life. But after a number of years, Donne continued to retain a soft corner for Catholics.

MAIN ASPECTS OF DONNE'S RELIGIOUS POETRY

Donne was essentially a religious man, though he moved from one denomination to another. His spirit of rational faith continued throughout his life. The following are the main aspects of Donne's religious poetry:

Conflict and doubt: - As a man of the Renaissance, he could not but question the assumptions and beliefs of the Roman Catholic Church. Being born in a particular religion is one proposition and being convinced of the Tightness of one's faith, is quite another. As he was sceptical of the religious dogmas of the Catholic Church, he adopted the Anglican faith, but even so his mind was not at peace. He could not reconcile the inner conflicts and as such he prayed for God's mercy and grace, so that he might be able to build his faith on a sound foundation. In his A Hymn to God the Father, he ultimately arrives at a firm faith. It is perhaps the culmination of his spiritual quest.

Note of introspection: - The metaphysical clement which is so evident in his love poems, finds expression of an inner heart searching. He digs deep within himself in order to measure his sincerity and devotion to God and above all his consciousness of sin and the need of penitence. His fear of death—Donne must have seen many of his friends on their death-beds and their last struggles—makes him repent for his past follies and hence his prayer to God for His mercy and compassion. The Holy Sonets particularly maybe regarded as poems of repentance, and supplications for divine grace. Donne's intention is not to preach morality or to turn men to virtue. Grierson writes in this connection: "To be didactic is never the first intention of Donne's religious poems, but rather, to express himself, to analyse and lay bare his own moods of agitation, of aspiration and of humiliation, in the quest of God, and the surrender of his soul to Him. The same erudite and surprising imagery, the same passionate, and reasoning strain, meet us in both".

The themes of his religious poetry: - Donne found the contemporary world dry and corrupt. He felt that its degeneration would lead to untold human misery. The main theme of his religious poems is the transitoriness of this world, the fleeting nature of physical joys and earthly happiness, the sufferings of the soul imprisoned in the body and the pettiness and insignificance of man. Above all, the shadow of death is all pervasiveand this makes him turn to Christ as the Saviour. Even so, his metaphysical craftsmanship treats God as 'ravisher' who saves him from the clutches of the Devil. Though Donne regarded the world a vanity of vanities, he could not completely detach himself from the joys of the world and there is a turn from other-worldliness to worldliness. However, we cannot doubt the sincerity of his religious feelings and his earnest prayer to God for deliverance. His moral earnestness is reflected in his consciousness of sin and unworthiness for deserving the grace of Christ He uses the images of Christ as a lover who will woo his soul.

Parallelism with love poetry: - There is a great similarity of thought and treatment between the love poems and holy sonnets, though the theme is different. The spirit behind the two categories of poems is the same. There is the same subtle spirit which analyses the inner experiences like the experiences of love. The same kind of learned and shocking imagery is found in the love poems:

Is the Pacific sea my home? or are
The Eastern riches? Is Jerusalem?
Anyan, and Magellan, and Gibraltar.
All straits (and none but straits) are ways to them.
Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Ham, or Shem.

Similarly in his treatment of divine love, the poet uses sexual images in holy situations. As for example:

Betray kind husband thy spouse to cur sights,
And let mine amorous soul court thy mild Dove
Who is most true, and pleasing to thee then
When she's embraced and open to most men.

CRITICAL SURVEY OF DONNE'S RELIGIOUS POETRY

There are two notes in Donne's religious poems—the Catholic and the Anglican. The Progress of the Soul leans towards Catholicism and it records the doubts and longings of a troubled subtle soul. The following lines show the working of the mind and are full of bold and echoing vowel sounds:

O might those sights and tears return again
Into my breast and eyes, which I have spent.
That I might in this holy discontent
Mourn with some fruit, as I have mourned in vain;
In mine Idolatory what showers of rain
Mine eyes did waste? What griefs my heart did vent?
That sufferance was my sin; now I repent.
Cause I 'did suffer I must suffer pain.

The Progress of the Soul, though written in 1601 was published after his death, in 1633. Ben Jonson called it "the conceit of Donne's transformation." Donne describes his theme in the very first stanza.

I sing the progress of a deathless soul
Whom Fate, which God made, but doth not control
Pla'd in most shapes; all lines before the low
Yok'd us, and when; and since, in this I sing.

He describes the soul of heresy which began in paradise (in the apple) and roamed through souls of Luther, Mahomed and Calvin and is now at rest in England:

The great soul which here among us now
Doth dwell, and moves that hand, and tongue and brow,
Which as the moon the sea moves us.

Donne moves from the aesthetic to the ethical plane of existence. His curiosity about the microcosm and his scepticism find expression here:

There's nothing simply good, nor all alone,
Of every quality comparison,
The only measure is, and judge, opinion.

The poem was written soon after the inner crisis and his conversion:

For though through many straits and lands I roam,
I launch at Paradise and I sail towards home.

The psychological problem finds its solution in a spiritual reintegration.

The Divine Poems include 'La Corona' and six holy sonnets on Annunciation, Nativity, Temple Crucifying, Ressurrection and Ascenstion. Donne seeks divine grace to crown his efforts:

But do not with a vile crown of frail bays,
Reward my muses white sincerity,
But what thy thorny crown gain'd, that gives me
A crown of glory, which doth flower always.

The other, group of sonnets also entitled Holy Sonnets contains 19 sacred poems. They belong to the period of doubt and intense inner struggle which preceded Donne's entry into the Church of England. Here is a mood of melancholy and despair.

This is my play's last scene here heavens appoint.
My pilgrimage's last mile. (Sonnet VI)
Despair behind and death before doth caste
Such terror and my feeble flesh doth waste.

In sonnet II, Christ appears as a lover and Donne as a temple usurped by the Devil.

Myself a temple of thy spirit divine

Why doth the devil then usurp on me...

In Sonnet III, Donne is sincerely repentant for his past sins:

That I might in this holy discontent
Mourn with some fruit, as I have moum'd in vain....
No ease, for long, yet vehement grief hath been
The effect and cause, the punishment and sin.

In Sonnet IV, Donne compares himself to a felon charged with treason, and yet he cannot resist conceits.

Christ's blood, though red, will whiten the souls stained and polluted with sin.
Oh make thyself with holy mourning black
And red with blushing, as them an with sin;
Or wash thee in Christ's blood, which hath this might
That being red, it dyes red souls to white.

Sonnet V shows Donne's Renaissance-spirit–his wander-lust:

You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands, can write,
Power new seas in ruined eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly.

Donne prays sincerely for pardon for his misdeeds:

Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if thou hadst seal'd my pardon, with thy blood.
The pilgrim-soul is not afraid of death.
Death be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so.

In Sonnet XIII, Donne brings forward the argument that because beautiful women have liked him in his youth, so Christ, the Incarnation of Beauty, should be kind to him:

No, no; but as in my idolatry,
I said to all my profane mistresses,
Beauty, of pity, foulness only is
A sign of rigour: so 1 say to thee.

In Sonnet XVII, Donne refers to the death of his wife which has now made him turn his attention to spiritual attainment:

Since she whom I lov'd hath paid her last debt
To Nature, and to hers, and my good is dead.

In Sonnet XVIII, Donne expresses his desire to see the true church (England, Rome, Geneva) undivided, because it is indivisible. The bride of Christ is the mistress of the whole world.

Who is most true, and pleasing to thee then

When she is embrac'd and open to most men.

The Hymn to God, written during his serious illness in 1623, is a sincere prayer to God to receive him in His grace:

So, in his purple wrapp'd receive me Lord,
By these his thorns give me his other Crown,
And as to others' souls I preach'd thy word
Be this my Text my sermon to mine own,
Therefore that he may arise the lord throws down.

The Divine Poems contain a vivid and moving record of a brilliant mind struggling towards God. Truth, is the goal but there are hurdles and temptations in the way. Donne is not afraid of analysing the appalling difficulties of faith. The vacillations, the doubts, of this imperfect but sincere man are reflected in all their passion. Donne's aim is not didactic or moral; he wishes to lay bare his own moods, his aspirations, his sins, his humiliation in the quest of God. He is the most sincere and introspective Anglican poet of the seventeenth century. He had experienced the intensification of religious feeling mentioned in the holy sonnets. Walton writes: "His aspect was cheerful and such as gave a silent testimony of a clear knowing soul, of a conscience at peace with itself. His melting eye showed that he had a soft heart full of noble compassion, of too brave a soul to offer injuries and too much a Christian not to pardon them in others." W.B. Yeats, a mystic poet, writes of Donne, "his pedantries and his obscenities, the rock and loam of his Eden, but make us the more certain that one who is but a man like us all has seen God!"

Conclusion: - Some critics question use of the metaphysical method in holy sonnets and religious poems. Grierson, however, justifies use of the metaphysical method in these serious poems. He writes: "Here, he recaptures the peculiar charm of his early love verse their best, the unique blend of passionate feelings and rapid subtle thinking, the strange sense that his verse gives of a certain conflict between the passionate thought and the varied and often elaborate pattern into which he moulds its expression, resulting in a strange blend of harshness and constraint with reverberating and penetrating harmony. No poems give more…the sense of conflict of soul, of faith and hope snatched and held desperately…."

Donne's religious poetry cannot be called mystical poetry. Donne does not forget his self as the mystics do. His is always conscious of his environment, of the world in which he lives and of his passionate friendships. As such his religious poetry lacks the transparent ecstacy found in great religious poetry. Helen White writes in this connection: "There was something in Donne's imagination that drove it out in those magnificent figures that sweep earth and sky, but whatever emotion such passages arouse in us, Donne was not the man to lose himself. In another world beyond the release of death, he hoped to see his God face to face, and without end. But he was not disposed to anticipate the privileges of that world in this, nor even in general try to do so… The result is that in most of the mystical passages in both his poetry and his prose, the marvellous thrust into the ineffable is followed by a quick pull-back into the world of there-and-now with its lucid sense-detail and its ineluctable common sense."

Donne's holy sonnets are deservedly famous and are remarkable. They embody his deeply felt emotions in a language reflecting conscious craftsmanship.

The Wit of John Donne

What is wit: - It is difficult to give a satisfactory definition of wit. The dictionary definition mentions a keen perception and cleverly apt expression of amusing words or ideas or of those connections between ideas which awaken amusement and pleasure. Wit is revealed in the unusual or ingenious use of words rather than in the subject-matter.

Inferior wit lies in the use of paradox, pun, oxymoron and word-play. Higher wit is the discovery of conceits and the assembly and synthesis of ideas which appear dissimilar or incongruous.

In a true piece of wit, all things must be Yet all these things agree
As in the Ark join'd without force or strife
All creatures dwelt, all creatures that had life (Cowley)

Donne is remarkable as much for his metaphysical element as for his wit. Hartley Coleridge, however, pokes fun at Donne's wit:

Twist iron pokers into true love knots
Coining hard words not found in polyglots.

Peculiar wit: - Donne has been called "the monarch of wit'. Dryden wrote: "If we are not so great wits as Donne, we are certainly better poets." Pope echoed the same thought: "Donne had no imagination, but as much wit, I think, as any writer can possibly have." Dr. Johnson felt that Donne's wit lay in the discovery of hidden resemblances in dissimilar things.

Donne's wit is deliberate and peculiar. It impresses us with its intellectual vigour and force and does not merely lie in the dexterous or ingenious use of words. Secondly, it comes naturally from the author's expansive knowledge and deep scholarship. According to Leishman, Donne's wit lies in his imprudent and shocking language. T.S. Eliot, however, finds his wit in the fusion of opposites—the blend of thought and feeling, what he calls 'sensuous apprehension of thought'.

The wit of Donne stands in a class by itself. Though his wit has points in common with Caroline poets, it has certain points which are peculiarly its own. Moreover, there is a world of difference between the wit of Shakespeare and Pope and the wit of the metaphysical poets. T.S. Eliot remarks: "The wit of the Caroline poets is not the wit of Shakespeare, and it is not the wit of Dryden, the great master of contempt, or of Pope, the great master of disgust." In Elizabethan poets, wit is decorative and ornamental. It is a result of light-hearted fancy or strange setting. In Donne, wit is the result of weighty thought and brooding imagination. It is a living image, and a subtle conceit, coloured with the quality of his thought:

I saw Eternity on the other night.

Donne's wit is grave and full of significance and sometimes pregnant with strange ideas.

Its complexity: - Donne's wit is a compound of many similes extracted from many objects and sources. His wit has certain distinct qualities. Donne's wit is scholastic or dialectical rather than metaphysical. He is fond of a logical sequence, ingenious and far-fetched analysis. In his poem entitled, The Anagram, Donne by a series of dialectical paradoxes defends the preposterous proposition that an old and ugly woman will make a better wife than a young and handsome one.

Similarly Donne defends his apparent gaiety during the absence of his beloved in his own paradoxical manner:

That Love's a bitter sweet, I never conceive
Till the sour minute comes of taking leave
Another I taste it. But as men drink up
In haste the bottom of a next civned cup
And take some syrup after, so do I.
To put all relish from my memory
Of parting, drown it in the hope to meet
Shortly, again and make our absence sweet.

Variety of moods: -Donne's wit expresses all moods from the gay to the serious, and from the happy to the pessimistic. Sometimes he is flippant and irreverent. In the Flea, he deifies a flea and calls it a marriage temple. In many poems, the poet debunks the customary vows of lovers and the Petrarchan conventions. Sometimes there is self-mockery and the poet plunges from the sublime to the ludicrous. The variety of poems on love like Love's War, Love's Diet, Love's Exchange, Love's Usury, and Love's Alchemy shows the range of his passion and wit.

Mental vigour: - The secret of Donne's wit lies in its mental strength and intellectual power. It is an expression of his rational outlook on life, an embodiment of his poetic sensibility, and a reflection of his vision of life. One critic observes in this connection that it is "the outward projection of his sense of the many-sidedness of things, of his manifold possibility, and ultimately a recognition of the multiplicity of experience." Donne could afford to laugh at established practices and convictions because he disliked humbug and pretence. A critic remarks: "What one sees all the time are established certainties being crumbled, positive pretensions denied or mocked, the very affirmations of the poem doubted or discredited before it ends, and a few certitudes won by hard proof in the face of contingent circumstance".

Irony: - The secret of Donne's wit lies in his use of irony. Irony is a literary device by which words express a meaning that is often the direct opposite of the intended meaning. In this manner, the poet by implication comments on the situation. Donne's irony is noticed in his attitude to love which can, to an extent, be summed up in the phrase: "What fools these mortals be!" The indignation and mockery takes on a literary phraseology and the intention of the poet is obvious. A.J. Smith writes in this connection: "The outright mockery of people and sects, and the impugning of motives in general, certainly isn't cynical. It expresses a perspective which takes the world's activities as ludicrous feverishncss in respect of bedrock human certainties; not however occasion for despair but, diverting by their own zestful life. The overturning of accepted evaluations seems the more convincing because it is the reverse of solemn: and because it emphatically doesn't imply any rejection of experience, but rather a delight in it."

Comparisons: - Donne's analogies are apt and full-blooded. In Love's War,Donne compares the qualities of a good lover and a good soldier; as for instance, the capacity to keep awake for nights together, the courage to face an enemy (rival) boldly, to besiege and take by storm, to elude watchmen and sentries. Donne's analogies are compressed syllogisms. Just look at this syllogism:

All that is lovable is wonderful
The mistress is wonderful,
Therefore the mistress is lovable.

Donne compresses the above argument in the following two lines:

All love is wonder; if we justly do
Account her wonderful, why not lovely too?
At times, Donne's wit takes the form of epigram:
If things of sight such Heaven be
What Heavens are those we cannot see.

Donne makes a sort of pattern of thought, of a mind moving from the contemplation of a fact to a deduction from a fact, and thence to a conclusion. Oliver Elton notes the endless 'teasing of words and thoughts'. Prof. Croft observes: "Thus the brain-sick fancies are piled up, twaddle upon twaddle, until the whole thing explodes with a passionate contrary or a familiar image." The notable thing about his comparisons is their novelty and freshness, their references to unlikely things and places. For example, the poet compares the two lovers to the Phoenix and to both the eagle and the dove. The lovers will be ressurected after death like the Phoenix. Joan Bennett observes: "They evoke severe sense memories of a literary heritage. If they evoke memories, they are of large draughts of intellectual drink, imbibed from science rather than poetry. "Donne is in the habit of elaborating a figure to the furthest stage to which ingenuity can carry it.

Exaggeration: - Exaggeration is an important element in Donne's wit. This exaggeration appears to be outrageous in its high spiritedness:

Go and catch a falling star
Get with child a mandrake root....

Donne being an anti-traditionalist, is keen on shocking people. His wit takes a kind of moral holiday by flouting traditional ideals and morals in several relationships. Dr. Johnson takes exception to Donne's wit on two grounds, aesthetic and moral. Dr. Johnson is offended by its lack of proportion and decorum, its "fundamental unseriousness, its detachment, and its immorality"

To teach thee, I am naked first, why then
What needst thou have more covering than a man

Dr. Johnson applies Pope's definition to the works of Donne:" That which had been often thought, but was never before so well expressed". Donne does not conform to this concept of wit. According to Dr. Johnson, wit is both conventional and new, but the wit of Donne is a combination of dissimilar images, a discovery of the occult resemblances in things unlike. The most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together, nature and art are ransacked for illustrations, comparisons and allusions; their learning instructs and their subtlety surprises, but the reader commonly thinks his improvement dearly bought and though he sometimes admires, is seldom pleased. If they frequently threw their wit upon false conceits, they likewise sometimes struck at unexpected truth; if their conceits were far-fetched, they were often worth the carriage.

Paradox: - Dr. Johnson compares Donne's paradoxes to remarks made by epicurean deities on the actions of men, devoid of interest or emotion. T.S. Eliot is also struck by the "telescoping of images and multiplied associations, constantly amalgamating disparate experiences always forming new wholes out of matter so diverse as reading of Spinoza, falling in love and smelling the dinner cooking". In one of his satires, Donne emphasises his companion's inconsistency and absurdity in hating naked virtue, although he loves his naked whore. Leishman dwells on the outrageous hyperbole and perversity of Donne's wit—"wit, often deliberately outrageous and impudent and coat-trailing, often breath-takingly ingenious in the discovery of comparisons and analogies, but nearly always, in one way or another, argumentative, sagacious, rigid, scholastically argumentative, whether in the defence of preposterous paradoxes or in the mock-serious devising of hyperbolical compliments."

She is all States and all Princes, I,
Nothing else is.
Countries, Towns, Camps, beg of from above
A pattern of your love.

What can be more dramatic and hypothetical than:

I wonder, by my troth what thou and I Did, till we lov'd?

When the lover is dead on account of disappointment in love, ghost of the lover will haunt and harass the beloved.

Donne is not merely witty but passionately witty or wittily passionate, in the two poems entitled The Anagram and The Bracelet. The words in themselves are not difficult, but the structure of sentences is far from simple.

Conclusion: - To some critics, Donne's wit is one of the means of escape, an escape from boredom and depression which constantly afflicted him during the years of his creative activity. Through wit and intellectual ingenuity, Donne avoids both self-pity and Hamlet-like frustration. Drummond rightly calls him "the best epigrammatist we have found in English".

In the ultimate reckoning, Donne's wit may be regarded not only symbolic of his spirit of interrogation and discovery but also the embodiment of introspection and intellectualism, the rebellion and conflict in the mind of Donne.

Donne's Contribution to English Style and Language

Donne has made a remarkable contribution to English poetic diction and versification. In this respect his status is like that of Dryden, Wordsworth and T.S. Eliot. We understand that the English language became too poetic in the age of Wordsworth, and in that of T.S. Eliot. It lost its touch with the language of everyday life, with the result that it became weak and enervated. Donne endeavoured to re-vitalise and invigorate English language by making it flexible. He imparted to it sinewy strength, energy and vigour.

Donne's poetry is based on an individual technique. His poetic diction and style is unconventional. The 'Donne-poem' is an argument in which a mind living in analogy exploits a chosen situation with a new and elaborate set of inter-connected images. His poems are like voyages of discovery, exploring new worlds of life, love and spirits. They are voyages of the mind which Cerates, transcending these, and other seas.

Matter more important than words

To Donne, matter was more important than words and the management of the thoughts dictated the form of the poem. De Quincey thought that Donne laid principal stress on the management of thought and secondly on the ornaments of style. Here is a poet who argues in verse accompanied by music. As T.S. Eliot puts it, "A thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility."

His love-poems are explorations of the types of love and friendship, from the man's point of view. They are not so obviously "poetic", as those of Marvell and Herrick. Excess of intellectual satires and complexity prevent the luminosity and certainty of statement. This partly accounts for his occasional inequality, violence and obscurity. His style stands in a class by itself. Cazamian writes: "Donne will have nothing to do with the easy and familiar, the mythological imagery. At the risk of being enigmatic, he takes pleasure only in the subtle. Passion, feeling, sensuousness—all are subjected to wit. This play of wit sometimes results in astounding hyperbole; sometimes he ingeniously brings together ideas as remote from each other as the antipodes, mingling the lofty and the mean, the sublime and the trivial. He often prefers to a smoothly flowering line, the lines that are freely divided, and in which he accents have an effect of shock, and pull the reader up and awaken his attention".

Donne's world of ideas: - The basis of the 'Donne-poem' is neither music nor imagery but the idea. There is a basic idea underlying each poem. The idea may be real or fantastic but it is never artificial or affected. Donne is modern in his psychological realism; he believed in the realism of a world of ideas. Donne told his friends that he described "the idea of a woman and not as she was." He rejected the courtly idea of woman as an angel or a goddess. To him, woman was essentially fickle and inconstant in love. The song beginning, "Go and catch a falling star" is based on the faithlessness of women in love. Nowhere can you find a woman who is faithful to her lover—"Fraility, thy name is woman." His important poem—The Anniversary—is a record of domestic bliss. The love of Donne and his wife is eternal and immortal and is not subject to decay or death:

All other things, to their destruction draw,
Only our love hath no decay;
This no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday....

His poem—The Sun Rising—is a stern warning to the sun not to disturb the lovers in their bed-chamber. The proper duty of the sun is to call on schoolboys, apprentices and courtiers who must attend to their work in time. His song—"Sweetest Love"—is based on the idea that parting is no doubt sad and painful, but those who love each other sincerely and deeply can never be really parted. This poem was addressed by Donne to his wife when he wanted to go to foreign countries for about six months. He bids her farewell cheerfully, till he meets her again.

Both structural and decorative peculiarities of Donne's poems: -The 'Donne-poem' possesses both structural and decorative peculiarities. Firstly, the metre is not a matter of chance but of choice. The metre is a part and parcel of the fused whole; it is not an ornament super-added. S.T. Coleridge writes: "To read Dryden and Pope, you need only count syllables; but to read Donne you must measure Time and discover Time of each word by the sense of Passion." You must hear his silences and his eloquence. Examine the following lines of the poem The Relic:

> When my grave is broke up again
> Some second ghost to entertain,
> (For graves have learned that woman-head
> To be more than one a bed)
> And he that digs it, spies
> A bracelet of bright hair about the bone
> Will not he let us alone,
> And think that there a loving couple lies,
> Who thought that this device might be some way,
> To make their souls, at the last busy day,
> Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?

Donne's interest in music: - Moreover, the greatest metrical variety in the form of syllables and stanzas shows not only the fertility of his genius but also his interest in and ear for music, Let us analyse The Relic and study its metrical effects. The Relic, a love poem, contains three stanzas. Let us read loudly the first stanza to grasp the movement. Each stanza contains eleven lines, of which the first four are octosyllabic or four-footed lines, the fifth and seventh are three footed, and the remainder of the length are—of the blank. verse line i.e. decasyllabic. "In reading the first stanza aloud, one sees that the first two lines, regular and equal, broach the theme with a typical Donnian startlingness and boldness, lines three and four have the same length as one and two but their being enclosed in brackets and the dig at woman's inconstancy which they offer, the meaning is, graves have learnt the feminine trick of being a bed to more than one person; old graves were often dug up to make room for new tenants."

Donne's use of simple and colloquial language: - Dryden appreciated Donne for fusing and combining complexity of substance with simplicity of expression. According to Legouis, he did not feel any necessity of mentioning gods and goddesses in his poetry. He rejected all the conventional and traditional poetic devices. He used the different vocabulary and imagery which was quite popular among the masses of his time. In his time, medieval scholastic learning and science was quite popular, although it appears very dull and boring to the modem reader. Donne used all the current phrases and diction of his age. He even expresses complex emotions by means of simple and colloquial diction and phraseology. Thus, he revolted against the Petrarchan, Spenserian and pastoral poetry. The poet expressed "Petrarchan sighs in Petrarchan language". The language, diction and imagery of poets had become too poetic, hackneyed and stereotyped. The conceits and images, metaphors and similes bear resemblance to one poet or another. Donne's constitution is considered remarkable because of infusing into English language energy and sinewy strength. Due to the invigorating influence of his poetic diction, his language brought new lustre to English literature.

Harmony of English verse: - Donne tries to lend metrical pattern to the rhetoric of utterance. Yet his verse has no note of jarring disharmony; on the contrary, it has a haunting harmony of its own. He is successful in finding the rhythm that will express his passionate argument, and his mood: that is why his verses are as startling as his phrasing.

Donne master of poetic rhetoric: - What Jonson called the 'wrenching of accent' in Donne, can be amply justified. He plays with rhythm as he plays with conceits and phrases. Fletcher Melton has analysed his verse to show two metrical effects, the "troubling of the regular fall of verse-stress by the intrusion of rhetorical stress on syllables which the metrical pattern leaves unstressed, and secondly, an echoing and re-echoing of similar sounds parallel to his fondness for resemblances in thoughts and things." He apparently uses an individual poetic diction, in the same way, he chooses metrical effects which are new and original. Prof. Grierson writes: "Donne is perhaps our first great master of poetic rhetoric, of poetry used, as Dryden and Pope were to use it, for effects of oratory rather than of song, and the advance which Dryden achieved was secured by subordinating to oratory the more passionate and imaginative qualities which troubled the balance and movement of Donne's packed out imaginative rhetoric."

Bold, original and startling use of figures of speech: - The other important feature of his poetry is the bold, original and startling use of figures of speech. Comparisons are useful in communicating sensations, feelings and states of mind. Donne relies on his scholasticism for new and far-fetched comparisons, and yet they are real, credible and meaningful. Donne, in Love's Progress,draws on geography and science of navigation in praising his mistress. The simile refers to the beloved's eyes as sun, and the nose as the meridian.

> The nose (like to the first meridian runs)
> Not 'twixt an East and West but 'twixt two suns

The tears of lovers are always of great poetic account but Donne handles them in different ways. In A Valediction of Weeping, he calls his tears coins; they bear her stamp because they reflect her image; the tear acts as a mirror. Then be compares the tear to a blank globe before a cartographer. In Witchcraft by a Picture, the poet's eye is reflected in his beloved's eye. As his tears fall, her image also falls and so her love. In another poem, Donne compares a good man to a telescope because just as a telescope enables us to see distant things nearer and clearer, in the same way a good man exemplifies virtue in his life in a practical manner. A highly developed simile is found in A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning written on the poet's temporary separation from his wife. The leave-taking should be quiet and peaceful as the dying of virtuous men. During absence, the lovers' two souls are not separated but undergo,

> An expansion
> Like gold to airy thinness beat.

Then the poet remarks that the two souls are like the two legs of a compasses:

> If they be two, are two so
> As stiff twin compasses are two;
> Thy soul the fix'd foot makes no show
> To move but doth if th' other do.

The wife's soul is the fixed foot of the compass, the foot with the pin that remains in the centre of the circle. It moves only when the other foot—the husband's soul—moves and then only by leaning in the direction of the return to the centre—symbolically—the journey to Europe and return—are accomplished because the other foot—the wife's soul—remains fixed. The journey is realised in terms of the completion of the circle.

Contribution of conceits to English versification style: - Donne's conceits are peculiar and novel. A conceit means a strained or far-fetched comparison or literary figure. The Elizabethan conceits were decorative and ornamental, while metaphysical conceits were the products of the intellectual process of thinking in figures. Donne's poems abound in conceits. Here are a few examples:

The spider lover, which unsubstantiates all
And can convert manna to gall,
Love, all alike, no reason knows, nor clime,
Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.
If, as in water stir'd more circles be Produc'd by one love such additions take,
Those like so many spheres but one heaven make
For they are all concentric unto thee

For Donne, the flea who has sucked their blood is the blessed go-between who has united the lovers.

This flea is you and I and this
Our marriage bed and marriage temple is

In Twicknam Garden, Donne desires to measure the love of other lovers by the taste of his own tears:

Hither with crystal vials, lovers come,
And take my tears which are love's wine
And try your mistress tears at home
For all are false that taste not just like mine.

Donne combines two figures of speech in The Sun Rising; here is apostrophe coupled with personification:

Busy old fool unruly sun,
Why dost thou thus
Through windows and through curtains, call on us?

Here is a hyperbole in Song to describe the speed of a lover's journey:

Yestemight the sun went hence,
And yet is here today,
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way;
Then fear not me,
But believe that I shall make Speedier journeys, since I take More wings and spurs than he.

Donne's irony: - Donne is fond of irony. A faithful woman will be false even while you inform others of her virtue:

Yet she Will be False, ere I come, to two or there.

In Woman's Constancy, Donne shifts irony from the beloved to himself:

Now thou hast lov'd me one whole day
Tomorrow when thou leav'st what will thou say?
Will thou then antedate soon new made vow?
Or say that now.
We are not just those persons which we were?
For by tomorrow I may think so too.

The poet is afraid that the beloved will break off their relationship in one way or another. He changes his own idea, and thinks that even if she does nothing, he himself may end their relationship. Donne does not spare himself when he engages in pun.

In A Hymn to God the Father, he writes, "When thou hast done, thou has not done, For, I have more."

Donne is fond of paradox. Here is one from A Burnt Ship with all its grim humour:

> Out of a fired ship which by no way rescued
> But drowning could be rescued from the flame
> Some men leap'd forth and even as they came > Near the foe's ships did by their shot decay
> So all were lost which in the ship were found,
> They in the sea being burnt they in the burnt ship drowned.

The abundant use of poetic devices and metres shows that Donne is intellectual to the finger-tip. He plays not only with words but also with ideas. His mind is full of medieval theology, science, mathematics and jurisprudence. His imagination is as complex as his intellect. His ingenuity finds expression in hyperbole, wit and conceit. His poetry may not be harmonious or musical at times, but we cannot deny that it always poses both sincerity and strength—elements necessary for greatness in poetry. The strength of Donne lies in his being an inimitable poet, one whom it is very difficult to emulate. Donne in the Holy Sonets writes: "Show me dear Christ, thy spouse so bright and clear." The Church is certainly the bride but she is open to most men which is hardly complimentary to any married woman. Here he is both paradoxical and ironical.

Donne's use of Diction in a Peculiar Manner: - Simple words are used in unexpected way. Although diction is simple, yet simple words are combined in unexpected ways and thus strange compounds are formed. For example:

(i) A she-sigh from my mistress' heart….
(ii) No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;…

Donne, sometimes, uses puns which are simple but effective; for example son/sun; done/Donne. Thus his use of words is often subtle and suggestive. He suggests much more than he narrates or describes.

Tone generally colloquial and flexible: - Love-songs are highly admired because of the general tone of the language which are usually colloquial. They have liveliness of spoken language and thus they are flexible. The first lines are often colloquial in tone. They immediately startle the readers and capture their attention. For example, note the opening of The Canonization.

Donne's symbols are intellectual: - Helen Gardner commends the verbal craftsmanship of Donne which has an attraction and magic of its own. It arouses memories and associations in the minds of the readers. Such associations have an intellectual, not an emotional content. Though Donne deals with love, yet he borrows ideas from geometry and hydraulics to explain a gamut of emotions. In this connection, Helen Gardner writes: "Donne's words bring with them the memory of abstract ideas. The magical lines in his poetry are those which evoke such conceptions as those of space, time, nothingness, and eternity. The words which strike the keynote of a poem are circles, spheres, concentrique, etc. They are the symbols of that infinity in love which underlies the human ebb and flow. The circle occurs again and again in Donne's verse and in his prose as the symbol of infinity, insensibility to such intellectual symbolism has caused not only Dr. Johnson but even so modern a critic as Miss Sackville-West to cite the compass image in A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning, as an example of metaphysical inaptitude."

Variety of versification: - Donne is a great experimenter in verse. He uses a large number of metres and different types of forms. However, he sees to it that his versification suits the subject matter and is in harmony with the ideas expressed in the poems. In this connection, Redpath remarks: "Some of the stanza forms are very attractive in themselves. Much play is made with variations of lines length. Stanzas of more than six lines seem to give Donne the scope he so often needs to develop the complex interplay of thought and feeling which is so typical of him. With exceptions, the poems in shorter stanzas tend to be thin or slight."

In the song, Go and Catch a Falling Star, the short lines offer a contrast to the long line at the tail of each stanza. Similarly, the change of line length in A Valediction: of Weeping, echoes the turbulent passion expressed in the poem.

Donne's ruggedness: - His ruggedness has been condemned by Ben Jonson who said that for not keeping of accent, Donne deserved hanging. It is true that Donne disregarded the simple rhythms of Elizabethan Age and introduced complicated rhythm patterns in order to convey the intellectual gymnastic and metaphysical conceits. One critic observes that every twist and turn of the sound pattern corresponds with the twist and turn of thought process. In the satire specially, his language is harsh and coarse. In this connection, Grierson remarks: "If there is one thing more distinctive than another of Donne's best work it is the closeness with which the verse echoes the sense and soul of the poem. And so it is in the satires. Their abrupt and harsh verse reflects the spirit in which they are written. Horace, quite as much as Persius, is Donne's teacher in satire and it is Horace he believes himself to be following in adopting a verse in harmony with the unpoetic temper of his work."

Grierson points out: "Donne was no conscious reviver of Dante's mataphysics, but to the game of elaborating fantastic conceits and hyperboles which was the fashion throughout Europe, he brought not only a full-blooded temperament and acute mind, but a vast and growing store of the same scholastic learning, the same Catholic theology, as controlled Dante's thoughts, but jostling already with the new learning of Copernicus and Paracleus."

"His vivid, simple, and realistic touches are too quickly merged in, learned and fantastic elaborations and the final effect of almost every poem of Donne's is bizarre, if it be the expression of a strangely blended temperament, an intense emotion, a vivid imagination."

Donne is bizarre and wayward in his style. He is "a maker of conceits for their own sake, a grafter of tasteless and irrelevant ornaments upon the body of his thought There are poems which undoubtedly support these accusations, and I shall be the last to deny that Donne relished the play of "wit' for its own sake; but I am convinced that in general his style is admirably fitted to express his own thought and temperament, and in all probability grew out of the need of such expression. The element of dissonance is no exception. No doubt, it expresses his spirit of revolt against poetic custom…..in this case the poetic ideal of harmony. But the expression of revolt is only a superficial function. With its union of disparate suggestions dissonance is most serviceable instrument, in fact a prime necessity of expressing Donne's multiple sensibility, his complex modes, and the discords of his temperament. In short, the dissonance; of style reflects a dissonance inwardly experienced."

"What is true", writes Grierson, "of Donne's imagery is true of the other disconcerting element in his poetry, its harsh and rugged verse. It, is an outcome of the same double motive, the desire to startle and the desire to approximate poetic to direct, and unconventional colloquial speech."

"Donne's verse has a powerful harmony of its own, for he is striving to find a rhythm that will express the passionate fulness of his mind, the fluxes and refluxes of his moods, and the felicities of his verse are as frequent and startling as those of his phrasing. He is one of the first, perhaps the first, writers, of the elaborate stanza or paragraph in which the discords of individual lines or phrases are resolved in the complex and rhetorically effective harmony of the whole group of lines…."

"Donne secures two effects; firstly the trebling of the regular fall of the verse stresses by the introduction of rhetorical stresses on syllables which the metrical pattern leaves unstressed; and secondly, an echoing and re-echoing of similar sounds parallel to his fondness for resemblances in thoughts and things apparently the most remote from one another."

"He writes as one who will say what he has to say with regard to conventions of poetic diction or smooth verse; but what he has to say is subtle and surprising and so are the metrical effects with which it is presented…It was not indeed in lyrical verse that Dryden followed and developed Donne, but in his eulogistic satirical and epistolary poems."

Donne's dramatic flexibility, rhetorical touches and poetic rhythms: - Donne is quite dramatic in offering catchy opening lines. He almost catches the reader by his arms and give him a jolt. This dramatic rhythm gives the illusion of talk in a state of excitement. Donne is original in his innovation of poetic rhythm. As Legouis asserts: "John Donne is perhaps the most singular of English poets. His verses offer examples of everything castigated by classical writers as bad taste and eccentricity, all pushed to such an extreme that the critic's head swims as he condemns…At the outset of Donne's career, Spenser had already won his glory, and the Petrarchan sonneteers were producing collection upon collection. The independent young poet reacted against these schools. He despised highly regular metres and monotonous and harmonious cadences. He violated the rhythm in his Satires, Songs and Sonets and in hisElegies. His friend and admirer Ben Jonson said of him that he esteemed him 'the first poet in the world for some things' but also that, 'Donne, for not keeping of accent deserved hanging'. Closely examined, this crime, for such it is, derives from his subordination of melody to meaning, his refusal to submit to the reigning hierarchy of words, sometimes from his lapses into the expressive spoken tongue, in defiance of the convention of poetic rhythm."

Helen Gardner further remarks: "Donne deliberately deprived himself of the hypnotic power with which a regularly recurring beat plays upon the nerves. He needed rhythm for another purpose; his rhythms arrest and goad the reader, never quite fulfilling his expectations but forcing him to pause here and to rush on there, governing pace and emphasis so as to bring out the full force of the meaning. Traditional imagery and traditional rhythms are associated with traditional attitudes; but Donne wanted to express the complexity of his own moods, rude or subtle, harmonious or discordant. He had to find a more personal imagery and a more flexible rhythm. He made demands on his reader that no lyric poet had hitherto made."

Conclusion: - The memorable nature of Donne's verses will strike any casual reader. Such verses haunt our memory and return to us again and again. Grierson has beautifully summed up the salient characteristics of John Donne's style and versification. As he remarks: "Donne's verse has a powerful and haunting harmony of its own. For Donne is not simply, no poet could be, willing to force his accent, to strain and crack a prescribed pattern; he is striving to find a rhythm that will express the passionate fulness of his mind, the fluxes and refluxes of his moods; and the felicities of verse are as frequent and startling as those of phrasing. He is one of the first masters, perhaps the first, of the elaborate stanza or paragraph in which the discords of individual lines or phrases are resolved in the complex and rhetorically effective harmony of the whole group of lines…The wrenching of accent which Jonson complained of is not entirely due to carelessness or indifference. It has often both a rhetorical and a harmonious justification. Donne plays with rhythmical effects as with conceits and words and often in much the same way…There is, that is to say, in his verse the same blend as in his diction of the colloquial and the bizarre. He writes as one who will say what he has to say without regard to conventions of poetic diction or smooth verse, but what he has to say is subtle and surprising, and so are the metrical effects with which it is presented. There is nothing of unconscious or merely careless harshness in his poetry. Donne is perhaps our first great master of poetic rhetoric, of poetry used, as Dryden and Pope were to use it, for effects of oratory rather than of song, and the advance which Dryden achieved was secured by subordinating to oratory the more passionate and imaginative qualities which troubled the balance and movement of Donne's packed, but imaginative rhetoric."

BATTER MY HEART, THREE-PERSONED GOD

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

As the very title of the sonnet suggests, it is a passionate and forceful appeal to God to take possession of the poet's heart. The intensity of the poet's feeling is conveyed by the word 'batter'. To batter means to pound repeatedly, to deal heavy repeated blows, to beat persistently and hard.

The poet vehemently prays to the Christian Trinity—God the Father, God the Son (Christ) and God the Holy Ghost to take possession of his heart by force. According to Leishman, it reveals the poet's "agonised striving" to be possessed by God and gives expression to it through the analogy of an usurped town during war and then of a beloved under the forcible possession of the adversary of the lover. "Any mild and persuasive action will not help in the transformation of the poet. The poet is a confirmed sinner and only drastic action against him will change him. A total regeneration is not possible without a powerful and violent action of God." According to F.W. Payne, the sonnet expresses adequately "in its striking metaphor and its forceful diction, his burning desire for an assurance of forgiveness" R.G. Cox feels that in the 'Holy Sonnets' of which this poem is one, the method of expression and style is the same as that of love poems. "As in love poetry here too, is a considerable variety of tone and method ranging from mere casuistry and debating tricks to a profound urgency and conviction and sometimes both may be found together." In this sonnet, the poet treats God as a conqueror or a ravisher. This is rather an unusual comparison. The plea of the poet is that unless God acts with force and vigour, He will not mend his ways. The way down-hill is quick and easy, the way uphill is difficult and strenuous. Only God's might may push him up on the spiritual path.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The poet appeals to God to transform his inner being. As he is a great sinner, mild methods will not succeed with him. God the Tinker, need not use gentle methods like 'knock, breathe, shine and seek to amend'. He must use harsh and rough methods. Just as the tinker, in order to reshape the pot, must 'break, blow and burn' the metal to give it a new shape, in the same way God must overpower him and use violent methods to reshape and remould him.

Usurped town: - The poet compares himself to a usurped town. His soul belongs to God, but has been taken away by the Devil. He himself is willing to pay his homage to God, but he cannot do so because he is under the power of the Devil. Reason is God's Viceroy, but even Reason is unable to oppose the might of the Devil. Therefore, God should use force and release him from the horrible clutches of evil forces. Thus alone he can be saved from damnation.

Usurped beloved: - The poet clarifies his position through the metaphor of lover-beloved relationship. The poet is the beloved while God is the lover. According to tradition, God is the man, while human beings are all females. The poet's soul loves God and desires to be united with Him. However, she has been forcibly betrothed to the Devil. He is a slave of the Devil and God alone can rescue him. God should sever his connection with evil and redeem him from wickedness. God should accept him as a beloved and take him into His arms. Now he is a slave of the Devil but let God make a slave of him. The poet feels that he can never be purified till God consummates his union with him. Then alone he will be free from sin and evil.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

This use of sensual relationship for holy transformation need not be objected to: 'Imprison me, enthrall me, ravish me' only show the intensity of the poet's feeling who wishes to be totally owned and possessed by God. There is a great use of paradox in the poem. Donne's relation with God is expressed through several paradoxes. Donne can only rise if he is once thrown by God; he can be free only if he is imprisoned by God and he can be chaste only if he is ravished by the Almighty. Another paradox is based on the maxim: preparedness for war is the best guarantee of peace. The poet can gain peace of mind only when God uses violence and snatches him away from the Devil. The tinker must use harsh and violent methods to break the vessel and then reshape it. Similarly, God should burn the impurities in him through the fire of the bellows. The metaphor of the usurped town to be taken by the lawful owner is quite appropriate. Similarly, the usurped body who is in the possession of the Devil should be rescued by God. Freedom and purity can come only through divine consummation.

The idea of violence runs throughout the poem like an undercurrent. The hammering of the tinker or the blacksmith is followed by the siege and capture of the besieged town. The marriage is followed by ravishment. There is a continuous comparison of secular love to divine love. Donne's artistry is evident in his expression of physical love which is used to advantage in portraying holy love. The use of sensual imagery cannot be regarded as incongruous because in the final analysis, it conveys the sincerity and confessional frankness of the poet as a true slave of God.

DEATH BE NOT PROUD

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

The poem is included as Sonnet X in the volume of Holy Sonnets: Divine Meditations. Donne demolishes two popular concepts: firstly death is dreadful and secondly death is mighty. He personifies Death and addresses him directly. Death has a certain power over man and it gives temporary sleep. If death and sleep are like brothers, greater rest and relaxation must come from death.

Death releases the soul from the body's prison. Opium and narcotics can induce sleep like death. Why then should death boast of its great power? The poet therefore calls it "poor death". Moreover, man does not die; his soul lives forever; it is, therefore, death which becomes superfluous and meaningless. The victory of Christian resurrection over death is the last nail in the coffin of death. The poem proves the thesis that death is neither terrible nor powerful.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The poet argues that death is not dreadful because those whom death claims to have killed have a long and peaceful sleep. Sleep resembles death, but just as sleep resembles and invigorates, similarly death would provide more comfort and pleasure. This is the reason for the virtuous dying young. Death brings rest and peace and therefore it is not dreadful.

Death: a slave: - Death is not powerful, as men think. It is not a powerful king but a miserable slave. It is an agent of fate, chance, and actions of wicked people, poison, wars and sickness. Death is a servant of sickness and old age. It induces sleep, but there are various other means like opium and drugs which give a better and gentler sleep. Death has no reason to be proud. It can only make people sleep for some time. After sleep in the grave, people shall wake up on the day of resurrection and live forever. Then death will have absolutely no power over human beings. Thus death's jurisdiction comes to an end. In fact, death does not kill human beings; it is death which itself dies.

The immortality of the soul ensures the survival of man. So, the poem ends on a paradox: Man is immortal; death is mortal.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

Apart from the debating skill and the plausible argument of the poet, there is a lurking fear of death. The allusion to resurrection and immortality does not in any way reduce the fear of death. One is reminded of Bacon's words: "Men fear death, as children fear to go in the dark". The comparisons are common—death as sleep, death as opium, body as prison of the soul. This poem is similar to the sonnet entitled. At the round earth's imagined corners where Donne speaks of death's woe, and the triumph of souls over death on Doomsday. Here Donne emphasizes the impotence of Death.

The structure of the poem facilitates the division of the theme into two parts. The octet proves that death is neither dreadful nor mighty.-The sestet brings the argument to a personal level and regards death as a slave and a door through which the soul passes to immortality. The last line hits the nail on the head. It is not the poet who dies. The poet declares happily: "Death, thou shall die".

TWICKNAM GARDEN

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

"Twicknam Garden" is a sonorous (resonant; high-sounding) and thoughtful lyric. It was most probably addressed to the Countess Lucy of Bedford for whom Donne had a profound admiration. The lyric is distinguished by highly condensed feelings of sadness. The poet is obviously in a mood of dejection. He gives vent to the anguish of his heart which neither nature can soothe nor poetry. Only Donne's emotion is the subject of this lyric. There is a sort of sting in the tail or in the last two lines. Donne calls the fair sex as the perverted sex but excepting this no scornful or bitter comments are made on women.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

It is remarkable that the lady to whom the poem is addressed was never in love with Donne. The poet probably mistook her friendly regard for him for love. The poet feels irresistibly drawn toward this "one of the most accomplished and cultured ladies" of the seventeenth century. Her truth kills him, because he is deeply involved in her charm and personality.

The most distinguishing feature of the poem is the atmosphere of sombre desolation that pervades it. This cold, bleak and cheerless atmosphere is in perfect harmony with the anguish of the poet. The poem reminds us of Keats's La Belle Dame Sans Merci and Shelley's song, A Widow Bird Sat Mourning. We find the same bleakness, loneliness, and dry unrelenting aspect of a leaden skied winter. The poem is steeped in grim and overwhelming despair. The poet strikes a piercing note of sadness with the very first line.

Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears, the well defined and concrete images drive home the utter despair and incurable pain of a love-lorn heart. For example the cold hardness of a "stone fountain weeping out my tears" and "crystal phials" leave on the mind an unforgettable impression of poignant sorrow. The frigid expression of tears gives a unifying effect to the poem. The poet refers to tears in all the three stanzas. Tears, in fact, control the diversity of imagery that we find in the poem.

The poem contains some of most marvellous of Donne's "conceits". In the first stanza we have the startling conceit of "spider love":

> The spider Love, which transubstantiates all,
> And can convert manna to gall.

Again, we have an equally brilliant conceit when Donne compares sad and poignant memories of love to the serpent in the garden of Eden:

> And that this place may thoroughly be thought,
> True paradise, I have the serpent brought.

In the second stanza, the love-lorn poet yearns to be converted into the stone fountain which would be shedding tears throughout the year. In the last stanza, 'tears' are called "Love's wine". All these 'conceits' lend a peculiar charm to the lyric.

"Twicknam Garden" is a short poem, but it is one of the greatest expressions in literature of poignant sorrow and piercing sadness.

Inspired by Lucy: - This poem was perhaps inspired by Donne's passion for the Countess Lucy of Bedford, a highly cultured and accomplished lady who did not feel anything stronger than friendship for the poet. The poet has given a most powerful expression to his frustrated (baffled) passion. His art which we can analyse to some extent, deserves admiration.

An expression of disappointed love: - He comes to Twicknam garden in order that the beautiful sights and sounds around him, might ease his anguish. But no, he finds that his bleak and desolate mood does not yield to the soothing influence of the atmosphere. On the contrary, the trees seemed to be laughing and mocking him to his face. If the garden were as beautiful as the garden of Eden, the thought of love within him was like the serpent to spoil the beauty of the place.

Contrast between the natural atmosphere and the poet's mood: - Donne expresses his mental state in a series of attractive conceits. He is a self-traitor, as he cherishes in his bosom the spider love, which transforms everything, even the heavenly manna can be turned into poison by it. If the garden is paradise, then his passion is the serpent. He wishes to be a mandrake and grow there in the garden (for the mandrake is a plant that feels pain) or a stone fountain, for he is always weeping, Donne's intellectual contempt for women: - In the third stanza, his intellectual contempt for women is expressed in an intricate series of images. He is the stone fountain and his tears are the true tears of love. Lovers should come and take away in crystal phials these tears and compare them with those shed by their mistresses at home. If those do not taste as Donne's do, then they are not true tears of love. Thus he implores lovers not to be misled by the tears their mistresses shed, for you can no more judge woman's thoughts by their tears than you can judge their dresses by their shadow.

Paradoxical thought in the closing lines: - Donne ends his poem with a paradox (anything that goes against the accepted opinion). The woman, he loves, is true and chaste; she is quite honest, that is why Donne cannot enjoy her love. And it is the perversity of the female sex that the only woman who is honest and true should be the one whose honesty and truth kill the poet, otherwise, perhaps she would not be so chaste and true. In Donne's view, woman is a kind of plague devised by God for man.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

This poem was addressed to the Countess Lucy of Bedford—a cultured and accomplished lady of the seventeenth century. She entertained a friendly affection for Donne the poet, which could hardly be given the name of "love'". The poet, a sad and forlorn lover, finds himself in a mood of dejection. Even nature fails to soothe his tormented soul. It is a song of sorrow pervaded by nothing except the bleakness of despair. It expresses the anguish of a lover's heart who has fallen a prey to sorrow and who cannot drown it even in nature. For its sombre atmosphere and intensity of grief, the poem has not been surpassed by any lyric in English poetry. It is a passionate outburst of sorrow expressing yearnings of unfulfilled love. The lady to whom it is addressed was never in love with Donne. It is possible that Donne misconstrued her friendly regard for him. In its poignancy of sorrow, the poem reminds us of Keats's La Belle Dame Sans Merci and Shelley's lyric, A Widow Bird Sat Mourning.

SONG—SWEETEST LOVE

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This lyric was addressed by the poet to his wife Anne More when he had to take leave of her on the occasion of his undertaking a journey to a foreign country. It is brilliant and unconventional love-lyric which stands out in the entire love-poetry of Donne. It is written in a tripping metre. There, is a freshness and naturalness about this poem which is missing from the honeyed verses of the Elizabethan lyricists and song writers.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

It is a singularly frank, realistic and sincere song of parting. The reason is obvious. There is a perfect equality of love between the lover-and the sweet-heart. The lover takes for granted his love for his beloved and vice versa. The artificial fears and sighs of the lover are after the fashion of the poet Petrarch. They are kept at bay because they are so cheap, boring and tiresome. Donne's love-song expresses mutual human, love. Both the lover and his lady-love are grieved at the parting, but the lover being a mail and scholar can deduce some higher thoughts from even this experience, which soothe and calm both of them. Though it is a, simple love-song, there is the development of an intellectual design. The lover feels the sorrow of parting, and even grows some-what pessimistic in stanzas I and III. But abruptly he turns away from thoughts of death and pessimism and begins to dwell upon their mutual relationship. She must not grieve, for that would hurt him, since he is a part of her. In the last stanza sorrow is cast away, and the very idea of parting is dismissed as something irrelevant, since

> They who one another keep > Alive, ne'er parted be.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

Love triumphs over the idea of parting. The final stanza is a typical example of Donne's habit to charge emotions with thought Deane is at his best when he allows fullest scope to love, so that it embraces both the body and the spirit.

The lyric contains two beautiful conceits in the last but one stanza, viz.

> When thou sigh'st them sigh'st not wind,
> But sigh'st my soul away;
> When thou weep'st, unkindly kind,
> My life's blood doth decay.

AIR AND ANGELS

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This is a poem of love and has little to do with air and angels. The poet is fed up with the Platonic idea of love—love as something holy and spiritual. He is also not happy with the worship of the beloved and the admiration of her beauty which the Petrarchan poets did.

He realizes the hollowness and hypocrisy of the idealization of love. Love demands something concrete. It must have a physical base. Love can grow only by mutuality and co-operation.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The poet discusses the soul-body relationship. Just as the angels manifest themselves in the air by a voice or light, in the same way love which is something idealistic, must express itself through some concrete medium. In the beginning he thought love was like a spirit or an angel, but subsequently he realised that love must be expressed through a medium, namely the human body. The beloved is the body of the soul of love. Love has now been concretized in the beloved and as such she has become the cynosure of his eyes. He appreciates the beauty of her lips, eyes and brow.

The steadiness of love: - Love cannot exist in a vacuum. It must have a concrete expression. Just as a ballast (heavy load) is necessary to steady the movement of a ship, in the same way, something more important than the appreciation of the bodily beauty is necessary to stabilise love. Mere admiration of her hair or some aspect of her beamy is not enough. There must be a substantial and objective expression of love. What Donne wants is physical union which can give both continuity and stability to man-woman relationship.

Man's active love: - Just as angels need the cover of air in order to be recognisable, so the lover must have the love of the beloved as a sphere for his love. There is, however, a difference between man's love, and woman's love. Man's love may be compared to an angel and woman's love to air. This implies that man is generally more active than woman in the game of love-making. The traditional concept of woman's coyness and modesty does make one feel that she plays the second fiddle in the orchestra of love. But just as there is harmony in the angel-air relationship, there should be mutuality and response in man-woman relationship.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

This is one of the 'highly intellectualised' of Donne's love poems. The title does not suggest the subject of love. Even so, the poet describes divine love in terms of the flesh. He borrows images and concepts from metaphysics, navigation and scholasticism in order to prove the point that both physical base and mutuality ate essential for the experience of love. The idea of using ballast to the ship of love for its smooth sailing is original and so is the concept of the disparity between man's passion and woman's response. That man's love is an angel and woman's love the air, and the harmony of the two is necessary for the concretization and consummation of love provides a sane and fitting conclusion to the poem.

SONG: (GO AND CATCH A FALLING STAR)

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This song was posthumously published in 1633 in the volume entitled 'Songs and Sonnets'. It was written by Donne in his youth when he saw a good deal of London life. The subject of woman's inconstancy was a stock subject but Donne enlivened it with his personal experience. His gay life in London and his association with different women in London only confirmed his view about woman's faithlessness.

In this poem, the poet, through a series of images, shows the impossibility of discovering a true and faithful woman. While the poets following the Petrarchan tradition made of woman a heroine and a goddess, worthy of love and admiration, the metaphysical poets poked fun at woman's fashions, weakness and faithlessness. Shakespeare's maxim—"Frailty thy name is woman" —was quite popular in the age of Donne. The fickleness of woman could be more easily experienced than described. The cynical attitude to the fair sex in the early poems of Donne, is in contrast with the rational attitude to love and sex to be found in his later poems.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

According to Donne, it is impossible to fins; a loyal and chaste woman. Woman's inconstancy proved a popular subject with the Elizabethan and the Metaphysical poets. The poet, through irony and exaggeration suggests the impossibility of the undertaking to discover a true and fair woman. Fair women will have lovers and therefore it is not possible for them to be faithful to any of them. (Faithfulness on the part of an ugly and uninviting woman can be a possibility because she will not be able to attract lovers). The poet mentions a number of impossible tasks—catching a falling star or meteor, begetting a child on a mandrake root, memory of past years, finding the name of the person who clove the Devil's foot, listening to the music of the fabulous mermaids, changing human nature so as to make it indifferent to envy and jealousy or finding out the climate which would promote man's honesty. Just as it is impossible to do these jobs, in the same way it is impossible to find a faithful woman. Even if a man were to travel throughout the world for ten thousand days and nights—this would cover more than twenty-seven years—till his hair grew grey, he would not come across a faithful woman. He might have seen many wonderful scenes and sights, but he would not have seen the most wonderful sight of all—that of a true and fair woman.

A real pilgrimage: - The poet is very keen on discovering a true and fair woman if there be any such in the world. If any one tells the poet that there is such a woman, he would go on a pilgrimage to see her. She would really deserve his admiration and worship. The poet, however, feels that the journey will be futile, for even such woman's faithfulness will be temporary. By the time one writes a letter to her, she would have enjoyed with two or three lovers. Hence the poet despairs about seeing any constant woman.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

Though technically the poem is a 'song' which should have sweetness, lilt and smoothness, it has a lot of argument. The colloquial form of the poem—the speaking voice in a real situation—deserves attention. The rhythm is similar to that of speech rhythm which changes according to the needs of the argument. 'The breaking of the tetrameter form in lines seven and eight (with two syllables each) is a dramatic device that projects tension rather than irregularity, and indicates the stress that one would use in a dramatic reading. "The poet constantly indulges in dislocating the accepted rhythms, dropping his lines most unexpectedly (though always giving us pleasant surprises) but the final impression is not one of confession but of an inner logic of the poet's experience". The use of hyperbole is understandable: "Ten thousand days and nights till age snow white hairs on thee". The witty ironic reversal in the last stanza is a device commonly used by Donne. All his journey and trouble in finding a true and fair woman would result in 'love's labour lost'. The poet draws images from a wide field of knowledge—mythology, Christianity and legendary love. He proves his thesis with a masculine gusto and youthful vivacity.

A VALEDICTION: OF WEEPING

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

The poem A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning was written practically at the same time, when the poet was about to leave for a visit to a foreign country. The poet wants to tell his wife to take this temporary separation in her stride and neither to lament or weep, for after all, this will only disturb the peace of mind of both staying at different places. How to take a separation with tears or sighs or with patience and resignation, this is the theme of the poem. Playing on the image of floods and tides, the poet ultimately comes to the conclusion that mutual understanding and forebearance are necessary, for romantic lamenting and sighing will only increase their sorrow and frustration.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

In the beginning, the poet wants to weep out his heart—just to give an outlet to his pent-up feeling for his wife—because he is going out and this separation is intolerable. Of course, the poet's wife is as unhappy as the poet himself at the prospect of separation and loneliness. The poet's tears are worth something because they bear his wife's stamp—"thy face coins, them," but with copious tears, the two are reduced to nothing. It is therefore better that they should weep no more.

The poet compares the tear to a globe and the tears shed by his wife will overflow the world. His tears combined with hers, will cause a deluge and much unhappiness. In fact, the deluge will destroy both of them though they never intended that both of them should die thus Tides and storms: - The poet's wife, like the moon, is capable of causing high tides capable of drowning the poet. Similarly, her sighs are powerful enough to cause sea-storms which may hasten his death. So at the end, the poet suggests that they should desist from sighing 'one another's death' because it would be mutually destructive. The poet feels that weeping at the time of separation is natural, but it has to be reduced to the minimum because it will destroy the peace of mind of both of them.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

There is an organic development of imagery. One image leads to the other. For example the tear is first compared to a coin and this leads to the 'stamp', and the 'mint' and the 'sovereign' and the 'worth'. The tear is round like a globe; the globe has a number of continents; their profuse tears will drown the creation, the universe and thereby destroy it like the Deluge. The beloved is like the moon. She will cause 'tides' and 'storms' and subsequent 'death'. All these images are interlinked, and convey a sense of unified sensibility. There is another image of round and 'pregnant' tears. The tears are round and large like pregnancy, because they hold a reflection of the beloved inside them. Similarly, the falling of tears indicates the falling of the beloved, and thus being reduced to 'nothing'. The poet draws images from geography, theology and astronomy. Even so he does not lose his grip on reality. The situation of the impending separation is faced boldly and the need of poise and patience is stressed. William Empson writes in this connection: "Its passion exhausts itself; it achieves at the end the sense of reality he was looking for, and for some calm of mind."

A VALEDICTION: FORBIDDING MOURNING

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This is a personal poem showing the pure love and devotion of the poet to his beloved. Some persons feel that the poem is addressed to his wife Anne More.

The poet is about to leave in the end of 1611 for a short visit to France but this absence of a few weeks may not be taken as an occasion of separation and lamentation. The poet's wife was in a bad state of health. The poet shows the uniqueness of true love and that it can stand separation on account of mutual confidence and affection. This separation may be deemed like death, but as good men are not afraid of death, true lovers are not afraid of separation. This is not a farewell to love, but an exposition of true and devoted love which can stand the shock of temporary separation, because it is not based on sex or physical attraction.

The critics differ about the quality and type of argument used by Donne to console his partner. Helen Gardner thinks that this is 'not an argument to use to a wife who has no need to hide her grief at her husband's absence', and therefore the poem may be regarded as an address of a lover to his lady friend. Coleridge, however, remarked: "It is an admirable poem which none but Donne could have written. Nothing was ever more admirably made than the figure of the compass" Dr. Johnson disliked the image of the compass and observed: "To the comparsion of a man that travels and his wife stays at home with a pair of compasses, it may be doubted whether absurdity or ingenuity has the better claim". Grierson, however, admired it as 'the tenderest of Donne's love poems'. In spite of the differences of opinion there is no doubt that the love mentioned in the poem is pure and realistic.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The poet addresses his beloved to offer her consolation for his short absence. Just as virtuous men are not afraid of death, in the same way true lovers are not afraid of separation. Separation only tests their loyalty and devotion. Ordinary lovers who are addicted to sex may not be able to stand separation. Therefore, his beloved should neither shed tears nor heave sighs. This absence is a sort of touch-stone to test their mutual love.

Men are afraid of earthquakes and the damage caused by them. However, the movement of the heavenly bodies, though much greater and more violent, is quiet and harmless. Similarly, ordinary lovers may lament a separation but their love is so holy and pure that in spite of separation, they have no feeling of loneliness. Their love is so chaste and refined that physical absence does not matter to them at all. Their love is not based on physical enjoyment.

Pure love: - The lovers cannot define the nature and essence of their pure love. It is a refined love of the mind and has nothing to do with the joys of sex. Their souls are one. Temporary separation cannot cause a breach of love. Absence extends the domain and expanse of love. Just as gold is beaten to thinness and its purity is in no way affected, in the same way their pure love will expand and in no way lose its essence. The lovers are like a lump of gold and the quality of their love cannot change. The frontiers of their love will extend and their mutual confidence and loyalty will in no way be affected.

A pair of compasses: - Donne employs the conceit of 'twin compasses'. Their souls may be two but they are united at a centre like the two sides of a compass. The soul of the beloved is like the fixed foot of the compass as she stays at home. The poet's soul is like the other foot of the compass which moves, so to say in a circle. The fixed foot leans towards the moving foot, and afterwards, the moving foot rejoins the fixed foot. The rejoining of the encircling foot suggests the return of the poet to his beloved and their union—in spite of their separate identities—is the very consummation and joy of love. The poet proves that in spite of separation, the lovers are united in mutual affection and loyalty. James Reeves writes in this connection: "We are like the two legs of a pair of compasses, you are the fixed one in the centre. Further my soul goes from yours, the more yours leans towards mine; and as mine comes home, so yours revives. Your soul is the centre of my being, and keeps mine constant as it circles round you."

CRITICAL COMMENTS

The poem consists of nine quartrains and is quite smooth in its rhythm. However, its images and conceits enrich its significance. The comparison of separation to death is obvious. Just as good people face death patiently and quietly, in the same way, true lovers face separation willingly. Ordinary lovers may view separation as an earthquake because their love is based on the physical relationship. True lovers are like the heavenly bodies, the movement of which is greater and violent but causes no injury or harm. Holy love is not affected by movement or change of environment. There is another conceit of the gold beaten to thinness. The quality of the gold remains unaffected though its area and its dimensions increase. In the same way, the quality of love remains constant in spite of the extension of the gambit of love. The best conceit of the stiff twin compasses is extremely appropriate and fits the theme like a glove. The individuality of the lover is maintained while their basic unity, is symbolised by the screw which fixes the two sides of the compass. This fixed foot rotates while the moving foot revolves in a circle and then gets rejoined to the fixed foot. While moving foot circumscribes, the fixed foot leaves it, showing the mutuality and interdependence of the two. In this connection A. J. Smith writes:

"The subject of this poem is a metaphysical problem; that of the union of the lovers even when they are separated…It is in the very respect in which they are separated, that he wishes to show his lovers are united. The souls are one substance, which has the invisibility of air, but also the obvious unity of a lump of gold. It is to stress this last point that the compasses are brought in. For gold, though originally solid enough, falls under suspicion of being likely to vanish away, once it has been compared to air. Compasses do not vanish; they have not the remotest connection either with physical or metaphysical subtlety. Hence, once the needful subtlety has been expanded, they close the poem and symbolize it—not, however, by their oddity."

The strength of the poem lies in its argument and the use of appropriate conceits and images. Sometimes hyperbole is used to emphasise a point that "tears" are floods and 'sighs' are tempests. The poet has been able to prove his point that his absence is no cause for mourning for his beloved because their love is pure and constant.

THE RELIC

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This is one of the important poems addressed to Mrs. Magdelen Herbert who was the poet's friend and benefactor. It would be difficult to imagine as some people feel that this poem might refer to some other woman whom Donne knew in his youth.

Moreover, some other poems also connected with Herbert, like The Blossom, and The Funeral, make one feel that this poem too refers to the poet's same friend. There was nothing wrong in writing about a married woman. One of the Petrarchan ways of courtship was the poet's addressing and worshipping the lady from a distance and deriving a sort of vicious satisfaction from holy love. His Platonic love for the lady is reflected in the poem 'Relic' means a part or momento of some holy person or some souvenir or keep-sake worshipped after his death and which is supposed to have miraculous powers. The lover has got a relic—a bracelet of bright hair from his beloved and he keeps it tied round his wrist. After his death, this relic will continue to remain on his body and this will be an object of adoration or worship for the later generation of lovers. It is not only a symbol of love but also a sort of miracle because it shows that love is independent of physical wish. This sort of holy or sex-less love is indeed a miracle. It represents a mirror of souls where even the difference of sex is obliterated.

Moreover, in this kind of pure love, the lovers did not know what they loved and why they loved. This nuptial and Platonic love defies description and is beyond the powers of language and communication.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The poem begins with a horrible situation—some persons are digging the poet's grave in order to bury some other dead body. There is a dig at woman's constancy because a grave can accommodate more than one corpse at a time. The person digging his grave will find a 'bracelet of bright hair about the bone'. How it is possible to find 'bright hair' when the grave is full of dust and insects, is not explained by the poet. The digger will think that it is the grave of a loving couple and the bracelet of hair is a device to make the souls meet at the grave on the Day of Judgement and stay for a little while together.

Wishful adoration: - If the grave is dug in some heathen age or land, the bracelet will be brought to the king or the Bishop to be blessed and recognized as a Relic. The hair shall perhaps be regarded as a relic of Mary Magdalen and the poet's bones as those of Christ or some other saint. Such relics will be worshipped by the lovers for its miraculous powers. The later lovers will feel that their love will be rewarded with success if they worship the relic.

Miracles of love: - The poet and his beloved were engaged in a sort of Platonic love-relationship. They did not know what they loved in each other and why, though they loved 'well and faithfully'. Moreover, their love was not dependent on sexual relationship. Their love was 'independent of the difference of sex just as the love of guardian angels is not physical but spiritual. Their love was based on a close affinity between the two souls. The lovers may have exchanged formal courtesies of kissing at the time of meeting or separation, but there was nothing more than that Donne seems to suggest that the state of nature permitted free physical sex while our human laws have restricted sexual freedom. This may have a reference to the marriage of his lady-friend to Mr. Herbert. His love has been restricted by the lady's marriage and as such his love can now only be 'Platonic', such a love cannot be described in words. The greatest miracle is that this was a sexless and pure love arid the beauty of the beloved is almost unsurpassed. She is a miracle of beauty and object of holy devotion.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

In spite of the poet's adoration of his beloved in a mood of Platonic love, he cannot help satirising the sex in general. In the lines three and four he has a fling at the inconstancy of woman because his beloved, like any woman, can have more than one man in her bed. Secondly, he lashes at women for their superstition in worshipping the bracelet of bright hair as a relic—"All women shall adore us." He thinks that men are not so foolish or superstitious as women. Therefore, the relic will be adored by 'some men'.

Three-fold theme: - The poem deals with love, death and religion. Pure love, as presented in this poem defies death. At the same time, this love lives through a momento or souvenir—'the bracelet of bright hair'. There is a kind of contradiction as this pure love is dependent on a small bit of hair. If it were a true union of souls it would not need such a flimsy token. The idea of death is emphasised by the grave and the Day of Judgment. Religion is brought in through the Bishop, "the last busy day', 'Mary Magdalen' and 'guardian angels'. The worship of the poet and his beloved as saints of love alter their death is a great tribute to their holy love. In fact, love becomes as sacred as religion. The three topics are intimately related to one another.

Philosophy of love: - Here, the poet deals with a higher and spiritual love. It is based on 'feelings' and mutual understanidng. This kind of spiritual love is seldom found in the world. This sort of holy love is a sort of miracle both for man and woman.

Style: - The poem consists of three stanzas, each of eleven lines. The fifth and seventh lines are shorter than the rest. This is a poem of fancy where the miracle of hair in the grave sets the ball rolling. The unusual comparisons—grave and woman, lovers and guardian-angels, the beloved and Mary Magdalen add to the charm of the poem. The laws injuring the otherwise seals of nature set free is also a fanciful figure of speech. All in all, we must admire the originality of the poem and the fancies which are enriched by Donne's sallies against woman.

THE FLEA

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

The flea has been the subject of love-poetry. The argument used by the poet is that the flea has a free access to the body of the beloved which is denied to the lover. Donne, however, makes a plea for physical union, which is necessary for spiritual love. Donne's originality and intensity makes it a powerful lyric. Grierson observes: "It is a strange choice to our mind, but apparently the poem was greatly admired as a masterpiece." Coleridge paid a tribute in a poem:

> Thrice-honoured fleas; great you all as Donne
> In Phoebus archives registered are ye,
> And this your patent of nobility.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The flea is a symbol of the poet's passionate plea for physical and sensuous love. The lover speaks to his beloved as he points to the flea which has sucked her blood. The flea has also sucked his blood and therefore the bloods of the lover and the beloved have mixed in its body. It has brought about a union of two bloods. The flea has enjoyed union with the beloved without any courtship or marriage. This is not considered as a matter of sin or shame or loss of virginity. The flea is superior to the lover because it can enjoy physical union without the formality of marriage.

Triple murder: - Donne goes a step further. He compares the flea to a temple and to a marriage bed. Just as the two lovers are united in the temple in a bond of marriage, so the two bloods have been united in the body of the flea. Its body is a sacred temple where their marriage has taken place. Similarly, their blood has mingled in the body of the flea and so its (flea's) body is like their marriage bed. The two have mixed up in the body of the flea in spite of her objections and those of her parents. Her killing the flea would be an act of triple murder—murder of the flea, murder of the lover and her own murder. This is a sin and so she must spare the flea.

No loss of honour: - The beloved kills the flea and the poet feels unhappy. He chides her for her cruelty. What, after all, was the crime of the flea? She sucked the blood of both. Sucking a drop of her blood has not made her weak; she has also not lost her honour or chastity. Just as she has felt no weaker and lost no honour by the sucking of the blood by the flea, in the same way, her physical union with the lover will not affect either her health or her honour. She should, therefore, willingly surrender herself to her lover. The poet has rejected the notions of honour or chastity which are generally held out as arguments against sexual indulgence. Even spiritual love has its prelude in physical love. Why should his beloved object to his overtures?

CRITICAL COMMENTS

Donne uses new images and conceits to advantage through the flea-bite. First, the mingling of the bloods of the lover and the beloved in the body of the flea is no matter of sin or shame. The flea has brought about the mingling of the blood of the two and therefore there should be no objection to their sex-relationship. The conceit of the flea as a temple and as a marriage-bed is original, so also the sin of triple-murder by the proposed crushing of the flea by the beloved. When the beloved has killed the flea with her nails, the poet regards it as shedding blood of innocence. Her victory over the flea is imaginary rather than real. She will lose as much honour by sexual relationship with the poet as the honour lost by the flea-bite.

Donne believes in physical relationship between the lovers. Sex is above fear or shame. The world of the lovers is different from the ordinary world. However, critics differ about the justification of sex-relationship. James Keeve calls the poem "cynical and unpleasant", while A.J. Smith regards it anti-courtly and anti-Petrarchan. There is no doubt that the poet's plea for physical union is both personal and original. The poem is remarkable for its emotional intensity and vigour.

THE GOOD MORROW

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This is one of the finest poems of Donne explaining the complex nature of love. Initially, love has an element of fun and sex. It is like the dark night—an experience which is hot quite clear. But with the dawn, the true nature of things is revealed. The title suggests the dawn of the true love, its essential quality and the mutual understanding and confidence between the souls of the lover and the beloved. This kind of pure love provides a complete world to the lovers—a world without coldness, fear and decay. It is much better than the physical world. This perfect love is neither subject to time nor death.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

In the beginning, the poet examines the nature of the first experiences of love. The first set of experiences is childish—the physical joys of love. The second set of experiences is much richer—it is the experience of spiritual love in which the voices of one soul are echoed by the other soul. The mature experiences of love make one disregard the first foolish acts of love, when so to say, the souls were asleep in the den of seven sleepers. The poet can only dream of true love in the first stage. The atmosphere of sleep, stupor and dream shows the fleeting and unstable nature of this kind of immature love.

The dawn of true love: - The past life spent in childish love was a sort of dream and blank. The night of oblivion and unreality is about to end. The dawn of true love is imminent and it awakens the soul of lovers to the meaning of true love. This true love makes them open out their hearts to each other, without any fear or inhibition. Their love for each other is all-absorbing and all-satisfying. They have no delight in other scenes or places. Each is like a world to the other. This world of love is everywhere. The poet is happy with the world of love. Let sailors discover new worlds and make charts and maps of the lands they have discovered. On the other hand, the lovers are content in their own worlds. Each of them has a world, but the two worlds of the two lovers put together, make one world of love.

The two hemispheres: - As the lovers look at each other, each of them sees his own image in the other's eyes. Their looks reflect the simplicity, purity and honesty of their hearts. Their two faces may be compared to two hemispheres which together make up a whole world. The two hemispheres of the faces of lovers are better than the geographical hemispheres, because they do not have the 'sharp North' and the 'declining West'. The 'sharp North' implies coldness and indifference—to which their love is not subject—and the 'declining West' symbolises decay and death from which the lovers are free. According to certain philosophers, when different elements, which go into the making of a thing, are not harmoniously mixed, the thing is liable to decay and death. This is not true of their love because their love is harmonious, and is sweet-blooded. As such their love is immortal and beyond the vagaries of time and clime.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

In his inimitable way, Donne begins the poem with a question—what thou and I did till we loved? This rhetoric easily captures the attention of the reader. The poet compares the first stage of love—sex and enjoyment—with the mature type of love, the harmonious relationship of two souls. There is a lot of difference between the two types of love. The poet's wit is seen in his contrast between the two worlds—the worlds of the lovers and the geographical world. There is no 'sharp North' or 'declining West' in the world of lovers. It is a mutual love equal in quality and spirit—balanced and harmonised in such a manner that it is not subject to time or decay. The poet proceeds from the night-scene and the experience of sleepy love to the morning of pure love which gives him a new life and makes him discover a world in their little room. No navigator has ever found a world as wonderful as the world of love. This discovery of true love is as welcome as the greeting of a new day.

Donne's manner is that of 'concentration' advancing the argument in stages, reasoning till he is able to prove his point and drive it home to the reader. Like an able lawyer he presses his point in such a manner that it is very hard to refute it. Moreover, hemarshalls his images from different sources in such a way that the cumulative effect is irresistible. Grierson rightly points out that the imagery has been drawn from a variety of sources, i.e. myths of everyday life, e.g. 'the seven sleepers' den, 'suck'd on country pleasures' and 'wishing in the morning', 'one-little room'; the geographical world, 'sea-discoveries', 'Maps', 'hemispheres'; and lastly, the scholastic philosophy 'what-ever dyes, was not mixt equally'. The relation between one object and the other is made intellectually rather than verbally.

Donne's method in spite of his scholarly references is not pedantic and appeals to the lay reader by its sincerity and sharp reasoning.

THE CANONIZATION

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

Love has been an object of fun and hair-splitting with the metaphysical poets. Donne has also dealt with different moods of love and has played with its several fancies and visions. In this poem, however, he has taken a positive and serious view of love. It is a selfless and saintly affection as worthy of respect as worship. Here we find his great devotion to Anne Moore—his beloved—though the marriage marred his career and brought him into disrepute. The main idea is that his love does not interfere with the lives of others and so why should they take exception to it. Donne's passion is physical and the lovers really believe in sexual indulgence. Their bodies become one and so do their souls, as in a religious mystery.'

The paradox: - Donne treats physical love as if it were divine love. Saints are canonized for their renunciation of the world and its comforts. In the same way, the lovers have renounced the material world. The love of Donne for his beloved causes no damage or injury to the society or to the world. Other people continue to carry on their normal daily chores and duties. The lovers have lost the world but gained more in the world of each other. The lovers are, so to say, dead to the world. They have, therefore, deserved the status of saints. They are the saints whose blessings other lovers will invoke. The lovers are devoted to each other as a saint is devoted to God. Some people may regard it as paradox of Christian Canonization, but there is no doubt that the tone of the poem is both serious and convincing.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The debate: - Donne begins his argument with a friend who dissuades him from love-making. He tells him to stop his nonsensical talk and allow him to love. Let his friend regard his love as a natural or hereditary disease. Let his friend mind his own business and look after his own career and fortune.

Love is harmless: - After all, the poet's love does not cause any harm or damage to anyone. It does not disturb the even flow of social life. His sighs and tears have caused no offence to anyone. People are busy in their own affairs. His profession is love and so why should anyone take objection to it

Secret of love: - The poet deals with the secret of love. Love is an association or union of two persons. Human isolation is awful; the lovers find mutual satisfaction in love. They are like flies and tapers which enjoy being consumed to extinction. Like the Phoenix, the lovers are resurrected from their ashes. Both are consumed by the fire of passion and out of this consummation emanates their resurrection. Physical love is elevated to the plane of spiritual love.

Life beyond death: - The poet and his beloved are prepared to die for love if they cannot live by love. The tale of their death will form the subject of love poets. Their love will be commemorated in lyric and sonnets. They will attain the status of saints of love. People will copy their love and regard it as a model.

Martyr-saints: - Lovers will worship the poet and his beloved as the martyrs to love. Lovers will invoke the blessings of these martyr saints. Love will bring them both peace and solace. Like them other lovers will devote themselves entirely to their respective beloveds. Each will find in his beloved the whole soul of the world. The lovers will pray to God to grant them the same kind of true love which the poet and the beloved enjoyed while living in the world.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

Mark the sudden and dramatic opening line of the poem. The first two stanzas are rhetorical full of contempt and rebuff for those who argue against love. There is a lot of hyperbole. Can 'sighs' turn into 'sea storms' or 'tears' cause floods or the 'heat of passion' cause plagues. Donne uses these metaphors to laugh at the Petrarchan paraphernalia of love. Donne also laughs at two good professions—soldiering and litigation which make fun of love.

Organic imagery is a strong point of the poem. The two lovers moving round each other like flies or again consuming themselves like tapers; or again the images of the eagle and the dove—the violent one preying on the weak, and ultimately the riddle of the Phoenix indicate the whole process of love from courtship to consummation of love. Though they are two, they are one, of the neutral sex like the Phoenix. As the Phoenix is reborn from its ashes, the lovers are reborn (revitalised) after sexual indulgence. In fact, Donne treats physical love like divine love. The canonization which leads to the lovers being regarded as the martyr saints of love will make them a model of love. The 'rage' of love will be transformed into peace. The lovers need no mention in history-books or any monuments or inscriptions. Donne's wit is seen in his mention of the King's face—the real one in the court, the fake one stamped on coins. The lovers' eyes are the mirrors in which each sees the reflection or the image of the other. Each eye contains the whole world with its countries, towns and courts. In short, the poem shows the craftsmanship of Donne at its best.

THE FUNERAL

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

This poem is a mixture of light-heartedness and seriousness. The poet has been rejected by his beloved. In sheer desperation and agony he wishes to sacrifice his life as a martyr on the altar of the god of love.

But in the meantime, he has secured a token of love from his beloved. This is a lock of her hair which he has worn round his arm. He thinks that the beloved's hair will preserve his dead body and prevent it from decay and disintegration. It is a kind of charm or rather an embodiment of the outward soul which will give him immortality. The poet ultimately wishes to die as a martyr but fearing that the hair may be worshipped as a relic, he wants it to be buried in the grave along with him. This will be a sort of revenge on the cruel beloved, because some part of her body will be in the grave while she is still alive.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The idea of the bracelet of the beloved's hair worn by the poet is the central theme of another, poem called The Relic. There the poet mentions that the hair is a sort of device which will make the souls of the lover and the beloved meet at the grave and spend some time together before the Day of Judgment. The bracelet of hair will also be regarded as a relic, sought by all men and women in need of love. This relic will be expected to perform miracles and bring success to lovers. In this poem, however, the hair is supposed to save the lover's dead body from disintegration. Secondly, the hair is a sort of a hand-cuff or fetter for causing pain to lover. The poet wants the hair buried with him as a sort of revenge on his beloved for his rejection. So, the bracelet of hair worn by the lover leads to an entirely different situation in this poem.

The poet wants no one to take away or destroy the bracelet of hair on his arm because it is a kind of charm which will preserve the limbs of the body. Just as the brain controls all the parts of the body, in the same way, her hair will hold together the limbs of his body in an organic whole. Perhaps the beloved never thought of this. She thought that her hair was a kind of charm or manacle to cause suffering to the lover. The poet, however, feels that he must punish the beloved for rejecting his love. He will commit suicide and thereby become love's martyr. He will have the satisfaction of carrying a part of the beloved to the grave. If she could not save him from dying, he could not help burying a part of her body.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

The poem contains three stanzas of eight lines each. Lines two, five and seven are comparatively short. This is a typical poem which uses the conceit of the hair which first causes some satisfaction and then some justification and anguish. The poet uses the image of the soul and the brain for the function performed by the hair. Then he compares the hair to manacles and as such a source of pain and suffering. Finally, the hair may become a relic and a piece of idolatry. All these fanciful images are used by the poet in order to express his anger and frustration. All in all, the poem records a series of moods or attitudes of the rejected lover centred on the subtle wreath of the beloved's hair on his arm.

THE SUN RISING

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

"The Sun Rising" is a typical poem by Donne, characterised by his usual vigour, sprightliness and freshness. It is a "saucy, muscular poem". It expresses a lover's vexation against sun-rising. The dawn is regarded as an impertinence which comes to disturb the lovers. The poet is delightfully out-spoken and defiant. He ridicules the sun as a "saucy pedantic wretch" and calls in question his right to peep through windows and curtains of a lover's bed-room. There is defiance, contempt, perfect love and the deftly moving shuttle of metaphysical conceit. The supremacy of love which transcends both time and space, for it knows 'no season and no climes' is established with a daring jugglery of words.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

This poem, like most of Donne's love-poems is inspired by the poet's love for his wife, Anne Moore. Donne's love amounts to a passion. It is a perfect synthesis of the spiritual and physical love. There are brilliant metaphysical conceits in the second and third stanzas of the poem. For example, the beloved is supposed to be combining in herself all the fragrance and the gold of East and West Indies:

> Look and to-morrow late tell me,
> Whether both th' Indias of spice and mine,
> Be where though left'st them, or lie here with me.

The lover and the beloved are compared to all the states and all the princes of the world, rolled into one:

> She's all slates, and all princes I;
> Nothing else is;

The lover's bed room is considered to be the epitome of the whole world.

> Shine here on us and thou art everywhere.

The poem is singularly free from the conventional and sentimental clap trap of love that was such a marked feature of Elizabethan love poetry. Donne's beloved rises superior to all the Elizabethan sweet-hearts in-as-much as she is an exalted being—she is all the states of the world rolied into one, she combines in herself all the fragrance of spices and all the gold of rich mine.

CRITICAL COMMENTS

A successful love poem: -The Sun Rising is one of the most successful love—poems of Donne. As a poet of love he can be an extreme realist and deals with the physical side of it as also its spiritual side. Here he treats of a situation very significant for wedded lovers, but unusual in the poetry of love—two lovers in bed who refuse to get up when the sun shines on them in the morning.

Language—bold and extravagant: - The poet chides the sun in language which for its boldness is unmatched in lyric poetry. The sun is a busy, and old fool; it is a saucy, and pedantic wretch. It can go and chide late school boys and apprentices, but has no jurisdiction over the poet and his wife. Lover's seasons do not run to the motions of the sun:

> Love, all alike, no season knows nor clime,

Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

Full or metaphysical conceits: - In expressing his contempt for the sun, the poet displays all his learning and metaphysical wit, and extravagant conceit and employed in glorifying his beloved. Recent geographical discoveries supply him with the image of "both the Indias of spice and mine" (India and the West Indies and America). His wife is to him these two Indias in one.

Extravagant fancy: - The poet's extravagant fancy discovers that he and his beloved in their secure possession of each other, are like all states and princes to each other. Princes only imitate them. She is all the world contracted into one feminine form and hence, by shining on her, the sun performs his duty towards the whole earth. Following up this conceit, the poet says that if the sun shines on him and his wife, it is, in a sense, shining everywhere—the bed becomes its centre and the walls of the bed room its sphere.

Conclusion: - The poem is remarkable for its boldness of thought and originality of execution. The way in which the sun is made to appear as an unwelcome guest and the way in which he is finally allowed to stay in the bedroom of the lovers, are the most striking examples of Donne's poetic inventiveness and ingenuity. The poet after establishing the supremacy of love, permits the sun, (in a very patronising manner, of course) to stay in his bed-room.

In this poem, the lover chides (rebukes) sun-rising because it disturbs the lovers. Love is above the sense of time. It knows no hours, days or months. The sun should not call on lovers; it should call on school apprentices, courtiers and country ants. Love knows no season nor clime. The whole world has contracted into the lover's bed-room. Thus the sun need not go round the earth, it should only pay a visit to the lover's bedroom and it would meet the whole world there.

THE ECSTASY

CRITICAL APPRECIATION

It is a complex and metaphysical poem dealing with the twin aspects of love—physical and spiritual. Some critics like Legouis find in it a plan for seduction with emphasis on the physical nature of love, while others like Helen Gardner find in it an affirmation of spiritual love. In fact, it deals with the relationship of the body and the soul in love.

What is 'extasie'? : - 'Extasie' is essentially a religous experience in which the individual soul, ignoring the body, holds converse with Divinity. It is a feeling of trance, of spiritual exaltation, and of Samadhi where the individual has a vision of the divine. Donne applies the feeling to the experience of the lovers and finds that the essence of love is not sex but an overpowering feeling of unity in diversity. In fact, true love is an activity of the soul. A new soul emanates from the two individual souls and makes the lover realise that love is, in its pure essence, spiritual. Donne has also interpreted love in a philosophic way. Love is an idea or a concept concretized through physical enjoyment of sex. He has also interpreted it according to the Platonic concept the desire of the moth for the star, longing of one soul to seek communication with another. Another idea introduced in the poem has been borrowed from astronomy. Just as heavenly bodies are moved by "intelligences" i.e., angelic spirits, in the same way souls are the motivating forces in human love, though they have no existence of their own. They are linked with the body, which is the overt and apparent machinery for love-making. The soul expresses itself through the body. In other words, the body is a medium used by the soul to achieve the consummation of love. Thus the poem uses a religious and mystical experience to interpret the complexity and depth of secular love.

DEVELOPMENT OF THOUGHT

The physical setting: - The first stanza provides the physical setting of the two lovers. On the bank of a river over grown with violet flowers, the lovers sit quiet, looking into each other's eyes and holding hands firmly. This physical closeness offers a romantic and pastoral setting—their hands cemented in mutual confidence and the eyes as if strung on a thread. This sensually exciting scene is a forerunner to the actual physical union.

The poet compares the two lovers to the two armies. The souls are like the negotiators. They are not committed to either side. Only those who are gifted can understand the dialogue of the two souls, and realize the true nature of love.

True nature of love: - The communication of the souls of lovers reveals the true essence of love. Love is not sex-experience. It is rather a union of two souls. Each soul appears to keep its identity and as in horticulture, by transplantation the plant grows stronger and better, the new soul has a great strength and vitality. The fusion of the two souls is the real consummation of love. The new soul is composed of 'atoms' which are beyond decay. Just as the essence of the individual is not the body but the soul, in the same way, the essence of love is not sex but mutual dependence and affection. The body is no dross, but an alloy necessary for pure metals to become stronger. The body is the channel for the souls to inter-communicate with each other.

Is love physical or spiritual? : - To this old and complex question, Donne has a satisfactory answer. Love is dependent both on the soul and body. Love has to be concretized. This is possible only through the physical play of love. Donne feels that physical love is enriched by the mutual understanding of the souls of the two lovers. Spiritual love is not possible in a vacuum. Like heavenly beings who influence the actions of men through manifestation, the souls must express themselves through the bodies. The poet feels that an isolated soul is like a captive prince. Souls must return to the bodies and manifest the mystery of love. As from the blood comes strength and vigour which acts as an agent of the soul and binds together elements which go into the making of man, so the body and the sense organs are at the disposal and service of the lovers' souls, otherwise the soul cannot express themselves. The body is the book of the love. Great mystics have also pleaded for the evolution of physical love towards holy or divine love.

Finally, the poet feels that love ripens in the soul. As such, physical love and holy love are complementary. If some lover observes the poet and his beloved, he will hardly find any change in their behaviour when the lovers return to their bodies.

CRITICAL REMARKS

The poet employs an unusual desire through 'extasie' which means 'to stand out". The souls of the poet and his beloved as it were, stand out of their respective bodies and hold a dialogue revealing the true nature of their love. In a religious 'extasie' the soul holds a communication with God. Here the conversation is not between the soul and God but between two souls. Donne has artistically explained the religious and philosophical belief to throw light on physical and sensuous love. The greatness of the poem lies in reconciling the opposites—physical love with spiritual love, metaphysical belief with the scientific, the abstract with the concrete, the human element with the non-human. The images and the conceits are carefully selected to support the poet's views. The romantic setting in the beginning of the poem sets the mood of physical love—the violet flowers, the holding of hands and the cementing of the balms and the threading of the eye beams. The physical aspect of love must precede the spiritual union. Then comes the image of two armies and the soul acting as negotiator. Then, there are the images of the new soul—emanating out of the two souls — stronger and abler because it is made out of ‘atoms’. The inter-dependence of the body and the soul is expressed through metaphors. The souls are moving spirits, while the bodies are the ’sphere’ in which the ’intelligences’ move. Just as the stars and planets give rise to natural phenomena which affect the fortunes of human beings, in the same way the soul must find expression through the body. Just as the spirits of blood unite the physical and metaphysical in love, so souls express themselves through the five senses in the body. The image of the body as lovers, is very vivid and convincing.

The poet shifts quickly from the physical to the spiritual and therefore this poem has an edge over other metaphysical poems. The very fact that critics disagree about the objective of the poem—seduction or spiritual transport—shows the complexity and the diversity of possible interpretations. On the whole, the critics praise the poet for his excellent performance. Coleridge said: “I would never find fault with metaphysical poems, were they all like this(Extasie) or just half as excellent.” James Smith commended the poem in the following words: “Donne does not write about many things; he is content with the identity of lovers as lovers, and their diversity as the human beings in which love manifests itself, the stability and self sufficiency of love, contrasted with the mutability and dependence of human beings; with the presence of lovers to each other, their physical unity, though they are separated by travel and death, the spirit demanding the succour of the flesh hampering the spirit, the shortcoming of this life, summarised by decay and death, contrasted with the divine to which it aspires.”

For reconciling the dichotomy between the flesh and the sensuous and the sublime, particularly in this poem, Donne deserves credit.

Pride and Prejudice

JANE AUSTEN; 1775-1817

Jane Austen was born in Steventon, England, in 1775, where she lived for the first twenty-five years of her life. Her father, George Austen, was the rector of the local parish and taught her largely at home. She began to write while in her teens and completed the original manuscript of Pride and Prejudice, titled First Impressions, between 1796 and 1797. A publisher rejected the manuscript, and it was not until 1809 that Austen began the revisions that would bring it to its final form. Pride and Prejudice was published in January 1813, two years after Sense and Sensibility, her first novel, and it achieved a popularity that has endured to this day. Austen published four more novels: Mansfield Park, Emma, Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion. The last two were published in 1818, a year after her death.

During Austen's life, however, only her immediate family knew of her authorship of these novels. At one point, she wrote behind a door that creaked when visitors approached; this warning allowed her to hide manuscripts before anyone could enter. Though publishing anonymously prevented her from acquiring an authorial reputation, it also enabled her to preserve her privacy at a time when English society associated a female's entrance into the public sphere with a reprehensible loss of femininity. Additionally, Austen may have sought anonymity because of the more general atmosphere of repression pervading her era. As the Napoleonic Wars (1800–1815) threatened the safety of monarchies throughout Europe, government censorship of literature proliferated.

The social milieu of Austen's Regency England was particularly stratified, and class divisions were rooted in family connections and wealth. In her work, Austen is often critical of the assumptions and prejudices of upper-class England. She distinguishes between internal merit (goodness of person) and external merit (rank and possessions). Though she frequently satirizes snobs, she also pokes fun at the poor breeding and misbehavior of those lower on the social scale. Nevertheless, Austen was in many ways a realist, and the England she depicts is one in which social mobility is limited and class-consciousness is strong.

Socially regimented ideas of appropriate behavior for each gender factored into Austen's work as well. While social advancement for young men lay in the military, church, or law, the chief method of self-improvement for women was the acquisition of wealth. Women could only accomplish this goal through successful marriage, which explains the ubiquity of matrimony as a goal and topic of conversation in Austen's writing. Though young women of Austen's day had more freedom to choose their husbands than in the early eighteenth century, practical considerations continued to limit their options.

Even so, critics often accuse Austen of portraying a limited world. As a clergyman's daughter, Austen would have done parish work and was certainly aware of the poor around her. However, she wrote about her own world, not theirs. The critiques she makes of class structure seem to include only the middle class and upper class; the lower classes, if they appear at all, are generally servants who seem perfectly pleased with their lot. This lack of interest in the lives of the poor may be a failure on Austen's part, but it should be understood as a failure shared by almost all of English society at the time.

In general, Austen occupies a curious position between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Her favorite writer, whom she often quotes in her novels, was Dr. Samuel Johnson, the great model of eighteenth-century classicism and reason. Her plots, which often feature characters forging their respective ways through an established and rigid social hierarchy, bear similarities to such works of Johnson's contemporaries as Pamela, written by Samuel Richardson. Austen's novels also display an ambiguity about emotion and an appreciation for intelligence and natural beauty that aligns them with Romanticism. In their awareness of the conditions of modernity and city life and the consequences for family structure and individual characters, they prefigure much Victorian literature (as does her usage of such elements as frequent formal social gatherings, sketchy characters, and scandal).

Jane Austen's life resembles her novels — at first glance they seem to be composed of a series of quiet, unexceptional events. Such an impression is supported by the comment of her brother, Henry, who wrote after her death that her life was "not by any means a life of event." Similarly, her nephew James added in a biography published fifty years later that "Of events her life was singularly barren: few changes and no great crisis ever broke the smooth current of its course." However, just as readers find that the complexity of Austen's novel lies in its characters and style, those studying Austen herself discover that the events of her life are secondary to her compelling personality, quick wit, and highly-developed powers of observation. The fact that Austen's life lacked the drama that other authors may have experienced in no way detracted from her skill as a writer. In actuality, Austen's lack of "extraordinary" experiences, as well as of a spouse and children, probably made her writing possible by freeing her time to work on her books. Additionally, because her books were published anonymously, Austen never achieved personal recognition for her works outside of her sphere of family and friends. Such anonymity suited her, for, as literary critic Richard Blythe notes, "Literature, not the literary life, was always her intention."

Historical Context for Pride and Prejudice

Late Eighteenth-Century Britain and the Regency Period: - Jane Austen's brief life and writing career overlapped with one of the most transformative eras in British history, marked by revolution abroad and unrest at home. The signing of the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the year after Austen's birth, signaled the start of the American Revolution, followed in the next decade by the beginning of the French Revolution in 1789. For the next two decades, Britain was engaged almost without cease in the Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars of 1793–1815, one of the most significant conflicts in British history. Among the effects of England's foreign wars during this period were great financial instability and monetary volatility. The precariousness of the late eighteenth-century was followed in the 1810s and 1820s by what is known as the Regency period. The Regency officially began in 1811, when King George III went permanently insane and his son George, Prince of Wales, was sanctioned to rule England in his place as Regent. The political Regency lasted until 1820, when George IV was crowned. However, the Regency period has also come to refer more generally to the early decades of the nineteenth century before the start of Victoria's reign in 1837, during which the Prince Regent provided a great deal of support for the development of the arts and sciences that flourished during this period. Austen would have witnessed, moreover, the beginning of industrialization in England, though the growth of the factory system would not reach its peak until the middle of the nineteenth century. Outside of the genteel world we see in Pride and Prejudice, a third of the country's population lived on the verge of starvation, spurring food riots across the countryside. This unrest was compounded by Luddite protestors who attacked new industrial machinery (a practice called "machine breaking") in demonstrations that were a precursor to labor strikes. As these demonstrations spread fear of a revolution in England, the government responded with repressive measures that sharply curtailed freedom of speech.

War with France: - Stretching over twenty-two years, Britain's war with France affected every level of British society. While an estimated quarter of a million men were serving in the regular army, a militia of officers and volunteers in the southeast coast of England (the region where Austen was from) mobilized for what was thought to be an impending invasion by Napoleon. Austen had a close connection to the militia, as her brother Henry joined the Oxfordshire militia in 1793. Though the rural countryside in which Austen's novels are set seems at a far remove from the tumultuousness of the period, the world of Pride and Prejudice bears the traces of turmoil abroad. As Gillian Russell writes, "The hum of wartime, if not the blast or cry of battle, pervades [Austen's] fiction."[1] The presence of the troops at Brighton and militia officers like Wickham reflect wider concerns about the place of the military in English civil society.

The Landed Gentry: - The novel is also embedded within a set of domestic concerns over property, money and status that highlight the changing social landscape of late eighteenth and early nineteenth-century England. Austen's novels portray the gentry, a broad social class that includes those who owned land (the country or landed gentry) as well as the professional classes (lawyers, doctors and clergy) who did not. Though industrialization and urbanization had begun to take hold at the end of the eighteenth century, the most influential sector of society in Austen's time was the landed gentry. Throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, ownership of English land was concentrated in the hands of the relatively small landed classes, who retained their hold over the land through a system that encouraged the consolidation and extension of estates by enforcing strict inheritance laws. Entails of the kind referred to in the novel were established during this period in order to concentrate wealth and enlarge estates by funneling property to male children or male relatives rather than breaking it up and distributing it amongst family members. Thus, Mr. Bennett's land is left not to his daughters but to a (male) member of his extended family, Mr. Collins, ensuring that the property stays in the family line, while disinheriting Elizabeth and her sisters. Large country estates, of the kind Darcy and Mr. Bingley own, served as a symbol of the wealth and power of the landed gentry.

Marriage and Gender Roles: - As we see in the novel, questions of land ownership and inheritance are closely interlinked with courtship and marriage. In the late eighteenth century, English conceptions of family and the role of women began to change, as British culture became increasingly focused on the accumulation and concentration of wealth within the family. One way for families to rapidly accumulate capital was through advantageous marriages. As a result, the position of daughters within the family changed, as they became the means through which a family could attain greater wealth. Familial aspirations, coupled with women's increased dependence on marriage for financial survival, made courtship a central focus of women's lives.

At the same time, the late eighteenth century also witnessed a transformation in the conception of women's rights following the publication of Mary Wollstonecraft's Vindication of the Rights of Woman in 1792. In the Vindication, Wollstonecraft argues, in the language of Enlightenment thinkers like John Locke, that women should be treated as the rational equals of men. Elizabeth Bennett serves as a paradigmatic example of the conflicting transformations in women's roles that occurred in the late eighteenth century. Disinherited of her father's property, Elizabeth is not financially independent, and in fact depends upon an advantageous marriage for her future survival. Yet throughout the novel, she asserts an intellectual and moral independence that reflects a Wollstoncraftian conception of gender politics.

Print Culture and the Novel in Austen's Time: - One particularly significant change that occurred during Austen's lifetime was the expansion of literacy and print culture in England. By 1800, almost everyone in the middle classes and above could read, and literacy rates for the rest of the population rose steadily thereafter. At the same time, from 1780 onwards there was a fairly steady rise in the number of new novels being published, so that by the end of Austen's life, the novel was the dominant form of literature in England. In part, the rise of the novel was spurred on by new forms of printing and marketing, which made books less expensive and expanded their readership. Smaller format books—octavos and duodecimos, as opposed to quartos—were more portable, and therefore easier to consume. Similarly, novels became more readily accessible through the expansion of various modes of access, including circulating and subscription libraries as well as periodicals, which made literature affordable in a time when books were often prohibitively expensive. Nevertheless, novels of the kind Austen published would have been an unaffordable luxury for a great deal of the population. This was particularly true in the earlier part of the nineteenth century, when "taxes on knowledge" raised prices on paper, newspapers, advertisements, and other texts. These taxes were in fact at their height during Austen's career. This was in part because of a desire to limit access to information for the lower classes in response to revolution in France and upheaval at home. Though the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries marked an explosion in novel reading and the production of the novels themselves, the widely affordable novel would not become ubiquitous until the middle of the nineteenth century.

The realist novel, defined by its putatively objective narrator, psychologically developed characters, and minute description of the realities of domestic life, was in part inaugurated by Austen in Pride and Prejudice, and would come to dominate the literary scene in England throughout the rest of the nineteenth century. The rise of the novel has historically been linked to the rise of the middle class in England from the eighteenth century onwards, because this expanding social class (and middle class women in particular) had both the income and the leisure time available to consume them. Her novels were widely read throughout the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries but they were largely considered unserious, frivolous, and even irrelevant—a merely "popular" genre.

Pride and Prejudice : Plot Overview

The news that a wealthy young gentleman named Charles Bingley has rented the manor of Netherfield Park causes a great stir in the nearby village of Longbourn, especially in the Bennet household. The Bennets have five unmarried daughters—from oldest to youngest, Jane, Elizabeth, Mary, Kitty, and Lydia—and Mrs. Bennet is desperate to see them all married. After Mr. Bennet pays a social visit to Mr. Bingley, the Bennets attend a ball at which Mr. Bingley is present. He is taken with Jane and spends much of the evening dancing with her. His close friend, Mr. Darcy, is less pleased with the evening and haughtily refuses to dance with Elizabeth, which makes everyone view him as arrogant and obnoxious.

At social functions over subsequent weeks, however, Mr. Darcy finds himself increasingly attracted to Elizabeth's charm and intelligence. Jane's friendship with Mr. Bingley also continues to burgeon, and Jane pays a visit to the Bingley mansion. On her journey to the house she is caught in a downpour and catches ill, forcing her to stay at Netherfield for several days. In order to tend to Jane, Elizabeth hikes through muddy fields and arrives with a spattered dress, much to the disdain of the snobbish Miss Bingley, Charles Bingley's sister. Miss Bingley's spite only increases when she notices that Darcy, whom she is pursuing, pays quite a bit of attention to Elizabeth.

When Elizabeth and Jane return home, they find Mr. Collins visiting their household. Mr. Collins is a young clergyman who stands to inherit Mr. Bennet's property, which has been "entailed," meaning that it can only be passed down to male heirs. Mr. Collins is a pompous fool, though he is quite enthralled by the Bennet girls. Shortly after his arrival, he makes a proposal of marriage to Elizabeth. She turns him down, wounding his pride. Meanwhile, the Bennet girls have become friendly with militia officers stationed in a nearby town. Among them is Wickham, a handsome young soldier who is friendly toward Elizabeth and tells her how Darcy cruelly cheated him out of an inheritance.

At the beginning of winter, the Bingleys and Darcy leave Netherfield and return to London, much to Jane's dismay. A further shock arrives with the news that Mr. Collins has become engaged to Charlotte Lucas, Elizabeth's best friend and the poor daughter of a local knight. Charlotte explains to Elizabeth that she is getting older and needs the match for financial reasons. Charlotte and Mr. Collins get married and Elizabeth promises to visit them at their new home. As winter progresses, Jane visits the city to see friends (hoping also that she might see Mr. Bingley). However, Miss Bingley visits her and behaves rudely, while Mr. Bingley fails to visit her at all. The marriage prospects for the Bennet girls appear bleak.

That spring, Elizabeth visits Charlotte, who now lives near the home of Mr. Collins's patron, Lady Catherine de Bourgh, who is also Darcy's aunt. Darcy calls on Lady Catherine and encounters Elizabeth, whose presence leads him to make a number of visits to the Collins's home, where she is staying. One day, he makes a shocking proposal of marriage, which Elizabeth quickly refuses. She tells Darcy that she considers him arrogant and unpleasant, then scolds him for steering Bingley away from Jane and disinheriting Wickham. Darcy leaves her but shortly thereafter delivers a letter to her. In this letter, he admits that he urged Bingley to distance himself from Jane, but claims he did so only because he thought their romance was not serious. As for Wickham, he informs Elizabeth that the young officer is a liar and that the real cause of their disagreement was Wickham's attempt to elope with his young sister, Georgiana Darcy.

This letter causes Elizabeth to reevaluate her feelings about Darcy. She returns home and acts coldly toward Wickham. The militia is leaving town, which makes the younger, rather man-crazy Bennet girls distraught. Lydia manages to obtain permission from her father to spend the summer with an old colonel in Brighton, where Wickham's regiment will be stationed. With the arrival of June, Elizabeth goes on another journey, this time with the Gardiners, who are relatives of the Bennets. The trip takes her to the North and eventually to the neighborhood of Pemberley, Darcy's estate. She visits Pemberley, after making sure that Darcy is away, and delights in the building and grounds, while hearing from Darcy's servants that he is a wonderful, generous master. Suddenly, Darcy arrives and behaves cordially toward her. Making no mention of his proposal, he entertains the Gardiners and invites Elizabeth to meet his sister.

Shortly thereafter, however, a letter arrives from home, telling Elizabeth that Lydia has eloped with Wickham and that the couple is nowhere to be found, which suggests that they may be living together out of wedlock. Fearful of the disgrace such a situation would bring on her entire family, Elizabeth hastens home. Mr. Gardiner and Mr. Bennet go off to search for Lydia, but Mr. Bennet eventually returns home empty-handed. Just when all hope seems lost, a letter comes from Mr. Gardiner saying that the couple has been found and that Wickham has agreed to marry Lydia in exchange for an annual income. The Bennets are convinced that Mr. Gardiner has paid off Wickham, but Elizabeth learns that the source of the money, and of her family's salvation, was none other than Darcy.

Now married, Wickham and Lydia return to Longbourn briefly, where Mr. Bennet treats them coldly. They then depart for Wickham's new assignment in the North of England. Shortly thereafter, Bingley returns to Netherfield and resumes his courtship of Jane. Darcy goes to stay with him and pays visits to the Bennets but makes no mention of his desire to marry Elizabeth. Bingley, on the other hand, presses his suit and proposes to Jane, to the delight of everyone but Bingley's haughty sister. While the family celebrates, Lady Catherine de Bourgh pays a visit to Longbourn. She corners Elizabeth and says that she has heard that Darcy, her nephew, is planning to marry her. Since she considers a Bennet an unsuitable match for a Darcy, Lady Catherine demands that Elizabeth promise to refuse him. Elizabeth spiritedly refuses, saying she is not engaged to Darcy, but she will not promise anything against her own happiness. A little later, Elizabeth and Darcy go out walking together and he tells her that his feelings have not altered since the spring. She tenderly accepts his proposal, and both Jane and Elizabeth are married.

Critical Analysis of Pride and Prejudice

Pride and Prejudice published in 1830 had originally been titled "First Impressions". The original title seems apt enough as the whole novel deals with the unreliability of first impressions. The new title however, focuses attention on the main theme of the novel which traces how 'pride' and 'prejudice' as two human traits guide relationships and this is brought out with respect to the relationship between two central figures of the novel – Mr. Darcy and Elizabeth Bennet. It is believed that these two characters are studies in pride and prejudice respectively. On a superficial level this view holds true but it would certainly be over-simplifying matters to say that this alone brings out the full significance of the title.

Pride certainly is the pre-dominant characteristic of Mr. Darcy. On his very first appearance he makes himself highly unpopular, for he is discovered to be excruciatingly arrogant and above being pleased. His pride that stems of out of his superiority of intellect, his noble ancestry and enormous wealth prejudices him strongly against Elizabeth's family and her low connections. Darcy's is actually a social prejudice – a variant of the conventional snobbery of the aristocratic class. Although "he had never been bewitched by any woman as he was by her", Darcy feels it beneath his dignity to admit to his love for her. Even when he can repress his feelings no longer and does propose to Elizabeth 'he was not more eloquent on the subject of tenderness than on pride." In fact his customary arrogance deepens into what amounts to insolence during the proposal in which he explains to her the various family obstacles he has had to over-come and the degradation this marriage will be for him. He is considerably humbled when he is rejected without ceremony and Elizabeth's words "had you behaved in a more gentlemanlike manner" and her criticism of his conceit and 'selfish disdain of the feelings of others' affect him deeply. Elizabeth's refusal initiates a process of introspection and self-criticism and he emerges as a man whose pride has been humbled. This is revealed in the way he welcomes the Gardiners at his estate and also by his long explanatory speech to Elizabeth towards the end of the novel. The greatest proof of this development is in his remaining firm in his choice of Elizabeth even after Lydia's and Wickham's dishonorable elopement which draws from Elizabeth the acknowledgement – "indeed he has no improper pride. He is perfectly amiable."

In Elizabeth, the intelligent and self-assured young woman too we see the same interesting compound of Pride and Prejudice. Her initial prejudice against Darcy arises from injured pride. At the assembly she over-hears Darcy's remark about herself: "she is tolerable but not handsome enough to tempt me". From that evening Eliza is left with no cordial feelings towards Darcy. On the other hand Elizabeth is prejudiced in favor of Wickham, charmed by his fine countenance, pleasing addresses and his flattering attentions and when he provides slanderous information against Darcy, the possibility of doubting Wickham does not occur to Elizabeth and her prejudice against Darcy takes the shape of moral indignation. It is only when she reads Darcy's letter that her eyes are opened to the true character of both. In fact, Darcy's letter induces in Elizabeth the same self-criticism that Darcy too undergoes. She begins reading it "with a strong prejudice against everything" that he might have to say" but on reflection she realizes how blind, partial, prejudiced and absurd she had been. She was flattered and pleased by his attentions to her and her uncle and aunt at Pemberley and when she learns Darcy's role in buying Lydia a marriage to Wickham she greaves over every 'ungracious sensation that she has ever encouraged' towards him. For herself 'she was humbled, but she was proud of him'.

The traits of Pride and Prejudice do not dominate merely the main figures and the significance of this title is worked out perfectly through the minor characters as well. Pride in some of the minor characters takes the form of pompous and comic self-importance in Mr. Collins. Social prejudice finds embodiment in Bingley's sisters, Lady Catherine and her daughter and renders them quite contemptible. Thus we see that the appropriateness of the title of Pride and Prejudice is indeed unquestionable and it bears immense significance to the plot, thematic concerns and the characterization in the novel.

"Love & Marriage" in "Pride & Prejudice"

"It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife."Jane Austen stated the main subject of the novel is stated in the first sentence.In this statement, Jane has cleverly done three things: she has declared that the main subject of the novel will be courtship and marriage; she has established the humorous tone of the novel by taking a simple subject to elaborate and to speak intelligently of, and she has prepared the reader for a chase in the novel of either a husband in reach of a wife, or a woman in pursuit of a husband. All the five marriagesin the novel contrast each other to reveal Jane's opinions and thoughts on the subject of marriage.

The marriage between Darcy and Elizabeth reveals the characteristics, which constitutes a successful marriage. One of these characteristics is that the feeling cannot be brought on by appearances, and must gradually develop between the two people as they get to know one another. In the beginning Elizabeth and Darcy were distant from each other because of their prejudice. The series of events, which they both experienced, gave them the opportunity to understand one another and the time to reconcile their feelings for each other. Thus, their mutual understanding is the foundation of their relationship and will lead them to a peaceful and lasting marriage. This relationship between Elizabeth and Darcy reveals the importance of getting to know one's partner before marrying. At the end, Elizabeth feels the pure sincerity of Darcy.

"She began now to comprehend that he was exactly the man, who in disposition and talentswould most suit to her". So, Elizabeth and Darcy's marriage is marriage of dissimilarity and long understanding and we know that long understanding always helps in judging positive and negative points of each other. In this way their marriage is a successful marriage.

The marriage between Jane and Bingley is also an example of successful marriage. Jane Austen, through Elizabeth, expresses her opinion of this in the novel"really, believed all his (Bingley) expectations of felicity, to be rationally founded, because they had for basis the excellent understanding, and super excellent disposition of Jane, and a general similarity of feeling and taste between her and himself."

However, unlike Darcy and Elizabeth, there is a plan in their relationships. The flow in that both characters are too gullible and too good-hearted to ever act strongly against external forces that may attempt to separate them.

Mr. Bennet says:"You (Jane and Bingley) are each of you so complying, that nothing will ever be resolved on; so easy, that every servant will cheat you; and so generous, that you will always exceed your income." So, their marriage is in between success and failure.

Obviously, Lydia and Wickham's marriage is an example of bad marriage. Their marriage was based on appearances, good looks, and sensual or sexual pleasures and youthful vivacity. Once each other can no longer see these qualities, the once strong relationship will solemnly fade away. As in the novel, Lydia and Wickham's marriage gradually disintegrates. Lydia becomes a regular visitor at her two elder sisters' home and "her husband was gone to enjoy himself in London or Bath." Through their relationship Jane Austen shows that hasty marriage based on superficial qualities quickly looks and leads to unhappiness.

Marriage of Mr. Bennet and Mrs. Bennet was similar to that of Lydia and Wickham. Mr. Bennt had married a woman he found sexually attractive without realizing she was an unintelligent woman. Mrs. Bennet's favouritism towards Lydia and her comments on how she was once as energetic as Lydia reveals this similarity. Mr. Bennet's comment on Wickham being his favourite son-in-law reinforces this parallelism. The effect of the relationships was that Mr. Bennet would isolate himself from his family, he found refuge in his library or in mocking his wife. Mr. Bennet's self-realization at the end of the novel in which he discovers that his lack of attention towards his family had lead his family to develop the way they are, was too late to save his family. He is Jane Austen's example of a weak father. Austen says about Mrs. Bennet: "she was a woman of mean understanding, little information and uncertain temperament, the business of her life was to get her daughters marry. Therefore, her solace was visiting and views."

About their marriage:"Her father captivating by youth and beauty and that appearance of good humour, with youth and beauty generally gave, had married a woman whose weak understanding and illiberal mind had very early in their marriage put an end to all real affection for her. Respect, esteem and confidence had vanished forever and all his veins of domestic happiness were over thrown."

In these two later relationships, Austen shows that it is necessary to use good judgment to select a spouse; otherwise the two people will lose respect for each other.

The last example of a marriage is of a different nature them the ones mentioned above. The marriage between Mr. Collins and Charlotte is based on economics rather them on love or appearance. It was a common practice during Austen's time for women to marry a husband to save her from spinsterhood or to gain financial security. However, Jane Austen dramatizes this form of women inequality and shows that women who submits them to this type of marriage will have to suffer in tormenting silence as Charlotte does.

"When Mr. Collins said anything of which his wife might reasonably be ashamed, which certainly was not unseldom, she (Elizabeth) would involuntarily turned her eye on Charlotte. Once or twice she could discern a faint blush; but in general Charlotte wisely did not hear."

In Pride and Prejudice Jane has denounced the elements of Marriage and society that she found distasteful. These five marriages contribute that a happy and strong marriage takes time to build and must be based on mutual feeling, understanding, and respect. Hasty marriages acting on impulse and based on superficial qualities will not survive and will lead to inevitable unhappiness. In this novel, "Love and marriage go together like a horse and carriage."

Pride and Prejudice: Title

The title Pride and prejudice better suits the book because the two protagonists of the novel are affected by these qualities. Elizabeth Bennet, the main female protagonist, judges her acquaintances based upon selective information, and she is proud when these judgments are correct. Fitzwilliam Darcy, the main male protagonist, is disliked because of his proud behavior. As the novel progresses the love between these two characters becomes what cures them of these bad habits. Pride and Prejudice is the most suitable title for this novel because it directly relates to the relationship between the two most important characters, whereas First Impressions only connects to Elizabeth's prejudiced attitude towards others.

Pride is the major fault of Mr. Darcy's character, and it is this pride that initiates Elizabeth's prejudice towards him. At the ball in the opening scene of the novel Darcy establishes his character with this rude comment, "She is tolerable; but not handsome enough to tempt me" (Austen 13). This is Mr. Darcy's first interaction with Elizabeth, and it establishes his pride. He dances very little at the ball, and this offends most of the people attending it. This instance is what makes Elizabeth then think of Darcy as "the proudest, most disagreeable man in the world".

Elizabeth's prejudice develops further as the novel progresses. She selectively chooses to believe only the information that supports her initial judgments. When Elizabeth first meets Mr. Wickham, she is attracted to his handsome features and agreeable attitude. She becomes inclined to believe his story about Mr. Darcy. Elizabeth searches for negative information on Mr. Darcy, and she is pleased whenever she acquires any. When Mr. Wickham tells his false tale that ruins Mr. Darcy's name, she believes all that he says because Elizabeth is prejudiced against Mr. Darcy. She is entertained and fascinated by this rumor because Elizabeth takes pride in the accuracy of her initial prejudice. Elizabeth does not recognize the pride she has within herself because she is too occupied noticing it in Mr. Darcy as a result of her prejudice towards him.

Both Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy's feelings change after his proposal to her. Darcy states that it was hard for his love to overcome the many obstacles it had to face, such as his love would result in a very imprudent marriage on his part. Elizabeth, though offended that he insulted her family "could not be insensible to the compliment of such a man's affection"This shows that Elizabeth yet again has pride in the fact that she has inspired love in Mr. Darcy, despite her hatred for him. Elizabeth states that she would still deny him even if Mr. Darcy had "behaved in a more gentleman-like manner". This phrase stays with Mr. Darcy and causes him to realize how the way he acted came across as proud. Elizabeth denies Mr. Darcy on the grounds that he ruined the happiness of Jane and Mr. Wickham.

In order to set the situation straight, Mr. Darcy writes a letter to Elizabeth. He justifies his motives for both offences that Elizabeth accuses him of. It is from this point on that these two characters begin to fall in love. It is ironically Elizabeth's prejudice that causes her to fall in love with Mr. Darcy. This is because after reading the letter, Elizabeth realizes the error of her judgment, and she feels guilty for having judged him unfairly. This also takes away Elizabeth's pride in her prejudice, because she realizes it was not as precise as she thought. Now that the other issues have been resolved, the only quality in Mr. Darcy, which Elizabeth dislikes, is his pride, and this issue is too resolved. After Elizabeth's comment regarding Mr. Darcy's behavior, he begins to change. She no longer sees him as the arrogant man she initially thought him to be. By the end of the novel Darcy states that Elizabeth is the cause for this change in him:

"You taught me a lesson, hard indeed at first, but most advantageous. By you, I was properly humbled. I came to you without a doubt of my reception. You showed me how insufficient were all my pretensions to please a woman worthy of being pleased".

Mr. Darcy is made aware of his pride by Elizabeth's prejudice towards him, and once he is aware of it he is able to end it. Mr. Darcy's pride was the last fault that Elizabeth could find in him, and now that he has been freed of it, she falls in love with him. The two protagonists exhibited pride and prejudice, and they were cured of these qualities by each other, thus resulting in their love.

It is apparent that the title of this novel should indeed be Pride and Prejudice. Had the title of this book been First Impressions it would only be half as effective as the book's current title. The first impressions that are made upon Elizabeth do not incorporate what is occurring with Mr. Darcy, the main mail protagonist, or any of the other characters. Nowhere in the novel does it describe the first impressions of Elizabeth on the other characters. This title lacks in comparison to Pride and Prejudice, which tells the story of the two main characters, and how their love grew, all within two main qualities.

Both pride and prejudice play large roles in the novel, which is why they are the only two suitable words for the title. Mr. Darcy's initial pride inspires the prejudice of Elizabeth. Whenever Elizabeth's prejudice is correct, she takes pride in it. When Darcy proposes to Elizabeth in a proud manner offending her family, she rejects him, and this makes Darcy aware of his pride. Then, when Elizabeth realizes that her prejudice is incorrect because of the letter from Mr. Darcy, she no longer takes pride in it, and stops being prejudice. Elizabeth falls in love with Darcy because he was able to eliminate his proud mannerisms, and Darcy falls in love with Elizabeth because she treated him differently then all of the other women who attempted to court him, through her prejudice. These two qualities flow through the novel between the two main characters, and they cure each other of them. Pride and Prejudice is the correct title because it encompasses how their love came to be with only three words.

Pride and Prejudice: A Novel with Limited Range

Jane Austen confines her creative activity to the depiction of whatever fell within her range of personal experience. While her range of observation in life is not so wide her work has been variously called as the "Two inches of ivory" and "three or four families". All these titles exhibit the excellence as well as the limitations of her craft and outlook.

Although she works on a very small canvas, yet she has widened the scope of fiction in almost all its directions. Her stories mostly have indoor actions where only family matters especially love and marriages are discussed. However, her plots are perfect and characterization is superb.

All of her six novels, including "Pride and Prejudice", have been controversial since their publication, on account of Austen's limited range. The critical view is divided in two groups – detractors and admires. The former group had criticized her on various points.

Critics object that her novels present a certain narrow physical setting. It was the period of American War of Independence and of Napoleonic Wars, but the characters of Austen are blissfully unaware of all these tumultuous events. Whole of the story of "Pride and Prejudice" revolves around Netherfield Park, Longbourn, Hansford Parsonage, Meryton and Pemberley.

Nature does not play any specific role in her novels. It seems to be an irony of the history of English literature that when writers like Wordsworth, Byron, Coleridge and others were discovering the beauties of nature / outer world, Austen confines her characters within the four walls of the drawing room or Hall. Edward Fitzgerald states:"She never goes out of the Parlour."

Austen avoids the sense of passions described by the romantics, because of her classical views of order and control. Bronte condemns her:"… the passions art completely unknown to her."

Critics have complained that her subject matters are very much the same in all her novels and she writes the same sort of story and also that she does not introduce any great variety in her characters.

All of her six novels deal with same theme of love and marriages. There are pretty girls waiting for eligible bachelors to be married to. The opening line of "Pride and Prejudice" is the theme of her six novels. She writes:"It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife."

Another limitation of Jane Austen is the feminization of her novels. Men never appear except in the company of women. All the information about Darcy is proved through Elizabeth's point of view. Hence, the reader looks at Darcy through Elizabeth's eye.

Even in her limited world, Austen restricts herself to the depiction of a particular class of country gentry. She excludes the matters of lower class and hardly touches aristocracy. For instance she has discussed Lady Catherine only for the purpose of satire.

There is no terrible happening in her novels. Everything happens in a civilized manner. The extreme severity in "Pride and Prejudice" is elopement of Lydia with Wickham."Wickham may elope with Lydia."

A famous critic, Charlotte Bronte believes that Austen has no concern with the morals and she is an author of the surface only:"Her business is not half so much with the human heart as with the human eye, mouth, hands and feet."

A. H. Wright remarks that there is very little religion in her novels. Politics is not mentioned too. There are no adventures found in her books, no abstract ideas and no discussion of spiritual or metaphysical issues.

The defence of Jane Austen's limited range comes from the nature of her novels, the situation of her time and her physical surroundings. Austen's novels are termed as "domestic novels". She belongs to the era when neither the girls were allowed to be admitted to universities nor to be intermingled freely with men. So it is natural that her range is limited.

Austen was a daughter of a country clergyman. She has very less exposure to the world except her short visits to London and a few years study at Bath. Hence the world she experienced was very small. In a letter to her niece, Austen wrote:"There are four families in a country village is the very thing to work on."

Though Austen's limitations are very self-imposed yet within her deliberately restricted field, her art is perfect. Realization of one's limitations is a positive virtue. The restricted social setting and purely interests, lend a sense of discipline to her art."Within the limits she is superb."

She gains in depth, what she loses in broadness of canvas. Her characters stem from a class which she knows well and hence they are very realistic and life-like. Elizabeth Bennet is one of the most delightful heroines one could come across in literature. Wordsworth remarks:"Her novels are an admirable copy of life."

It would be wrong to say that her novels lack passion and profundity. Her themes are love, courtship and marriage and it is impossible to keep the feelings out from such a novel. Besides love, there are also significant emotions, like jealousy of Bingley's, cunningness of Wickham, snobbery of Lady Catherine – all are depicted by Austen with perfect sincerity and conviction.

She also holds a definite moral concern in her novels. She laughs at the shortcomings of people to correct their behaviours. Beneath the theme of love and marriage, she deals with manners to correct the conduct of the middle class country gentry. She preaches the dictum of "know thyself". Hence she aims at high morality. She also depicts the merits and strength of a marriage based on understanding through the wedding of Elizabeth and Darcy. The nature of her craft is defined by Austen herself as:"With bit of irony on which I work with so fine brush to produce little effect after much labour."

Within her theme and subject matter, Jane Austen is unparalleled in her skill and plot construction. The sub-plots of Jane-Bingley, Lydia-Wickham, Charlotte-Collins all are closely linked to the main Elizabeth-Darcy plot and highlight the theme of good marriage. Even in her limits, no two of her characters are repeated. G. H. Lewis remarks:"Her circle may be restricted but it is complete. Her world is perfect orb and vital sphere."

Thus it may be concluded that within her limited range Austen handles all the characters, events, dialogues and the plot of her novels in a very exquisite manner. Her art is fine, perfect and distinguishable. No doubt she is a fine flower of the expiring 18th century.

Pride and Prejudice: Jane Austen's Moral Vision

Jane Austen is not a proclaimed moralist. Unlike Fielding, her aim is not to propagate the morality. She believes in art for the sake of art. She is the pioneer of the novels. Therefore, her plots are well-knit. Her main interest lies in irony and there is a hidden significance of morality as we come across her moral vision in her novels through irony.

Jane Austen is in a favour of social prosperity than individual. She upholds the organic unity of society. She stresses that the duty of human beings owe to others, to society and maintains that individual desires have to be sub-ordinate to the large scale. Lydia-Wickham elopement is passionate and irresponsible. It shows that how society's harmony is disrupted and how others' lives are ruined by the selfish act of the individual. On the other hand the marriage of Elizabeth and Darcy, Jane and Bingley bring happiness and stability to everyone, not simply to themselves.

She discusses individuals 'short comings'. Even the hero and heroine have no exception. Elizabeth blinds herself absurdly because of prejudice whereas Darcy is full of pride."… tolerable but not handsome enough to tempt me."

But we can see that both learn and understand each other. Their pride and prejudice are vanished. But the shortcomings of the other characters are not changed. Mr. Bennet is careless and irresponsible man. Mrs. Bennet is vulgar and stupid. Charlotte is very much economic. Lydia is lusty and Wickham is a deceiver.

Society is divided into classes. "Pride and Prejudice" is an attempt to harmonize the two extremes of middle class – lower end and the top end – into one. Bingley's marriage with Jane and Darcy's with Elizabeth. It is her moral approach to rub the class distinction-line of society.

She also discusses the institution of family which is disturbed. The heads of Bennet family are not mentally bound. This is a matchless couple. Their role as a parent is not active. The disadvantages of such an unsuitable marriage attend the daughters also. On the other hand Bingley family is betraying because there is no head for them but only guided by Darcy.

Jane Austen is concerned with the growth of an individual's moral personality measured by the most exacting standards of 18th century values. Popes dictum "know thyself" underlines the theme of her novel. The conclusion of her novel is always the achievement of self-respect and principal mean of such an achievement is a league of perfect sympathy with another, who is one's spiritual counterpart. Jane Austen traces Elizabeth's prejudice and her anguished recognition of her own blind prejudice before she is united with Darcy in a marriage based on mutual respect, love and understanding. As she says,"How despicable have I acted! I, who have pride myself on my discernment! – I who have valued myself on my abilities."

In the end she says,"There can be no doubt of that. It is settled between us already that we are to be the happiest couple in the world."

Main theme of her novel is marriage. She tries to define good reasons for marriage and bad reasons for marriage. Her moral concern though unobtrusive, is ever-present. The marriage of Lydia-Wickham, Charlotte-Collins and of the Bennets serves the show by their failure the prosperity of the Elizabeth-Darcy marriage.

There is corruption in landed class. Jane Austen reflects this problem in her novel also. The Bingley sisters hate the Bennet for their vulgarity but are themselves vulgar in their behaviour. Lady Catharine is equally vulgar and ill-bred.

Army men in her novel are only for flirtation. They come only for enjoyment. They have no love in them. Some of them are deceiver like Wickham who elopes with Lydia not for love bur for money.

Then she discusses the degeneracy of clergy. Mr. Collins is a clergyman. He comes at Netherfield in search of life partner. But he is rejected by Bennet's daughters. Then he turns towards Charlotte. He has some reason for marriage."My reasons for marriage are, I think it right thing for every clergy (like me) in easy circumstances to set the example of matrimony in parish …"

Jane Austen throws light on the materialism and economic concern of society. Charlotte is more concern with money than man. She is lusty. Her materialistic approach is judged by her remarks."I am not romantic, you know, I never was. I ask only for a comfortable home."Collins also has materialistic mind. Mr. Wickham is always thinking about money. He elopes with Lydia only for money.

Pride and prejudice, is in fact, corresponding virtue. Pride leads to prejudice and prejudice invites pride. Darcy is proud, at the beginning. As he says:"… my good opinion once lost is lost forever"His first appearance is appallingly insolent and we tend to agree with Mrs. Bennet's complaint:"He walked her and he walked there, fancying so very great".Darcy's remarks prejudiced Elizabeth. At ball-party, when he firstly sees her, he says:"… tolerable but not handsome enough to tempt me."Wickham's biased account about Darcy increased the hatred of Elizabeth. But we can observe that both earn when they go through the process of self-realization. Then Elizabeth thinks that:"…Darcy was exactly the man, who in disposition and talents; would suit for her."

We may say that Jane Austen's main concern was irony. She uses irony to shake the major figures of their self-deception and expose the hypocrisy and pretentiousness, absurdity and insanity of some of her minor figures. It is definitely possible to deduce from her work a scheme of moral value. Andrew H. Wright rightly points out that irony in her hand is the instrument of a moral vision. Walter Allen rightly comments:"She is the most forthright moralist in English."

Pride and Prejudice: Irony

One of the most prominent features of the literary style of Jane Austen is her frequent use of irony. In Pride and Prejudiceshe investigates social relationships in the limited society of a country with an ironic and often humorous eye.

General Irony

Irony in the themes of 'pride' and 'prejudice':- The title of the novel, which refers to those failings of the main characters that initially prevent them from accepting each other, contains a strain of hidden irony. Jane Austen subtly introduces an inversion in the thematic foibles ('pride' and 'prejudice') and the characters they belong to. This very inversion is another example of Austen's use of irony. It is Darcy who is supposed to have the pride and Elizabeth who is supposed to have the prejudice. But in her misunderstandings with Darcy, sheaccuses him of excessive pride, while he accuses her of prejudice.

Irony in the very first line: - The reader is invited to laugh at the ironies of human perception and expectations from the very first line of the novel: "It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife." Read ironically, this sentence is turned on its head to mean: "Everyone who knows a single rich man will pursue him with ambitions to be his wife." This is irony, which allows the author to communicate more than the literal or expected meanings of her language.

Mr. Bennet's irony

Mr. Bennet's intentional irony: - Mr. Bennet, the intelligent, detached father of the Bennet sisters is an interesting study in the novel's use of irony. His own sense of irony is very well defined, and he enjoys laughing at his wife's and his family's follies.

His ironical comments at the expense of his wife range from the gently mocking: "You mistake me, my dear. I have a high respect for your nerves… They are my old friends. I have heard you mention them with consideration these twenty years at least" and the subtle and indirect:"Now, Kitty, you may cough as much as you choose" to the harsh and direct:" This is a parade which does one good; it gives such an elegance to misfortune! Another day I will do the same; I will sit in my library, in my night cap and powdering gown, and give as much trouble as I can, - or, perhaps, I may defer it, till Kitty runs away".

But Mr. Bennet's conscious use of irony serves no useful purpose. It neither serves to shame his wife, who fails to detect the vein of sarcasm underlying all his comments, nor does it educate his younger daughters or make them see how improper their behaviour is.

Mr. Bennet's unintentional irony: - This is why the plot of the novel seems to show, through Mr. Bennet, the limitations of sitting back and observing irony as a response to human experience. Trapped in a bad marriage, Mr. Bennet makes life endurable for himself by assuming the pose of an ironic passive spectator of life, who has long ago abandoned his roles as a husband and a father. And this ironic detachment on the part of Mr. Bennet is closely linked to his abdication from responsibility.

His most spectacular abandonment of duty comes in connection with Lydia's proposal to go to Brighton. "Lydia will never be easy till she has exposed herself in some public place" says Mr. Bennet, "and we can never expect her to do it with so little expense or inconvenience to her family as under the present circumstances." His statement, seen in retrospect, is even more ironic than he meant it to be. Lydia did, in fact, end up exposing her family. And the expense and inconvenience, which he claimed would be little, turns out to be enormous.

Elizabeth's irony

Elizabeth's intentional use of irony: - On the other hand, Elizabeth's playful irony is for her both a defense against others whose faults she can perceive, and a weapon which she uses to condemn them for these faults.

In the war against stupidity, she uses irony to skewer the negative traits she is quick to find in people. She targets Mr. Collins' self-importance and his sycophantic behaviour towards Lady Catherine De Bourgh:"They…were indebted to Mr. Collins for the knowledge of what carriages went along, and how often especially Miss De Bourgh drove by in her phaeton, which he never failed coming to inform them of, though it happened almost every day." Mr. Collins, of course, was too blinded by his self-importance and his infatuation with Lady Catherine's power and wealth to see that Elizabeth was really not at all indebted to him, and in fact her irritation and contempt of him increased with this behaviour.

Similarly, she criticizes the contrast between Wickham's duplicity and Darcy's honesty to Jane: "There certainly was some great mismanagement in the education of those two young men. One has got all the goodness, and the other all the appearance of it."

She does not even spare Bingley, accusing him of over-compliance in his reliance on Darcy: "Elizabeth longed to observe that Mr. Bingley had been a most delightful friend; so easily guided that his worth was invaluable".

She criticizes Mr. Darcy's lack of social graces to his face: "I have always seen a great similarity in the turn of our minds. We are both of an unsocial, taciturn disposition, unwilling to speak, unless we expect to say something that will amaze the whole room". And she does not spare him in Bingley's drawing room when she says to him: "I am perfectly convinced by it that Mr. Darcy has no defect. He owns it himself without disguise." The irony, of course, is that by accusing him of owning that he has no defect, she is actually accusing him of a grave defect: arrogance.

Elizabeth response at Charlotte's marriage – unintentionally ironic: - Yet, Elizabeth's own behaviour towards Wickham is unknowingly tinged with irony.Perhaps the worst instance of Elizabeth's stubborn belief in Wickham's character is her serene acceptance of his defection to the moneyed Miss King. Ironically enough, just a few months ago, she had expressed shock at Charlotte's decision to marry Mr. Collins for very similar reasons, and in fact, had partially estranged herself from Charlotte because of what she thought were Charlotte's mercenary and shallow motives.

In her letter to Mrs. Gardiner, she says of Wickham: "handsome young men must have something to live on, as well as the plain". Contrast this to her very different response when Charlotte herself said much the same thing to her: "[Elizabeth] could not have supposed it possible that when called into action, [Charlotte] would have sacrificed every better feeling to worldly advantage. Charlotte, the wife of Mr. Collins, was a most humiliating picture! – And to the pang of a friend disgracing herself and sunk in her esteem…." This seeming inconsistency on her part reeks of hypocrisy, but the truth is that Elizabeth is simply less clear-sighted in the case of Wickham than she is with Charlotte.

The irony of the difference in her response to Charlotte's engagement and her own subsequent leniency towards materialism is further underlined by the reaction that the first sight of Pemberley arouses in her ("at that moment she felt that to be mistress of Pemberley might be something!"). Later, she tells Jane "…I hardly knew when it began. But I believe I must date it from my first seeing his beautiful grounds at Pemberley." People have differed on how ironically this statement by Elizabeth, supposedly dating the beginning of her love for Darcy, should be taken. But however ironically she meant it herself, it cannot be denied that her regard for Darcy received a great impetus when she saw his beautiful house.

Darcy's irony

Darcy is not as humourless and sober as he appears on the surface. He may not laugh, but in his own way he is as attuned to irony and incongruity as Elizabeth is. Their conversation shows that his wit can be as ready as Elizabeth's. For example, when Miss Bingley accuses Elizabeth of being 'one of those young ladies who seek to recommend themselves to the other sex, by undervaluing their own,' Mr. Darcy's ironic response that "there is meanness in all the arts which ladies sometimes condescend to employ for captivation"indicates that he sees through Miss Bingley's own attempt to "recommend" herself to him by "undervaluing" Elizabeth.

Mrs. Bennet's irony

Mrs. Bennet is a minefield of unintentional irony. Her ill-natured, materialistic and narrow-minded view of the world is revealed in her foolish comments, such as the one she made about Bingley to Elizabeth on her return from Hunsford "Well, my comfort is, I am sure Jane will die of a broken heart, and then he will be sorry for what he has done.''

Other such comments abound. But in the final resolution of Mrs. Bennet's deepest wishes for her daughters' marriages, there lies still more irony. Even though it is the business of her life to get them married, she has only succeeded in ruining their prospects. If her daughters' futures were left entirely up to her, her improper management of them would have ended up making them ineligible for any respectable suitors. In fact, it is Mr. Darcy who moves behind the scenes and secretly arranges the marriage of all the three Bennet girls. Thus Darcy, who she despises, and who in turn despises her, is the one who is ultimately responsible for her exultation at the end. This, then, is the greatest irony of all.

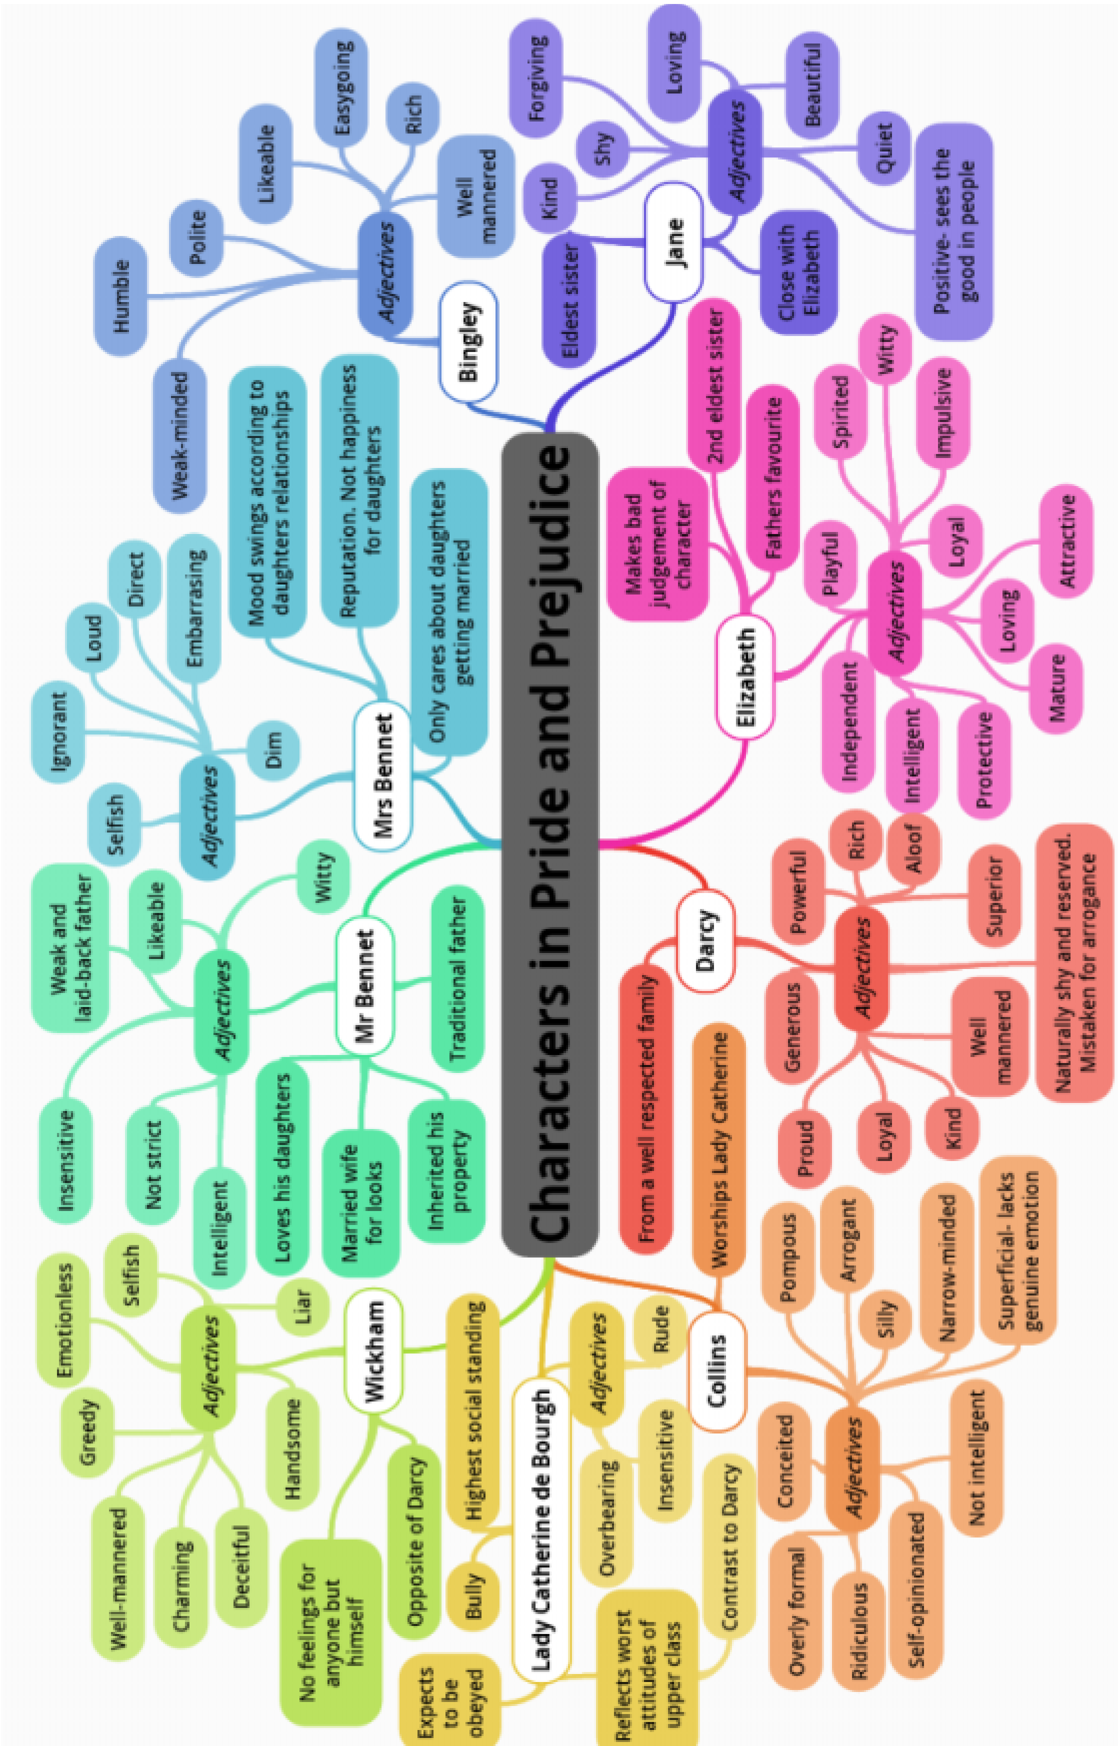
Jane Austen's irony in the social context

Finally, the author's most devastating use of irony in the book is in her attacks on community and on society, such as on the Meryton society. She uses irony as a social tool to direct the reader's gaze to some of the human imperfections that threaten the virtues of her culture.

Independent of any character, she uses irony in the narrative parts for some of her sharpest judgments. Through the Meryton community's reaction to Lydia's marriage with Wickham: ("the good-natured wishes for her well-doing, which had proceeded before, from all the spiteful old ladies of Meryton, lost but little of their spirit in this change of circumstances, because with such an husband, her misery was considered certain."), Austen attacks society's practice of taking pleasure in others' ills, and the mean-spirited gossip-mongers that inhabit society.

Austen also pokes fun at society's practice of suddenly becoming enamoured with a man because of his wealth without knowing his true nature. For instance, upon Darcy's entrance to a dance in chapter 3, Austen writes that "the report was in general circulation within five minutes...of his having ten thousand a year." She adds that "the ladies declared that he was much handsomer than Mr. Bingley" – obviously his wealth recommended his countenance to them. That they retract their approval so fast when they realize that he pays no attention to them is no less ironic.

A striking feature of the irony in Pride and Prejudice is that it is mixed with unmistakable strains of cynicism. This 'black' irony is very much in evidence throughout the book. For example, in the following statements



Elizabeth on Bingley: "Is not general incivility the very essence of love?"

Mr. Collins to Elizabeth: "Your portion is unhappily so small that it will in all likelihood undo the efforts of your loveliness and amiable qualifications."

Charlotte Lucas on marriage: "If a woman conceals her affection … from the object of it, she may lose the opportunity of fixing him. … In nine cases out of ten, a woman had better show more affection than she feels."

The cynicism of all this is striking – especially the suggestions that human attachments spring largely from selfish motives, and that women who do not feign affection for men are likely to be left on the shelf.

Thus, irony is employed by Jane Austen in Pride and Prejudice as the lens through which society and human nature are viewed. She uses irony not only to create humour and make her books more enjoyable, but also to make veiled, bitter observations about the world around her. And this is why this novel is as relevant in our times as it was in hers, perhaps more – for in her hands irony is an extremely effective device for moral evaluation that exposes those defects in her society which still prevail in ours today.

Characters in Pride and Prejudice
Bingley
Adjectives
Humble Polite
Likeable
Easygoing
Rich
Well mannered
Weak-minded
Jane Eldest sister
Adjectives
Kind Shy
Forgiving
Loving Beautiful
Quiet
Positive- sees the good in people
Close with Elizabeth
Elizabeth
2nd eldest sister
Fathers favourite
Makes bad judgement of character
Adjectives
Spirited
Witty
Impulsive Playful
Loyal
Attractive Loving Mature Protective Intelligent Independent
Darcy
From a well respected family
Adjectives
Powerful
Rich
Aloof
Superior
Naturally shy and reserved. Mistaken for arrogance
Well mannered
Kind Loyal Proud Generous
Collins
Worships Lady Catherine
Adjectives
Pompous Arrogant
Silly
Narrow-minded
Superficial- lacks genuine emotion
Not intelligent
Self-opinionated Ridiculous
Overly formal Conceited
Contrast to Darcy
Lady Catherine de Bourgh
Adjectives
Rude
Insensitive
Overbearing
Highest social standing
Bully
Expects to be obeyed
Reflects worst attitudes of upper class
Wickham
Adjectives
Liar
Selfish
Emotionless
Greedy
Well-mannered
Charming
Deceitful
Handsome
Opposite of Darcy
No feelings for anyone but himself
Mr Bennet
Traditional father
Inherited his property
Married wife for looks Loves his daughters
Adjectives
Witty
Likeable
Weak and laid-back father
Insensitive
Not strict Intelligent
Mrs Bennet
Only cares about daughters getting married
Reputation. Not happiness for daughters
Mood swings according to daughters relationships
Adjectives
Dim Ignorant
Loud Direct
Embarrasing
Selfish

Pride and Prejudice: Art of Characterization

The range of Jane Austen's characters is rather narrow. She selects her characters from among the landed gentry in the countryside. Sir Walter Scott very accurately describes this range:"Jane Austen confines herself chiefly to the middling classes of society … and those which are sketched with most originality and precision belong to a class rather below that standard."

She omits the servants and the labourers. They appear wherever they are needed but they are usually not heard. Aristocracy also is hardly touched and if taken, it is only to satirize. Lady Catherine in "Pride and Prejudice" is arrogant, pretentious, stupid and vulgar. Austen finds herself at home only with the country gentry and their usual domestic interests.

In spite of such a limited range, Austen never repeats her characters. Lord David Cecil says:"In her six books, she ever repeats a single character … There is all the difference in the world between the vulgarity of Mrs. Bennet and the vulgarity of Mrs. Jennings."

Though these characters are so highly individualized, yet they have a touch of universality. Thus Marianne becomes the representative of all romantic lovers while Wickham represents all pleasant-looking but selfish and unprincipled flirts.

Austen usually presents her characters dramatically through their conversation, actions and letters. Darcy and Wickham, Lydia and Caroline are much revealed through their actions, while Collins and Lydia are revealed through their letters. A direct comment is sometimes added. The mean understanding of Mrs. Bennet and the sarcastic humour of Mr. Bennet have already been revealed in their dialogues before the direct comment of the novelist. Similarly before she tells us about Mr. Collins, we have already become aware from his letter that he is not a sensible man.

Though Jane Austen does not conceive her characters in pairs yet her characters are revealed through comparison and contrast with others. Lady Catherine and Mrs. Bennet balance each other in their vulgarity and match-making drills. Wickham serves a contrast to Darcy while Bingley is a foil to him. Elizabeth's is compared and contrasted with Jane and Caroline Bingley.

Austen builds character through piling an infinite succession of minute details about them. In "Pride and Prejudice", the Elizabeth-Darcy relationship is traced through minute details, details which look trivial and insignificant in the first instance but whose significance is realized only after reading the novel. Sir Walter Scott makes a fine comment:"The author's knowledge of the world, and the peculiar tact with which she presents characters … reminds us something of the merit of the Flemish school of painting."

Austen is a great realist in art. Her characters are creatures of flesh and blood, pulsating with vitality. She studies her characters kindly but objectively. Regarding their appearance, she treats them quite generally, fixing them with a few bold strokes. She is constant in providing details about their outlook, attitude, manner and accomplishments.

Lord Cecil says:"Her lucid knife-edged mind was always at work penetrating beneath such impressions to disown their cause, discover the principles … that go to make up his individuality."

Austen's characters are neither embodiment of virtue nor pure villains but real human beings both pleasant and disgusting. Elizabeth is perceptive but her perception is sullied by her initial prejudices. In contrast Wickham has so much charm that it is rather difficult to detest him. Austen often mingles knavishness with folly making villainous characters a source of rich comedy.

Jane Austen's minor figures are flat. They do not grow and are fully developed when we first meet them. As the action progresses our first impressions of them get confirmed. Mrs. Bennet seems to be stupefied and vulgar right from the first scene. Her appearance at the Netherfield Park or her reaction to Lydia's elopement confirms her stupidity and vulgarity. This is true of almost all of her minor figures.

But her major characters are ever changing, ever growing. Usually self-deceived in initial stages, they are capable of understanding, growth and maturity. They are complex, dynamic and intricate. Her heroines, blinded by ego, vanity or over-confidence, commit gross errors and suffer bitter reverses. But by virtue of their insight they are gradually disillusioned and, thus, grow.

Minor or major all characters created by Jane Austen may be described as round inasmuch as they are all three-dimensional. E. M. Forster brings out this point quite admirably:"All her characters are round or capable of rotundity … They have all their proper places and fill other several stations with great credit … All of them are organically related to their environment and to each other."

Dull characters are made interesting. An eminent critic, describing Jane as a prose Shakespeare remarks:"What, in other hands, would be flat, insipid … becomes at her bidding, a sprightly versatile, never-flagging chapter of realities."

Thus touched by the magic wand of Jane Austen's art, even the fool and bore of real life became amusing figures. The pompous stupidity of Mrs. Collins and the absurdity and vulgarity of Mrs. Bennet should in real life, prove as irritating to us as to Elizabeth and Darcy. But even these characters become such a rich source of mirth and entertainment.

Still there are a few characters that do not look enough life-like or relevant. Mary Bennet fails to impress, nor is she even vital to the story. Jane Fairfax in "Emma" is shadowy. Margaret is "Sense and Sensibility" never comes to life. But these minor failures do not detract much from her reputation as one of the greatest delineators of characters.

Pride and Prejudice : First Impressions

First impressions and separation of social classes plays a very active role in the whole theme of Pride and Prejudice. In this novel by Jane Austen, we not only see how first impressions effect relationships, but also see how the characters in this story experience transformation through their experiences of first impressions, pride and prejudice.

First impressions cause these characters' preconceived notions, based on wealth and class to activate more pride and prejudice against each other. Elizabeth Bennet's first impression of Mr. Darcy is that he is "proud, above his company, and above being pleased," while Mr. Darcy's first impression of Elizabeth is that "she is tolerable but not handsome enough to tempt" him.

Furthermore, Elizabeth's pride and prejudice towards Mr. Darcy continues to grow stronger. She is unaware of his admiration towards her, because she figures a man like him would never love her and she could never love a man with so much pride and conceit. The confusion of Mr. Darcy's true character takes her almost the entire novel to discover the truth about him: the truth about him and Wickham and his true reasoning for parting Bingley and Jane.

Pride and Prejudice is a story about a man who changes into a better man and his true and upstanding character, and he blossoms into a true gentleman. It's also about a woman who changes because her perception of this man has been clarified. Both Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy learn to see beyond their first impressions of each other and learn how to make things right. Both Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy act out of misjudgment, pride, prejudice, and lack of open communication right from the very beginning of their acquaintance. Although they are both extremely guilty of these character flaws, Elizabeth accomplished a greater transformation because, ironically, her pride and prejudice exceeded Mr. Darcy. They are much alike in character, however, and they both undergo great transformation.

The fact that Mr. Darcy is rich and of a higher class than Elizabeth seems to lead her to immediately assume his lack of interest in anything else going on around him at the balls is influenced by his wealth. "I should have judged better had I sought an introduction; but I am ill qualified to recommend myself to strangers… I certainly have not the talent which some people possess of conversing easily with those I have never seen before. I cannot catch their tone of conversation, or appear interested in their concerns, as I often see done." We see that Elizabeth has not come to know the fact about Mr. Darcy that he is not shallow or as snooty as she conceives.

Early in the novel Mr. Darcy judges Elizabeth by saying that she is not handsome enough to tempt him. His mind changes about Elizabeth as he discovers the depth of her personality. Elizabeth perceives Mr. Darcy's quick wits and response to her comments as prideful, but actually they both challenge each other's minds and patterns of thinking in a positive way. Mr. Darcy also bases his prejudice and misjudgment of Elizabeth based on her pushy, boisterous mother. Her mother turns him off from the Bennet family entirely, and foolishly he turns Mr. Bingley off from Jane as well, not only for that reason but because he didn't believe Jane felt any affection for Mr. Bingley. These were misjudgments on Mr. Darcy's behalf for Elizabeth sometimes can't even stand her own mother and Jane truly did have affection for Mr. Bingley. Mr. Darcy acted immaturely, without knowing the fullness of the situation. Later when Elizabeth confronts and reveals the truth to Mr. Darcy, he honestly feels remorse, and later fixes his mistake.

In the same manner Elizabeth makes judgments also about Mr. Darcy and Wickham. Elizabeth believes Wickham's story about him and Mr. Darcy when they have only just met. Elizabeth has not begun to understand Wickham's character, yet she believes him whole heartedly without first asking Mr. Darcy about that matter. She foolishly allows her prejudice to grow inside her against Mr. Darcy; and she even talks to her family and friends, causing distaste in their mouths as well. This is immature and prejudice in the fullest.

Mr. Darcy, after several miscommunications between Elizabeth and himself finally admits his faults of pride and ignorance. He got to explain himself as well. His true character unraveled as more events took place. His maid spoke so highly of him and all that he has done for others and especially his sister. He has never shown anger, pride, or prejudice to any of his servants. He makes things right with Elizabeth and Jane- Bingley situation and even helps Lydia and Wickham after all that had happened. These are true advancements of his character from false first impressions to humbling himself and admitting fault.

For Elizabeth, she finally admits herself of being "blind, partial, prejudiced, and absurd." She admits she has acted despicably, by priding herself on her discernment. "Vanity, not love, has been my folly. Pleased with the preference of one, and offended by the neglect of the other, on the very beginning of our acquaintance, I have courted prepossession [pride] and ignorance, and driven reason away where either were concerned. Till this moment, I never knew myself."This is the greatest moment, the pivotal point in Elizabeth's character transformation. Elizabeth finally realizes first impression, pride and prejudice, have been false and wrong towards Mr. Darcy.

Both Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy could not have experienced such a character transformation as these if it were not for their initial first impressions of each other. They grew to know one another better and deeper. They caused each other to mature and transform into a greater man and a greater woman. Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy were both so stubborn about what they thought about each other for most of the novel that it caused them to see each other unclearly; luckily they overcame their false first impressions and were able to see the truth about each other and help each other grow.

Pride and Prejudice : Characteristics of a drama

The novel Pride and Prejudice by Jane Austen has several characteristics of a drama. The novel shares such leading qualities of a drama as dialogue, character development, plot, theme, action and dramatic irony. The use of these dramatic devices makes the novel interesting to read.

Dialogue: - The novel opens with dialogue. It provides the substance of the play. Dialogue is used to show the characters speaking directly to each other which give the reader access to the thoughts and emotions of the characters. It grows intimacy between characters and audience."My dear Mr. Bennet," said his lady to him one day, "have you heard that Netherfield Park is let at last?"

All of Austen's many characters come alive through dialogue. Long, unwieldy speeches are rare and in their place, the reader hears the crackle of quick, witty conversation. True nature reveals itself in the way the characters speak: Mr. Bennet's emotional detachment comes across in his dry wit, while Mrs. Bennet's hysterical excess drips from every sentence she utters. Austen's dialogue often serves to reveal the worst aspects of her characters—Miss Bingley's spiteful, snobbish attitudes are readily apparent in her words, and Mr. Collins's long-winded speeches carry with them a tone-deaf pomposity that defines his character perfectly. Dialogue can also conceal bad character traits: Wickham, for instance, hides his rogue's heart beneath the patter of pleasant, witty banter, and he manages to take Elizabeth in with his smooth tongue. Ultimately, though, good conversational ability and general goodness of personality seem to go hand in hand. Pride and Prejudice is the story of Darcy and Elizabeth's love, and for the reader, that love unfolds through the words they share.

Plot: - The plot of a drama involves unexpected turns, suspense and climax. In pride and Prejudice we find some turning points which motivate the novel such as Darcy and Elizabeth's first meet at the Meryton ball. Darcy's Pride arouses Elizabeth's prejudice. Darcy refuses to dance with Elizabeth upon Bingley's request, saying that Elizabeth is no handsome enough to tempt him. Elizabeth hears this comment and greatly hurt. She immediately takes a view about Mr. Darcy that he will be a man of arrogant personality.

However through the Bingely-Bennet friendship Darcy and Elizabeth are brought into each other's company. Again Jane's illness at Netherfield brings the two together again. And it is the beginning of his admiration for her.

Now the audience becomes suspicious when Mrs. Bennet's garrulous vulgarity turns Darcy away from his interest in Elizabeth and leads him to take the docile Bingley to London. Moreover Elizabeth's initial prejudice is deepened by the smooth lies of Wickham against Darcy. She accepts at face value everything that Wickham says about Mr. Darcy. Mr. Wickham professes to be discrete and hints that he would not defame anybody's character, but he defames Darcy. Elizabeth would not have tolerated such a conversation if anybody except the disagreeable Mr. Darcy were the subject of the talk. As a result, Elizabeth forms an even more unfavorable opinion about Mr. Darcy than she had formed before. Her prejudice turns into hatred.

As an another principal turning point the two meet again when Elizabeth is visiting Charlotte Collins and Darcy is visiting his aunt Lady Catherine at Rosings. Darcy's old interest is revived with increased fervor.

Now we see the struggle in Darcy's mind between his pride and love for Elizabeth with the handicaps of such relations as Collins, Lydia, Kitty, Mary, Mrs. Bennet and the inferior family connection with trade. Love wins enough of a victory to bring him to the point of proposing.

The chief climax of the main story occurs when Darcy proposes to Elizabeth at Rosings and is refused. Darcy constantly emphasizes the struggles and obstacles that he had to overcome in order to make him this step. Rather than emphasizing his love, he constantly refers to all the obstacles which he has had to overcome. This proposal completely stuns Elizabeth. She thinks that Mr. Darcy is only seeking a wife who is so inferior as to be ever grateful for a chance to be his wife. She rejects his proposal without least hesitation and she gives her reasons for her refusal. She mentions his past ill- treatment to Mr. Wickham and she tells him that he was responsible for breaking up between Jane and Bingley. And finally she accuses him not behaving in a gentleman- like manner. The denouement is reached with his second proposal and this time acceptance.

On the very next day, Mr. Darcy hands over to Elizabeth a letter which contains a defense of him against the charges which she had leveled against him. There is much logic in this defense and Elizabeth is deeply affected by it. She is forced to acknowledge the justice of his claims as regards Wickham, his criticism of her family and even his claims concerning Jane. She comes to a self-realization. Suddenly, she cannot remember anything that Mr. Darcy has ever done which was not honorable and just, while Mr. Wickham has often been imprudent in his comments. Previously, she had called Jane blind, and now she has gained a moral insight into her own character and sees that she has also been blind. Consequently, Elizabeth's character increases in depth as she is able to analyze herself and come to those realizations. This self- recognition established her as a person capable of changing and growing.

Meanwhile, the youngest Bennet, Lydia, rushes into an ill-advised romance with Wickham, an officer who at first appears charming and trustworthy. Wickham fails in a ruthless attempt to marry a rich northern woman and impulsively elopes with the naive Lydia. The 16-year-old girl speaks recklessly, acts offensively, and must gratify her impulses instantly. Lydia fails to see that running off with Wickham scandalizes her family.

Darcy shows his true mettle by secretly helping Charles return to Jane, by ensuring that Wickham and Lydia return to Longbourn as a married couple with an income, and by proposing again to Elizabeth with new humility. Shamed, Elizabeth recognizes many of her misjudgments and accepts Darcy's proposal. Their personalities soften and blend beautifully.

Another coincidence brings Elizabeth and Darcy at Pemberley House. He is very warm and friendly and inquires of her family. There is no trace of haughtiness in the manner in which he now talks to her and to her relatives. Even more, when she learns the role which Darcy has played in Lydia's marriage, she becomes strongly inclined towards him.

In this changed circumstances Mr. Darcy arrives at Netherfield and proposes marriage to her. This time she gladly accepts the proposal because she has now begun to think that Mr. Darcy is truly a gentleman. He also tells Elizabeth that it was her frankness which had finally revealed to him his shortcomings. He also admits that he encouraged Bingley to propose Jane. Elizabeth also honestly confesses the change in her feelings and the two lovers are finally happy.

A plot also centers on a single interest and other sub-actions become involved to it. There is a quite compact plot in Pride and Prejudice. In Pride and Prejudice the main story of Elizabeth and Darcy runs throughout the whole narrative. Minor stories, kept under complete control, are never permitted to obtrude and are always made to contribute to the main story.

Secondary plots revolve about Jane and Bingley, Lydia and Wickham, Mr. Collins, Miss Bingley's schemes, Lady Catherine de Bourgh. The action is developed around the gradual coming together of Elizabeth and Darcy and their ultimate happiness. The secondary figures act as foils to the main characters and interact with them to help bring about the final resolution.

Character: - In a drama the characters show significant development. The characters of a drama suffer from their mistakes and finally learn many lessons. In the same way, here in this novel we also see the development of characters. The characters who mostly develop are Elizabeth and Darcy.

Jane Austen's characters evolve the drama. Throughout the novel, the characters, like in a drama are developed gradually or step by step. They are placed in different contexts in which he encounter each other and help reveal their personalities. Darcy and Elizabeth, for example, undergo significant changes throughout the novel.

Letter plays an important role to develop the relationship between Elizabeth and Darcy. Darcy's first letter to Elizabeth makes her even more prejudiced against Darcy but at the same time begin to think deeply about Wickham's previous story.

Darcy writes his first letter in such a way as if he is showing favor to her, which exhibits his pride. She rejects his proposal without least hesitation and she gives her reasons for her refusal. She mentions his past ill- treatment to Mr. Wickham and she tells him that he was responsible for breaking up between Jane and Bingley. And finally she accuses him not behaving in a gentleman- like manner. This final accusation gives a serious blow to Darcy. This is a turning point for his self-realization.

Elizabeth learns lessons and changes the way she thinks about some situations. An extremely rich and famous man, one of the most sought after men in the country falls in love with Elizabeth, and although she initially rejects his proposals of marriage, thinking him too proud, does slowly fall in love with him, realizing his pride was only shyness, and they become engaged. She admits her own faults and overcomes her prejudice against Mr. Darcy and she becomes aware of her own social and emotional prejudice. When her friend Charlotte marries Mr. Collins, Elizabeth condemns the marriage as ridiculous but comes to understand and accept the position her friend was in. The marriage between Mr. Collins and Charlotte is based on economics rather than on love.

Elizabeth regards Jane as more noble and kind-hearted than herself. Jane is slightly naive, she expects all people to have pure and good motives for everything and seeks to find good in everyone. She has not shown much emotion to Bingley's advances, though she accepts them. She shows little of the same sentiment, although this is just her nature, this is what made Darcy think Jane would not be much hurt if Bingley left her. This is untrue, she suffers the loss greatly, though alone and privately.

Lydia and Wickham have each other in an unhappy and impecunious marriage. Miss Bingley's jealous envy brings only bitterness and disappointment. Mr. Bennet's indolence and failure as a parent brings him the pain and shame of Lydia's elopement and Lady Catherine's arrogance brings about her humiliation in her interview with Elizabeth and her defeat in the marriage of Elizabeth and Darcy.

Theme: - The title of the novel Pride and Prejudice can be interpreted as a theme running through the novel. Pride is the feeling that one is better or more important than other people and prejudice is an adverse judgment or opinion formed beforehand without knowledge of the facts. When we add these two themes together, we get this novel Pride and Prejudice.

The very basis of this book is on Pride and Prejudice. Jane Austen created a world in which most of the people are guilty of Pride and Prejudice and judge each other on the basis of their pride and prejudice. But pride and prejudice are not very unusual factors in this world which is based on artificial and conventional behaviors. And Jane Austen appreciates those who can come out of their Pride and Prejudice and reject the superficial behaviors. But those who can't discard their pride and prejudice remain the objects of ridicule till the end of the novel.

Mr. Darcy and Elizabeth Bennet, the two central characters of the novel, for the better part of the novel is the focus of Pride and prejudice respectively. And in the later part of the novel both Darcy and Elizabeth have come out from their Pride and Prejudice respectively.

Irony: - Irony is the very soul of Jane Austen's novels and "Pride and Prejudice" is steeped in irony of theme, situation, character and narration. Irony is the contrast between appearance and reality.

The first sentence of the novel Pride and Prejudice opens with an ironic statement about marriage, "It is a truth universally acknowledged that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife" (1). A man with a fortune does not need a wife nearly so much as a woman is greatly in need of a wealthy husband. The entire novel is really an explanation of how women and men pursue each other prior to marriage. Jane Austen uses a variety of verbal, dramatic and situational irony through the novel.

The novel is full of verbal irony, especially coming from Elizabeth and Mr. Bennet. Verbal irony is saying one thing, but meaning the complete opposite. Although Mr. Bennet is basically a sensible man, he behaves strangely because of his sarcasm with his wife. He amuses himself by pestering his foolish wife or making insensitive remarks about his daughters. Mr. Bennet cruelly mocks his wife silliness and is shown to be sarcastic, and cynical with comments as "…you are as handsome as any of them, Mr. Bingley might like you.

In chapter 4, Elizabeth confirms her strong dislike for Darcy and criticizes Bignley's sisters as well. She is critical of Jane for being "blind" to others. This criticism is filled with irony, because in the later part of the novel Elizabeth is blind in analyzing Darcy because of her prejudice against his pride. Shortly in the novel, Darcy grows interest in Elizabeth, but Elizabeth doesn't notice it. Elizabeth misunderstands Darcy attraction toward her. As she was playing the piano at the parsonage, she believes that Darcy is trying to unsettle her when he stands by the piano to hear her play the piano.

Also, Darcy was blind in the beginning of the novel because he did not realize that Elizabeth possesses the qualification his future wife must have. Another dramatic irony is in chapter 39 when Elizabeth is shocked by the behavior that she sees in her family and realizes the truth Darcy has stated about the weak impression they make.

It is interesting to note that ironically, in "Pride and Prejudice", it is the villainous character Wickham and lady Catherine – who are responsible for uniting Elizabeth and Darcy.

Action: - Another requisite of drama is action. In Pride and Prejudice there is a great deal of action, even though it is quite and seemingly unexciting. The characters of the novel do not behave in any wild or improbable way. Since the picture drawn is of everyday life and activities, it is easy for us to comprehend it and is that much more real to us.

The elements of drama, by which dramatic works can be analyzed and evaluated, are categorized into the above discussed areas. And because of the presence of these dramatic elements we can call Pride and Prejudice as a dramatic novel.

Feminine Individuality in Pride and Prejudice

Literature is a mirror of social evolution. In it we find a living record of the progressive emergence of individuality in history. It depicts the development of political rights, social equality and psychological individuality as several stages in a common evolutionary movement.

The well-loved English novelist, Jane Austen lived in an age when female social conformity was demanded, original thinking frowned upon and creativity discouraged among women. Women were expected to be virtuous, submissive, modest, concealing to their intelligence and abilities and leaving matters of science, philosophy, politics and business to more intelligent and better informed gentlemen. English law at the time forbade divorce and regarded married women much like the property of her husband's. It was an age in which it was universally believed that every girl must marry and marry young to secure a groom for financial security and social status, in utter disregard of foolish, idealistic notions of love and romance. Jane Austen rejected one very respectable proposal and refused to marry at all because she could not marry for love.

Her writing was as individualistic as she was and her own individuality was reflected in that of her heroines. In Pride and Prejudice she portrays Elizabeth Bennet's struggle to express her individuality in a society that demanded strict social conformity, a situation far afield for most Western women today, but closely resembling the pressures felt by woman in many Asian countries even now. Elizabeth has inner strength. She doesn't value people and things just because society values them. She judges according to her own values. She is not socially self-conscious or pretentious. She has a natural spontaneity. She has social skill and capacity, but she is not constrained by artificial social formalities. Nor is she a prisoner of her own ego. She has the sincerity to examine her own behaviour and the capacity to change. She has the will, as well as the strength, to resist social pressure. Elizabeth is not aggressive, rebellious or frivolous, disrespecting societal norms and breaking rules for fun. She has high human values, and employs her good sense and strong will as she sees fit, thinking independently of her family, friends and neighbours.

Unlike many contemporary notions about female individuality, Elizabeth is able to express her intelligence, independence and strong character without in any way compromising on her femininity. She is able to stand up for her rights, speak her mind freely and disregard social status, yet she never aspires to be a successful man in a man's world. She strives only to express her own unique feminine individuality. With her cheerfulness and goodwill, she is feminine as well as individualistic.

Elizabeth belongs to a family of five daughters, their father a gentleman farmer of moderate fortune. With no male heir, the family estate is to pass on to a cousin after her father's time. With no suitor in sight and no dowry to recommend her in case one turned up, marriage and financial security seem like distant dreams. But Elizabeth is not daunted. Marriage, to her, is not an ideal in itself. Her mother's one aim in life is to marry five daughters. Her younger sisters cannot wait for their turn to marry. Her best friend goads her to do all she can to secure a wealthy husband, be he a fool or a villain. But Elizabeth feels differently, and fear of neither spinsterhood nor poverty can dilute her values. At a time in England where marrying for love hardly ever happened, like her creator Jane Austen, Elizabeth is determined to marry a man she loves and respects, or not marry at all.

Her bumbling cousin Collins visits the Bennets and announces his intention of marrying Elizabeth. Collins is a decent man with a college education, respectable job and considerable income. More significantly, he is the heir to the Bennet estate. Mrs. Bennet who has intensely felt the pressure of having five unmarried daughters and dreaded the thought of their becoming poor old maids, celebrates this end to all their troubles. There is pressure on Elizabeth to accept the lucrative proposal. But she is not swayed. She cannot accept her clownish cousin just for the comforts he can supply. She does not love him, cannot possibly respect him, and seeing no admirable values in him, turns him down. Her friend Charlotte seizes the opportunity and secures him for herself, and is satisfied with the accomplishment, as is the rest of her family and neighbourhood. But to Elizabeth, the idea of marriage with such a man is humiliating. When those around her see his social standing, exalted connections and financial advantages, she sees right through it all, at his core, foolishness and pomposity.

Bingley, a wealthy young man moves to the neighbourhood, with his fashionable sister Caroline and even wealthier friend, Mr. Darcy. Bingley is a pleasant type, but his entourage acts proudly and haughtily. The entire town admires Caroline's fashionable gown and dainty lace, graceful walk and superior airs. The townspeople go up to Darcy for the privilege of exchanging a word with him, and some feel gratified even to receive a gruff snub from the aristocrat. They value only money and status. But Elizabeth Bennet is not deceived by the packaging. She sees rude, uncultured, selfish people where others see fashionable, sophisticated, wealthy folks.

Much to his own amazement as well as hers, Darcy falls in love with Elizabeth passionately and proposes to her. All that he had to offer would have tempted any other girl in Elizabeth's place to say yes before he finished speaking. But Elizabeth turns him down without a second thought. She could not accept a man with no scruples and goodness, as she mistakenly believes him to be, in spite of his fine estate, huge income, prestigious family and superior connections. She does not set her values based on the society's, or take decisions with an eye on society's approval.

Darcy's aunt Lady Catherine is the queen of her territory. Her imperialism, founded on the virtue of her wealth and status, is gratefully enjoyed or quietly accepted, but never challenged. Here again, Elizabeth thinks for herself. The lady, Elizabeth believes, does not deserve to be worshipped because she has immense wealth. She need not be obeyed for the sake of her aristocracy. Elizabeth could not sacrifice her good sense or self-respect to please another. She scandalizes all by contradicting the lady, while all around mumble their agreement or safely nod and smile. The lady calls on Elizabeth and abuses, threatens and coaxes in turns to prevent her from marrying Darcy. Elizabeth braves the storm that would have sunk many a mighty ship, and defiantly sails past the lady right up to the altar with Darcy.

A developed mind, good values and strong character are the source of Elizabeth's strength. Nothing from the outside can dictate to her how to feel, think or act, and if her wishes are contrary to those external voices, she gallantly listens to her inner voice. She has great psychological strength that lets her face that impalpable, yet overwhelming foe of social disapproval and rewrite rules that define society.

Society comes around. It learns from her, and rewards her for transforming it. It raises her sky high. Elizabeth Bennet who had a mere £50 a year, a family to be embarrassed about and no high connections, becomes mistress of one of the finest estates in the country, a husband with an income of £10,000 a year who respects and loves her passionately, wealth to grant every comfort she could wish for and society that looks up to her in appreciation.

Jane Austen was a pioneering individual who showed that individuality is not breaking away from femininity, but enhancing it to make a more beautiful, meaningful personality. As she tells us through her heroine Elizabeth Bennet, individuality is not about competing with men or becoming masculine. It is not about getting rid of femininity. It is about recognizing the beauty, strength and values within oneself, nurturing them, and accomplishing a complementary relationship with the men and women in one's life.

The growing numbers of biographies, journals and literary societies devoted to Austen, film and television adaptations of her works, online reading groups, fan sites and mailing lists are an ode to the increasing popularity and relevance of Jane Austen and the feminine individuality she epitomized.

It is interesting to compare and contrast the characteristics of individuality that emerge in Jane Austen's and Elizabeth Bennet's personality with the more traditional masculine conception of rugged individuality.

Darcy's Individuation

In one sense we are all individuals, each with his or her own defining characteristics and attributes. But in another sense, some people are more formed individuals than others; less dependent for their attributes on how others think, feel and act, relying more on their own personal judgment, values and experience. It is easy to find examples of both types of people in life and literature. But it is more difficult to explain the process by which a member of the collective evolves into a unique individual. Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice provides a rare insight into that process of individuality formation.

The story takes place at the turn of the 19th century when the spirit of French Revolution on the other side of the Channel is exerting a quiet pressure for social evolution in England. At the beginning of the story, we encounter Fitzwilliam Darcy, the hero of the novel, as a self-centered, arrogant, wealthy English aristocrat who takes great pride in his status and estate. By the end of the story, he has shed his sense of self-importance and superiority and learnt to value himself and those around for their character and values, rather than their material possessions or social standing. Darcy's transformation clearly depicts the process of individuation.

Darcy belongs to a distinguished family. He owns a fine estate generating £10,000 annual income and a large, dependent, tenant population. He has a college education. He is handsome, strong and intelligent. As a result, in a deeply class conscious society, he has developed an acute sense of superiority. Given his class, almost all of Darcy's friends are a few rungs below him in the social ladder. Darcy dominates them socially. He convinces his impressionable friend Charles Bingley not to marry the girl he loves because she doesn't belong to the right class. Along with a cousin, the second son of an Earl with only on a modest income of his own, he visits his aunt, and takes all the decisions about the trip without once consulting his cousin.

When Bingley moves to Meryton, a provincial town, Darcy turns up his nose at the country folk. Their rural lifestyle is naturally different from his city-bred ways. Their culture, which he sees as lack of culture, offends him. The people appear noisy and ill mannered. So at every dinner or dance, Darcy stands aloof on his pedestal, refusing to mix, spurning every hand extended to him from below. When the friendly Sir Lucas suggests that he dance with one of the girls present, Darcy brusquely refuses. When a clergyman introduces himself to Darcy, he considers it an affront to be spoken to by one from a lower status without formal introduction, and rudely walks away. Like many of his society, Darcy sees a man's manners, his family, status and wealth, and misses the man himself. So when Bingley offers to introduce him to Elizabeth Bennet, Darcy fails to see her beauty, good nature, quickness, wit, or any other value that is going to make him fall in love with her later. All he sees is a local girl with unfashionable clothes and unaffected manners. Repulsed by her irresponsible parents, silly sisters and low class relatives, he dismisses her.

In the background greater forces are at work. Across the channel, the French are violently tearing down the pedestal that aristocracy had raised for itself all over Europe. As the guillotine tries to abolish the distinctions between the classes in French society, it dawns on the English aristocrats that they will have to give up their superiority if they want to save their heads. Something stirs in Darcy.

He begins to notice the imperfections in people of his own class. He sees much to be ashamed of in his stately aunt, Lady Catherine. Her rank has rendered her boorish and vulgar. Bingley's sister Caroline is, unlike the Meryton girls, wealthy, fashionable and elegant. But all her style does not make up for her coarse thoughts and meanness. The more she fawns on him, the more Darcy is repelled. His titled, wealthy cousin, Lady Anne is from an even higher social level than himself. But she is sickly, weak, lifeless, a nonentity.

By contrast, Elizabeth radiates life and energy. Darcy gradually comes to see a light in her eyes that renders her a joy to behold. Where he saw undignified manners, he now sees liveliness. Lack of sophistication now seems natural and charming. He discerns goodness, intelligence, strength, quickness and beauty in this girl he had brushed aside as only tolerable. It is perhaps the first time that Darcy sees someone simply for what they are, without being distracted by their surroundings. This signals the onset of Darcy's transformation from social conformity to true individuality, a journey that shifts his center-of-reference from external society to his own inner values.

But the path of Darcy's individuation is not smooth, as is the course of his love. Two decades of social conditioning do not let go of a man without a struggle. They lead to an inner conflict in Darcy. The emerging individual in him wants to change, move on, and embrace the new. The conservative social aristocrat in him does not want any change in the status quo. Society gets the better of him just then, and Darcy forces himself away from Meryton and Elizabeth Bennet.

Their paths cross unexpectedly when Darcy visits his aunt at Hunsford and finds Elizabeth staying with a cousin who lives nearby. With each day, he becomes clearer about his feelings for Elizabeth. Her family is still vulgar, her connections inferior, her status is no match for his, but she alone, he believes, is good enough for him. He decides to marry her, and proposes, ignorantly and arrogantly assuming that she will accept so worthy a match as his. He is stunned to hear Elizabeth's reply.

Elizabeth makes it clear to him, in a language he has never heard before, that he is the last man on earth she would ever marry. She accuses him of pride, arrogance and insensitivity. Darcy valued himself for his social position and assumed she would too. He never imagined that there was anything else for her to consider apart from his wealth, rank and estate. His value system has been turned upside down. He is angry with Elizabeth for abusing him. He is disappointed his proposal has not been accepted. He is at a crossroads. He has a choice to make. He can fall back on his old status, fortify himself in his luxurious estate, keep all commoners at a distance, and dismiss Elizabeth and all that she said as foolish. Or, he can give up his sense of superiority, cultivate humility and learn to appreciate the good values he finds in others, regardless of their status. That will mean letting go of all that is familiar and comforting, and plunging into unknown territory. Darcy does just this. He chooses the way forward. Whether it is the result of the French Revolution raging nearby, or the emotional outburst of the girl he passionately loves, or both, Darcy transforms himself from a member of a social type into a unique, psychological individual.

Displaying great humility, he recognizes and accepts the truth in Elizabeth's accusations against him. He vows to give up his pride in his family, culture, wealth and rank. He looks at himself as another would, and discovers his own faults. He sets about changing himself. He takes another look at the people he wrote off as inferior, and finds admirable qualities in them. He makes his respect for the Gardiners, Elizabeth's uncle and aunt, evident when he meets them. These people whom he had written off simply because they resided in Cheapside, a low class locality in London, and were in trade, now win his admiration and gratitude. He sees their goodness, culture and knowledge.

A greater test of his commitment to getting rid of old attitudes comes when his arch enemy Wickham elopes with Elizabeth's sister Lydia. For the sake of Elizabeth, he goes searching for Wickham in shady neighborhoods, negotiates with a man he despises, arranges his marriage, pays off £6000 of his debts and gets him an officer's position in the military. Darcy who a year earlier could not stand to be in the same room as the rural folk of Meryton, who convinced his friend to give up his love for the sake of his class, rejects all those snobbish, aristocratic social attitudes for the sake of his love.

As proof that Darcy has completely risen above the society and looks no more to it for approval, respect or appreciation, he conceals from Elizabeth and her family his role in saving Lydia. He acts out of his personal values, and saves the girl whose sister he loves. He does it neither to impress Elizabeth nor the society they live in. Darcy is rewarded for his transformation. Elizabeth learns his secret, is filled with gratitude and eagerly accepts him when he proposes the second time. Darcy attains a romantic fulfillment he had not dreamed possible.

Darcy's process of individuation is an expression in the microcosm of the transformation taking place in English society at that time. In saving Lydia and her family, compromising with the roguish Wickham, embracing the rural people of Meryton, and marrying Elizabeth Bennet, Darcy contributes his mite to the peaceful evolution in England that integrated the society and prevented a violent revolution.

The Development of the Darcy-Elizabeth Relationship

Mutual Dislike in the Beginning; Marriage at the End: - Pride and Prejudice is largely the story of Miss Elizabeth Bennet and Mr. Fitzwilliam Darcy, although certain other characters such as Mr. Bingley, Miss Jane Bennet, and Mr. Wickham also figure prominently in the novel. Both Elizabeth and Darcy create a forceful impression on us.

In fact, we would be perfectly justified in designating Elizabeth as the heroine, and Mr. Darcy as the hero of the novel. The Elizabeth-Darcy relationship dominates the novel. These two persons begin with a mutual dislike of each other, but then they both begin to feel drawn towards each other till they find that they are both in love with each other and are, in fact, indispensable to each other. Marriage is the natural consequence of this discovery by them.

Elizabeth's Self-Esteem, Hurt By Mr. Darcy's Remark: - Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy meet each other at an assembly (that is, a social gath-ering). Mr. Darcy has come to this assembly in the company of his intimate friend, Mr. Bingley. The girls attending the assembly are greatly attracted by Mr. Darcy chiefly because of his handsome appearance and his large estate (which is situated in Derbyshire). The girls are also attracted greatly by Mr. Bingley who too is a good-looking and very rich man. While Mr. Bingley shows a lot of interest in the girls, and more especially in Miss Jane Bennet, Mr. Darcy does not feel much attracted by any of the girls. In fact, Mr. Darcy thinks that none of the girls present suits him as a partner in the dancing and therefore he dances only with the two sisters of his friend, Mr. Bingley. When Mr. Bingley suggests to Mr. Darcy that he should dance with Elizabeth, Mr. Darcy speaks disapprovingly of her, saying that there is not much charm about her. This uncomplimentary remark by Mr. Darcy about Elizabeth is overheard by her, and she therefore feels very annoyed with him. Otherwise too Mr. Darcy seems to be a very proud man. Mrs. Bennet, after attending the assembly, and speaking to her husband, describes Mr. Darcy as a very rude kind of man. Thus on the occasion of their very first meeting, Mr. Darcy expresses the view that Elizabeth is not beautiful enough to tempt him, while Elizabeth feels deeply offended with him after overhearing this remark. Elizabeth feels that Mr. Darcy is a very proud man who has mortified her own pride. What she means is that Mr. Darcy has hurt her self-esteem.

A Change in Mr. Darcy's Opinion of Elizabeth: - When Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy meet again, Elizabeth is determined not to dance with him because of the grudge which she is harbouring against him. However, a slight change now takes place in Mr. Darcy's view of Elizabeth. He begins to find that Elizabeth's face is rendered uncommonly intelligent by the beautiful expression of her dark eyes. He also finds that her figure is light and pleasing; and he is impressed by the easy playfulness of her manners. He now tells Miss Bingley that Elizabeth is a pretty woman having a pair of fine eyes. Miss Bingley regards Mr. Darcy's praise of Elizabeth as a clear signal that he is thinking of Elizabeth as his would-be wife. She then makes a sarcastic remark, telling Mr. Darcy that, in case he marries Elizabeth, he would get a charming mother-in-law in Mrs. Bennet. Actually, Mrs. Bennet has not produced a good impression on either Miss Bingley or Mr. Darcy, and Miss Bingley's remark is therefore meant to lower both Elizabeth and her mother in Mr. Darcy's estimation.

Mr. Darcy's Comment upon Elizabeth's Long Walk: - When Jane has fallen ill at Netherfield Park, Elizabeth goes to attend upon her sister. Elizabeth walks the whole distance of about three miles from Longbourn to Netherfield Park. Mr. Bingley’s two sisters mock at Elizabeth for having walked such a long distance because they think themselves to be fine ladies and because, in their opinion, only a low-class girl would care to walk such a long distance. However, Mr. Darcy does not share the opinion of these two ladies in this respect. He defends Elizabeth for having walked this long distance, and says that her eyes looked brighter after she had walked that long distance. Elizabeth, of course, does not know the comments which these persons have made upon the long walk that she has taken. She continues to nurse a grievance against Mr. Darcy for having made an adverse remark about her at the assembly.

Mr. Darcy, Charmed by Elizabeth; her Handicap in his View: - Mr. Darcy now becomes more and more interested in Elizabeth. Miss Bingley perceives this change in Mr. Darcy, and she tries her utmost not to allow Elizabeth to get too close to him because Miss Bingley is herself interested in him. Mr. Darcy has now begun to like Elizabeth very much and is, in fact, feeling thoroughly charmed by her. Her only handicap in his eyes is that she does not belong to the aristocratic class of society to which he himself belongs. If she had been the daughter of aristocratic and rich parents,

Mr. Darcy would certainly have proposed marriage to her at this very stage in the story. Mr. Darcy is a proud man and a snob who believes in distinctions of class and rank. Elizabeth, on her part, continues to feel prejudiced against Mr. Darcy because of the adverse opinion which he had initially expressed about her.

Different Points of View: - In the course of a conversation, Mr. Darcy happens to say that it has always been his effort to avoid weaknesses which invite ridicule. Elizabeth asks if vanity and pride are among the weaknesses which he tries to avoid. Mr. Darcy replies that van-ity is surely a weakness which should be avoided, but that pride has to be properly regulated if a proud man has a really superior mind. Elizabeth, speaking to Miss Bingley, says half ironically that Mr. Darcy suffers from no defect. Mr. Darcy, intervening, says that he has his full share of faults, though his faults are not due to any mental deficiency in him. He then goes on to say that he cannot ignore the follies and vices from which other people suffer; and he adds: "My good opinion once lost is lost forever." Elizabeth, however, tells him that it is surely a fault in him if he can never ignore other people's follies and vices. She even says to him at this time that his defect is a tendency to hate everybody, to which he replies that her defect is deliberately to misunderstand everybody. Now, it is clear to us that Elizabeth is keen to maintain the independence of her mind. Any other girl would have been at pains to humour Mr. Darcy and to endorse whatever opinion he might have expressed. But Elizabeth has the courage to differ with him. Mr. Darcy, it seems, does not resent Elizabeth's disagreeing with the opinions which he expresses. On the contrary, Mr. Darcy finds that he is feeling more and more drawn towards her.

Mr. Darcy, Almost in Love with Elizabeth: - Mr. Darcy now thinks that, if he comes into contact with Elizabeth more often, he might actually fall in love with her. The author in this context writes: "He began to feel the danger of paying Elizabeth too much attention." Mr. Darcy pays little heed to Miss Bingley who tries her utmost to win his good opinion and his heart. At this point we get the feeling that Mr. Darcy has already fallen in love with Elizabeth though he does not yet admit this fact even to himself. The chief obstruction in his way is Elizabeth's lower social position. He thinks that his marrying Elizabeth would be an unseemly step because he is far above Elizabeth in social standing.

Elizabeth Hardening; and Darcy Softening: - A new complication arises in the Elizabeth-Darcy relationship when Mr. Wickham appears on the stage. This man, who becomes rapidly familiar with Elizabeth because of his social charm, tells Elizabeth that Mr. Darcy had done him a great wrong and a great injustice. Mr. Wickham represents himself to Elizabeth as a victim of Mr. Darcy's callousness and high-handedness, with the result that Elizabeth's prejudice against Mr. Darcy is now increased. In this frame of mind, Elizabeth tells her friend Charlotte that she is determined of hate Mr. Darcy and that there is no possibility at all of her finding him an agreeable man. Then another event takes place which further intensifies Elizabeth's bitterness against Mr. Darcy. She learns from Colonel Fitzwilliam that Mr. Darcy had dissuaded Mr. Bingley from proposing marriage to her sister Jane. Thus several reasons have now combined to harden Elizabeth's attitude towards Mr. Darcy, while Mr. Darcy, on his part, has been softening towards Elizabeth.

Darcy's Proposal of Marriage; and Elizabeth's Rejection of It: - Mr. Darcy is now so much in love with Elizabeth that he proposes marriage to her. This happens when Elizabeth is staying at Hunsford. However, his con-sciousness of Elizabeth's social inferiority to him has by no means weakened or diminished. Even while making this proposal of marriage to her, he goes out of his way to emphasize the fact of her being socially very much beneath him. Elizabeth, who is a very self-respecting girl, feels deeply offended by the condescending manner in which Mr. Darcy has made his proposal of marriage, and she therefore summarily rejects his proposal not only because of his arrogant manner but because of other reasons as well. She gives him her reasons for this rejection in some detail. She tells him that he had prevented his friend Mr. Bingley from marrying her sister Jane. She tells him that he had most unjustly and cruelly treated Mr. Wickham, the son of the steward to Mr. Darcy's late father. And, of course, she points out to him the superiority complex from which he is suffering.

Darcy's Letter to Elizabeth in Defence of Himself: - On the following day, Mr. Darcy hands over a letter to Elizabeth. This letter contains Mr. Darcy's defence of himself. Through this letter he informs Elizabeth that he might have been mistaken in his judgment of her sister Jane and might have committed an error of judgment in preventing Mr. Bingley from marrying Jane, but that his treatment of Mr. Wickham had fully been justified because Mr. Wickham, far from deserving any favour or any kindness, is an obnoxious man, having no scruples at all. Mr. Darcy further points out that the behaviour of Eliza-beth's mother and her two youngest sisters has been far from pleasing.

A Change in Elizabeth's View of Darcy: - Although Elizabeth finds that the tone of Mr. Darcy's letter is insolent and haughty, yet the letter does bring about a certain change in her. She begins to realize that Mr. Darcy had, after all, not been unjust in his treatment of Mr. Wickham. She also realizes that Mr. Darcy had some valid ground for preventing Mr. Bingley from marrying Jane because Jane had really not given to Mr. Bingley a sufficient indication that she was deeply in love with him. Elizabeth also admits to herself that the behaviour of her mother and her two youngest sisters has been undignified and therefore disagreeable.

Mutual Appreciation of Each Other: - During Elizabeth's stay at Lambton and her visit to Pemberley House, Mr. Darcy is at pains to please Elizabeth by his talk and by calling in her in the company of his sister Georgiana. So anxious is Mr. Darcy to place Elizabeth at Lambton that Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner feel convinced that he is in love with her. On one occasion when Miss Bingley begins to speak unfavourably about Elizabeth's physician appearance, Mr. Darcy says that Elizabeth is one of the handsomest women of his acquaintance. Elizabeth, on her part, has now begun to think that Mr. Darcy is exactly the man who, in disposition and talents, would suit her most as her husband. She believes that his understanding and temper, though unlike her own, would answer all her wishes.

Elizabeth's Admiration for Darcy for his Role in the Lydia-Wickham Affair: - Elizabeth begins to admire Mr. Darcy still more when she comes to know of the role which he had played in bringing about the marriage of Lydia and Mr. Wickham. She now thinks that the Bennet family has reason to feel deeply indebted to Mr. Darcy for having saved them from disgrace and infamy. Mr. Darcy's action in having paid Mr. Wickham the required sum of money and having settled the whole matter amicably shows him to be a high-minded man.

The Effect on Mr. Darcy of Lady Catherine's Talk with Elizabeth: - Another event now takes place to bring Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy closer to each other. This event is a visit by Lady Catherine to Longbourn. Lady Catherine, in a private meeting with Elizabeth, warns her against agreeing to marry her nephew, Mr. Darcy. Lady Catherine says that Mr. Darcy is to marry her own daughter Miss Ann de Bourgh and that Elizabeth should not dare to think of marrying him. Lady Catherine utters all sorts of threats to Elizabeth; but Elizabeth remains calm and unafraid, and her answers to Lady Catherine show that she would decide the matter in accordance with her own wishes in case Mr. Darcy at all proposes marriage to her. Lady Catherine feels most annoyed by Elizabeth's attitude. When Lady Catherine meets Mr. Darcy in London, she tells him of the meeting which she has had with Elizabeth, and the answers which Elizabeth had given to her. Mr. Darcy now feels convinced that Elizabeth has a soft corner for him, and so he decides to renew his proposal of marriage to her.

Elizabeth's Acceptance of Mr. Darcy's Proposal of Marriage: - At his next meeting with Elizabeth, Mr. Darcy once again proposes marriage to her, admitting that he is now a changed man and that all his pride, vanity, selfishness, and arrogance have been humbled by her. He says that he owes the great change in his character to the manner in which she had been behaving towards him. Elizabeth, whose own attitude towards Mr. Darcy has undergone a great change on account of various reasons including the role which Mr. Darcy had played in the Lydia-Wickham affair, gladly accepts the proposal. And so, after the permission of Mr. Bennet has been obtained by Mr. Darcy, the marriage of Mr. Darcy and Elizabeth takes place amid great jubilation.

Theme of Mercenary in Pride and Prejudice

Theme of mercenary or money marriage plays a significant role to the extent that without this theme; the novel is either incomprehensible or prosaic. Although the theme of mercenary resonates through almost all the major characters; we cannot take it to be Austen’s view point. She is against; not for mercenary marriages.

19th century England had some serious social problems left over from the heyday of Royalty and Nobility. One of the most significant of these was the tendency to marry for money. In this basic equation, a person sought a spouse based on the dowry receivable and their allowance. This process went both ways; a beautiful woman might be able to snag a rich husband, or a charring handsome man could woo a rich young girl. In these marriages, money was the only consideration. Love was left out, with a feeling that it would develop as the years went by. In Pride and Prejudice, Jane Austen comments that marriage in her time is a financial contract, where love is strictly a matter of chance. Lady Catherine states the fact that happiness in marriage is strictly a matter of chance. This holds true in the conception of marriage held in the novel. All of the marriages in the book formed under the bonds of money rather than the bonds of love end up unhappy or unsuccessful. The whole novel outlines attempts to dance around love for the combination of a wealthy person with an attractive person.

Before Austen can chart the difficult process through which the heroine of Pride and Prejudice becomes a skilled player of the marriage-gambling game, however, the novelist must establish the association between money and marriage. She accomplishes this throughout the book by mixing the languages of love and economics. The novel's celebrated first sentence presents an example of this type of punning: "It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife". The line's comic effect derives primarily from the incongruity between the lofty diction of the phrase "truth universally acknowledged" and the baldly mercenary sentiment with which the sentence ends. The humorous conflation of philosophic and monetary speculation continues through the first and into the second chapter, as Mr. Bennet misses no opportunity to amuse himself with repeated puns that portray the arrival of the Bingley party at Netherfield as a serendipitous investment opportunity for the families in the village. When, for example, Mr. Bennet tells his wife that he needn't call on Bingley, since their neighbor Mrs. Long has promised to introduce the Bennet girls to the rich young man at an upcoming party, Mrs. Bennet replies that Mrs. Long is a "selfish, hypocritical woman" who will do no such thing since she has "two nieces of her own" . In that case, replies Mr. Bennet, Mrs. Bennet herself should introduce the girls, justifying such a breach of decorum on the sound financial principle that he who hesitates is lost: "if we do not venture, somebody else will; and after all Mrs. Long and her nieces must stand their chance". All financial ventures, from the stock market to marriage, entail an element of risk that one must expect and for which one must plan.

The first line of Pride and Prejudice, "It is a universally acknowledged fact that a single man in possession of a good fortune must be in want of a wife", sets the tone for the rest of the novel. We interpret it to mean that a wealthy man either actively pursues a wife based on his knowledge that no one would turn down a wealthy suitor, or attractive women use their beauty to their advantage to attract a rich husband. Confident in his knowledge of his own wealth and magnificence, Darcy's less than romantic first proposal to Elizabeth is a good example of the first of these truths. Darcy marches into the room, and after stating all the reasons why a wealthy man such as himself should never marry a "socially inferior" person such as Elizabeth, he proposes to her. He is totally confident in the knowledge that no woman would turn down marriage to a person as rich as himself, no matter how obnoxious he is. He seems out rightly stunned when Elizabeth refuses him. This refusal shatters his conception of reality, showing him that money is not all powerful. This is what seems to throw him head over heels in love with Elizabeth.

Mrs. Bennett is the embodiment of the second part of the rule. Her marriage was based on the principal of financial gain, and she desires her daughters to be the same. She was able to attract Mr. Bennett, a seemingly sensible and self-controlling man, by, "keeping her mouth shut and smiling a lot." Basically stated, she entered their marriage under false pretenses. She had no real love for him, only a desire to gain financially. Every action taken by her in the novel is directly intended to undermine her daughter's marriages, guiding them toward financial gain. She is furious when Elizabeth turns down Collins, as her marriage to him would mean the estate would stay in the family. She found Darcy most disagreeable, but would have been furious if Elizabeth had told her the she had turned Darcy's marriage proposal down.

Charlotte Lucas represents the group entirely left out of this equation. She has neither extreme beauty nor wealth. She cannot even attract a husband through her wit as Elizabeth does, and so she is basically without hope for inclusion. Elizabeth is astonished when Charlotte accepts Mr. Collin's marriage proposal, as she does not understand fully Charlotte's predicament. She cannot hope for a wealthy and handsome husband like Elizabeth and Jane can, as she does not have their particular assets. She can hope at best for security and a degree of comfort.

In Ch.26 we read that Wickham has switched his affections from Elizabeth to Miss King because she has suddenly acquired 10,000 pounds. In Ch.27 When Mrs.Gardiner teases Elizabeth that Wickham who till then was her admirer is "mercenary" Elizabeth replies:"Pray, my dear aunt, what is the difference in matrimonial affairs, between the mercenary and the prudent motive? Where does discretion end, and avarice begin?" Money no doubt is certainly necessary for a successful and happy marriage. But the vital question is 'how much?': In Ch.33 Col.Fitzwilliam Darcy,the younger son of an earl, a very rich charming young man, subtly hints that he cannot marry Elizabeth:"Our habits of expense make us too dependent, and there are not many in my rank of life who can afford to marry without some attention to money." to which Elizabeth playfully suggests that his price would perhaps not be "above 50,000 pounds." In Ch.19 Collins threatens Elizabeth to submit to his proposal by emphasizing her impoverished status:"one thousand pounds in the 4 per cents, which will not be yours till after your mother's decease, is all that you may ever be entitled to." The novel is a heart rending cry for the freedom of young women from the clutches of mercenary men who toyed with their happiness: "Happiness in marriage is entirely a matter of chance."

Mr. Wickham's quick transferal of his affections to Miss King after she has acquired 10,000 pounds provides important insight into his true character. While Elizabeth had clearly been his favorite, Wickham must have realized that her social position gave him little chance of being able to marry her. Of course, this knowledge did not prevent him from forming an attachment to her in the first place. Because he paid no attention at all to Miss King before she inherited the money, his motives for beginning to show a preference for her must be purely mercenary. Elizabeth does not seem to find fault with him for his actions, however, even Mrs. Gardiner points out the purely mercenary reasons for his actions. Having been sufficiently flattered by his preference for her and having formed a positive judgment of him, it seems that even in the face of such strong evidence she is unwilling to rethink her positive judgment of him. It is ironic that while Elizabeth is unable to make excuses for her good friend Charlotte for her choice to marry based on financial concerns, she sees no problem in Wickham's feigning attraction to a woman simply because her sizeable inheritance.

Elizabeth learns from Lydia that Mr. Wickham has given up his thought of marrying Miss King also. This and the other facts show Mr. Wickham to be an utterly unreliable kind of man. When Elizabeth tells Jane the true facts about Mr. Wickham, Jane too feels shocked and says: "Wickham so very bad! It is almost past belief." Mr. Wickham provides further evidence of his being a rascal and a villain by eloping with Lydia. The news of Lydia's elopement with Mr. Wickham comes as a great shock to the whole Bennet family, and especially to Elizabeth. It is true that much of the blame for this elopement rests upon Lydia herself; but Mr. Wickham cannot be exonerated. According to the information supplied by Mr. Wickham's friend Mr. Denny, Mr. Wickham had no intention to marry Lydia. Thus, Mr. Wickham's real purpose in running away Lydia had been only to seduce her and to satisfy his lust for her. If Mr. Wickham does marry Lydia ultimately, it is because of the role played by Mr. Darcy in the whole affair. Mr. Wickham states certain terms and conditions on which he is prepared to marry Lydia; and Mr. Darcy goes out of his way to fulfil those terms and conditions. Of course, Mr. Bennet too has to satisfy certain conditions laid down by Mr. Wickham, but the major role in bringing about the marriage is that of Mr. Darcy. Mr. Wickham also reveals at this time that he had incurred certain debts which are also now paid by Mr. Darcy. Thus, Mr. Wickham shows himself to be a mercenary man, besides being unscrupulous in his relations with girls.

Wickham's next victim is Lydia. It is rather difficult to explain his motives here, for Lydia has neither money, nor beauty, nor brains. And Wickham does not love her at all. The fact is that his gambling and his reckless extravagance involve him in a number of undischarged debts of honour, and he is forced to leave the neighborhood. The elopement is brought on by the strength of Lydia's love for him. He has absolutely no intentions of marrying her. Mrs. Gardiner's letter to Elizabeth clearly reveals that, even after elopement, he cherishes the hope of more effectually making his fortune by marriage in some other country. His willingness to take Lydia along is either a pure piece of rakishness or an attempt to blackmail Mr. Bennet and extort as much money as possible. However, Darcy's intervention persuaded intervention promises him substantial immediate relief and he is persuaded to marry Lydia. His conduct in this episode betrays his extreme selfishness, his mercenariness and venality, and his utter baseness and want of principle. In pursuing his selfish aims he is thoroughly calculating - as in the careful plan to gain Georgiana Darcy's money as well as revenge on Darcy. In most of his pursuits he is thoroughly mercenary, as in his pursuit of a wealthy wife and his readiness to marry Lydia when offered enough money. His style of living is debauched: he likes gambling to excess and drinking, and his sexual morals are weak or non-existent. He is totally lacking in honour, and runs away from paying gambling debts, feels no guilt about the social stigma which will attach to Lydia after she has run away with him, and shows no intention of marrying her. Nor on his return to Longbourn after the marriage does he show any shame. At the end, we feel that in marrying Lydia he gets the fate he deserves.

In conclusion, the essential statement made about marriage in Pride and Prejudice is that a marriage for money will end up unsuccessful. At the same time, a marriage based purely on the means of passion and love alone will also be doomed to failure. A balance must be met. Balance doesn't necessarily have to be equal, but must be present in order for a marriage to be successful. This is proven in the novel Pride and Prejudice, by examples of unsuccessful marriages formed for money, and successful marriages formed by a combination of love and security.

Character Analysis of Elizabeth and Darcy

Elizabeth Bennet:

The protagonist of the novel, is portrayed as an independent and innovative woman of her time. She is the second eldest of the five Bennet sisters and shares a close relationship with her older sister Jane. Favored by her father, Elizabeth is seen as her mother's least favorite. This comes as no surprise as Mrs. Bennet is extremely superficial and self-absorbed, the polar opposite of Elizabeth. Her younger sisters, Kitty and Lydia, are equally repulsive, shamelessly flirtatious with men of the local military outpost. Though very dedicated to her family, Elizabeth is often humiliated by their personalities.

A central theme within the novel is Elizabeth's limitation for marriage resulting from her family's social status. Elizabeth's mother throws a fit when her predetermined plans to wealthily wed each of her daughters clashes with Elizabeth's personal creed to marry for love, regardless of material wealth. One such example is when Elizabeth is proposed to by her imbecilic cousin, Mr. Collins. According to inheritance mandates of nineteenth century England, Mr. Collins is entitled to the family's entire estate upon Mr. Bennet's death. Elizabeth, however, does not love him nor ever could. She is often regarded as being too stubborn, socially rebellious, and judgmental, viewing those who do not share her same beliefs concerning marriage in a condescending light. This proves true when Elizabeth's dear friend, Charlotte Lucas, in turn marries the spurned Mr. Collins solely for financial security. Elizabeth disapproves of her friend's shallow and conformist decision, causing her to so eagerly court and proceed to marry him.

Just as she possesses critical opinions about select others, so too do others reciprocate the criticism and judgment for her. When faced with opposition, Elizabeth's quick and fiery tongue often gets the better of her. A key event in the novel that exemplifies Elizabeth's spirit transforms her life drastically. While attending a social gathering, Elizabeth is introduced to Fitzwilliam Darcy, a tall, handsome, and wealthy landowner. Their meeting is spiteful and cruel. Mr. Darcy does not hesitate to insult and slight Elizabeth and her family. Somewhat uncharacteristically, Elizabeth's musters the strength to internalize his words and remain silent; however, Mr. Darcy's insults give her reason to be prejudiced against him and his seemingly unjustifiable pride.

The rollercoaster of affairs involving two men in Elizabeth's life begin partially after her initial acquaintance with Mr. Darcy followed by that with a handsome and charming, yet impoverished soldier named George Wickham. Initially, Wickham captures Elizabeth's interest, however, he is deceitful about his past, portraying Mr. Darcy as the primary source of his suffering and misery. Elizabeth trusts Wickham's fabrication completely, only succeeding to fuel Elizabeth's increasing distain for Mr. Darcy. In addition to Wickham's malicious tales, Elizabeth discovers that Mr. Darcy is responsible for the cruel end to the romantic relations between her beloved older sister Jane and Mr. Darcy's good friend, Mr. Bingley. Elizabeth loathes Mr. Darcy as Jane is overcome with depression from the abrupt ending of her relationship with Mr. Bingley.

The turning point of the novel is marked by Mr. Darcy's shocking marriage proposal to Elizabeth. Naturally, she is stunned and even appalled at this, considering her preconceptions of his character. Elizabeth proceeds to charge Mr. Darcy with poor manners and ignoble character. Mr. Darcy eventually enables Elizabeth to see his true character as an honorable and respectable gentleman. Ironically, Elizabeth also comes to realize that all the characteristics she erroneously distained in Mr. Darcy truly belong to Mr. Wickham.

As time goes on, Fitzwilliam Darcy and Elizabeth Bennet's relationship only strengthens as they solidify a loving relationship. New obstacles arise between the two proud lovers, though, mainly stemming from social faux pas and class divides only true love can bond. Additionally, a dramatic scandal arises nearly eliminating any possibility of marriage between Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy. Elizabeth discovers that her impulsive sister Lydia has run away with George Wickham, without any intentions of marrying. Lydia's actions are certain to bring shame and dishonor to the entire Bennet family, such that no respectable man would be able to consider marrying the remaining sisters thereafter. Mr. Darcy rescues the Bennet family name by providing the financial means for Lydia and Wickham to marry. It is only due to the audacious personalities of both Mr. Darcy and Elizabeth that the two are able to overcome tribulations caused by nearly every character involved: Lady Catherine de Bourgh, Mrs. Bennet, George Wickham, the younger Bennet sisters and Mr. Bingley's sisters.

Elizabeth suffers the loss of hope after introspective reflection and painful confrontation of shallow social standards. She is devastated by the possibility that after reconsidering true nobility of Mr. Darcy's character, she could have lost him forever. It will take redeeming the seemingly irreversible and shocking scandal of Lydia and George Wickham's elopement for Mr. Darcy to prove his noble, selfless, and considerate character. He saves not only the Bennet family by making Lydia an honorable woman by offering Wickham enough money to entice him to wed the virtually penniless Lydia, despite his own personal grudge against the deceitful Wickham. The restoration of honor to the Bennet family provides for two more important marriages to take place: one between Jane and Mr. Bingley, and the other between Elizabeth and Mr. Darcy. In the end, Elizabeth has maintained her pride, yet is able to overcome her prejudice against Mr. Darcy, who initially sought to damage this pride upon meeting each other for the first time. Eventually, Elizabeth is forced to reconsider her prejudice attitudes, targeting the superfluous societal values as a whole, instead of the people who live by them.

Fitzwilliam Darcy:

Mr. Darcy is the second of the two protagonists in the novel. Over time as the story unfolds, the reader's perception of Mr. Darcy's transforms from maliciousto benevolent. His position as the ideal match for Elizabeth becomes obvious, though once an unimaginable possibility. In addition to being educated and worldly, he is rich and handsome, claiming the adoration of various women throughout the novel. It is clear from the onset, however, that he is only interested in the very woman who despises him most, Elizabeth Bennet. Nephew of Lady Catherine de Bourgh, Mr. Darcy's rank in society is just below that of nobility.

Mr. Darcy praises and holds dear many things in his life. Among the most important are his sister, Georgiana and his estate, Pemberley. Pemberley proves a fitting symbol for Mr. Darcy throughout the novel. From afar, Pemberley appears to be a proud and arrogant residence. Upon closer inspection, however, it radiates natural warmth, beauty, and a solid foundation.

Mr. Darcy's family ties and relations, in addition to Lady Catherine de Bourgh, are strong and formidable. As the only son of a well-established family, he inherits of the Pemberley estate and becomes the master of the family, especially of his adoring younger sister Georgiana Darcy. As her legal guardian, Mr. Darcy adopts a paternalistic role in Georgiana's life. Upon the death of Wickham's father, Mr. Darcy's father took the penniless Wickham under his wing and treats him like his own son. Wickham and Mr. Darcy mature together, both enjoying financial and social success at an early age. It soon became apparent, however, the conflicting characters of the two men. Where Mr. Darcy is honest, forthright, and hardworking, Wickham is discovered to be surreptitious, especially in regards to money, Mr. Darcy's father, Georgiana, and Elizabeth. In addition to being deceitful, Wickham is a philanderer and gambler.

A riff between the two childhood friends develops and quickly grows to irreparable proportions once Wickham decides to earn his fortune by eloping with young Georgiana Darcy. Georgiana was an heiress in her own right. Fortunately, Darcy due to his undying commitment to family and virtue, he succeeds in preventing the dishonorable elopement. Fortunately for Wickham, he decides not to publicly ruin him; instead, but he buys Wickham off, and thus severing all connections between them.

Unfortunately, Wickham's actions and an atrocious first impression form Elizabeth's repulsive opinion of Mr. Darcy. Ironically, her response to his hostilities and the obvious interest she shows in George Wickham only intrigue Darcy further, igniting within him a passion for Elizabeth. It is only after a fruitless and shocking proposal to Elizabeth, signifying the turning point of the novel, that Mr. Darcy receives the opportunity to clear his good name with his beloved, in addition to his dark past with Wickham and his influences on the relationship between Jane Bennet and Charles Bingley. Mr. Darcy does exactly this and slowly begins to win her affections. Despite humiliating himself by proposing and being rejected from one of inferior social class, he remains steadfast and determined to win Elizabeth's heart. His prejudice is proven through both his initial insulting comments to Elizabeth upon introduction, and by the reasons he offers to Mr. Bingley for ending relations with Jane Bennet. It is not long, however, before Mr. Darcy realizes that Elizabeth is far different from any of the solicitous women enamored with him.

Although both are quick to judge and initially are often blinded to the truth behind their pride and prejudices. Love escapes him. He is desirous not to wed or doom his days to an ordinary girl, but he is intrigued not only for Elizabeth's beauty, but her intellect, spirit, and wit as well. Elizabeth's bitter feelings towards him, and his own haughtiness seem only to deny any romantic prospects between the two. While Darcy hails from the upper echelons of society and family, Longbourn, Mr. Bennet's estate, is just barely profitable enough to admit the family into Mr. Darcy's social realm. Undoubtedly, Elizabeth's rejection of his proposal humbles Mr. Darcy tremendously.

Elizabeth's beauty claims Darcy's affections for her throughout the remainder novel, causing him to demonstrate his growing commitment to her, regardless of social standings and the family's harsh criticisms of him. Mr. Darcy finds himself in a peculiar situation, faced with the potential ruin of the Bennet family that Elizabeth had prophesized. He knows that the only way to save the family, as well as his romantic prospects with Elizabeth, is to aid Lydia Bennet, and the deplorable George Wickham.

The decision serves as a great burden upon Mr. Darcy's conscience as he is forced to choose between pride and charity. Darcy proves his benevolence as he proceeds to secretly funnel money to the Bennets through Mrs. Bennet's brother, Mr. Gardiner. In the process, Mr. Darcy is able to overcome any previous judgments, and even accepting Wickham as a prospective brother-in-law. With a renewed outlook, he offers his consent and support of Mr. Bingley and Jane Bennet's marriage, which Darcy had also previously delayed due to his critical opinions of their relationship. Mr. Darcy's patronage of the Bennet family as well as his romantic intentions are offered at a superficial cost to him, voiced by his disapproving aunt, Lady Catherine, a prude and narrow-minded woman. Lady Catherine is appalled at the alleged destruction of her family name that would result by admitting Elizabeth into her family. Instead, she considers her own sickly daughter, Heiress Anne de Bourgh, a far more fitting wife for Mr. Darcy.

In the end, however, Mr. Darcy is only too set on winning Elizabeth's heart. She regrets her initial harsh judgments of Mr. Darcy, and begins to see him with new eyes, the man of her dreams. Darcy, being the impressionable man that he is, holds few people in high esteem, and Elizabeth is one of them. She joins Georgiana, Mr. Darcy's dear sister, as the two most influential and precious elements in his life. Pemberly becomes the home to his new wife, Elizabeth. Mr. Darcy overcomes various internal battles, such as his arrogance, prejudice, and social restraints. Finally, he reaches a state of harmony between all the elements of his life including fortune, family, friends, and the very dearest to his heart, his new wife, Elizabeth.

Jane Austen as a Novelist

Jane Austen wrote out of sheer love of writing without having an eye on popularity or monetary gain. She has often been praised for the silvery perfection of her art. Macaulay has in his journal the entry: "I have now read once again all Miss Austen's novels; charming they are. There are in the world no compositions which approach nearer to perfection." She is perfect because she never strays outside the material and method of her art

Jane's creative range is in some respects a very limited and narrow one. In the first instance it is confined to her portrayal of the gentry class in which she was born and which she knows best. Leonie Villard has rightly pointed out: "The 'gentry,' that class which is essentially proper to English society, holding to the aristocracy as well as to the middle class, and forming a link between them, is not only the class which Jane Austen knows best, it is also the only class that she wishes to know."

Jane further limits herself by taking not a large canvas for her portraiture but selecting only "the little bit of irony (two inches wide)" to work upon. According to her, "3 or 4 Families in a Country Village is the very thing to work on," as she wrote to her niece, the literary Anna. Owing to the fascinating pictures of domestic life portrayed by Austen, her novels are considered the classics of "domestic comedy" novels. She lived through the French Revolution and the Napoleonic Wars, but she does not mention these historic events even once in her novels. There are no adventures, no sensational incidents, and no romantic musings in her novels. There are incidents of elopements such as those of Lydia and Wickham in Pride and Prejudice, or Julia and Henry Crawford in Mansfield Park. They are, however, in no sense romantic affairs but fall in the natural course of events in the story.

Jane Austen's novels deal with commonplace humdrum events of everyday life, in which people do little more than talk to one another about their trivial interests. Life mostly consists of paying Visits, quizzing and speculating about new arrivals, driving to meet relatives or to do shopping, walking in parks, etc. The quiet drama of life that is treated is mostly confined to drawing rooms. That is why Charlotte Bronte regrets that Jane's novels lack the picturesque aspects of external nature for there is "no open country, no fresh air, no blue hill, no bonny beck" in her novels. Owing to Jane's preoccupation with ordinary, commonplace events of life, her novels are called "tea-table romances." Walter Scott praised her for her exquisite treatment of ordinary events: "The young lady has a talent for describing the involvements of feelings and characters of ordinary life which is to me the most wonderful I ever met with." He also praises her "...exquisite touch which renders ordinary commonplace things and characters interesting...."

According to Professor Garrod the central situation in Austen's novels is more or less the same, namely, young women in search of husbands. In Somerset Maugham's view, "She wrote very much the same son of story in all her books, and there is no great variety in her characters." Even in the treatment of love Jane is limited in her inability to express impulsive emotions, associated with love, directly and passionately. Charlotte Bronte emphasizes the lack of passions in her novels when she remarks: "She ruffles her reader by nothing vehement, disturbs him by nothing profound. The passions are perfectly unknown to her; she rejects even a speaking acquaintance with that stormy sisterhood." According to George Eliot, Jane Austen "never penetrated into deeper experience, the powerful and spiritual things of life."

The most important aspect of Jane's narrow range is her comic mode of holding a mirror up to life. She is a comedian and her literary impulse from the beginning to the end, has been humorous. On being asked to write an historical romance by the Prince Regent's librarian, Mr. Clark, she clearly told him that she "could no more write a romance than an epic poem." She could under no condition go beyond her range of the comic vision of life. Most of her successful characters are regular comic character-parts like Mrs. Bennet and Mr. Collins.

Within her narrow range Austen is among the greatest literary artists, the greatest "artificers" of fiction. Her picture of life is "a delicate water-colour to put beside the more vigorous oil-painting of Fielding." Her work is that of a miniaturist or illuminator. According to Charlotte Bronte "There is a Chinese fidelity, a miniature delicacy in the painting" of life by Austen. Like a true artist Jane holds to the classical ideal, "nothing in excess; everything in its proper proportion." She, however, conceals the effort of her creative activity so well that her work seems absolutely spontaneous and natural, almost a free outburst. Her own conception of a perfect novel as given in Northanger Abbey is "a work in which the greatest powers of mind are displayed, in which the most thorough knowledge of human nature, the happiest delineation of its varieties, the liveliest effusions of wit and humour, are conveyed to the world in the best chosen language."

Professor Garrod's remark that Jane Austen is incapable of writing a story refers to her inability of narrating sensational and exciting happenings. In fact, such a sequence of happenings was beyond her range. But, even while dealing with commonplace events of life, she goes on manipulating relationships among characters by giving twists to them in such a way as always keeps the reader in suspense. The story of the struggle of mutual attraction against mutual repulsion of Darcy and Elizabeth in Pride and Prejudice, passes through" such situations as keeps the readers eager to know the next development, till the end. Jane Austen also anticipates Henry James* favourite technique of telling the story not as the author perceives it, but as one of the characters in the story perceives it. This device helps to eliminate the frequent intrusions of the author, which break the illusion of reality and make the novel rambling and loose in form. The story of Pride and Prejudice is narrated from the point of view of Elizabeth.

All of Jane Austen's novels are meticulously integrated. There is not a character or incident that does not make its necessary contribution to the development of the plot. Structurally her novels belong to that type of the "dramatic novel" in which the hiatus between the characters and the plot disappears. The given qualities of the characters determine the action, and the action in turn progressively changes the characters, and thus everything is borne forward to an end. In Pride and Prejudice, the pride of Darcy and prejudice of Elizabeth give rise to action which in its turn brings about a change in them. Darcy discards his pride and Elizabeth her prejudice and thus the hero and the heroine are finally united. Baker divides the plot of Pride and Prejudice into five acts of high comedy corresponding with the five stages of situation at the beginning, development of conflict, climax in the middle of the plot, followed by the decline of conflict and final resolution. In the novel the climax is reached when Darcy's proposal is rejected by Elizabeth.

Austen's skill to fuse together good and bad in her characters in the same proportion as is found in nature makes them real and life-like. She has an unerring eye for the outward idiosyncrasies of her characters, their manner, their charm and their tricks of speech. Her characters are therefore so much individualized that each is different from the other. In Macaulay's view she approaches nearest to the manner of Shakespeare in this respect. He says: "she has given us a multitude of characters, all, in a certain sense, commonplace, all such as we meet every day, yet they are all as perfectly discriminated from each other as if they were the most eccentric of human beings."

Austen has a deep psychological insight which enables her to correlate the surface peculiarities of her characters with their inner nature. She also reveals a keen insight into the processes of the heart and the hidden internal workings of the minds of her characters. These hidden tumults of heart often bring about changes in her characters. Austen's characters are, therefore, not static or flat but well-rounded and vibrant. Being embodiments of essential human nature, her characters transcend the bounds of time, to become figures of as timeless and universal a significance as the pilgrims of Chaucer.

What makes Jane Austen a source of perennial interest is the all - pervading presence of humour and irony in her stories. It is the irradiating spark of humour that enlivens her commonplace subject matter and gives to her novels their exhilarating charm. But she never ridicules "what is wiser or good." "Follies and nonsense, whims and inconsistencies" (Chapter XI) divert her and she laughs at them. In Pride and Prejudice, Mrs. Bennet and Mr. Collins arc constantly the source of laughter because of their vulgarity and mean understanding. Mr. Bennet misses no opportunity of amusing himself at their cost. Mr. Collins' foolish display of self-importance and humility and his pompous proposal to Elizabeth are also full of great fun and laughter.

Jane Austen's humour is quiet and delicate. She never exaggerates the fun. Her sense of ridicule is proportioned to the follies which divert her. Her humour is cultivated and genial; it is the humour of an observer — of a refined, satisfied observer — rather than the humour of a reformer. This is why even her satire is mild and genial, and often tinged with irony. When Lydia in Pride and Prejudice suggests to her mother that the family visit her for she can get husbands for her sisters easily there, Elizabeth remarks: "I thank you for my share of the favour; but I do not particularly like your way of getting husbands".

Irony is the most important element of Jane's comic vision. According to Professor Chevalier, "the basic feature of every irony is a contrast between a reality and an appearance." While "verbal irony" shows the contrast between the apparent meaning of a statement and its real meaning, "situational irony" provides the contrast between the expectation and fulfillment of a situation. "Irony of character" presents the contrast between appearance and reality of characters. Irony is at play continually and all through Pride and Prejudice. All the characters do the opposite of what they wish to do and experience the opposite of what they and others expect them to experience. Darcy and Wickham are the impressive examples of the irony of character. Elizabeth who describes Wickham as "the most agreeable man I ever saw" and considers Darcy to be "the last man in the world whom I could ever be prevailed on to marry", has to revise her opinion soon to her great mental agony Darcy, who at first sight finds Elizabeth "not handsome enough to tempt me", later on describes her "as one of the handsomest women of my acquaintance". He in good faith tries to prevent his friend Bingley from marrying a Bennet girl, but marries one himself. Mrs. Rennet thinks Darcy to be the most disagreeable man in the world, but soon after goes "distracted" with delight when she hears he is to be her son-in-law. She takes Elizabeth to her husband so that he may persuade her to marry Mr. Collins, but Mr. Bennet instead tells Elizabeth: "An unhappy alternative is before you, Elizabeth. From this day you must be a stranger to one of your parents — your mother will never see you if you do not marry Mr. Collins, and I will never see you again if you do".

Jane Austen is undoubtedly one of the great prose stylists among prose writers in English. She uses proper and apt words and her sentences are balanced, clear, precise, and simple, yet refined and lively. Though she sometimes uses archaisms and stilted diction, her dialogues are very natural and suited to her characters. Dr. Chapman calls her "one of the most accurate writers of dialogue of her own or any age."

Jane Austen's moral-realistic vision, the perfection of her art, her sparkling humour and irony, her skill in framing compact plots and natural dialogues, and portraying living characters, and the universal significance of her stories — all contribute to making her in the words of David Cecil "one of the supreme novelists of the world."

Importance of Economic Concerns in Pride and Prejudice

Economic concerns are set up right from the opening sentence of Jane Austen’s Pride and Prejudice as the foil for love. The novel is a lengthy discourse upon the old adage that “money doesn’t buy happiness”, and throughout the textual dance between these two elements, the author presents the [perhaps rather bleak] theme that happiness in marriage is possible only when love, affection, and mutual respect are all present and influential, and yet tempered with sound financial resources and decisions. “The danger of losing it all” must be removed far enough for love to blossom, and yet must not be the sole reason for the match. My essay will explore this theme through studies of the five major matrimonial arrangements in the novel.

Due to economic misfortune, the marriage between Mr. and Mrs. Bennetcannot be described as a happy one. Exasperated cries such as “Oh, Mr. Bennet!” are heard throughout the story as his wife fails repeatedly to anticipate his mind, whereupon Mr. Bennet invariably chooses to isolate himself from her shrewish voice in his library. Their relationship is significantly dysfunctional.

Mr. Bennet is motivated mostly by a desire to enjoy his life as comfortable as possible, and take nearly nobody seriously. Mrs. Bennet on the other hand is perpetually troubled by the looming threat of being reduced to her pittance of an inheritance to support her family, thanks to the “cruel entail” of the Bennet estate upon a male heir. This riles her fragile nerves, and inclines her to the sort of behaviour that Mrs. Bennet calls “silly”, such as gossip, match-making, and behaving like a snob-nosed bitch. Mrs. Bennet’s emotional despair at her financial affairs is what drives them apart. She has little recourse but to gossip about the prospects of eligible rich men marrying her daughters, as we are to understand Mr. Bennet has been unable or unwilling to save for his family. His happiness and that of Mrs. Bennet and their daughters would therefore always be greatly impaired due to his failure to properly address these economic concerns.

A character that has far too much regard for economic concerns and far too little regard for emotion is Charlotte Lucas, whom marries the ill-manneredMr.Collins for the "worldly advantage" and security he can offer her. She admits to the reader that she finds Mr. Collins "neither agreeable nor sensible", and his society "irksome" rather than pleasing, just like everybody else does. However, she still marries him without hesitation asking only "a preservative from want." Her own happiness is not even a factor in her calculations; she sees it as something external to the entire institute of marriage, saying "happiness in marriage is entirely a matter of chance." Elizabeth and the reader pity her since they know that happiness consists principally in not marrying Mr. Collins, a giant douche. After Charlotte marries she finds the only way she can bear her life with Mr. Collins is by furnishing a room for her own comforts, and by subtly manipulating him into spending time in the garden or the study, away from her.

As for Mr. Collins, he married in a manner that becomes his financial position, but his happiness too also depends on matters outside of marriage. He endlessly priorities the iron will [whim?] of Lady Catherine de Bourgh over any mutual attachment with either his cousin Elizabeth or Charlotte Lucas, and in general seems honored to be her loyal terrier for the rest of his life.

The married lives of Mr. and Mrs. Collins shows exactly how happiness is unobtainable in marriage without both love and sound economic reasoning in the right proportions.

The embarrassing put-up marriage between Wickham and Lydia comes as a result of her having no regard at all for financial concerns, and being swept up entirely in her emotions.

Not realising that the scandal of an elopement will make her sisters utter ineligible as wives for rich men in high society, thus causing the ruin of the whole family, Lydia's affair causes more grief to her mother than anyone else, shocking her and leaving her confined to her bed with misery. Swept up in girlish raptures of emotion Lydia fails to understand Wickham's motives as Lizzy does, in that "handsome young men must have something to live on, as well as the plain", and that he was only happy to marry her firstly for the money he thought he was marrying into, and later for the money he was promised by Darcy.

Since Lydia continues to naively overlook Wickham's vices she, and the family too, appear to be perfectly happy once the financial problems of her marriage are solved, and the scandal is thus disguised.

Quite shortly, the romance and marriage between Mr. Bingley and Jane Bennet is the purest in the story, and is possible only because of Bingley's fortune.

Having all his financial matters well in hand, and fully able to provide for a future wife and maintain his current life of impulsive self-serving luxury, Bingley is able to court Jane freely without complication other than his interfering sisters. In this respect he proves true the opening line from the novel, "A single man in possession of good fortune must be in want of a wife", for his fortune being assured, they have leave to both be simply happy making each other happy.

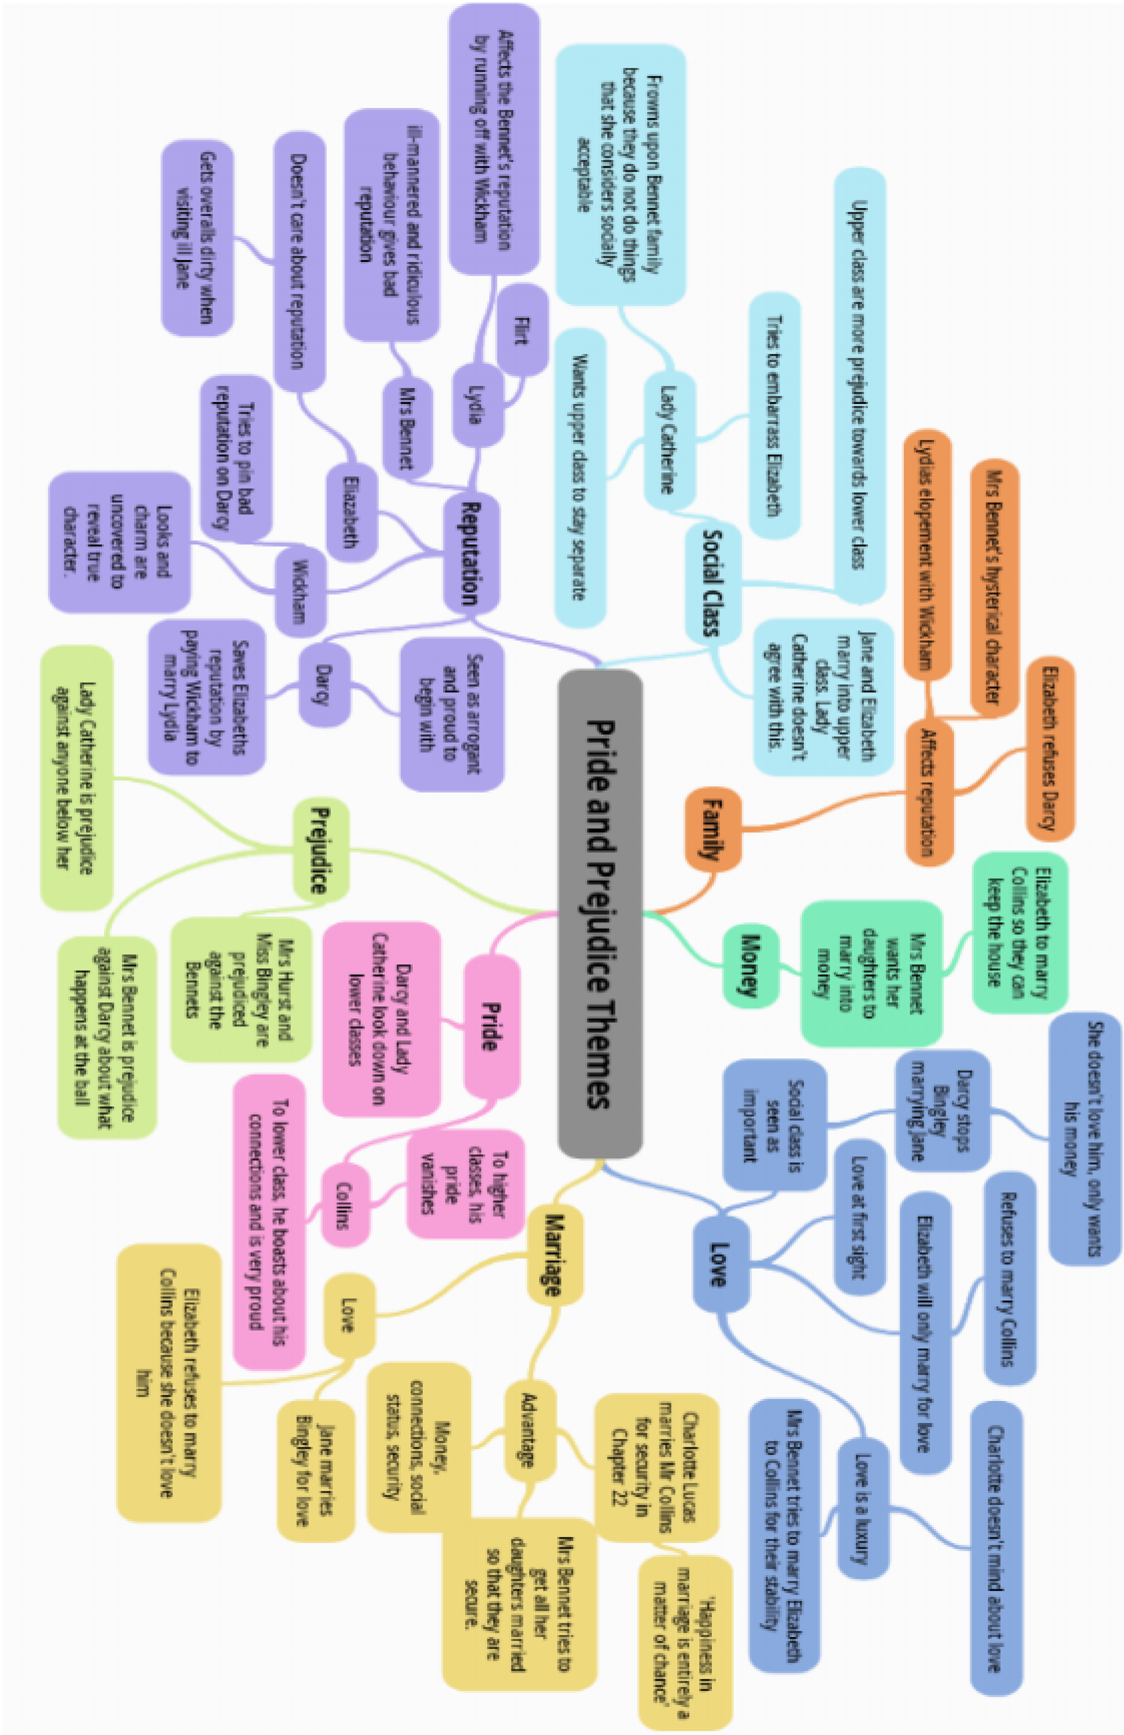
The eventual marriage between Darcy and Elizabeth is almost identical to that of Jane and Bingley's in terms of happiness and inexhaustible financial means; Darcy is indeed even richer than Bingley, and anybody who gets to know this pair well can see they are far richer in personality too. However in their courtship period Darcy and Elizabeth are unable to make each other happy. They firstly have no love for each other on account of Wickham's poisonous tales of Darcy causing a prejudice, and Darcy's pride in his superiority in wealth and class.

Their relationship builds and after some time Darcy hastily proposes to Elizabeth, but at the same time pointing out the glaring deficiencies in her financial and social position and his magnanimity in condescending to propose in spite of them. He, the careful steward of his father's great legacy, is most likely still of the mindset that in marriages between two highly wealthy families, such as would be the case between for example his and the Bingleys or de Bourghs, it is important for the lady to be equally distinguished and accomplished and bring her own financial and class benefits to the match. Not surprisingly, his proposal is rejected in this form since Elizabeth can see that she would not be happy to be regarded as an inferior.



Not until he voluntarily entreats with the despicable Wickham and even bribes him with his own [precious] fortune, does Elizabeth truly credit Darcy with having learned that his unashamed pride in his high financial position was a character flaw, and then resolve to be happy with him in marriage. His aid in first clearing Lydia's scandal with Wickham, and then confessing to meddling in Bingley's attempts to court Jane Bennet, resolves both his own reservations about lowering himself to become involved with the comparatively poor Bennet family, and Elizabeth's distaste for his pride.

After resolving both their personal and financial conflicts, they like Bingley and Jane are nothing but happy.

To conclude we can say that various marriages of characters in Pride and Prejudice explore the idea that it is essential for us to be sensible of our financial position when searching for a husband or wife, and that love and economics are equally important.

Mr. and Mrs. Bennet can no longer be happy with their dwindling wealth. In the case of the Collinses, they wed for reasons of social expectation and provision of a respectable income, and cannot make each other happy. In the case of Lydia and Wickham they are happy, but only when the truth of Wickhams financial indiscretions are concealed.

But the happy ending to the story comes when Darcy and Bingley finally overcome the economic disparities between their families and accept their brides the very happy Miss Bennets for richer or for poorer.

Pride and Prejudice Themes Reputation
Lydia
Flirt
Affects the Bennet's reputation by running off with Wickham
Mrs Bennet
ill-mannered and ridiculous behaviour gives bad reputation
Elizabeth
Doesn't care about reputation
Gets overalls dirty when visiting ill Jane
Wickham
Tries to pin bad reputation on Darcy
Looks and charm are uncovered to reveal true character.
Darcy
Seen as arrogant and proud to begin with Saves Elizabeths reputation by paying Wickham to marry Lydia Social Class
Lady Catherine
Frowns upon Bennet family because they do not do things that she considers socially acceptable
Tries to embarrass Elizabeth
Wants upper class to stay separate
Upper class are more prejudice towards lower class
Jane and Elizabeth marry into upper class. Lady Catherine doesn't agree with this.
Family
Affects reputation
Lydias elopement with Wickham
Mrs Bennet's hysterical character
Elizabeth refuses Darcy
Money
Mrs Bennet wants her daughters to marry into money
Elizabeth to marry Collins so they can keep the house
Love
Darcy stops Bingley marrying Jane
She doesn't love him, only wants his money
Social class is seen as important
Love at first sight
Elizabeth will only marry for love
Refuses to marry Collins
Love is a luxury
Charlotte doesn't mind about love
Mrs Bennet tries to marry Elizabeth to Collins for their stability Marriage Advantage
Charlotte Lucas marries Mr Collins for security in Chapter 22
'Happiness in marriage is entirely a matter of chance'
Money, connections, social status, security
Mrs Bennet tries to get all her daughters married so that they are secure.
Love
Jane marries Bingley for love
Elizabeth refuses to marry Collins because she doesn't love him Pride
Darcy and Lady Catherine look down on lower classes
Collins
To higher classes, his pride vanishes
To lower class, he boasts about his connections and is very proud
Prejudice
Lady Catherine is prejudice against anyone below her
Mrs Hurst and Miss Bingley are prejudiced against the Bennets
Mrs Bennet is prejudice against Darcy about what happens at the ball

The Return of the Native

THOMAS HARDY ; 1840-1928

Thomas Hardy was born on June 2, 1840, in Upper Bockhampton, not far from Dorchester, in Dorsetshire, southern England. The son of Thomas Hardy, a master mason or building contractor, and Jemima Hand, a woman of some literary interests. Hardy's formal education consisted of about eight years in local schools. He was bright enough so that, by this time, he'd read a good deal in English, French, and Latin on his own. Later, in London, he made his own rather careful study of painting and English poetry. He was also interested in music and learned to play the violin. At the age of sixteen, he was apprenticed to an architect in Dorchester and remained in that profession, later in London and then again in Dorchester, for almost twenty years.

He began to write poetry during this time, but none of it was published. His first novel, The Poor Man and the Lady, written in 1867–68, was never published. Although the manuscript did not survive, Hardy used parts of it in other books. His first published novel was Desperate Remedies in 1871. The first novel to appear in installments in a magazine before publication as a book, an arrangement he was to follow for the rest of his novels, was A Pair of Blue Eyes in 1873.

Hardy's real fame as a novelist, along with sufficient income to let him abandon architecture for good, came with Far from the Madding Crowd in 1874. On September 17, 1874, Hardy married Emma Lavinia Gifford.

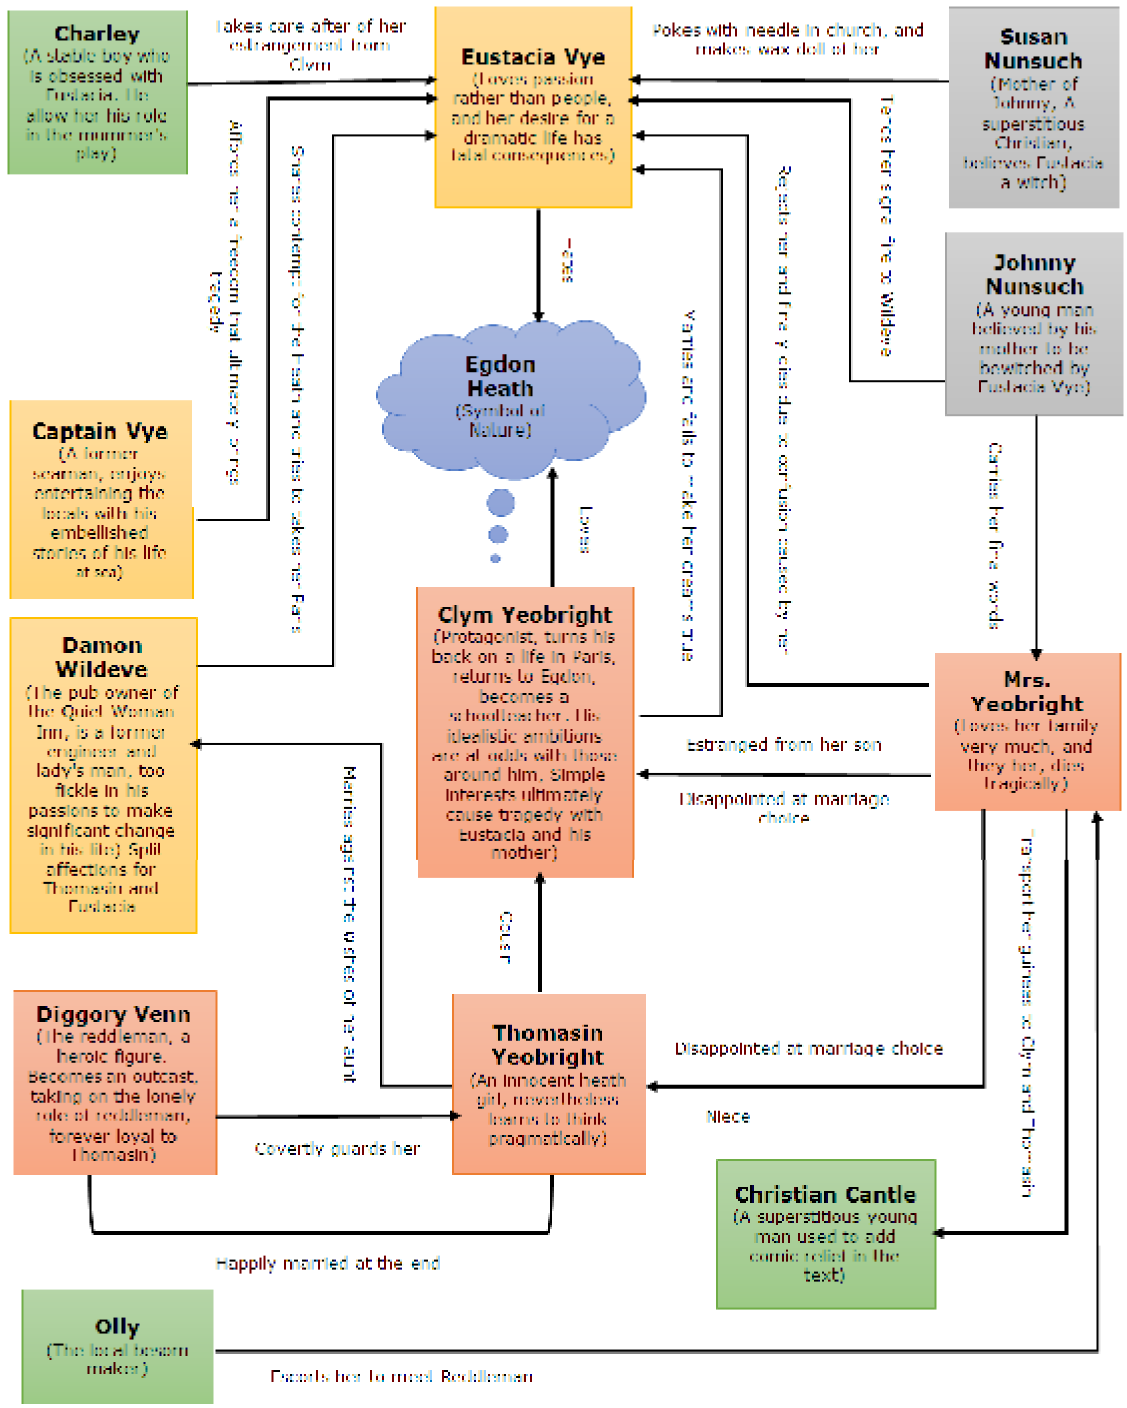
From this time on, Hardy devoted his full time to writing, continuing to publish novels regularly until his last, Jude the Obscure, in 1895. Among these are some of the best of his so-called Wessex novels (Hardy uses the name of one of the kingdoms of Anglo-Saxon Britain to designate an area including his native Dorsetshire): The Return of the Native, 1878; The Mayor of Casterbridge, 1886; The Woodlanders, 1887; Tess of the D'Urbervilles, 1891; in addition to Jude. To this list of best should be added the earlier Far from the Madding Crowd.

In writing most of his novels, Hardy worked out the details of time and geography he wanted to use with great care. Almost every novel is, therefore, located in a specific, mapped-out area of Wessex and covers a specified period of time. The Return of the Native, for example, covers the period 1842-43 and is set on Puddletown Heath (called Egdon Heath in the novel), on which Upper Bockhampton is situated. This novel also reveals a side of Hardy's authorship for which he has been taken to task by critics. In response to requests from readers of the novel in serial form, he added a sixth book to the original five to give his story a happier ending. He says in a note to the novel that the reader can choose which of the two endings he prefers but that the rigorous reader will probably favor the original conception.

Tess sold more rapidly than any of his other novels, and Jude was probably more vehemently denounced. During this period of time, Hardy also published his first poems as well as short stories. On June 29, 1885, he moved into a house he had built in Dorchester and lived there for the rest of his life.

On November 27, 1912, Mrs. Hardy, a woman with whom he had become increasingly incompatible, died. Several months later, he married Florence Emily Dugdale, a woman whom he had referred to for several years previously as his assistant and who was about forty years younger than he. After the appearance of Jude, Hardy devoted his attention entirely to poetry and drama, publishing a number of books of poems, including one which he prepared just before his death. He also wrote and published an epic drama on the Napoleonic era, The Dynasts, which appeared in three parts with a total of nineteen acts. He was given a number of honors, including an honorary degree from Oxford. The success of Tess had made possible a good income from his writing for the rest of his life, and when he died he left an estate of nearly half a million dollars. He died on January 11, 1928, and a few days later was buried in Westminster Abbey.

"The Return of the Native" : Summary



Across Egdon Heath (a "vast tract of unenclosed wild . . . a somber, windswept stretch of brown hills and valleys, virtually treeless, covered in briars and thorn bushes"), an older man makes his way. Soon he encounters a horse-drawn van, being led by Diggory Venn, a reddleman (seller of a reddish powdery dye used by sheep farmers to identify their flock). In the van is a young woman whose identity Venn rudely conceals from the elderly hiker. As he continues walking alongside the van, the reddleman notices the figure of a woman, standing atop Rainbarrow, the largest of the many Celtic burial mounds in the area, profiled against the sky, "like an organic part of the entire motionless structure," and then, replacing her, other figures. These are heath folk (locals, living near the heath) come to start a Fifth-of-November bonfire, a local custom. The night sky is lit by a number of these bonfires.

The young woman traveling in Diggory Venn's horse cart is Thomasin Yeobright, who was to have married Damon Wildeve that day. Mrs. Yeobright takes Thomasin with her to see Wildeve at the inn he operates in order to demand an explanation of his failure to marry her. When their bonfire has burned out, the locals come to serenade Thomasin and Wildeve, thinking them to be newly married and wanting to celebrate. When Wildeve is able to get rid of them he starts off to see Eustacia Vye, the mysterious figure Venn saw earlier, standing on Rainbarrow.

Eustacia watches for Wildeve on Rainbarrow, returning now and then to check on the signal fire she has had built before her grandfather's house. (Captain Vye is the chance acquaintance of Venn's). Wildeve was once Eustacia's lover, but she has not seen him since his interest in Thomasin. Eventually, Wildeve does finally arrive.

Venn accidentally learns of the meeting between Eustacia and Wildeve. A longtime admirer and once rejected suitor of Thomasin, Venn thinks he can score points with her. He now resolves to help her and purposely overhears the conversation between Eustacia and Wildeve the next time they meet on Rainbarrow. Venn then calls on Eustacia to get her to help Thomasin, finally telling her he knows about her meetings with Wildeve. Venn also informs Mrs. Yeobright he would like to marry her niece. Though he is rejected, the aunt uses him as a means to put pressure on Wildeve. Wildeve goes immediately to Eustacia to convince her to leave with him, but she will not answer right away.

The news of the arrival for the Christmas holidays of Mrs. Yeobright's son, Clym, is widely talked about on the heath, including Captain Vye's house, where Eustacia also hears about his impending visit.

Mrs. Yeobright and Thomasin make preparations for Clym's arrival. After getting a glimpse of him, Eustacia is fascinated by him. She arranges to substitute for one of the boys in the traditional Christmas mumming (a play or pageant in which the actors use gestures, masks, props, and elaborate makeup, but do not have spoken lines), the first performance of which is at a party Mrs. Yeobright is giving. During the performance at the party, Eustacia succeeds in meeting Clym while she is in costume. Now that her interest in Wildeve has paled, Eustacia makes clear to Venn that she would like to see Wildeve married to Thomasin. They do marry, with Eustacia serving as witness. Mrs. Yeobright, who has once opposed the marriage, does not attend; and Clym, who has been away from home, finds out about the marriage after it has taken place.

Giving up his business career in Paris, Clym has returned to Egdon Heath to set up as a schoolteacher to those who can't afford existing schools. Mrs. Yeobright disapproves, thinking Clym's career goals do not show enough ambition. Clym meets Eustacia, in her own person this time, and is strongly attracted to her, an attraction that Mrs. Yeobright argues against. Clym sees Eustacia regularly, usually on the heath, for several months and then asks her to marry him. She says yes, though she hopes he will finally give up his plans and take her to Paris.

When Mrs. Yeobright and Clym quarrel over his love of Eustacia and he feels forced to leave his mother's house, he decides he and Eustacia should marry right away and live for a time on the heath. Clym finds a cottage and moves from home, leaving his mother disconsolate and bitter. Wildeve's interest in Eustacia revives when he hears of her approaching marriage.

On the occasion of their marriage, Mrs. Yeobright decides to send a gift of money. Her son, Clym, is marrying Eustacia against her wishes, and she hopes that, by offering this gift, she and her son can repair their relationship. The other half of the money is to go to her niece, Thomasin, who has recently married Damon Wildeve, Eustacia's former lover. Unfortunately, Mrs. Yeobright selects as her messenger the inept Christian Cantle, the village simpleton. Cantle loses the money gambling with Wildeve, who wants revenge on his wife's aunt for not trusting him with the money. Venn, protecting Thomasin, wins it back from Wildeve, but not understanding that part of it should go to Clym, Venn he delivers it all to Thomasin.

Eustacia and Clym for a time live a secluded life. When Mrs. Yeobright receives no response from Clym about the money, she calls on Eustacia, and they quarrel bitterly. Clym, hurrying his study to be a teacher so as to pacify the impatient Eustacia, develops severe eye trouble and is forced to suspend his work. To his wife's dismay, he takes up furze cutting (furze is a low, prickly shrub) as a way of making a little money and getting exercise. To Eustacia, this is a far cry from what she yearns for — the gay life of the great world, especially as represented by Paris — and since Clym had business and connections in Paris, Eustacia saw him as a way out of her constrained life on the heath. To compensate, she goes to a gipsying (a dance) and unexpectedly encounters Wildeve and dances with him. Venn sees them together and attempts to discourage Wildeve's loitering around Clym's house at night.

Persuaded by Venn to forget her pride and call on her son, Mrs. Yeobright starts the long walk to his house on a hot August day. She sees Wildeve admitted by Eustacia before she can get there; when she knocks on the door, Clym's wife looks out the window but doesn't answer. The older woman tries to walk back home, stops in exhaustion, and is bitten by an adder. She is later discovered by Clym, who has set off for her house to attempt a reconciliation, but even medical attention cannot save her and she dies. Clym blames himself for her death. Eustacia is nearby when Mrs. Yeobright dies but doesn't make an appearance; she has accidentally encountered Wildeve, who has lately come into an inheritance.

Clym for some time is ill and irrational because of his mother's death. His constant blaming of himself exhausts Eustacia, and she tries to find consolation in Wildeve. Once back to normal again, Clym sets out to discover what his mother was doing on the heath. From Mrs. Yeobright's handyman, Cantle, from Venn, and a young boy who came across his mother as she tried to get home that day, Clym learns what happened. He accuses Eustacia of cruelty to his mother. When Clym adds the charge of deception of himself as a husband, the relationship between him and Eustacia is effectively over. She leaves his house to return to Captain Vye's.

At her grandfather's, Eustacia doesn't know how to occupy herself and once even thinks of suicide. A bonfire is lit for her when the Fifth of November comes, an inadvertent signal to Wildeve, who offers to help Eustacia get away from the heath to Paris. On Thomasin's advice, Clym, now moved back to his mother's house, writes to ask his wife to return to him.

On the evening of the sixth of November, Eustacia signals to Wildeve that she wants to go, by chance not getting Clym's letter before she leaves the house. Thomasin, has suspicions about Wildeve. She and Captain Vye, who finds out Eustacia has left the house very late at night, come to ask Clym's help. Thomasin tries to get back home, finally with Venn's assistance. While Wildeve waits with a horse cart for Eustacia, and Clym searches for his wife, Eustacia on this dark, stormy night throws herself in a stream near a weir. Both Wildeve and Clym try to rescue her, but it is Venn who pulls out both men as well as Eustacia. Of the three, only Clym survives.

After her husband's death, Thomasin moves into the family home with Clym. Venn, having given up the reddle trade, calls on her, and they become interested in each other. However, Clym thinks he ought to ask his cousin to marry him since his mother wished it. But Thomasin and Venn decide to marry and do. Clym is last seen on top of Rainbarrow, performing as an itinerant preacher of moral lectures.

“The Return of the Native” : Critical Analysis

The Return of the Native looks at first like a typical nineteenth-century novel: long, with several plots, and set in a wide landscape. But this tale is really very compact. The major action takes place in a year's time. All of the characters live in the Egdon area, and the outside world does not intrude (we do not hear, for example, about the national problems of England).

All of the major characters are bound together in a dense knot of relationships. The structure of this book is concentrated, to reflect the tight organization of the action. Book first, the longest book, sets the stage and introduces the characters. Book second brings Clym and Eustacia together and sees the marriage of Thomasin and Wildeve. Book third shows the split between Clym and his mother and his marriage to Eustacia. Book fourth tells of the terrible accidents that lead to Mrs. Yeobright's death. Book fifth sees Clym and Eustacia separate, bringing about the tragic deaths that end the main action. Book sixth, a kind of epilogue, shows the marriage of Thomasin and Diggory.

The action is organized around seasonal celebrations, beginning and ending with the autumn bonfires, as if to emphasize the dramatic changes that can take place in such short periods of time. The story is told in straight chronological order, without the use of flashbacks or other devices. (This may underscore the story's sense of the straightforward, irresistible movement of time itself.) Regularly, our concentration upon the major characters is broken by the appearance of the country folk, as if for comic relief, to stress the need for the reader to step back and consider the meaning of the tale.

Take, for instance, the example of Egdon Heath, the first "character" introduced into the book. The heath proves physically and psychologically important throughout the novel: their relation to the heath defines characters, and the weather patterns of the heath even reflect the inner dramas of the characters. Indeed, it almost seems as if the characters are formed by the heath itself: Diggory Venn, red from head to toe, is an actual embodiment of the muddy earth; Eustacia Vye seems to spring directly from the heath, a part of Rainbarrow itself, when she is first introduced; Wildeve's name might just as well refer to the windwhipped heath itself. But, importantly, the heath manages to defy definition. It is, in chapter one, "a place perfectly accordant with man's nature." The narrator's descriptions of the heath vary widely throughout the novel, ranging from the sublime to the gothic. There is no possible objectivity about the heath. No reliable statement can be made about it.

For Clym, the heath is beautiful; for Eustacia, it is hateful. The plot of the novel hinges around just this kind of difference in perception. Most of the key plot elements in the novel depend upon misconceptions--most notably, Eustacia's failure to open the door to Mrs. Yeobright, a mistake that leads to the older woman's death--and mistaken perceptions. Clym's eventual near- blindness reflects a kind of deeper internal blindness that afflicts all the main characters in the novel: they do not recognize the truth about each other. Eustacia and Clym misunderstand each other's motives and true ambitions; Venn remains a mystery; Wildeve deceives Thomasin, Eustacia and Clym. The characters remain obscure for the reader, too. When The Return of the Native was first published, contemporary critics criticized the novel for its lack of sympathetic characters. All of the novel's characters prove themselves deeply flawed, or at the very least of ambiguous motivation. Clym Yeobright, the novel's intelligent, urbane, generous protagonist, is also, through his impatience and single-minded jealousy, the cause of the novel's great tragedy. Diggory Venn can either be seen as a helpful, kind- hearted guardian or as an underhanded schemer. Similarly, even the antagonistic characters in the novel are not without their redeeming qualities.

Perhaps the most ambiguous aspect of the novel is its ending. The novel seems to privilege a bleak understanding of human nature. Given the tragedy of the double drowning, it seems impossible that the novel could end happily. And yet, Diggory Venn and Thomasin are contentedly married. This is not, however, the way the novel was first conceived; Hardy was forced to give the novel a happy ending in order to please the Victorian public. In an uncharacteristic footnote, Hardy remarks, "The writer may state here that the original conception of the story did not design a marriage between Thomasin and Venn… But certain circumstances of serial publication led to a change of intent. Readers can therefore choose between the endings." Thus, even the true conclusion of the novel is left in doubt, a fitting end for a novel that thrives on uncertainty and ambiguity.

Hardy frequently interrupts his story to tell us what it means- but does he really tell us? One cannot always be certain that this author is explaining himself fully, even when he seems to be doing so. It's not that he attempts to deceive the reader; rather, he wants to make it clear that life is unclear. He wants to emphasize the mystery of existence. He doesn't believe that life offers simple, clear-cut answers, nor does he imagine that human beings, or his characters, can be judged as either completely good or completely bad.

His point of view, then, could rightly be called "ambiguous." He may directly criticize Wildeve in one passage, for example, but then his narrative suggests that Wildeve is not responsible for everything that happens to him and Eustacia. He may number all of Eustacia's worst faults, but somehow most readers still feel that Hardy is, like Clym, fascinated with her.

He shows that life is filled with disasters and tragedies, but he says that new life will continually spring up to replace the old.

Although Hardy frequently shows a sense of humour, many readers have felt that he puts too much emphasis on the unhappy aspects of life. He would argue against that charge, saying that he simply reported life as it is, and the true report just happens to be filled with unhappiness. Is that the thinking of an objective observer, or a pessimist? As you read this novel, form your own opinion of where Hardy really stands.

"The Return of the Native" : Major Themes

The Heath: - The heath is more than just a dramatic backdrop to the action; it is an integral part of the plot and character development, and a constant thematic symbol. Hardy devotes the novel's entire first chapter to describing the timeless landscape of Egdon heath. What defines it most of all is its timelessness - it is much bigger than any human drama, and hence might its natural forces swallow those humans.

The heath can also be viewed as an antagonist in the story, working against the key characters to bring about their tragic fates. Mrs. Yeobright, exhausted by her long toil to Clym's house, collapses in the darkness on her return, and is bitten by a snake. Wildeve and Eustacia both drown as they plan to flee the heath forever. Clym becomes a preacher, extolling the virtues of a world beyond the heath. Only Thomasin and Diggory, who are truly at ease with their surroundings, endure. The heath is a place for lasting sentiment, not fiery passion or intellectual ideals. Those who are able to tune to its rhythms and pace remain. Those who feel they can live beyond its power are destroyed by it. Eustacia views it as an explicit antagonist - "'Tis my cross, my shame and will be my death" - and yet falls in attempting to defeat it (69). Most of all, the heath is an expression of Hardy's tragic sense, which suggests that time and the world have little use for the squabbles of humans and will thereby negate their efforts time and again.

Superstition: - Superstition permeates the text, and is connected with the death of Eustacia and possibly Mrs. Yeobright. In the most basic sense, superstition exists through the heath locals. So tied to nature, they are naturally drawn more towards pagan rituals than towards the transcendent message of Christianity. They judge their lives according to the cycles of the heath, and hence believe that strange forces beyond their understanding rule the world.

Many locals, Susan Nunsuch most of all, believe Eustacia is a witch. Susan brings a fearful dimension to their charge, both stabbing Eustacia with a pen and then later making a wax effigy that she burns. Hardy was cautious to avoid being labelled immoral, and so he never extrapolates on Susan's suspicions, which could be based in the possibility of Eustacia's sexuality. Both of Susan's actions are based around witch-lore. A witch would supposedly not bleed if pricked, and an effigy works akin to a voodoo doll, by transferring pain to another.

Eustacia's death also evokes witch-lore, since a suspected witch was thrown in water. If she floated, she was vindicated, and if she drowned, she was proven witch. Tragically, Eustacia floats but it brings her no benefit, since she dies. In surviving and dedicating himself to Christianity, Clym suggests Hardy's dismissal of such lore, though the author never goes so far as to outright denounce any of the ancient superstitions suggested in the text.

Tradition: - One of the novel's inherent conflicts is that between the declining, traditional attitudes of Dorset and the modern world that was replacing it. Hardy's work often highlighted the waning traditions and ideals of his age, and there are many examples where custom and folklore feature as central to the narrative. Part of the novel's appeal is the way it records these dying customs.For instance, Diggory Venn's trade as a reddleman represents the dying skills of the region:

He was one of a class rapidly becoming extinct in Wessex, filling at present in the rural world the place which, during the last century, the dodo occupied in the world of animals. He is a curious, interesting and nearly perished link between obsolete forms of life and those which generally prevail.(6)

Though Diggory does dismiss the traditional fears - that a reddleman stole children - he nevertheless dedicates himself to this ancient trade.

Hardy also records the decline in church attendance in rural regions like Egdon, and discusses the history and function of the mummers. In terms of the latter, he explains how repeated tradition can lead to perfunctory execution and reception, as opposed to the true passion of a regenerated custom.

There are some customs that Hardy connects to more ancient customs. Hardy believed the November 5th bonfires were a continuance of Druid tradition more than a commemoration of Gay Fawkes. Further, the May Day celebrations seems to have a primal draw, since it is those which finally bring Thomasin and Diggory together.

Education: - The Return of the Native presents a range of views on education without ever delivering a final conclusion in the issue.

As an extraordinary resident of the heath whose intelligence allowed him to explore the greater world, Clym is a strong proponent for education. In fact, he wants to explore a new type of education with the residents of the heath, and is drawn home for that purpose. However, he confronts both reticence and outright opposition to these noble plans, and ends up as a preacher - a vocation more associated with tradition than modernity - than as a teacher. To some extent, Clym is oblivious to the nature of those he wishes to educate. They are not only not ready for his ideas, but are also fundamentally opposed to them. Captain Vye gives a reflective instance of their skepticism when he describes education as valuable only towards encouraging the young to engage in offensive graffiti.

In fact, Hardy explores how Clym's natural good-looks stand in opposition to these modern ideas of education exemplified in his intellect:

He already showed that thought is a disease of flesh, and indirectly bore evidence that ideal physical beauty is incompatible with emotional development and a full recognition of the coil of things.(109)

It is only really within the spiritual world that he is finally able to find solace. His ideal of "instilling high knowledge into empty minds" is unrealistic to the point of arrogance, an indicator that his learning has not helped him to connect with his fellow man (160). Even as preacher, his "moral lectures" maintain a didactic air that repulse some listeners. He continues to speak but not to listen, which gives an implicit criticism of the educational instinct.

Clym’s most significant education is what he learns on the heath - that the world is controlled by large forces beyond our understanding.

Romantic Love: - The quest for romantic love amongst the nature-centered heath affects many characters, Eustacia most of all. She is desperate to discover the passion of romantic love. Early in the text, she expresses that she seeks, "A blaze of love, and extinction, [which] was better than a lantern glimmer of the same which should last long years (56). She wants a quick burst of passion, rather than the pragmatism of a sustaining respect and passion. This desire helps explain her tragic demise - she is too quick to romanticize a situation, ignoring its reality. She ignores the fact that Wildeve mostly repulses her, to twice become attracted to him, and ignores Clym's stated intentions to justify her acceptance of his proposal. This conflict creates a sense of dissatisfaction that has tragic consequences.

Clym is attracted to Eustacia on so many levels, but ultimately chooses a respectable, simple life with her. The passion and romanticism that defined him on his return is quickly traded for a more pragmatic personality that disappoints Eustacia. His tragic flaw here is his blindness to what she needs, and they both pay for it.

Finally, Thomasin begins with a romantic passion for Wildeve, but ultimately realizes the greater wisdom of pragmatism. When they finally marry, she is no longer enamored with him, but rather has matured to realize that she must protect her reputation over her romantic pride.

The Oedipus complex: - Clym has an intense and turbulent relationship with his mother, which evokes the Oedipus complex, so-named by Freud because of the ancient play Oedipus Rex. Simply put, the Oedipus complex describes an unhealthy love-hate attraction between a mother and son.

Mrs. Yeobright has clearly had great ambitions for her son. We see her disappointment when he reveals that he has left Paris to return to Egdon. She cannot appreciate his return to Egdon as a step forward; instead, she vicariously considers it as sign of failure, asking him, "But it is right, too, that I should try to lift you out of this life into something richer, and that you should not come back again, and be as if I had never tried at all?" (140).

This vicarious association further explains her contempt for Eustacia. She cannot understand that he is attracted to her instead of finer Parisian ladies. The relationship between Clym and his mother starts to sour after he begins to court Eustacia. He chooses to give Eustacia a gift – a charnel pot unearthed from the burial mound – which was originally intended for his mother. Though all of these attitudes can be explained, they together suggest an intimate and intense connection.

Clym is aware of the challenges to his happiness, and refers to the competing areas of his life as "antagonistic growths." Interestingly, his relationship with his mother is the first he lists, before his wife and vocation. He is forced into making a choice between Eustacia and his mother, and the regrets over this situation lead to a romantic demise for almost all involved.

Constancy: - In the novel, characters who display constancy are rewarded. Like the unswerving firmness of the Egdon landscape, those who remain true to their ideals endure. Diggory Venn, as example, is unwavering in his love for Thomasin. He adapts his lifestyle and means of income to win her affections, and patiently remains her faithful champion. Similarly, Charley the stable boy does not waver in his affection for Eustacia. He gives her his mummer's role, and later cares for her despite her attitudes towards him. Even the dim-sighted Clym can perceive Charley's love for his wife. Similarly, the heath folk are characterized by their adherence to unchanging tradition and folklore. They accept the heath as timeless and constant, and their kind perseveres for that reason.

The characters more defined by transient, changing passions - Wildeve, Eustacia, and Clym - all suffer a tragic end. The heath, with its constancy, has little use for such dynamic human passions.

"The Return of the Native" : Hardy's Concept of Tragedy

Expressions like pessimism and fatalism have unreservedly been used by critics and readers to describe Hardy's philosophy of life, and there is no doubt these labels do largely convey his outlook and his stance. He is deemed pessimist because he considers that man is born to suffer and he is called fatalist because he thinks that destiny is antagonistic to man and that it governs human life, allowing very little free will to human creatures and often inflicting undeserved sufferings upon them.

Hardy, however, is not a cynic because he does not regard man as essentially mean and wicked. There, certainly, are villains in his novels but he believes on the whole that there is more goodness and nobleness in human nature than evil, and that man is capable of a heroic endurance of misfortune. Further wise, it is possible to call Hardy a determinist instead of fatalist, because, while fatalism implies a blind and arbitrary working of some supernatural power, determinism implies the logic of cause and effect. In Hardy's novels the logic of cause and effect is as much at work as an arbitrary supernatural power.

Hardy's conception of life is essentially tragic. As Austin never wrote a tragedy, Hardy never attempted a comedy. He holds an opinion:"Happiness is an occasional episode in the general drama of pain".

Hardy feels that "man is born to suffer" and the glory of man lies in his power of bearing his catastrophe. It appears that his mind is trained in the Greek literature, which was the first attempt to project a mighty clash between man's dreams and realization. Hardy also portrays this conflict, but with a slight difference. In Greek tragedy, Fate is some of supernatural power holds responsible of the catastrophe, while in Shakespearean tragedy, man is solely responsible for his actions their consequent disaster. Hardy combines both these concepts to carve his own view of tragedy. In his stories, destiny is as much responsible for the disaster, as a character himself. "The Return of the Native" fully illustrates Hardy's conception of tragedy.

Aristotle defines 'a tragedy is a story of a conspicuous man, who falls from prosperity to adversity, because of his error of judgment i.e. his hamartia and his sufferings, downfall arouses a feeling of pity and fear in us, thus becomes a source of catharsis'. As it is clear from the statement as well as from the historical facts, that Greek tragedy was the story of a conspicuous man, related to country life, and almost same is the case with Shakespearean tragedy. But Hardy sets his tragedy in the rural background. His story brings forth the downfall of a common man, yet noble. As Clym is a noble man, his innate kind and loving nature, residing at the Egdon Heath. He is surrounded by the intense figures of common life, rustics. His mind is a kingdom, filled with his noble aims of educating the rustics, in the true sense of the word, as author comments:

"He had a conviction that the want of most men was knowledge of a sort which brings wisdom rather than affluence".

But striving after high thinking, he still likes his plain living. He struggles selflessly to achieve his high aims, but he is somewhat unpractical rather, too simple to plan properly for his goals. And his flaw lies in the fact he goes too far, selflessly but unplanned, for his aims, and thus injures himself, both physically and spiritually, causing poor eye sight in the first case and tension through disharmony with his mother and wife, in the second case.

His unpractical nature also comes out when he 'decides to marry Eustacia' though she warns him that she would not make "a good home spun wife" and his mother pronounces her as "an idle voluptuous woman". Clym thinks that Eustacia would help in his educational prospects, but she proves to be exactly the opposite. It's said, that Eustacia holds the "greatest responsibility" for the tragedy in "The Return of the Native", then it would not be wrong.

Hardy also shows the weak power of decision of Clym that he fails to strike a balance between his duties (to his mother), his ambition (for teaching) and his love (for Eustacia). As the author states:

"Three antagonistic growths had to be kept alive: his mother's trust in him, his plan for becoming a teacher, and Eustacia's happiness".

And he fails to maintain them, at a time, first inclining totally towards Eustacia and then towards his mother, and in adjusting his educational plans between them.

According to Hardy, Fate and destiny have always an essential part to play in bringing a catastrophic end. In the novel under discussion, destiny is disguised in the cloak of "nature" and "co-incidences". Chances and Coincidences occur, in Hardy's novels, too frequently that they become almost unrealistic. In this novel, the story leads to ultimate tragedy, with the death of Mrs. Yeobright, which is caused by a number of ironic accidents and co-incidences. It is also the role of chance that the letter of Clym fails to reach Eustacia, which becomes the cause of her fatal ending death. Thus, Hardy feels: "Human will is not free but fettered".

Nature is always considered as a "living agent", by Hardy, which is always so strong and influential, that his human characters can never escape from its clutches. "Egdon Heath" also depicts such qualities. It contrasts with the human existence. Eustacia feels the heath, as her "cross", her "shame", and eventually it becomes a potential cause and the place of her death. Nature is also hostile to Mrs. Yeobright, as Heath kills her by a venomous creature from its own bosom.

Nature also appears as the "foreteller" of coming events, when the Heath becomes furious before the death of Wildeve and Eustacia.

The thick-skinned rustics are also an essential part of Hardy's writings. They perform the "role of chorus" of the Greek tragedies and provide "Comic relief", like Shakespeare's characters. In "The Return of the Native" much of the useful information, also, about the main characters is provided by these rustics.

The most important aspect of a tragedy, according to Aristotle, is the feelings of catharsis. Undoubtedly, the tragedies of Hardy also provide a source of catharsis. One certainly experiences the feelings of pity and fear, when one observes Clym's paralysis of will. He appears in the story as a devoted, sympathetic, energetic fellow but he ends up as a miserable, pitiable, half-blinded figure, with the end of the story. Truly, the description of the author is very true, when he says:

"Everywhere he (Clym) was kindly received, for the story of his life had become generally known".

It can be noted through the treatment of Clym, that Hardy's general view about the human nature is essentially noble and sublime, but tragic. His main characters portray the higher values of human traits of tolerance and bearing of misery, the eyes of the reader.

In short, it can be said that Hardy's concept of tragedy is of a higher level. Though he does not reach the height of Shakespeare, but comes quite near to him. Thus, it can be said that his art of tragedy is perfect.

"The Return of the Native" : Chances &Coincidences

Is chance the same thing as fate? Different readers disagree on this question. Perhaps it is cruel, deliberate fate that Eustacia, for instance, has been set down to live on the heath she loathes. It may be mere capricious chance, however, that Mrs. Yeobright decides to visit on the very afternoon that Wildeve also decides to come to Eustacia's cottage. In other words, fate seems to rule events according to some vast pattern, which is beyond human control. Chance seems to intervene in smaller, random ways, when human beings are trying to act on their own. Many readers, however, feel that chance and fate is the same thing in this novel. Things "just happen," without rhyme or reason, and that in it is the pattern of the universe.

Hardy lost faith in orthodox Christianity quite early in his life. It was mainly because of the advancement and challenges of science to dogma. As a consequence, he reached a new kind of scepticism. He felt that universe is governed by some blind chance and not by any conscious power. For this reason chance and coincidences play a very vital role in all the novels of Hardy.

Such a conspicuous influence of accidents, on the course of events, does not appear in the works of any other novelist. Though Hardy's characters are responsible for their suffering yet the role of chance and coincidences often operates as a deciding factor. Hardy feels:"An impishness of circumstances invades our life and becomes the cause of our undoing".

In his novel, man is tossed here and there in the ruthless struggle for survival and the stronger one suffers more as he tries to resist the sweep of chance.

Hardy believes that chance is an embodiment of fate. He feels that fate or destiny is sometimes indifferent, but it is most often hostile to human happiness. He thinks:"Happiness is an occasional episode in the general drama of pain".

The hostile of fate, disguises itself in the irony of circumstances, which one finds in the novels of Hardy. In other word, when the human beings are not themselves responsible for the frustration for their hopes and thwarting of their aims, fate appears in the shape of chance or accident to contribute to or to complete, their ruin. Hardy thinks:"Chance is the incarnation of the blind forces, controlling human destiny".

There is also an abundant use of chances, accident and coincidences in "The Return of the Native". These chances are interwoven with the actions of characters, to bring forth the ultimate catastrophe.

Johnny Nunsuch introduces the first coincidence in the story. He overhears the conversation of Wildeve and Eustacia, when Wildeve visits her in response to her bonfire. Johnny narrates this incidence to the Reddle-man. As a result of this chance, Reddle-man becomes activity involved in the affairs of these two principal characters Eustacia and Wildeve. On the other hand, furthermore, this chance meeting eventually results in the wedding of Thomasin with Wildeve.

At some later stage, during the story, Christian Cantle meets the village folks, by a sheer accident that takes him to a raffle (lottery). He is carrying Mrs. Yeobright's money, which is to be delivered to Thomasin and Clym, in equal halves. Cantle, by a chance stroke of good luck, wins prize at raffle. Being encouraged by his winning, he agrees to play the game of dice with Wildeve and loses all the money of Mrs. Yeobright. Then, the Reddle-man appears and with his luck, wins all the money back and delivers all the money to Thomasin. Thus, the chance meeting of Cantle with the village folks causes a great misunderstanding and also a future quarrel between Mrs. Yeobright and Eustacia.

"The marriage is not a misfortune in itself. It is simply the accident which has happened since that has been the cause of my ruin".

Another accident is the chance meeting of Eustacia with Wildeve, which leads not only to the renewal of bond between the two but also to the suspicion in the mind of the Reddle-man, who immediately goes to Thomasin and informs her about her husband's plans.

The most crucial accidents, however, are yet to come in the novel. At an occasion, Wildeve visits Eustacia during the daytime. At the same time Mrs. Yeobright comes to reconcile with her son. This coincidence creates a big complication, as Eustacia fails to open the door, while Wildeve is inside and when she opens it, Mrs. Yeobright has gone while Clym is fast asleep, just by a chance. Consequently, each of these four characters has to pay heavily for these accidents, happening simultaneously.

On her homeward journey, Mrs. Yeobright faces yet another accident. She is bitten by an adder and is dead. Her death results in a fierce quarrel between Clym and Eustacia. Thus, much of the tragedy of the novel centres s round the closed door, to which a number of accidents contribute.

At a later stage, Wildeve receives a legacy, by a pure chance. This news would have been a sign of hope in the story, but the future events prove Hardy's essentially tragic conception of life. Hence:"There is pervading note of gloom, only momentarily relieved".

The news of legacy brings new thoughts to Eustacia's mind. Her meeting with Wildeve encourages her to seek his help in her attempt to escape from Egdon Heath. Unfortunately, this attempt proves fatal and deadly for both of them.

After the death of Clym's mother, he first expels Eustacia out of his house but later, he intends to bring her back to home therefore, he writes a letter to her, but Captain Vye fails to handover the letter to Eustacia and she decides to escape with Wildeve to Paris, this chance brings her fall.

Finally, the nature also contributes in the contrivance of chance. On the night of Eustacia's escape, the weather accidentally gets worst. The night becomes dreadful, because of rain and storm. This desperate situation of weather adds to the gloomy condition of Eustacia and causes her death.

Thus, Hardy certainly makes his story hard to believe by his excessive use of chance and coincidence. There are accidents and coincidences in real human life, but they are not so frequent, as in the novels of Hardy, nor are accidents and coincidences always malicious and hostile to man. A critic says:"The plot of the novel lacks the terrific and terrifying logic of cause and effect that marks the plots of the greatest tragedies. That, yet operates the way it does more accidental than necessary".

But to condemn his use of chance altogether is to misunderstand his view of life. His novels present a bottle between man and destiny, whereas, destiny appears through chances and coincidences. However, the realism of "The Return of the Native" is certainly marred by en extraordinary use of the device of chances and coincidences:As Shakespeare says:"Fate has a terrible power; you cannot control it by wealth or war".

"The Return of the Native" : A tragedy of Character &Environment

Hardy has been called the Shakespeare of the English novel and the four great Hardian tragedies, Tess of the D'ubervilles, Jude the Obscure, The Mayor of Casterbridge and The Return of the Native have been likened to the four great Shakespearean tragedies. But Hardy's conception of tragedy is radically different from that of Shakespeare.

Hardy's Tragic Hero: - In a Shakespearean tragedy, as Bradley has pointed out, the tragic hero is a man of high rank and position. He may belong to the royal family or he may be some great general and warrior indispensable for the state. He is not only exalted socially but he has also some uncommon qualities of head and heart. He is in short a rare individual. When such a person falls from greatness and his high position is reversed, the result is "Cathartic'. His fall excites the tragic emotion of terror and the readers are purged of the motion of self-pity.

This was the traditional concept of Tragedy up to Hardy. But Hardy has how own concept, he is the innovator of a new form of tragedy, His tragic hero and heroines are no exalted personages. They are neither kings nor queens. They belong to the lowest ranks of society. Thus in the present novel, Clym is humble by birth, and he takes to furze-cutting as his profession, and Mrs. Yeobright is the wife of a humble farmer. But these humble people have exceptional qualities of head and heart which raise them above the common run of mankind. Thus Clym is the idealist, and Mrs. Yeobright is prudent, strong and loving.

Hardian Tragedy: Apotheosis of the Human Spirit: - When these humble heroes and heroines of Hardy suffer and fall from grace the effect is as "Cathartic" as that of a Shakespearean tragedy. A Hardian tragedy is an apotheosis of the human spirit. It reveals to us the essential nobility and heroism of the human soul. The nobility of Mrs. Yeobright is brought out by her death, and Clym suffers because of his idealism.

Tragic Waste in Hardy: - Like a Shakespearean tragedy, a Hardian tragedy .also creates the impression of tragic waste. Evil is eliminated in the long run, but always at the cost of much that is good and desirable. The real tragedy is this waste of good. Much good is wasted when Eustacia comes to a tragic end. Similarly, the real tragedy is not that Mrs. Yeobright dies, but that in her death so much of love and prudence are wasted.

Hardian Tragedy, Elevating: - But Hardian tragedy does not discourage or cause despair. "It is elevating and stimulating. It does not shake our faith in life, all the more it strengthens us; it does not make us light-hearted, but makes -us wiser and better." Thus, The Return of the Native, is not depressing. Hardy has introduced a note of meliorism by showing the happy end of Thomasin's love story.

No Tragic Flaw in Hardy: - The Shakespearian hero has some fault of character, some strong tendency to act in a particular way, which is the cause of his undoing. Bradley has called this weakness of the hero as the "tragic flaw' of his character. This tragic flaw results in the fall of the hero, it is the cause of the tragedy. Though at a later stage the course of action is complicated by other factors — chance, abnormal state of mind, some supernatural force, etc.-yet primarily action issues out of character. Character is responsible for tragedy.

"Character is Destiny in Shakespeare." But this is not so in Hardy. His Tragic heroes and heroines are free from any 'tragic flaw' in the Shakespearean sense. They do not have any obsession or a marked tendency to act in a particular way. Thus the tragedy of Clym and Eustacia is the result of chance to a very great extent. Mrs. Yeobright's death is also brought about by chance events.

Destiny, and Not Character, the Cause of Tragedy: - "Character may be destiny" in Shakespeare, but in Hardy, "Destiny is Character." In all his novels, chance events happens throughout. Fate expresses itself as chance. However in the. Return of the Native character too plays a significant role in bringing about the tragedy. Eustacia' tragedy results from her excessive love of the glittering city life and from her extreme hunger for love. Isolation in Egdon makes her rebellious, morose and gloomy. It intensifies her hunger for love, and for the pleasures of city life. Similarly, Clym's idealism is responsible to a very great extent for his tragedy. He is unpractical and lacks worldly wisdom. Character and environment play a larger part in causing tragedy in this novel, than in other novels.

Considered as a tragedy, The Return of the Native has other peculiar features as well. For one thing, while in a Shakespearean tragedy both the hero and the heroine die at the end, in this novel the heroine, Eustacia, alone dies, and the hero lives on a life of deep anguish, virtually a life-in-death. This is another instance of the relentless cruelty of destiny.

Secondly, the Return of the Native has a double-ending. While Eustacia, Wildeve and Mrs. Yeobright come to a tragic end and Clym too suffers terribly, the end of Thomasin's love-story is a happy one. We find her in the end married to the faithful Venn, and likely to enjoy a happy life ever afterwards. In this way, the novelist has introduced a note of meliorism in the novel. He has thus shown that a limited happiness is possible even in this sorry life of ours. The happy end of the Thomasin story does not reduce the tragic intensity of the Catastrophe, rather it enables the novelist to present his vision of life truthfully and honestly.

"The Return of the Native" : Role of Egdon Heath

Huge, forbidding, strange- the wasteland of Egdon Heath is like a stage set for the action of this novel. It offers wide spaces for movement, but it also has hiding-places for intimate scenes. Its many different faces reflect or heighten the many different moods of the story. One can believe that the Heath has many secrets, and has witnessed all possible varieties of human experience. It is a place of long life and of sudden death, of fertile spring and short, vivid summer. No matter what feeling Hardy wants to express at any particular point, the heath can offer it up.

Something about Egdon Heath depresses the restless, adventure-seeking characters of the novel, Eustacia and Wildeve. But it is a comforting presence to unselfish people like Clym and Thomasin. As you read, notice each character's reaction to the heath; it may say something about his or her inner nature. The less intellectual country folk simply take the place for granted, just as they take their own souls for granted.

Does Egdon Heath represent life? Time? The supernatural? Destiny? Readers have suggested these and other possibilities. Perhaps it is not a symbol for anything, but merely a background, a small universe, having no meaning, offering no answers. Part of the mysterious appeal of this novel is that Hardy makes the heath seem so significant, but then never specifically explains his purposes. We must use our own imaginations to try to understand and feel what the heath finally means.

Egdon Heath is the first 'character' introduced into the book. The heath proves physically and psychologically important throughout the novel: their relation to the heath defines characters, and the weather patterns of the heath even reflect the inner dramas of the characters. Indeed, it almost seems as if the characters are formed by the heath itself: Diggory Venn, red from head to toe, is an actual embodiment of the muddy earth; Eustacia Vye seems to spring directly from the heath, a part of Rainbarrow itself, when she is first introduced; Wildeve's name might just as well refer to the wind-whipped heath itself. But, importantly, the heath manages to defy definition. It is, in chapter one,"A place perfectly accordant with man's nature."

The narrator's descriptions of the heath vary widely throughout the novel, ranging from the sublime to the gothic. There is no possible objectivity about the heath. No reliable statement can be made about it.

For Clym, the heath is beautiful; for Eustacia, it is hateful. The plot of the novel hinges around just this kind of difference in perception. Most of the key plot elements in the novel depend upon misconceptions--most notably, Eustacia's failure to open the door to Mrs. Yeobright, a mistake that leads to the older woman's death--and mistaken perceptions. Clym's eventual near- blindness reflects a kind of deeper internal blindness that afflicts all the main characters in the novel: they do not recognize the truth about each other. Eustacia and Clym misunderstand each other's motives and true ambitions; Venn remains a mystery; Wildeve deceives Thomasin, Eustacia and Clym. The characters remain obscure for the reader, too. When The Return of the Native was first published, contemporary critics criticized the novel for its lack of sympathetic characters.

All of the novel's characters prove themselves deeply flawed, or at the very least of ambiguous motivation. Clym Yeobright, the novel's intelligent, urbane, generous protagonist, is also, through his impatience and single-minded jealousy, the cause of the novel's great tragedy. Diggory Venn can either be seen as a helpful, kind-hearted guardian or as an underhanded schemer. Similarly, even the antagonistic characters in the novel are not without their redeeming qualities.

"The Return of the Native" : Role of Eustacia Vye

For Hardy, romantic passion can be dangerous. Another kind of passion, uncontrolled anger, can also have unfortunate consequences. The only feelings, which can be trusted, are moderate, like Thomasin's kindness and desire for people to be at peace with each other. Relationships between people are best not when they are violent and sudden, but when they have a long history and have endured much, like the love between Diggory and Thomasin. Love at first sight, as Eustacia and Clym find out, is likely to be a mistake. Hot-tempered reactions are generally a mistake, as well. Hardy understands that passion is fundamental to human nature- and he portrays passion so well that we cannot help but respond to it in characters like Eustacia. But he stresses that we must try to act in the light of reason. We may fail- as Clym does- but we must try. Moderation is the goal.

Is Eustacia really a superior being, or does she merely thinks she is? Are her passions deeper than other people's, or is she simply greedy? Is she doomed by fate or by her own selfishness? Few readers have ever been able to decide for certain. That is the genius of Hardy's portrayal. If you are like most readers, you will find this beautiful young woman fascinating one moment, exasperating the next. Even the other characters of the novel find her unpredictable, and their reactions to her vary widely. Is she a goddess or a witch?

Hardy skilfully avoids simple answers by showing us many sides of this complex character. At times, he seems sympathetic to her frustrations with her narrow life, yet he does not shrink from showing her at her worst. She is capable of deception, and she has a killing temper. She can be disloyal, she can wound with a perfectly aimed insult, and she can exploit other people’s good nature.

Why, then, does the reader simply not turn away from her? Perhaps because almost everyone can feel pity for her at moments, such as before her death when she cries out,

“How I have tried and tried to be a splendid woman, and how destiny has been against me… I do not deserve my lot!”

If she had been able to live in a great city, perhaps she would have been splendid. If she had found a society that appreciated her rare qualities, rather than fearing or scorning them as the people of Egdon do, she might have achieved great things.

Hardy’s point, of course, is that those possibilities are not available. Like all of us, Eustacia must make do with the situation that faces her: she must either accept or change her fate. Her tragedy is that she refuses to accept it but fails to change it.

Usually, Hardy describes Eustacia in contrasts, to stress the divided nature of her soul, the conflicts that torture her. Early in the novel, he writes,

“As far as social ethics were concerned Eustacia approached the savage state, though in emotion she was all the while an epicure. She had advanced to the secret recesses of sensuousness, yet had hardly crossed the threshold of conventionality.”

He is saying that, on the positive side she is a nonconformist, an independent spirit; but on the negative side, emotion, passion, the heart's needs have become an obsession with her. She lives solely for romance.

“To be loved to madness- such was her great desire.”

One side of her nature, however, all too poignantly recognizes that love itself is evanescent: she is terrified of time. Think of her first appearance in the novel, eagerly searching with her telescope for Damon. She is the very picture of a desperate woman searching for experience. She carries with her an hourglass, even though, as Hardy takes pains to point out, she does have a modern watch. It is as if she actually wants to see time, her dreaded enemy, as it dribbles away. At the moment which should be her most blissful, when she and Clym decide to marry, she gazes toward the eclipsed moon and warns,

"See how our time is slipping, slipping, slipping!"

She confides to her lover the deep (and perceptive) fear that their love will not last.

Though she lives by certain illusions, another side of Eustacia is ruthlessly realistic. Perhaps her most attractive quality is this inability to lie to herself about herself. Basically, she knows her own faults; she's intelligent, perceptive, and honest. When she first meets Clym, she explains to him that she is depressed by life. It’s a simple statement, but it may well sum up all her difficulties. Life itself is somehow too much for her unusually sensitive and demanding nature. Life doesn't give her what she wants. Life, as she experiences it, is a prison.

Not surprisingly, readers disagree on many aspects of this puzzling, ambiguous character. Her actions can be seen from many different perspectives. For example, some say that she sincerely loves Clym; yet surely she also has a selfish motive in agreeing to marry him: in her mind, the marriage is associated with an escape to Paris. Throughout the book, her mixed motives often lead to troubling actions.

No matter how many times you read this novel, you will probably never be certain just how you feel about Eustacia Vye. She is too contradictory; she is too special and rare. Hardy himself is most eloquent when he describes her in symbolic terms, as when he writes that she and Damon, walking together under the full moon, “appeared amid the expanse like two pearls on a table of ebony.” Equally doomed, these two passionate beings shine brightly in a dark world only to be extinguished.

“The Return of the Native” : Role of Clym

Well denotation, if sometimes mistaken, Clym is Hardy's central character, the returning native of the novel's title. He does not find happiness, but he does find a kind of wisdom through his suffering. In the beginning, he is stubborn and proud. When he discovers that he can cause tragedy for others, he learns humility. Hardy wants the reader to learn what Clym learns. We cannot always get what we want in life, but neither can anyone else. Human beings should love one another and try not to cause each other pain.

Well-meaning, intelligent in certain ways, Clym Yeobright is not suited to life in the real world of his day. He dislikes city life as “effeminate,” but when he returns to Egdon, no one understands his ambition to teach school. His ideas come from books rather than from direct experience with people. Unfortunately, he does not really know himself, either. He thinks he is rational and controlled; but love for Eustacia causes him to act rashly. He thinks he is morally right; but this leads him to be cruel to others, whom he believes to be in the wrong.

Like his cousin Thomasin, Clym loves Egdon Heath, and the people there love him for his pure nature. The most important influence in his life is his home, especially his mother, Mrs. Yeobright. Temporarily, he leaves her to marry Eustacia, but in the end, even after her death, her influence on him remains strong.

Hardy suggests that Clym is too sensitive. His constant thinking almost seems to weaken him physically; his studying literally makes him an invalid for a while. His high ideas are not very practical. In day-to-day experiences with other people, he often has little or no idea what they want, or what they are thinking.

Yet this does not make him ridiculous. We have to respect himbecause he is struggling to find the truth of life. Though he is sometimes obtuse, he is never thoughtless. Perhaps he lacks the sense of self that is necessary to survive. If Wildeve is too selfish, then Clym in contrast is too unselfish.

In the end, Clym dedicates himself to others, hoping to spread truth and comfort and to teach all men to love each other. Ironically, he himself has failed with his mother and with Eustacia, the two people he loved most. He is more successful at loving all mankind than at being a son or husband.

"The Return of the Native" : Responsibility of Character and Fate

Pessimism, Fatalism, Determinism: - Words like pessimism, fatalism and determinism have freely been used by critics and readers to describe Hardy's philosophy of life. These labels largely convey his outlook and attitude. Everywhere in the novels of Hardy, human beings appear to us crushed by a superior force. He is pessimistic because he believes that man is born to suffer and he is fatalistic because he believes that destiny is hostile to man and that it governs human life, allowing very little free will.

Whether his creed is fatalism or determinism, Hardy is haunted by the vision of necessity. He shows us the sad consequences of a conflict of contradictory wills and the development of this conflict is crossed at every moment by accidents which interpret them. Hardy, however, is not cynic. He doesn't regard man as essentially mean and wicked. There are villains in his novels; but he believes that there is more goodness than evil in human nature. Man is capable of heroic endurance of misfortune. Therefore it is possible to call Hardy a determinist than a fatalist. Fatalism implies a blind supernatural power and determinism implies the logic of cause and effect.

Character and Fate responsible: - Hardy believes that "happiness is an occasional episode in a general drama of pain." He didn't think life to be a boon. Hardy's conception of life is essentially tragic. The conflict is one in which there is only the remotest chance of escape. Man suffers from a lack of foresight and from an inability to subdue his own insubordinate nature and this suffering is aggravated by the chances and incidents and a strange overwhelming power. The Tragedy in RN is due largely to the weaknesses and faults of the characters themselves. To that extent, character is fate, but tragedy is also caused by the natural and fateful forces working on the other end.

Clym's responsibility: - Human weaknesses largely determine the course of events in the novel. Clym is a noble man and would like to serve his fellow human beings by educating them. He is not a materialistic man. In fact, has forsaken the fashionable life of Paris and returned to Egdon Heath. We should not expect such a man to be unhappy; but he has his shortcomings. He fails to perceive Eustacia's unsuitability as a wife to a man like himself. He is unable to see materialistic nature of Eustacia and love for worldly gaiety. She warns him that she doesn't have the makings of a "good some-spun wife" and his mother emphatically tells him that he would regret his marriage to Eustacia whom she rightly describes as an "idle, voluptuous woman" but Clym doesn't see to these warnings. Having fallen in love with and married Eustacia, fails to keep the marriage. He also fails to balance between his wife and mother. Both the couples are incompatible with each other.

Mrs. Yeobright's responsibility: - Mrs. Yeobright, though a respectable matron for whom we feel great respect, is rigid and obstinate. Being worldly and practical, she is unable to read Clym's mind and feels unsympathetic to his humanitarian projects. She objects to her educational plans and marriage to Eustacia.

Wildeve's responsibility: - Wildeve is the villain of the piece and is the author of much of the misery that the characters suffer. He is an unscrupulous man, with a shallow nature and shifting loyalties. He fluctuates between one woman and another, marries one of them but keeps running after the other. His intimacy towards married Eustacia triggers more crises in the lives of characters.

Incongruities of the situation: - The tragedy in RN results from the incongruities of the situation in which these characters find themselves. For example, the incongruity of incompatibility between Clym and Eustacia, she hates Egdon Heath as much as Clym likes it. She like the glamour of Paris and thinks Heath a hell. Describe the tragic story in brief…

The role of destiny: - The responsibility of the characters for their tragedy is obvious. We repeatedly have a clash of wills and a conflict of purposes between the various persons involved, each pulling in a different direction. The tragic situation keeps mounting and the characters reach the limit. We are unable to understand the force working behind their tense and tragic life. It is destiny which manifests itself in the form of accidents and incidents. It is just when Mrs. Yeobright has determined to reconcile between the couple that the demon of mischance begins its game. Mrs. Yeobright's death is the result of many ironic accidents and coincidences. She arrives at her son's house at a time when Wildeve is having an intimate conversation with Eustacia and when she cannot immediately open the door. Mrs. Yeobright turns back and on her way back home is bitten by an adder and is killed. Before her death, she tells the boy, Johnny whom she meets purely by chance that Eustacia had discarded her. Clym has driven out Eustacia; fate resumes its flippant jests. He writes a letter to her to come back; but the letter miscarries by a few minutes. Clym, unaware of this, sits in his house waiting for Eustacia to knock. The night is the worst imaginable. The Heath is beaten by wind and rain. At length, a woman's footstep is heard. He feels excited. Thinking it to be Eustacia, he finds Thomasin who breaks the news of Eustacia's elopement with Wildeve which ends in drowning. We must remember that almost all Eustacia's meetings with Wildeve after her marriage to Clym have been accidental. All these incidents are responsible for their tragic ends and are supplemented by human weaknesses and get aggravated.

The Part of Nature and Egdon Heath: -In Hardy's stories, nature is always a personage and this personage is embodied here in Egdon Heath. Heath is the dark immemorial environment whose influences control the lives and destinies of those who dwell here. Egdon Heath symbolizes the whole cosmic order, win which man is but an insignificant particle. Eustacia looks upon Heath as a great enemy. She regards it as her cross, as her shame and as the potential cause of her death. Egdon Heath is swept by rain and wind causing death to Eustacia and Wildeve and it also kills Mrs. Yeobright with its venomous adder from its bosom.

"The Return of the Native" : The Sense Disillusionment

Thomas Hardy has a very pessimistic philosophy of life and his characters also suffer from disillusionment of their lives. He shows man lives in an indifferent world. Return of the Native is based on the assumption that man is destined by God to suffer the overwhelming pain and suffering which exits in the world.

All the main characters of Return of the Native namely- Clym, Eustacia, Wildeve, and Mrs.Yeobright have their own aim ambition. But all their plans turn into vain. All of their lives are full of aim. But they are trapped in a series of bitterly ironic events. They are faced with an incomprehensible universe.

The protagonist of the novel, Clym at an early age have been sent to Budmouth and from where he had gone to Paris. In Paris he had placed in trade and he had risen to the position of a manager of a diamond-merchant's establishment. He is a boy of whom something is always expected. He feels that he has to use his services for the people in Egdon Heath. In order to be of some service to the people, he wants to start a school. His misfortune, semi blindness disables him from executing the educational project.

In his love affair also he was not successful. Clym is very much attracted by the charm and beauty of Eustacia. Ignoring his mother's strong opposition he takes a cottage at Alderworth, several miles away from Blooms-End. But the utter incompatibility of temperaments had foredoomed their marriage.

The heroine of the novel, Eustacia was fully aware of the beauty, which nature has bestowed upon her. She didn't care about what people may tell about her. She can't bear the loneliness that heath has. She says, "Tis my cross, my shame and will be my death". Eustacia dreamed of a life in Paris. She hopes that if she marries, Clym he may take her to Paris. She has fascination for the pompous city life. But Clym on the other hand wants to settle in Egdon. So she had to stay in Heath. In the later part of the novel she tries to escape from the Egdon Heath with the help of Wildeve. Coincidentally Clym writes Eustacia a letter begging her to return to him - but he sends the letter too late. Eustacia does not see the letter before she leaves to flee with Wildeve. If she had, she might have no die like this.

Mrs. Yeobright, the mother of Clym, is a woman of middle age with well-formed feature. She vehemently opposes the plans of Clym to start a school. She wants Clym to go back in Paris because there he has a respectable job. She had brought up her with great care and devotion. She also strongly opposes not to marry Eustacia. She says, "Is it best for you to injure your prospects for such a voluptuous, idle woman as that?" But nothing could restrict her son from staying in the Heath or marrying Eustacia.

She was shocked, for example, by the sight off her son dressed as a furze cutter. She could not believe her eyes. She had thought it was only a diversion or hobby for him.

Again she resolves to reconcile with her son. But she never gets the chance to reconcile with her son and she dies.

Wildeve

Though Wildeve is depicted as a demon here but still he is also the portrayal of disillusionment. In the beginning of the novel, Wildeve responses quickly to Eustacia's signal fire. It is true that he wishes to marry her. But he could not. And in the later part of the novel he unhesitatingly leaps into the stream with all his clothes on to try to rescue Eustacia. But in this time also he fails and dies.

Analyzing all the above discussed characters we can say that man is thus posited to be the source of the cosmic but the cosmic is considered to be too complex for human understanding.

"The Return of the Native" : Hardy's Art of Characterization

Introduction: In the field of characterization, Hardy's talent, as compared with that of some great novelists, is narrow. His memorable characters all have a family likeness, but there is no doubt about the realistic quality of Hardy's character portrayal. He makes his characters live in almost vital manner.

We get the feeling that we have actually met the various persons whom Hardy portrays in his fiction. His characters are made of solid flesh and blood like Clym and Eustacia. They are recognizable human beings and their conversation, actions, irritations, annoyances and quarrels perfectly convincing. It has been said that Hardy's great success is with subtle characters. But the fact is that his men and women are the most vividly realized when they are simple, primal characters: rustics such as Grandfer and Christian Cantle, sturdy countrymen like Diggory Venn.; passionate wayward women such as Eustacia and plausible rogues such as Wildeve. The portrayal of male characters are admirable, he perhaps succeeds ever better in the treatment of men than women. This choice of his characters leads him away from intellectual complexities which delight most novelists. If his best characters are not subtle, the art that describes them is surely one; for he can record the minutest fluctuations of emotional experiences -write the problems in the relationships of the characters and discuss them- such as incompatibility of Eustacia etc. Hardy introduces each of his principal characters with a vivid description of the personal appearance. The reddleman is described "as young and, if not exactly handsome, approaching very near to handsome." Wildeve is quite a young man. The grace of his movement is singular. It is "the pantomimic expression of a lady-killing career." Eustacia is "full-limbed and somewhat heavy and soft to the touch as a cloud. She has pagan eyes, full of nocturnal mysteries."

The portrayal of Eustacia: Return of The Native contains some of Hardy's greatest characters, notably Eustacia and Clym. Her rebellious nature and force of will are for what Hardy calls her, "the raw material of the divinity". She is the most powerfully-drawn woman in the Hardy's portrait-gallery. Her selfishness, her charms and beauty, her uncontrolled passions do not blind us to her celestial imperiousness. Hardy suggests that she is a goddess in her power. She has a femme fatale in her power to arouse passions in others and Cleopatra in her pride, her passion and her scorn of consequences. She is Hardy's greatest creations whom no reader is likely to forget. She herself is responsible for the tragedy that befalls her. These are the factors which put her to tragedy: Her unsatisfied longing to be taken to Paris and her Hatred of Heath are the main factors governing her fate. She was attracted towards Clym simply by the hope that she would be taken to Paris. She was also aware of his deficiencies and she frankly confessed to Clym that she didn't have the makings of a good house-wife. But she also told him that she loved him and that she could sacrifice her dream of Paris for him, "To be your wife in Paris would be heaven to me; but I would rather live with you in a hermitage here than not be yours at all." In spite of this her desire of Paris never perished. Her reaction to Clym's furze-cutting, her renewed interest in Wildeve, Her failure to open the door, and her final decision and death are all the factors which contribute to her tragedy. Eustacia's own weaknesses and lapses play a large part in bringing about the tragedy. Her love of gaiety and fashion, her worldliness and incapacity to appreciate her husband's lofty nature and her inconsistency are the powerful factors.

Mrs. Yeobright's character: Mrs. Yeobright has been vividly portrayed. Her love for her son is her most outstanding quality. With it she combines a strength and firmness of mind, a shrewdness and sagacity. She has a practical mind especially in her assessment of Eustacia. Her opposition to her son's educational plans shows her narrow-mindedness.

The portrayal of Clym: His portrayal is much less complex. His aversion to materialistic and fashionable life of Paris, his great love for her mother, his decision to be a school teacher and educator and his acceptance of his misfortune all make him a convincing character. The delineation of his character has superbly been made by Hardy.

Diggory Venn: In the portrayal of Diggory Venn, too Hardy is matchless. He represents the honest, steadfast, devoted, self-sacrificing and selfless lover. Some of us remain unconvinced by the selfless love he expresses towards Thomasin. It would be seen that he has nothing else to do but safeguard the interests of his farmer sweetheart.

Wildeve's character: Wildeve is the villain whose conduct arouses disgust in our minds. He is depicted as casual, irresponsible, selfish, pleasure-loving and even callous. He plays with the hearts of girls, marries one of them and runs away. He strongly reminds us of Sergeant Troy in Far From the Madding Crowd. He has attractive manners and amiable nature. He partly redeems himself by sacrificing his life for Eustacia. The character of Wildeve is convincing.

Contrasted Portrays: One important aspect of Hardy's characterization is the contrasting portraits of his characters. Mrs Yeobright and Eustacia are as unlike each other as any two women could be. The one honest and devoted; the other, unscrupulous and inconstant in love. Clym is contrasted with both Diggory and Wildeve. He portrays men though in a narrow range, but he delineates women eminently. There are three women characters in the novel. Eustacia, Mrs. Yeobright and Thomasin (Compare them). There are only three main male characters; Clym, Wildeve and Diggory Venn (Compare them here).

The Egdon Heath: In delineating the various characters, Hardy makes use of the natural environment in which these characters live. Egdon Heath is not only the scene of the story; it dominates the plot and determines the characters. (write attitude of different characters to Heath)

The Rustic Group: We cannot ignore the rustic group of characters. Although they appear here as a group, yet they have been individualized too.

How Hardy Uses his Knowledge of the Bible, Art, the Universe and Wessex Folklore to Add Depth to "The Return of the Native" ?

Hardy began writing Return of the Native in 1877 and Hardy includes many of the beliefs and views of the Victorian period in his writing including concerns about God and religion, scientific theories, moral values and cultural attitudes of the people of the day. Hardy wrote the novel at a time when he was happiest, when he had returned to his native Dorset after living for a time in London. He loved the countryside but realized that with this great time of change, with the industrial and agricultural revolution, that the customs of rural England were under threat. He was concerned that local traditions and regional identity would be forgotten through the civilizing of the masses. Hardy was keen to preserve a record of the local folk history and superstition which continued to play a major part in the lives of the Dorset people, even in the 1890's. By drawing on his knowledge, Hardy was able to illustrate to the reader the changing beliefs of the period at the same time as giving deeper meanings to the story and giving the reader a better understanding of the characters through his extensive use of Greek mythology and biblical references.

Hardy began his life with strong religious beliefs. He was born into a very active Christian family and regularly attended church services. His faith was devout until 1862 when he moved to London. There he was exposed to new ideas and scientific advancements and as he started questioning religion and searching for the meaning of life, his faith weakened and his spiritual beliefs were strengthened. It was a time when the bible had been brought into question through Darwins work 'The Origin of the Species' which suggested that evolution had been responsible for man's development rather than being created by God. With this and other discoveries, people had started to think about the nature of existence.

In Return of the Native, Hardy writes from the point of view of an agnostic as his characters, although uneducated, question traditional beliefs. Conventional Christian religion is conspicuous by its absence in the novel. Although the Church did play a central part in most rural communities at the time, in the world of Egdon Heath, the heath folk rarely made the effort to attend church services. When Fairway recounts the story of Mrs Yeobright forbidding the wedding banns in book 1 chapter 3, he says

'ah well I was at church that day ……. which was a very curious thing to happen' and Humphrey replies, 'I haven't been these three years'.

This suggests it is an unusual occurrence for the local people to go to church. Hardy also describes in Book 2 chapter 4 how the local inhabitants of Egdon are unlikely to visit church, even on Christmas Day, as because of the weather 'they did not care, to trudge two or three miles to sit wet footed in the church'. If their belief had been strong, then it wouldn't have mattered what they had had to endure to demonstrate their faith.

Hardy's views on religion are obvious in his writing. He is almost mocking of Clym as when he first returns to the Heath, he is likened to a Victorian missionary in his aim to improve the lives of the common workers through education. Hardy describes him as 'John the Baptist who took ennoblement rather than repentance for his text' and his further comment that 'the rural world was not ripe for him' seems to criticise his unwelcome intentions. Hardy ends the novel with Clym as a rather pathetic and tragic hero, preaching his 'Sermons on the Mount'.

Hardy uses a great deal of religious imagery in the novel and the purpose of this reference to biblical characters and disasters, gives the reader a better understanding and magnifies the importance of events. In book 1 chapter 4, Eustacia explains her hatred of the heath as she tells Wildeve, 'Tis my cross, my shame, and will be my death'.

The imagery anticipates her failure to escape the heath and foreshadows her death. In the chapter The Night of the 6th of November, Hardy describes Eustacia's last walk on the Heath. He refers to the 'agony in Gethsemane'. Eustacia's thinks of various historical and biblical events as she heads off into the night on the path towards Rainbarrow. Such references are extremely symbolic. Similarly Venn is compared to an 'Ishmaelitish creature' inferring that he has been cast out and gives a better understanding to how Venn is seen as an outsider by the locals. The purpose of Hardy including these biblical references reflected the thinking of the time and is meant to be ironic.

Hardy's lack of Christianity led him to the conclusion that there was an imminent will that controlled life and that people were simply pawns being manipulated by a higher force that was indifferent to pain. Although some of the characters in Return of the Native are uneducated, they question traditional beliefs which are shown through the Heathfolk's Pagan rituals.

Art

In the novel, Hardy frequently pauses from the story to talk about the past and often refers to people in Greek mythology, art and literature to compare the characters. In his description of Eustacia, he compares her to myths like 'Artemis, Athena, Hera' to emphasise how much like a goddess she is and how she is different to other normal women. He also refers to her as 'an embodiment of the phrase a populus solitude' likening her to a quotation of one of Hardy's favourite poems 'Child Harolde by Byron.

When Hardy describes Mrs Yeobright perception of communities he suggests that she sees things from a distance and suggests that her view of life is the same as you would have to view the work of Flemish painters 'Sarlert and Van Alsloot'.

From the point of view of MrsYeobright's experience of rejection by Clym, the novel echoes the themes and actions of Shakespeare's play King Lear, as it explores the themes of the parent-child bond, pride, arrogance, misunderstandings, justice, blindness and madness. The allusion to King Lear and the tone which Clym speaks to Eustacia is Shakespearian in its style as he says in book 5, chapter 3,

'By my wretched soul you sting me, Eustacia! I can keep it up, and hotly too. Now, then, madam, tell me his name!'

The inclusion of Shakespearean themes in the novel adds more seriousness to the events taking place and stresses the tragedy.

Wessex Folklore

Hardy loved his native Dorsetshire and preferred country life to city life, much like Clym Yeobright. At the time of writing the novel in the 19th century, major changes were taking place largely due to the industrial revolution. This resulted in people moving from the farmlands to work in new factories in the cities. Hardy was well aware that one of the effects of the social change taking place was a loss of identity.

Hardy's novel is centred around Egdon Heath and the people who live there and documents a vanishing life of colourful characters, traditional dialects, seasonal celebrations, folk remedies and superstitions. He included the details of the vanishing country life as a historical record which also included negative aspects. As the great agricultural depression took place in Britain and Ireland between 1870 - 1890, people lost their jobs. This is possibly the reason that Clym was forced to leave Egdon to look for work and probably the reason Diggory Venn was forced to take up employment as a Reddleman as his work running a dairy herd no longer existed as he writes 'since the introduction of the railways Wessex farmers have managed to do without these'.

As well as documenting dying traditions, the heath folk act like a chorus in a classical Greek drama and through their talking and joking, they are able to comment on the actions of the main characters. Hardy uses them to provide the reader with a background to the story. For example in Book 1, chapter 3, they provide information that the marriage between Thomasin and Wildeve and that the brides Aunt, Mrs Yeobright 'forbad the banns'. The main action of the plot is interspersed with the appearance of the Heathfolk who are always light and jovial, which allows the reader to take in important information and think about the consequences of the action of the main characters.

The heathfolk are the main participants in the ritualized celebrations that Hardy wanted to include. The action is organized around seasonal celebrations, which begin and end with the autumn bonfires. The bonfire is a symbol of continuity which has its origins in a pagan ritual and because the heathfolk are strongly superstitious, they use the bonfire to ward off evil spirits. Hardy uses the 5th November to show a strong sense of tradition which began in 1605 when Guy Fawkes attempted to get rid of the King James I by blowing up the houses of parliament. Bonfire night is also related to the Celtic New Year when bonfires were lit as part of the New Year celebrations.

Another example of traditional celebration comes when the heathfolk perform the Mummers play as part of the Christmas festivities. The Play of St George shows a battle between Christianity and Paganism and Hardy includes the play to make a point about good and evil and the fact that the reader should consider the complexity of the characters and not make moral judgments about them.

The gypsying at the village picnic in late August also marks the changing of the seasons as does the Maypole dance, a festival of Spring which is symbolic of fertility and renewed life. Hardy uses the Maypole dancing to suggest that new life may also be possible for Thomasin.

As well as the seasonal celebrations, Hardy includes other ancient rituals that are performed by the locals. In the novel, to cure Mrs Yeobright of her adder bite, Sam suggests an old folk remedy telling Clym 'You must rub the place with the fat of other adders'.

Christians believed that man had the right to chose between right and wrong. However they also believed that there exists an evil agent at work in the world which the bible calls Satan. Following the New Testament teaching, the ancient church regarded the devil as the originator of all evil. Magicians, sorcerers and witches who were believed to make use of Satanic powers were therefore excommunicated.

Hardy was keen to emphasise the superstitious beliefs and god fearing nature of the rustics on Egdon Heath. The two main examples of the local superstition are Diggory Venn and Eustcia Vye. Both of these characters are isolated and feared for being different and therefore arouse suspicion. In the early Christian years, the Church was relatively tolerant of magical practices. If you were proven to be involved in it, then all you had to do was to pay penance but later on, it was considered evil and the Church's attitude became aggressive and all people suspected of witchcraft and socery were now charged with having made a pact with the devil, and using their supernatural powers to harm people. Most of the Heath people suspect Eustacia of being a witch as Jonny Nansuch explains to Venn, 'They say she's clever and deep, and perhaps she charmed 'en to come'. She is linked to witchcraft often because she seems to have an unnatural power over men. She also strange habits, roaming the countryside at night, lighting bonfires. As the story develops, the fear of Eustacia as an evil force is shown in the cruel treatment she receives. Susan Nansuch believes that Eustacia has spellbound her children and when her son Johnny becomes ill, she believes Eustacia is the cause and makes a wax effigy of her and throws it into the fire after sticking it with pins.

'To counteract the malign spell which she imagined poor Eustacia to be working, the boys mother busied herself with a ghastly invention of superstition, calculated to bring powerlessness, strophy and annihilation on any human being against whom it was directed'.

Diggory Venn, the Reddleman is also a victim of the heathfolks superstition. The fact that he is 'trapped' in his red colouring and the myths associated with his lonely trade cause many of the images associated with Venn to be Satanic. Hardy mentions that the Reddleman was the favourite bogeyman that Wessex mothers used to threaten their naughty children as they told them 'the Reddleman is coming for you'.

Dorset Festivals

Ashmore village in Dorset hosts the Filly Loo celebration on the nearest Friday to the longest day, June 21st. Villagers dance beside the village pond. A traditional morris band plays to the crowd who dance in the street. A Green Man arrives in a procession and takes part in the first dance to start the evening. There are display dances followed by public dancing, then at dusk, the celebrations reach their climax with the Abbots Bromley Horn Dance. This is a torchlit procession with six antlered deer-men and four other costumed characters: a Maid Marion, a bowman, a hobby horse and a fool. The procession and dance is accompanied by a haunting solo melody in a minor key which is very atmospheric. The celebration finishes with the torches in the ground around the pond and everyone holding hands around the pond for the last dance.

Wessex Morris Men dance above the Cerne Abbas Giant, an ancient fertility symbol, at dawn, around 5.20am. They then walk down the hill collecting may and dance and process through Cerne Abbas accompanied by the Dorset Ouser (or Ooser), a horned animal-like figure.

Maypoles

The earliest sources suggest that the maypole acted as a focal point for May festivities or games, marking the spot of the where everyone should meet. There is no evidence that they were connected to pagan beliefs or worship - such accusations were first made by sixteenth-century Puritan reformers hostile to all dancing, drunkenness and merry-making, which they associated with idolatry. As a result, during the Protestant regime of Edward VI (1547-53) the May Day customs were curtailed. In the reign of 'Good Queene Bess' the Puritans seem to have been the first to link the maypole to 'heathen' worship as a regular part of their propaganda and 'anti-ceremony' agenda. The matter became an issue of debate in ecclesiastical courts.

The Stuart monarchs seem to have had no objection to the maypole customs, although religious opposition from the Puritans continued. The issue of morris dancing and maypoles became a 'bit player' in a larger and more fundamental debate between Church and State. This reached new levels with the Puritan revival during the English Revolution (1640-60), when such 'folk' revelries were banned, along with celebrating Christmas and playing football. Maypoles were banned by Act of Parliament in 1664. Those local officials who did not comply could be fined 5 shillings a week.

On the restoration of the monarchy a Charles II General Wade raised the famous maypole in April 1661 on The Strand in London to celebrate the king's return to the capital.

The tradition of raising maypole to celebrate royal anniversaries began in the 17th century. In 1760 to celebrate the accession of George III maypoles were also erected. Likewise in 1887 and 1897 to celebrate milestones during the reign of Queen Victoria. Our present Queen, Elizabeth II, has also had maypole raised in celebration of her Jubilees in 1977 and 2002.

May customs and maypoles were brought into the industrial cities of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries as part of the continued evolution of the celebrations.

Yet even as the old May traditions began to fade, they were revived as part of the cult of 'Merrie England'. Traditional song retained the May Day references. May Day acquired its connection with socialism at the end of the 1800s. In 1975 it became a public holiday again for the first time since 1640.

The majority of 'working maypoles' are only ribboned at the time of public festivities, such as May Day, and remain 'undressed' for the rest of the year. Maypoles are still ribboned for public dancing in different parts of England.

Mummers Plays

Mummers' Plays have been performed in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland for hundreds of years. They are folk dramas based on the legend of St. George and the Seven Champions of Christendom. They were originally mime or dumb shows (Thus mummers from the Middle English word mum, meaning silent.) where all the performers were disguised and known as 'Guisers'. All the characters were played by men who kept the same part for many years. Eventually, dialogue was added, but was passed on by word-of-mouth. Consequently, the 'Chinese Whispers' effect over the centuries and the loss of the real significance of the original story, makes present day performances very entertaining but virtually meaningless to most audiences.

The principal characters are St. George (â€¦of dragon fame.), Captain Slasher, The Turkish Knight, The King of Egypt, Doctor and several men-at-arms who challenge St.

George to a duel and are subsequently slain. The Doctor enters and demonstrates his skill by resuscitating the dead knights.

Many historians believe that this drama is a celebration of the death of the year and its resurrection in the spring.

“The Return of the Native" : A love-story

Hardly was a modern so far as his thought or philosophy is concerned, but the form of his novel is traditional. His plots arc all old fashioned. All of them turn on love. In all of them, we find the conventional love-triangle. Hardy's novels are all basically love-stories.

This is also true of the Return of the Native. It is also a love-story. And in it, there is not merely a love-triangle, but a- rhomboid (a four cornered figure) with a tail. The love triangle in the novel may be represented as follows:

(a) Eustacia-Clym Yeobrighl (b) Wildeve-Tliomasin-Venn

Both Clym Yeobright and Wildeve love Eustacia, and both Wildeve and Venn love Thomasin. Thus there is a double love-story, the path of the lovers cross, and the result is much sorrow and suffering, and ultimately tragedy. Love, in the present novel, as in other novels, is a lord of terrible aspect, a source of tragedy rather than of happiness. A detailed consideration of the love-triangle would make the point clear.

Clym-Eustacia-Wildeve: - Long before the novel opens, Wildeve and Eustacia have been in love with each other. They meet frequently on the Rainbarrow near Eustacia's home, and the sound produced by the dropping of a stone in the nearby pond is used as the signal of love. But their love is neither true nor sincere. They are strangely fascinated and drawn towards each other, and yet they are unfaithful to each other. The fact is that isolation in Egdon Heath has made Eustacia love-hungry, and she turns to Wildeve because there is no other more worthy object of love on the desolate heath. Wildeve too loves her because she is the most beautiful woman on the heath. However, as she is proud, hot and impulsive, he turns to pretty Thomasin who is the very opposite of Eustacia. He is a sort of lady-killer and likes to make love to a number of women at one and the same time.

On her part, Eustacia is equally capricious and changeable. She, too, transfers her love to Clym as soon as he returns to Egdon. She is disgusted with Egdon, yearns for the pomp and glitter of city life, and loves Clym because she thinks he would take her to Paris. However, her dream is frustrated. Clym has his own plan of educating the rustics, studies for long hours loses his eye-sight, and is compelled to take up the humble work of a furze- cutter. This is a great humiliation for Eustacia. At this juncture, Wildeve again crosses her path. The two dance on the village green, and Wildeve comes to meet her secretly at her home. The visit results ifi the tragedy of the closed door and the death of Mrs. Yeobright.

When Clym comes to know of the circumstances which led to the death of his mother, he is, quite naturally, angry with his wife. There follows a violent quarrel, and Eustacia leaves her husband and comes to live with her grandfather. Unable to tolerate life on Egdon, she decides to elope with Wildeve. They leave home on the night of the 6th of November. It is absolutely dark and a furious storm is raging. Eustacia falls into a pond and is drowned. Both Wildeve and Clym jump into the pond to save her. Wildeve is drowned, while Clym is saved by the reddleman.

In this way, Clym-Eustacia-Wildeve love-triangle results in tragedy for all concerned. Eustacia and Wildeve come to a tragic end. Clym's love for Eustacia is the direct cause of the tragic death of Mrs. Yeobright. No doubt, Clym lives in the end, but his is a life in death. He live haunted by a sense of guilt that he is responsible for the death both of his wife and his mother.

Wildeve-Thomasin-Diggory: - Wildeve-Thomasin-Diggory Venn have-triangle, on the other hand, ends more happily, largely, as a result of the patient and forbearing nature of Thomasin. Diggory Venn had loved Thomasin from the very beginning, but Thomasin rejected him for three reasons. First, because she did not love him, secondly, because she loved another person, and thirdly because her aunt, Yeobright, did not agree to her marriage with Diggory, by far their social inferior. Diggory was much frustrated. He was a small dairy farmer but dis-appointment in love led him to give up his farm and adopt the profession of a reddleman.

When the story opens we find the poor Thomasin has been jilted by Wildeve at the eleventh hour. They had gone to be married, but it was discovered that there was some technical flaw in the marriage license and so they could not be married. This is a great humiliation for Thomasin. Instead of returning home with Wildeve after the unfortunate event, she returns in the van of Diggory. In Egdon all supposed that they, Wildeve and Thomasin, were duly married, and so the Wessex folk even came to the Quiet Woman Inn to congratulate them.

Wildeve, instead of acting honorably and marrying Thomasin at the earliest, turns once again to Eustacia who is gratified to have her lover back. Diggory does her best to help Thomasin. He adopts his, "silent system", to scare away Wildeve from Eustacia, and keep him at home in the evening. At a critical moment, he offers himself to Mrs. Yeobright as a possible suitor for Thomasin. The result is that Mrs. Yeobright is able to talk to Wildeve from a position of strength, and to tell him frankly that if he does not marry her at an early date, there is another lover waiting to marry her. However, Thomasin is determined to marry Wildeve for, "her pride's sake". It is only though marriage with that she can wash off the disgrace from her fair name.

It is the return of Clym to Egdon that makes matters easier for Thomasin. Eustacia falls in love with him, and writes to Wildeve telling him that she no longer wants him, and he may marry Thomasin, if he so desires. The result is that Thomasin and Wildeve are married. But Wildeve does not remain faithful to her for long. He meets Eustacia by chance, dances with her and then visits her secretly, first in the evening, and then in the day. Thomasin knows all this, and suffers deeply as a consequence.

Melioristic Note: - However, her patience, tolerance, humility and prudence are rewarded in the end. Wildeve and Eustacia are drowned in the pond on the might of the 6th of November, and in this way she becomes a widow. The faithful Diggory still loves her and continues to court her. The episode of the lost glove touches her heart deeply. She now realises the sincerity and depth of his love. The result is that she now accepts him, and the two are duly married. We may be sure that the two lived happily together ever afterwards.

Thus the love story of Thomasin end; happily. Through her the novelist has introduced an element of meliorism in the novel. Life is tragic, and love is a cause of sorrow and suffering, but we can get some happiness even out of human life, if we are sufficiently gentle, humble, patient and forbearing like Thomasin and Diggory Venn. It is in this way that the tragedy of human life can be ameliorated or softened a little.

"The Return of the Native" : Significance of the Title

A good title must be appropriate and significant. Just as a signboard indicates the contents of a shop, a good title should indicate the substance or the basis theme of a novel is the story of the tragic consequences of the return of Clym Yeobright who is a native of Egdon Heath.

Clym Yeobright was born and bred up on Egdon Heath. He is its native. He loves the Heath, and is permeated through and through with its influences. He finds the hills congenial and friendly, and its very spirit is in his blood. His playthings have been the flora and fauna of Egdon, and he is as familiar with the face of the ancient Heath, as one is with the face of a close relative. He is the son of Egdon, Egdon is in his blood, and he cannot remain happy away from it.

As Clym, the native of Egdon, was a promising lad, he was sent to Paris so that he may prosper and rise in life. There he became the manager of a big diamond business. He was doing well there, but still he did not feel happy and satisfied. He felt bored and tired in the artificial and unnatural life of the city of Paris. He did not feel at home there. He felt that in Paris, "he was pandering to the meanest vanities" of libertines and shameless women. The call of Egdon was too strong for him and he returned.

The return of Clym to his native Egdon causes much sorrow, suffering in the life of at least five people —Clym himself, Eustacia, Wildeve, Mrs. Yeobright and Thomasin. Clym was disgusted with the life at Paris, and he intended to devote the rest of his life to the education of the Heath-folk. He intended to stay forever in his birthplace to start a sort of school for the education of the rustics. This is a noble end, indeed, but it too idealistic and is bound to result in frustration and disappointment. The illiterate Egdon people would never have appreciated his nobility or his attempts at education them. In order to put his plan into practice, he studies hard late into the night. The result is that he grows-semi-blind, and is obliged to take to the humble work of a furze-cutter to support himself. This is a great tragedy, and Clym's suffering can better be imagined than described.

But this is not all. His return brings tragedy in the life of others also. Eustacia, the Queen of Night, falls in love with him and marries him in the hope that he would take her to Paris, and in this way her craze for city life would be satisfied. She is disgusted with Egdon, regards it as a Hell, and yearns for the pomp and glitter of city life. When she finds that Clym has no intentions of returning to Paris, her frustration knows no bound. She turns once again to Wildeve, and plans to elope with him. The result is that both of them are drowned in the dark and stormy night.

Thus is cut short the career of the beautiful. Eustacia, and of Wildeve, the Rousseau of Egdon. Had Clym not returned, Eustacia would have married Wildeve, and all would have been well. As it is, his return makes Wildeve marry Thomasin, and the two ate incompatible by their very natures. Wildcve does not remain faithful to Thomasin for long, and makes love to Eustacia again. Thomasin suffers silently as long as he lives, and finally has to suffer the pangs of Widowhood. Her life would have been a long tale of misery, had not there been the faithful Diggory to marry her and thus bring a ray of sunshine into her dark life.

Again, it is the return of Clym to Egdon, which brings him into direct conflict with Mrs. Yeobright, his mother. Mrs. Yeobright loves her son deeply and devotedly. She lives for him alone. A wise and shrewd woman, she knows that Eustacia would never make a good wife to him. She, therefore, warns Clym against a hasty marriage with her. She strongly objects to their marriage. The result is that the two quarrel violently, and finally separate and live apart. The result is that both of them suffer acutely, but silently. Their suffering is terrible. When Mrs. Yeobright comes to know that her son has turned a furze-cutter, she relents and goes to his cottage to be reconciled. But cruel Destiny has willed otherwise. The door of Clym's house remains closed in her face, she turns back disappointed and exhausted, and dies on the Heath.

Thus the novel narrates the story of the tragic consequences of the return of Clym to Egdon, his native place. Hence the title is appropriate.

"The Return of the Native" : The Pessimism of Thomas Hardy

Is Hardy a Pessimist? : - Much ink has been spilt in proving, and disproving too, that Hardy is a pessimist through and through. But Hardy himself repeatedly denied this charge in his prefaces, letters and diaries. He called himself an "evolutionary meliorist" and a realist. Let us here examine the arguments, both for and against, and then from our own conclusions.

Arguments of Hardy's Critics: - Those who charge Hardy with being a pessimist do so on account of his 'twilight' or gloomy view of life. They point out that in Hardy's considered view all life is suffering. Suffering is the universal law and happiness is but an occasional episode. In one of his poems, "Tire Poet's Epitaph", he calls life a "senseless school" and in another one that "Life offers only to deny." In hide the Obscure a child, called Father Time, murders his step brothers and sisters and then hangs himself. He does so because he feels that life is not worth living, and it is better not to have been born at all. Hardy himself adds the comment that Father Time symbolises the coming universal wish not to live.

Hardy Pessimistic about the First Cause: - Moreover, Hardy's critics point out, he is pessimistic about the governance of the world. He rejected early in life the Christian belief in a benevolent and omnipotent anthropomorhic God or First Cause. He rather conceives of Him as malevolent, as one who take delight in the suffering of us mortals. In Tess we are told, "Justice was done, and the President of the immortals had ended this sport with Tess."

In one of his poems he speaks of the Creator as, "Godhead dying downwards, with eyes and head all gone" and elsewhere refers to it as some "vast imbecility". Thus in his view 'the supreme power is blind, imbecile and malevolent and it takes joy in killing and torturing his innocent creation. In this ill-conceived scheme of things, with an hostile imbecility as the supreme governing force, there can be nothing but, "strange orchestra of victim shriek and pain." If this is not pessimism, ask the critics of Hardy, then what is?

Hardy's Own Point of View: - But Hardy vehemently denied this charge, times out of number. He pointed out that he was an artist and not a philosopher. It would be wrong to read any considered belief or theory of life in his mood-dictated writings. Expressions, like the one in Tess, regarding the President of the immortals, were simply poetic fancies, merely poetic devices like the use of ghosts, witches, fairies, etc., commonly used in all imaginative literature. Poems like "The Poet's Epitaph" were merely impressions of the moment and did not represent his considered view. He should not be judged by them. In his letters, diaries and prefaces he frequently explained his own point of view and called himself an, "evolutionary meliorist", or an "explorer of reality."

Hardy a Realist and Not Pessimist: - The fact is that Hardy was a thorough realist. Born and bred in a scientific age, he could not shut his eyes to the fact of suffering. Therefore, the cheap, blind optimism of poets, like Browning, who sang, failed to satisfy him. Rather, the brutal and ruthless struggle for existence which he saw being waged in Nature everywhere, the starvation, hunger, sickness and disease which stalks the earth, made him feel that God was not in heaven and all was wrong with the world. He claimed, and rightly, that his position was nearer the truth. Nor could he agree with the Romantic poets, like Wordsworth, who said that Nature had a "Holy plan" and that there was joy everywhere in Nature. How could it be so, when numbers of children were born to shiftless parents, like the Durbeyfields, to bring misery to themselves and to others. The world was already overcrowded; there were already too many hungry mouth to be fed. Acutely conscious of this fact of universal suffering, he felt with his own Jude that mutual butchery was the law of nature. This is not pessimism, but realism. This state of affairs can be mended not by turning our backs to it, but by facing it squarely. He therefore taught :
"God is in His heaven
All is right with the world."

"If a way to the better there be
It implies a good look at the worst."

This is a perfectly sane and healthy view of life and no right-minded person can object to it.

Hardy's View of the First Cause: Scientific: - As regards the creation and the Creator, Hardy was much influenced by the scientific theories of his age. He agreed with evolutionary scientists, like Darwin, that the universe could not have been created out of nothing by a single act of creation. It was in a constant process of evolution. With all modern thinkers, he lost faith in the benevolent, anthropomorphic God of Christian orthodoxy and conceived of the First Cause as an inhering force or energy, working constantly from within. Thus Hardy's universe is in a constant state of evolution. He conceives of this energy as indifferent and unconscious, without any hostility or any sense of pleasure in causing pain. This is his considered view. But when carried away by his indignation, he shakes his fist at the cause of things and personifies it as a conscious and hostile Creator. For example, with indignation burning in his heart at the unmerited suffering of Tess, he calls the First Cause as the President of the Immortals who kill us for their sport. He may be excused for such poetic'fancies, for they have been made use of by all poets and writers of fiction. They do not reflect in any way this logical position.

Ultimate Enlightenment of the First Cause: - Moreover, he believes that this energy or power would gradually evolve consciousness and then human lot would undergo amelioration. Towards the end of his epic-drama, The Dynasts, his most philosophical work, he holds out a hope of the gradual emergence of a better order of things. In this drama, he calls the First Cause, Immanent Will, and says that already,

"..... a sound of joyance thrills the air,
Consciousness the will informing
Till it fashion all things fair,
And the rages of the ages shall be mended."

This is certainly not pessimism. It may be what Hardy called, "evolutionary meliorism."

Philosophy of Resignation, Not of Nihilism: - Besides this, Hardy is not a Nihilist. Except in his last novel Jude the Obscure, he never advocates a rejection of life. Suffering, no doubt, is the universal law but human lot can be ameliorated a great deal through tact and wisdom and through wise social reform. It is a philosophy of resignation which he teaches. The Wessex rustics are resigned to their lot and suffer patiently. Joan Durbeyfield's suffering is not so intense, because when faced with misfortune she again and again mutters, "It was to be", and then goes about her way as usual. Elizabeth-Jane and Thomasin tactfully adjust themselves to their circumstances and so escape much misery.

Emphasis on Wise Social Reform: - Social reforms can go a long way towards ameliorating human lot. Marriage laws, specially, should be liberalized in favour of the fair sex. 'Pure' women, like Tess, who are more sinned against than sinning, should not be looked down upon and treated as outcasts. Our double standards of morality must go. A marriage should be dissolved as soon as it becomes a cruelty to either of the two contracting parties, for it is then no marriage at all.

Hardy's View of Man: - Moreover, Hardy does not take a degraded view of mankind. Odious villains, detestable and condemnable rascals, are few in the Wessex Novels and none of them is an unredeemed villain. Thomas Hardy cannot draw completely odious people. David Cecil writes in this connection, "Odiousness implies meanness; and mean people neither feel deeply nor are aware of any issues larger than those involved in the gratification of their selfish desires." If Hardy tries to draw such a mean person, he is a dreadful failure. It does not mean that all his successful creations are virtuous. Henchard and Eustacia commit sins, but they do so in a grand manner. There is no calculated selfishness in them. Moreover, they know they are wrong : they are torn with conscience. They are simply carried away by an over-mastering passion. Therefore, we do not dislike them. Mankind for Hardy always assumes heroic proportions. The Wessex Novels are the, "apotheosis of the human spirit", and not expositions of its meanness.

Hardy a Humanist, and Not a Pessimist: - The spirit of, "Loving-kindness", Hardy advocates, should he the basis of all human relations. Much of human misery results from the imperfections of the First Cause, but much more suffering can be avoided if we are kind and sympathetic to each other. Instead of seeking refuge in nature and turning our back on life, we should rather turn to our own kind, for,

"There at least discourse trills around,
There at least smiles abound,
There sometimes are found,
Life-Loyalties."

A poet who could write like this cannot be called a pessimist. Thomas Hardy is a 'humanist" or what he called himself an, "Evolutionary meliorist."

To sum up, there has been hot controversy as to whether Hardy is a pessimist or not. Those who consider him a pessimist point out that in his view all life is suffering and happiness is only an occasional interlude.They also point out that the ruling power is blind, unconscious of human suffering and lacking in moral sense. Its activity is purposeless. Hardy considered himself a realist and an evolutionary meliorist. He believed that if a way to the better there is, it requires a good look at the worst. The ruling power would be gradually enlightened with the passing of time.Human lot can be improved by tactful and adjustment to one's circumstance, by wise social reform and "loving-kindness."

"The Return of the Native" : Hardy's Contribution to the English Novel

Hardy's Greatness as a Novelist: - Hardy has come now to be universally recognised as the greatest novelist of the Victorian era. Indeed, he is one of the greatest novelists in the whole range of English Literature. Some critics have even called him the Shakespeare of the English novel. Let us here consider the various merits and demerits of his art and then form our own estimate of his true greatness as a novelist.

The Classification of Hardy's Novels: - Hardy's first novel the Desperate Remedies appeared in 1871, and thereafter novels after novels flowed from his pen in quick succession. His-last novel, Jude the Obscure, which was published in 1895, was vehemently criticised as being immoral. This hostile reception made him give up novel writing for good, for exclaimed he, "a man would be a fool, to deliberately stand up to be shot at." The Mayor of Casterbridge, The Return of the Native, Tess of the D'urbervilles and Jude The Obscure are regarded by universal consent as his masterpieces, and they have been compared to the four great Shakespearean tragedies. Prof. L Abercrombie has divided Hardy's novels in to two groups — the dramatic and the Epic. Dramatic novels are those in which our interests is divided between a group of character whose actions and interests clash with each other, such conflict forming the main point of the novel. The Return of the Native and Far From the Madding Crowd are dramatic, for in them the chief interest arises from a clash between the main characters. In the epic novels the interest of the novel centres round the life of a single character. The background is vast and imposing and there is no sub-plot. Tess of the D'urbervilles obviously belongs to the second class, for in this novel the action centres round a single character, a milk-maid, whom Hardy calls a "pure woman". The Mayor of Casterbridge shares the qualities of both these kinds. Hardy was a born poet and even his novels are the works of a poet. Poetic scenes of great power abound, and they have earned for Hardy World-wide acclaim and popularity.

Hardy as a Regional Novelist: - Hardy is a regional novelist. He is the creator of "Wessex" a small tract of country consisting of six odd countries in South England. His knowledge of this limited region is as thorough as that of Scott of his beloved Scotland and that of Wordsworth of the Lake District. "Wessex" appears and reappears successively in one novel after another and it is seldom that he strays out of it. But his treatment of this locality is not narrow or provincial. He has raised it to the level of the universal. Wessex scenes and sights are made a part of universal nature and his characters are at one with humanity as a whole. Wessex heaths and woodlands have an epic grandeur and his principal characters have the greatness of epic heroes and heroines. He has thus imparted a new emphasis and significance to the regional novel which had already been dignified by the Brontes.

His Theme: - But above all Thomas Hardy is the creator of the philosophical novel. Uptill now the English novel was a vehicle of social criticism. Man in society had been its theme so far. But Thomas Hardy uses the novel to inquire into the cause of things. His novels are questionings about life. He constantly inquires about the why and whereof of things and constantly attacks accepted beliefs. Man's predicament in the universe is the theme of Thomas Hardy's novels. He has no faith in the benevolent and omnipotent God of Christianity. He conceives of the First Cause as blind, indifferent and unconscious. Man suffers owing to the imperfections of the powers on high. The Return of the Native is a tragedy of character and environment but even here chance and fate play an important role in bringing about the tragedy. Character is responsible for the tragedy only to a very limited extent. Thus his conception of tragedy differs radically from that of Shakespeare. His characters suffer for no fault of their own, but because they happen to inhabit a blighted planet. In Tess of the D'urbervilles, Tess suffers even though she has done no wrong. She is essentially a pure woman more sinned against than sinning. She has no 'tragic-flaw' in the sense in which all the tragic heroes of Shakespeare have it. In this way, Hardy is the father of a new form of tragedy. He has given to the English novel depth, richness and significance.

The Creator of the Democratic Novel: - To Thomas Hardy must go the credit of having democratized the English novel. Aristotle had taught that the hero (at least the tragic hero) of an epic, drama, or novel must belong to the highest rank of society so that his fall from his previous greatness may rouse the emotions proper to tragedy. Writers in general followed this precept of Aristotle. Witness, for example, the great tragic heroes of Shakespeare. But the heroes and heroines of the great Hardian tragedies are all drawn from the lowest rank of life. Hcnchard, the hero of The Mayor of Casterbridge, is a haytrusscr, Tess is a milkmaid, Giles is a cider-maker and pine-planter, Gabriel Oak is a shepherd and Clym is a furze-cutter. He has thus completely broken away from tradition and his novels do not suffer in any way. He has revealed the essential nobility and grandeur of the soul of humble humanity that remains unknown in country isolation. Tess, though an humble milk-maid, has the nobility and grandeur befitting an empress. Hardy's tragedy is as great an apotheosis of the human spirit as the tragedy of Shakespeare.

Hardy: Treatment of Sex: - Hardy has broken new ground in another respect also. He was the first English novelist who dared to make a woman who had sinned, or who was an adulteress, the heroine of his novels. Tess is a woman with a past, yet Hardy has made her the heroine of Tess of the D'urbeivilles. Similarly, Sue Bridehead, heroine of Jude the Obscure, is an adulteress. Hardy thus shocked Victorian notions of morality and was vehemently criticised as being immoral and a corrupter of the people. His books were burnt. But he did not yield; he rather chose to give up novel-writing when the bitter attacks of his critics were too much for him.

Characterization: - Characterization is an important aspect of the art of a novelist and Thomas Hardy is a master of the art of characterization. Some of his characters are among the immortal figures of literature. They remind us of the immortal creations of Shakespeare. He chooses his characters from the lower strata of society because he believed that while the character and actions of people from high society are concealed by conventions, the rustics are free from any such control. Hence in their case character is fully revealed and can easily be portrayed. Thus Thomas Hardy excels in the portrayal of simple, elemental natures. His female characters are better and more forceful than his male characters, because women are more elemental, nearer to nature, than men. Thus his range of characterization is limited. AH his important characters belong to Wessex and to the lower strata of society. When he strays out of Wessex or attempts to portray complex characters drawn from the upper classes of society, he fails miserably. But this does not mean that his characters have only a topical or local interest. He deals with the universal passions of man and so his characters are universal in their interest. They appeal to people in all ages and countries. One has to think only of Henchard, Clym, Tess, Eustacia, Giles, Marty South, etc., to realise the truth of his statement.

Thomas Hardy's characters are all human beings, with common human weaknesses and virtues. They are neither saints nor angels, nor unredeemed villains. His characters may have some faults; they may sin but they are never mean. We never hate them, we love them despite their faults. They are grand even in the faults they might commit. They have conscience, and they are torn within themselves when they do some wrong. Henchard is jealous and revengeful, his wrongs are the result of impulse, never the result of calculated malice. Whatever we may call him, we can never call him mean. Similarly, Tess has sinned, but she is essentially a pure woman whom we pity, and whose heroic struggle against heavy odds we admire.

Minor Characters: - Hardy's characters may be divided into two broad classes — major and minor. His major characters include such unforgettable and forceful figures as Henchard, Farfrae, Elizabeth-Jane. Clym, Eustacia, Giles, Marty South, Bathsheba, Gabriel Oak, Tess, Angel Clare, Sue, Jude, etc. His minor characters are sons of the soil, real children of the earth. They are representatives of antiquity. They perform the function of the Greek Chorus in the novels of Hardy. They comment on action and people and tell us of what has happened off the stage. They are the main source of humour in his novels. They provide a norm by which to judge the main characters of his novels. Often they are the spokesmen of Hardy himself and express his views on life. They appear in groups and generally remain in the background. They may be likened to the clowns of Shakespeare or to his rustics. They, too, are unforgettable and unique in their own way and constitute much of the charm of his novels. When they are absent, as from Tess, even the best of his novels lose something owing to their absence.

Plot Construction: - Hardy's novels are masterpieces from the point of view of plot construction as well. They have an architectural finish and symmetry. The architectonics of Hardy have been praised by all who have studied him. The forethought, the careful planning, the pattern and design, the majesty and grandeur of the plots of his novels, is explained by his early architectural training. They are all massively built. As an edifice rises brick by brick, joined together by mortar according to a particular plan, so are Hardy's plots constructed scene after scene, and his Wessex and his philosophy are the cement that wields the scenes into a single whole. Digressions are there, still everything develops according to a preconceived design. There is no looseness, unfinished odds and ends.

The Faults of His Plots: - But his plots are old fashioned. They are all love stories. The wrong man meets the wrong woman or vice versa and thus complications arise leading the characters to their doom. The "eternal triangle", is always there. Moreover, they follow the old fashioned dramatic plot-pattern in the convention of Fielding. There is action, sensation and thrill; but there is no such introspection, or psychol-analysis as we expect from a modern novelist, and as we get in the novels of writers like Henry James. While Hardy is a modern as far as the thought content of his novels is concerned, he is conventional and old fashioned in his plot construction. Moreover, his plots turn too much on chance and coincidence. This is unrealistic and jars upon the reader's sense of probability.

Style: - The style of Hardy has come in for a great deal of criticism. Mr. Erza Pound accused him of writing with a blunted pencil. Others have called him pedantic for his use of obsolete, dialectic words and such words and expressions drawn from the terminology of the arts and the sciences, as are unlikely to be familiar to the average reader. He has been condemned for his faulty grammar —for his split infinitives, unrelated participles, and the misuse of articles and prepositions. These are serious faults, no doubt, and it is right that they should be pointed out. But the fact remains that Thomas Hardy's style is the best suited for his purposes. It is a poetic style. He has an almost Shakespearean felicity of expression, and has the rare, and invaluable nack of using the best word for his purpose. At every step his style reveals the sincerity of the man. He uses obsolete words and expressions, and scientific terminology only because he wants to be exact and convey his sense to the readers as accurately as possible. He is master of the use of similes and metaphors. When at his best, images after images come out of his pen as sparks from a chimney fire. His rustics speak their own dialect, but they use it most forcefully and effectively. Hardy instinctively chooses the best possible vehicle of expression for them and for himself.

The Modern Note: - Hardy is largely a traditional novelist. His plots, his characters are all conventional. His narrative is straightforward. We do not find in him that probing into the human soul which we find in the modern psychological novel. He does not, "move backward and forward in time as a stream of consciousness" novelist does. He does not disregard chronology or the logical sequence of events. His form is conventional, but as far as his matter is concerned he is entirely a modern. He is a modern in his views of God and religion, and in his free and frank treatment of sex.

To sum up, we can say that 'In the largeness of design, in the march and sweep of imagination, in the greatness of his great themes, he has given to the novel a simple grandeur and impressiveness, the more impressive for his preoccupation with the concerns of modem thought." Thus Hardy occupies an important place in the development of the English novel.

A Tale of Two Cities

THE VICTORIAN ERA (1850-1900)

The Queen Victoria (1819-1901), who was 18 when she became the Queen, had all the personal traits and characteristics of her age; in the arts she did not introduce any changes; she simply approved of them and became a symbol of them. She was a sheltered child, with well-marked personal traits which she demonstrated throughout her long life as the Queen of England. For the moderns, she represents false modesty, squeamishness in facing the facts of life. We associate with her name such concepts as complacent narrowness, artificial respectability, a code of 'decency' decided upon by the 'best' people. Victoria, as a queen was simply an ideal, who personally agreed with the practices and ideals of the new commercial upper-middle classes of England. Throughout her reign, she was adored by the people and was the symbol of the greatness and glory of England. Love of England meant love of the great and glorious Queen.

An Era of Peace and Prosperity: In the beginning of the era there was a widespread faith in unlimited progress. This sense of self-satisfaction or complacency resulted from the immense strides that England had taken in the industrial and scientific fields. The nation was prospering and ' growing richer and richer every day. Wealth brought with it many evils, like snobbery and social climbing. Money values prevailed, and as a result of increased materialism of the age, art and culture suffered. The British Empire was already a reality; the white man's burden; or the colonising mission of the English, was already bringing in rich dividends. They at-tributed all this prosperity to their glorious and dominant Queen Victoria. It was an era of prosperity, an era of aggressive nationalism, an era of rising imperialism. Hence, nobody wanted that the status quo should be dis-turbed; any questioning of the present order was frowned upon. Emphasis was on faith, faith in one's religion, faith in the Queen and those in authority, and faith in continuous progress. It there were doubts any-where, they needed to be compromised with the existing order.

Rapid Social Change: However, such a state of affairs could not continue for long. The Industrial revolution gradually destroyed old agricultural England. It shook the supremacy of the aristocratic class and landed gentry, and brought into being a new merchant class. This new class, quite naturally, clamoured for power and prestige, both political and social, and did not agree to the accepted order of things. Victorian traditions and conventions were thus subjected to greater and greater pressures and by the last quarter of the century there were large cracks in the Victorian fabric. Moreover, the lower classes, too, were acquiring political rights. There was mental and cultural emancipation all around.

Rise of Democracy and Liberalism: This spirit of emancipation is nowhere seen to better advantage than in the freedom which women gradually acquired. Victorian tradition and Victorian prudery placed ex-cessive emphasis on the chastity of women. Their proper sphere was within the four walls of the home; any contact with the outside world was supposed to corrupt and spoil them. Their sole business was to look after the comfort of their menfolk. But with the passing of time the movement for women's emancipation gained ground; women were given political rights and more and more of them came out of their homes to take up independent careers. Florence Nightingale did valuable service to the cause of women. Problems of sex and married life were receiving increasing attention from thinkers and writers. Havelock Ellis and Freud were already working on their epoch-making works. Tennyson expresses his views on the problem in his The Princess.

Evolutionary Science andthe Spirit of Questioning: This breakup of Victorian traditions and conventions was accelerated by the rapid advance of science. Science with its emphasis on reason rather than on faith encouraged the spirit of questioning. Victorian beliefs, both religious and social, were subjected to a searching scrutiny and found wanting. The publication of Darwin's Origin of Species in 1859 is of special significance from this point of view. His celebrated theory of Evolution contradicted the account of Man's origin as given in The Bible. His theory carried conviction as it "was logically developed and supported by overwhelming evidence. Man's faith in orthodox religion was shaken; he could no longer accept without question God's mercy, etc., for such orthodox notions of God were contradicted by facts. Similarly, Darwin, with his emphasis on the brutal struggle for existence which is the law of Nature, exploded the romantic view of her as a "Kindly Mother" having a "Holy plan" of her own. The process started by Darwin was completed by philosophers like Huxley, Spencer, Mill, etc. The impact of these developments in science and philosophy on the literature of the period is far- reaching.

Pessimism of the Age: Thus the established order, customs, faiths, beliefs and traditions were losing their hold on the minds of the people, and the new order of things had not yet been established. Man had lost his mooring in God, Religion and Nature. The mechanistic, view of the universe precluded any faith in a benevolent creator. Man felt, "Orphan and defrauded". He took a gloomy, view of life, for he felt miserable and helpless with nothing to fall back upon. It was for the first time, says David Cecil that "conscious, considered pessimism became a force in English literature". The melancholy poems of Arnold, the poetry of Fitzgerald, Thomson's The City of God, and the works of Thomas Hardy all reflect the pessimistic outlook of the late Victorian era. This growth of pessimism was further encouraged by the flow of pessimistic thought from Europe, where pessimism was much in the air at the time.

The Victorian Compromise: A word may now be said of the famous Victorian compromise. The age in which Tennyson matured and produced was an era of social change. Man was caught between two worlds, with the old one crumbling down, and the new one not yet formed. Doubts and unrest possessed man's soul and everything was in ferment. The chief disintegrating forces of the Victorian age were three: (a) the Industrial Revolution resulting in the rise of a new, rich and prosperous merchant class, desirous of rank and privilege, (b) the rise of democracy, and (c) the rise of evolutionary science. All these forces tended towards the break-down of the existing order; hence an effort was made to reconcile the old and the new, to bring about a compromise between science and religion, between the demand for "progress" and the need of stability, order and peace.

Its Several Aspects: The Victorian compromise had several aspects. Politically it meant the reconciliation of the claims of liberty and progress with order. An orderly broadening down of freedom from precedent to precedent became the Victorian ideal. Government still remained an affair of "great families" whether Whig or Tory. But the aristocracy itself was recruited more freely from the middle classes. In every field the Victorians tried to uphold authority in the face of the rising tide of social change. In the political field "authority" meant State and established law: in the field of government it meant aristocracy; in religion it was represented by the Established Church: in the domestic sphere it meant the supremacy of man over woman. Victorianism emphasised authority, and in religion it was represented by the English Church. The emphasis on Church authority deepened in the face of the challenge from science and rationalism.

Social Morality: Morality and respectability were the corner-stones of Victorianism. This emphasis on conventional morality was partly a reaction against the corruption of the earlier age, scandals of Byron and the radicalism of Shelley who did not hesitate even from depicting incest. "Moral duty remained for most Victorians a categorical imperative." The Victorians expected the poets not only to amuse but also to instruct. Men of letters must show a sense of social responsibility in a high degree. It is reflected in the humanitarianism of Dickens, Kingsley and Charles Reade.

Avoidance of Extremes: The Victorians disliked extremes of feeling or passion or even language. There was a tacit understanding as to what was to be depicted on the stage and what was to be left to the imagination. A general reticence concerning matters of sex is a common characteristic of literature in the Victorian age. H.M. Jones remarks: Victorianism is the pretense that if you do not name a thing it isn't there. According to Elwin, "prudery and humbug" presided over the age. This prudery placed a real limitation on the contents of the novel. It made it impossible for the novelist and poets to portray a real, living woman. Hence it is that decorum and solemnity are associated with Victorianism.

General Characteristics: The Victorian Age, also known as the Age of Tennyson in English literature, witnessed an unprecedented change and progress in all spheres of life. It was an era of material affluence, political awakening, democratic reforms, industrial and mechanical progress, scientific advancement, social unrest, educational expansion, idealism and pessimism. The literature of this period, wonderfully rich and varied in personal quality, embodies the spirit of the age. The Victorian era is characterised by the following main currents which transformed both life and literature:

(i) An Era of Peace: The Victorian Era was remarkable for its uninterrupted peace. The few colonial wars that took place during this period did not seriously disturb the national life. Though the Crimean War directly affected Britain, the sores of this war were soon healed up. The liberals of this period were particularly ardent champions of universal peace, brotherhood and justice. They regarded war as an unmitigated evil on a relic of barbarism. It was a peaceful epoch when Englishmen could complete the transformation of all aspects of their industrial, commercial, and social life without any of those risks of violent interruptions that gave quite a different quality to the history of continental nations.

(ii) Prosperity and Progress: As it was an age of peace, it made remarkable progress in industrial and mechanical development. Factories were established all over England, and large-scale production added to the national wealth. The new commercial energy of England was reflected in the Great Exhibition of 1851 and it was hailed as the beginning of a new era of prosperity. Carlyle writes in Signs of The Time "It is the age of machinery, in every outward and inward sense of that word; the age which, with its whole undivided might, forwards, teaches and practices the great art of adapting means to evils. Not the external and the physical alone are now managed by machinery, but the spiritual also. Men are grown mechanical in head and heart, as well as in hand. It was an era of prosperity, an era of aggressive nationalism, an era of rising imperialism.

Rapid industrialisation, commercial and material expansion also resulted in many evils, such as the appalling social conditions of the new industrial cities, the squalid slums, and the exploitation of cheap labour, often child labour, the painful fight by the enlightened few to introduce social legislation and the slow extension of franchise. The evils of Industrial Revolution were vividly painted by Dickens, Mrs. Gaskell and Kingsley. The disintegration of the village community, which was also necessitated by industrial expansion, is expressed in Hardy's novels.

(iii) The New Education: Educational expansion was registered by the passing of Education Acts, by which education to a limited degree became compulsory. The education expansion produced an enormous reading public. As the publication of books became cheap, their production was multiplied. Education brought political and social awakening among the masses. Press became a powerful political force. With the diffusion of education, a great reading public grew up unlike any that had existed before. The new reading public had no high literary standards. It asked for something to read. So, journalism and novel writing grew up. Edward Albert writes: "The most popular form of literature was the novel, and the novelists responded with a will. Much of their work was of a high standard so much so that it has been asserted by competent critics that the middle years of the nineteenth century were the richest in the whole history of the novel."

(iv) Victorian Compromise: It was an era of turbulent social changes. Man was caught between two worlds, the one dead and the other not yet formed. The new democratic, scientific and industrial forces tended towards the breaking down of the existing order. Hence, an effort was made to reconcile the old and the new, to bring about a compromise between science and religion, between the demand for progress and the need of stability, order and peace. In the field of political life there was a compromise between democracy and aristocracy. Harold Nicholson writes that the Victorians "desired to be assured that all was for the best; they desired to discover some compromise which, while not outraging their intellect and their reason, would nonetheless soothe their conscience and restore their faith, if not completely, at least sufficiently to allow them to believe in some ultimate purpose and most important still, in the life after death. In voicing these doubts, in phrasing the inevitable compromise, Tennyson found, and endeavoured passionately to fulfill his appointed mission."

(v) Social Unrest, Social Purpose and Realism: Victorian era was characterised by great social unrest. The class of wealthy capitalists and mill owners was rolling in wealth and luxury, but, on the other hand, factory workers and labourers were leading a life of abject misery and poverty. The industrial revolution had appealed strongly to the baser instincts of the commercial classes. To the wage earning classes the new Wealth accruing from the vast increase of manufacturers meant little. The Poor living conditions of the industrial slaves attracted the attention of social reformers and writers. The writers were inclined to depict a realistic picture of contemporary life with a conscious purpose of reformation. W. J. Long remarks: " The Victorian Age is emphatically an age of realism rather than of romance,—not the realism of Zola and Ibsen, but a deeper realism which strives to tell the whole truth, showing moral and physical diseases as they are, but holding up health and hope as the normal conditions of humanity." Both poets and writers worked under the shadow and burden of a conscious social responsibility. In the stories of Dickens is faithfully mirrored, writes Rickett, "the deplorable state of the Debtors' Prison, the Fleet, and the Marshalsea; the dismal abysses of elementary education; the oppression of little children; the prevalence of religious hypocrisy— these and many other dark corners of the life of London, were illuminated by the searchlight of his genius."

The closer approximation of literature to social life is very marked in the Victorian era. Kingsley writes passionate social tracts in the guise of a story, cheap bread inspires Ebenezer Elliott; Elizabeth Barrett voices The Cry of the Children, and Thomas Hood immortalizes the despairing unfortunate. Carlyle plunges into the political problems of the day. Ruskin, starting as critic of the art of painting, turns in the new century to the more complex art of life, and no man of letters has tackled industrial problems with greater insight and more brilliant suggestiveness.

(vi) Advancement of Democratic Ideals: In the political sphere the progress of democracy was a remarkable achievement. The political supremacy of the landed aristocracy had been destroyed by the Reform Bill of 1832 but there was no improvement in the condition of the working classes. Agitation for electoral reforms continued. The popular movement, known as Chartism kept England for about ten years in a state of political unrest, which was further stimulated by the industrial depression and widespread misery of "the hungry forties". The glaring social and political problems stirred the conscience of reformers and gave immense impetus to philanthropic energy and the spirit of humani-tarianism. The repeal of the Corn Law in 1848 ushered in an era of improved industrial conditions. The Chartist movement came to an end in 1848. Subsequently the Reform Bills of 1867 and 1884-85 "transformed the essentially oligarchic England of William IV's time into "the crowned republic" whose praises Tennyson sang." The old feudal landmarks and distinctions gradually disappeared, and the growth of sympathy between man and man and class and class was evident. With the expansion of democratic and humanitarian ideals popular education also spread, which provided proper opportunities for personal development to all. Journalism also became popular. The literature of their period derived greater energy and driving power from the democratic and humanitarian ideals. Carlyle, Ruskin, Dickens, Kingsley and even Mrs. Browning were deeply influenced by these ideals.

Women's liberation also characterised the Victorian epoch. Women were given political rights, and more and more of them came out of their homes to take up independent careers.

(vii) The Impact of Science: The progress of science kept pace with the progress of democracy. Due to the spread of popular education, newspapers, magazines and cheap books, the facts and speculations of scientists and thinkers passed rapidly into the possession of the reading public at large. The doctrine of evolution which is generally associated with the names of Darwin, Wallace and Herbert Spencer had completely revolutionised all current ideas about nature, man and society. Faith in the Biblical view of cosmology and creation was shaken, and was replaced by the Darwinian theory of revolution through struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest.

The impact of science was so powerful on human mind that it had affected every channel of intellectual activity. It influenced human thought in two ways. First, it had fostered a spirit of restlessness; for by increasing man's material resources, it had commercialised human life at the cost of religious and spiritual values. Carlyle and Ruskin condemned growing materialism. Carlyle proclaimed the insufficiency of existing social ideals. The general spiritual unrest is voiced most remarkably in mid-Victorian poetry. Rickett remarks: "The questioning note in Clough, the pessimism of James Thompson, the wistful melancholy of Matthew Arnold, the fatalism of Fitzerald, all testify to the sceptical tendencies evoked by scientific research. It did not kill poetry but it stifled for a while the lyric impulse and overweighed verse with speculative thought."

The scientific method of observation and critical insight influenced the poetic art of Tennyson and other poets. "In accuracy of detail it would be impossible to rival the scenic descriptions of Tennyson," says Rickett, "whose nature poetry is like the work of an inspired Scientist……."

The scientific spirit is also clearly discernible fiction. The problems of heredity and environment attracted the attention of novelists. Biology, psychology and pathology influenced the works of Charlotte Bronte, Dickens, Kingsley and Reade, who deal with social problems. We come across the influence of Herbert Spencer and Comte in the novels of George Eliot. The analytical methods of science were more subtly followed by George Eliot and Hardy.

(viii) Revival of Interest in the Past: Though the Victorians were interested in contemporary social and political life, they still had a fascination for the old ages. Some of the writers and poets had romantic thirst for beauty, love and art. The Pre-Raphaelites remained unaffected by the sweeping tide of realism in fiction and they were attracted towards the Middle Ages. In the sphere of religion Keble and Newman pioneered the Oxford Movement which was based on spiritual romanticism. Just as Romanticism went back to old traditions and feelings in the same way the Oxford reforms refreshed religious life by a return to the past. Pater and Oscar Wilde were the pioneers of the Aesthetic Movement, which was a reaction against utilitarianism and pessimism. Cazamian explains that the spirit of Romanticism continues to influence the innermost consciousness of the age which sees a Tennyson, a Thackeray, a Browning and an Arnold, it permeates every thought just as it colours almost every mode of expression.

Even its adversaries and even those who would escape its spell are impregnated with it. England, like Europe, is not yet entirely free from the predominant influence of Romanticism; she still witnessing the development of its effects."

CHARLES DICKENS; 1812-1870

Charles Dickens was born in Portsmouth, England in 1812. As the second of eight children in a very poor family, he lived a difficult childhood. Eventually, his father was sent to debtor's prison, and Dickens himself went to work at the age of twelve to help pay off the family's debt. This troublesome time scarred Dickens deeply and provided him with substantial material for such stories as Great Expectations, Oliver Twist, and David Copperfield. Steeped in social criticism, Dickens's writing provides a keen, sympathetic chronicle of the plight of the urban poor in nineteenth-century England. During his lifetime, Dickens enjoyed immense popularity, in part because of his vivid characterizations, and in part because he published his novels in installments, making them readily affordable to a greater number of people.

The Industrial Revolution, which swept through Europe in the late eighteenth century, originated in England. The rapid modernization of the English economy involved a shift from rural handicraft to large-scale factory labor. Technological innovations facilitated unprecedented heights of manufacture and trade, and England left behind its localized, cottage-industry economy to become a centralized, hyper-capitalist juggernaut of mass production. In tandem with this transformation came a significant shift in the nation's demographics. English cities swelled as a growing and impoverished working class flocked to them in search of work. As this influx of workers into urban centers continued, the bourgeoisie took advantage of the surplus of labor by keeping wages low. The poor thus remained poor, and often lived cramped in squalor. In many of his novels, Dickens chronicles his protagonists' attempts to fight their way out of such poverty and despair.

A Tale of Two Cities, originally published from April through November of 1859, appeared in a new magazine that Dickens had created called All the Year Round. Dickens started this venture after a falling-out with his regular publishers. Indeed, this period in Dickens's life saw many changes. While starring in a play by Wilkie Collins entitled The Frozen Deep, Dickens fell in love with a young actress named Ellen Ternan. Dickens's twenty-three-year marriage to Catherine Hogarth had become a source of unhappiness in recent years, and, by 1858, Hogarth had moved out of Dickens's home. The author arranged to keep Ternan in a separate residence.

Dickens's participation in Collins's play led not only to a shift in his personal life, but also to a career development, for it was this play that first inspired him to write A Tale of Two Cities. In the play, Dickens played the part of a man who sacrifices his own life so that his rival may have the woman they both love; the love triangle in the play became the basis for the complex relations between Charles Darnay, Lucie Manette, and Sydney Carton in A Tale of Two Cities. Moreover, Dickens appreciated the play for its treatment of redemption and rebirth, love and violence. He decided to transpose these themes onto the French Revolution, an event that embodied the same issues on a historical level. In order to make his novel historically accurate, Dickens turned to Thomas Carlyle's account of the revolution. Contemporaries had considered Carlyle's version to be the first and last word on the French peasants' fight for freedom.

Dickens had forayed into historical fiction only once before, with Barnaby Rudge (1841), and the project proved a difficult undertaking. The vast scope and somewhat grim aspects of his historical subject forced Dickens largely to abandon the outlandish and often comic characters that had come to define his writing. Although Jerry Cruncher and Miss Pross embody some typically Dickensian quirks—exaggerated mannerisms, idiosyncratic speech—they play only minor roles in the novel. While critics continue to debate the literary merits of the novel, no one denies the light that the novel sheds on Dickens's development as a novelist. More experimental than the novels that precede it, A Tale of Two Cities shows its author in transition. Dickens would emerge from this transition as a mature artist, ready to write Great Expectations (1860–1861) and Our Mutual Friend (1864–1865).

Literary & Historical Information:A Tale of Two Cities

A Tale of Two Cities is a popular, historic novel set in London and Paris before and during the French Revolution. It was initially published as a serial in the weekly entitled All Year Round, from April 30 to November 29, 1859. The novel concentrates on the social and psychological crises more than on a retelling of the actual historical event of the war. Dickens' vision of the Terror encompasses aristocratic exploitation and neglect of the poor, public bloodshed, and private vengeance.

Dickens' source of the French Revolution is undoubtedly Thomas Carlyle's monumental work, The French Revolution. He is also indebted to Bulwer-Lytton's novel Zanoni and Watt Philips' play The Dead Heart, both having the French Revolution as their background. Even though Dickens relied upon other works, his vision and view in A Tale of Two Cities are clearly his own. He expresses his views most clearly when he shows how uncaring the aristocrats were to the plight of common people. But he is able to shift his sympathy away from the mob of French patriot revolutionaries to the plight of the aristocrats and their families. His dislike of the mob is seen in an earlier historical novel, Barnaby Rudge. There the mob storms the Newgate Prison, but the authorities are able to quell the violence. The vengeful, bloodthirsty mob that storms the Bastille cannot be restrained.

Dickens handles the historic event with maturity. He reveals the similarity between the behaviors of both aristocrats and the revolutionaries. Dr. Manette is thrown into prison without reason or trial in the same way that the patriots send innocent people, like Darnay or the seamstress, to death by the guillotine without a fair trial.

There is an autobiographical element in the story, for Dickens identifies himself with both Dr. Manette and Sydney Carton. He was in love with Ellen Terman, and the way Carton worships Lucie is the way Dickens loved Ellen. Like Dr. Manette, Dickens lived in two worlds--one of stark reality that he chose to forget and an imaginary one that made his bad experiences more acceptable.

The novel displays several literary influences. Dickens refers to classical legend in the chapter titled "The Gorgon's Head." His themes and characters also seem to be influenced by the Bible, especially the New Testament and its concepts of resurrection and redemption. He finally draws on the techniques used in folklore, fairy tales, and fable to enrich the descriptive passages. The symbols, allegory, and irony thus become more effective.

Revolutions have occurred ever since the first oppressed people became tired of their tyrannical rulers. They have been the cry of the downtrodden since the beginning of time, symbolizing hope for a better future. The French Revolution, which occurred from 1789 until 1799, violently transformed France from a country ruled by a monarch with a rigid social hierarchy into a modern nation where the social structure was loosened and power passed increasingly to the middle classes. The weakness of King Louis XVI is regarded as a crucial factor that started the revolution. He ignored individual rights, rich and poor alike. During his reign, the ordinary French person was very poor, and food became scarce and expensive. The agricultural recession in 1776 forced property owners to exploit their sources of revenue; but the growing middle class threatened the established landed aristocracy. When the lower classes refused to pay more taxes, the royal ministers attempted to tax all landowners. This plan led to the Aristocratic Revolt. Their first meeting in 1789, in Versailles, was paralyzed because the Third Estate (the Commons) refused to meet separately as a distinct inferior body. On June 17, the Commons took the very important revolutionary step of declaring their assembly to be the National Assembly and thus the States-General was destroyed. They asserted their power, and to show who really was in control, the people of Paris stormed the Bastille on July 14. Riots broke out everywhere. The failure of the 1788 harvest and an exceptionally severe winter aggravated the discontent of the peasants. They robbed and burned the chateaux of the aristocracy and destroyed all records. This episode is known as the Grande Peur (Great Fear).

The National Assembly established a new legal structure; privileges and feudal obligations were abolished. On August 4, a Declaration of Rights was formulated and the king was the chief executive power, but he had no legislative power except a suspensive veto. Louis XVI was reluctant to sanction the new decrees, and this led to the second Parisian uprising--the so-called March of the Women. On October 5, a mob marched to Versailles and forced the king to sign. The king and the queen, Marie Antoinette, were moved to Paris, followed by the Assembly. France became a constitutional monarchy, and legal distinctions between Frenchmen disappeared. From 1789 to 1791, the National Assembly did much to modernize France. However, the reformed franchise excluded the poor. But the people had faith in freedom as shown in the first Festival of Federation, a celebration of National Unity on July 14, 1790, Bastille Day.

When King Louis tried to escape from Paris on June 20, 1791), civil war was imminent. The Assembly retained control, and the crowd that had assembled in Paris to demand a republic was dispersed by force. In 1791, the king was reinstated after he accepted the completed Constitution. The Revolution was then believed to be over. This, however, was not true, as religious and social strife had already broken the unity of the Third Estate.

On April 20, 1792, the New Legislative Assembly declared war on Austria as King Louis was believed to have asked them for help to stop the revolution. Austrian and Prussian forces invaded France, and riots broke out in Paris. On August 10, the palace was stormed, and Louis was imprisoned by a new revolutionary Commune of Paris. The Legislative Assembly now did not have any power and so ordered an election. Counter revolutionaries were massacred in the prisons of Paris.

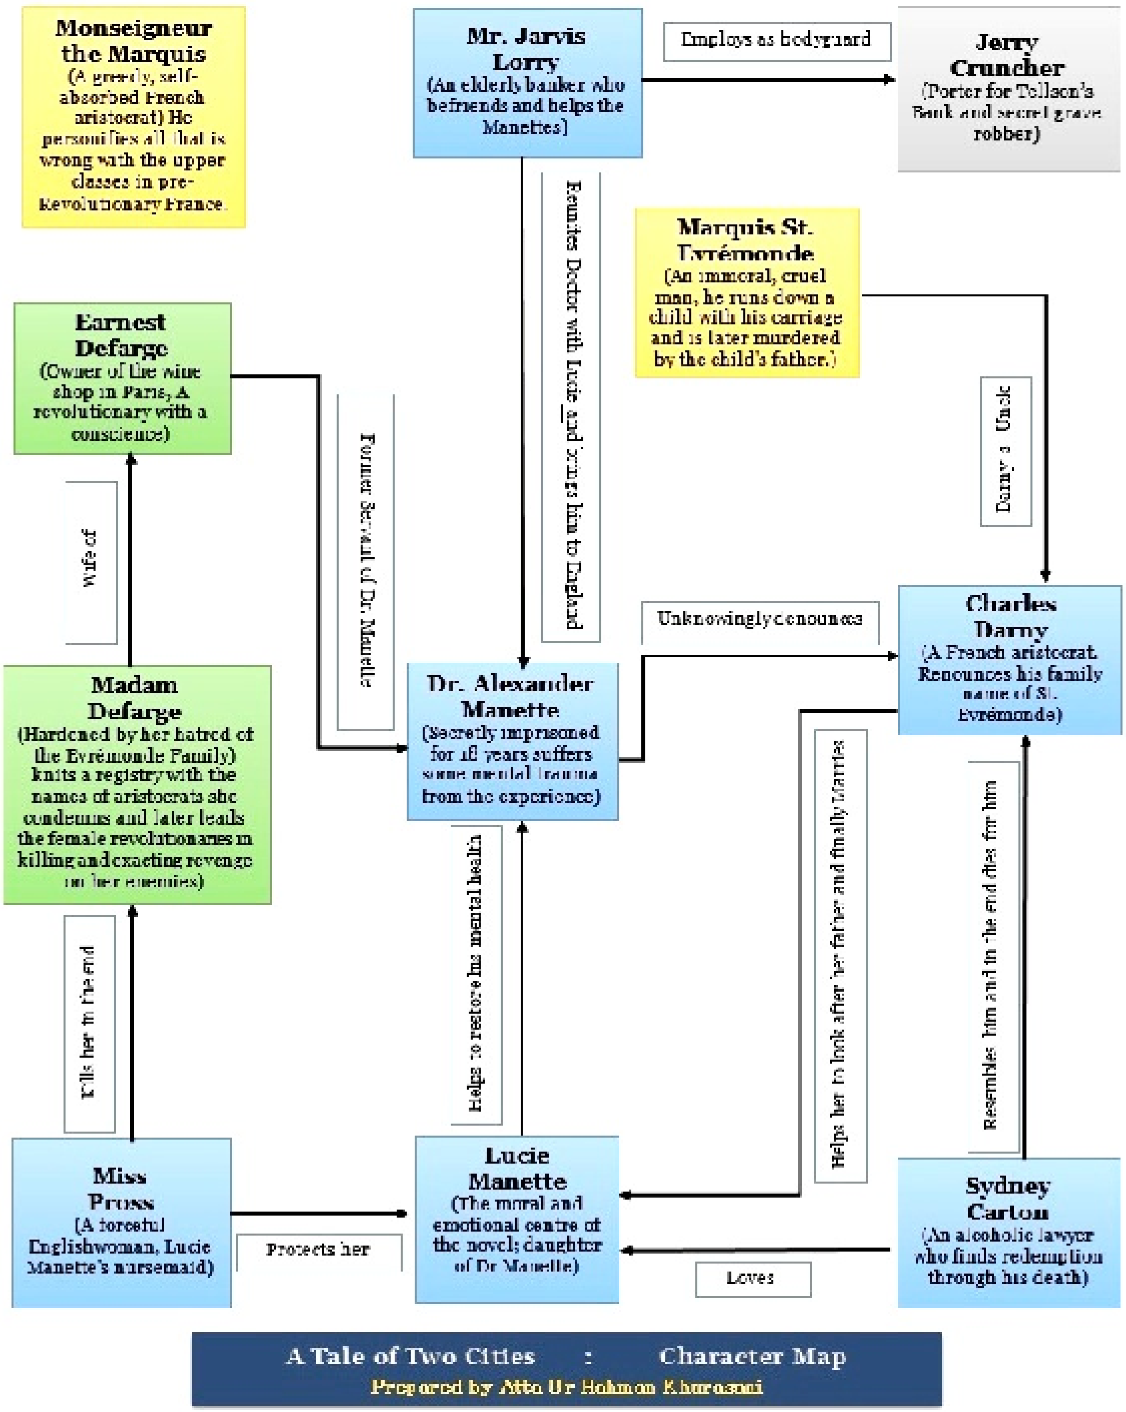
On September 22, 1792, the National Convention established a republic, and the king was sent to the guillotine on January 21, 1793. France was divided by a militant minority comprised of the Monteguards and the Jacobins who wanted to take vigorous revolutionary measures, while their opponents, the Girondists, leaders of the amorphous majority, looked to the Provinces and hoped to consolidate the Revolution. In 1793, a savage royalist uprising commenced, and the hard-core revolutionaries began to gain ground. Emergency bodies were set up, but there was no leadership and the Parisian insurrection of June 2 forced the Convention to expel the Girondists and accept Monteguard control. The Reign of Terror lasted from 1793 until 1794. The Monteguard Convention had to deal with invasion, royalist civil war, and widespread revolts in the provinces. At first George Danton tried to placate the provinces, who were revolting against the dictatorship of Paris, but later Maxmillian Robespierre sent armies to subdue the rebellious cities. The city of Toulon surrendered to the British, and a demonstration in Paris forced the National Convention to establish a repressive regime known as the Terror. The Revolutionary Tribunal sent state prisoners, including Girondists, to the guillotine and agents of the Convention known as representatives of the people enforced bloody repression throughout France. The churches were closed on November 23, 1793. The republican armies were now in command, and the Terror became identified with ruthless and centralized revolutionary government. Any dissidence was classified as counter revolutionary, and Monteguards and extremists were guillotined early in 1794. Robespierre insisted on associating Terror with virtue, and his effort to make the republic a morally united patriotic community became equated with the endless bloodshed. Robespierre was overthrown by a conspiracy of certain members of the National Convention on July 27, 1794. The Robespierrist deputies and most members of the Commune were guillotined the next day, July 28.

The period from 1794 to 1795 of the Thermidorian Reaction was so weak that anarchy and inflation almost overwhelmed the country. However, the extreme republicans could achieve nothing, and the Convention broke the popular movement permanently with the aid of the army. The Constitution was completed in 1795, and it took effect after a reactionary rising in Vendemiare was suppressed by General Napoleon Bonaparte. The Constitution of 1795 established an executive directory, two assemblies, and a property owner's franchise. Care was taken to see that the country could not revert to either democratic Terror or monarchy. In 1797 the directors purged the parliament ruthlessly. Many deputies were labeled as royalists and sent to the penal colony of French Guinea--called the dry guillotine. Soon the moderates were outnumbered, and in 1799, the Consulate, with Bonaparte as the First Consul, was established. The revolutionary period ended with the creation of the First Empire, which lasted from 1804 until 1815.

The French Revolution

Dickens relied heavily on Thomas Carlyle's The French Revolution when writing A Tale of Two Cities, but he also assumes a certain amount of familiarity with the history of the Revolution. Because the novel is in large measure a historical novel, it is important to be aware of the background against which his characters are acting.

The causes of the French Revolution, which began in 1789, are still debated by historians. Louis XIV had consolidated absolute rule for the French monarchy, and France was governed by the nobility (Monsiegneur's class) and the clergy. The country ran into huge debt due to an archaic system of taxation and the government's financial support of the American Revolution. Because of financial difficulties, the King was forced to call the States-General (the French legislature) in 1789 for the first time since 1614.



The Third Estate (commons) proclaimed themselves the National Assembly and took an oath in a tennis court that they would not disband until they had drawn up a constitution. On July 14, Parisians attacked the Bastille, a symbol of the other two estates (nobility and clergy). The people were mobilized by hunger and fear of retaliation by the nobles and moved to burn down chateaux belonging to noblemen (like Dickens's fictional Monsiegneur's) in what was known as the grandepeur ("great fear"). Riots and looting were rampant. A constitution created in 1791 created a limited monarchy with an elected one-body legislature. The king and queen tried to escape but were caught. They returned to Versailles and, humiliated, accepted the constitution. The Jacobin party was on the rise and "Liberty, equality, fraternity" became a catchphrase.

France declared war on Austria, and rumors that the king was guilty of treason turned the people against him. In 1792 a second revolution created the Commune of Paris, which suspended the power of the king and prompted arrests of suspected royalists. The September Massacres occurred thereafter, when mobs murdered 2,000 of these prisoners. The Republic was declared in 1792, and it became increasingly radicalized until Maximilien Robespierre took control and instituted the Reign of Terror, in which many were guillotined including the king and queen. The Revolution drew to a close with the death by guillotine of Robespierre himself in 1794 and the rise to power of Napoleon.

A Tale of Two Cities : Plot Overview

The year is 1775, and social ills plague both France and England. Jerry Cruncher, an odd-job man who works for Tellson's Bank, stops the Dover mail-coach with an urgent message for Jarvis Lorry. The message instructs Lorry to wait at Dover for a young woman, and Lorry responds with the cryptic words, "Recalled to Life." At Dover, Lorry is met by Lucie Manette, a young orphan whose father, a once-eminent doctor whom she supposed dead, has been discovered in France. Lorry escorts Lucie to Paris, where they meet Defarge, a former servant of Doctor Manette, who has kept Manette safe in a garret. Driven mad by eighteen years in the Bastille, Manette spends all of his time making shoes, a hobby he learned while in prison. Lorry assures Lucie that her love and devotion can recall her father to life, and indeed they do.

The year is now 1780. Charles Darnay stands accused of treason against the English crown. A bombastic lawyer named Stryver pleads Darnay's case, but it is not until his drunk, good-for-nothing colleague, Sydney Carton, assists him that the court acquits Darnay. Carton clinches his argument by pointing out that he himself bears an uncanny resemblance to the defendant, which undermines the prosecution's case for unmistakably identifying Darnay as the spy the authorities spotted. Lucie and Doctor Manette watched the court proceedings, and that night, Carton escorts Darnay to a tavern and asks how it feels to receive the sympathy of a woman like Lucie. Carton despises and resents Darnay because he reminds him of all that he himself has given up and might have been.

In France, the cruel Marquis Evrémonde runs down a plebian child with his carriage. Manifesting an attitude typical of the aristocracy in regard to the poor at that time, the Marquis shows no regret, but instead curses the peasantry and hurries home to his chateau, where he awaits the arrival of his nephew, Darnay, from England. Arriving later that night, Darnay curses his uncle and the French aristocracy for its abominable treatment of the people. He renounces his identity as an Evrémonde and announces his intention to return to England. That night, the Marquis is murdered; the murderer has left a note signed with the nickname adopted by French revolutionaries: "Jacques."

A year passes, and Darnay asks Manette for permission to marry Lucie. He says that, if Lucie accepts, he will reveal his true identity to Manette. Carton, meanwhile, also pledges his love to Lucie, admitting that, though his life is worthless, she has helped him dream of a better, more valuable existence. On the streets of London, Jerry Cruncher gets swept up in the funeral procession for a spy named Roger Cly. Later that night, he demonstrates his talents as a "Resurrection-Man," sneaking into the cemetery to steal and sell Cly's body. In Paris, meanwhile, another English spy known as John Barsad drops into Defarge's wine shop. Barsad hopes to turn up evidence concerning the mounting revolution, which is still in its covert stages. Madame Defarge sits in the shop knitting a secret registry of those whom the revolution seeks to execute. Back in London, Darnay, on the morning of his wedding, keeps his promise to Manette; he reveals his true identity and, that night, Manette relapses into his old prison habit of making shoes. After nine days, Manette regains his presence of mind, and soon joins the newlyweds on their honeymoon. Upon Darnay's return, Carton pays him a visit and asks for his friendship. Darnay assures Carton that he is always welcome in their home.

The year is now 1789. The peasants in Paris storm the Bastille and the French Revolution begins. The revolutionaries murder aristocrats in the streets, and Gabelle, a man charged with the maintenance of the Evrémonde estate, is imprisoned. Three years later, he writes to Darnay, asking to be rescued. Despite the threat of great danger to his person, Darnay departs immediately for France.

As soon as Darnay arrives in Paris, the French revolutionaries arrest him as an emigrant. Lucie and Manette make their way to Paris in hopes of saving him. Darnay remains in prison for a year and three months before receiving a trial. In order to help free him, Manette uses his considerable influence with the revolutionaries, who sympathize with him for having served time in the Bastille. Darnay receives an acquittal, but that same night he is arrested again. The charges, this time, come from Defarge and his vengeful wife. Carton arrives in Paris with a plan to rescue Darnay and obtains the help of John Barsad, who turns out to be Solomon Pross, the long-lost brother of Miss Pross, Lucie's loyal servant.

At Darnay's trial, Defarge produces a letter that he discovered in Manette's old jail cell in the Bastille. The letter explains the cause of Manette's imprisonment. Years ago, the brothers Evrémonde (Darnay's father and uncle) enlisted Manette's medical assistance. They asked him to tend to a woman, whom one of the brothers had raped, and her brother, whom the same brother had stabbed fatally. Fearing that Manette might report their misdeeds, the Evrémondes had him arrested. Upon hearing this story, the jury condemns Darnay for the crimes of his ancestors and sentences him to die within twenty-four hours. That night, at the Defarge's wine shop, Carton overhears Madame Defarge plotting to have Lucie and her daughter (also Darnay's daughter) executed as well; Madame Defarge, it turns out, is the surviving sibling of the man and woman killed by the Evrémondes. Carton arranges for the Manettes' immediate departure from France. He then visits Darnay in prison, tricks him into changing clothes with him, and, after dictating a letter of explanation, drugs his friend unconscious. Barsad carries Darnay, now disguised as Carton, to an awaiting coach, while Carton, disguised as Darnay, awaits execution. As Darnay, Lucie, their child, and Dr. Manette speed away from Paris, Madame Defarge arrives at Lucie's apartment, hoping to arrest her. There she finds the supremely protective Miss Pross. A scuffle ensues, and Madame Defarge dies by the bullet of her own gun. Sydney Carton meets his death at the guillotine, and the narrator confidently asserts that Carton dies with the knowledge that he has finally imbued his life with meaning.

A Tale of Two Cities - Critical Analysis

In 1859, Charles Dickens wrote the book A Tale of Two Cities. In A Tale, Dickens writes about the French Revolution, and relates the events in the lives of two families, one French and one English. In addition to writing about a very interesting fiction plot, Dickens also tied in a wide variety of important themes and sub plots that keep the reader interested as well as portraying very valuable lessons for us even today. He chose very archetypical characters for the book, all strengthening or portraying one of the themes. The main themes are revenge, courage and sacrifice, and resurrection.

One theme involves revenge; the evil effects of revenge bring out one's bad side. Although it occurs many times in A Tale, Madame Defarge is the main character representing this theme. Her sister and mother were assaulted by the brothers Evrémonde. After this, she vows to herself that all members of the Evrémonde family will die. She turns into a ruthless killer because she must get revenge. When her husband tells her to stop, she replies, "tell the wind and fire to stop, not me". We now see that she is a person teeming with hatred. Revenge is so powerful. When she found out Charles Darnay is an Evrémonde and is planning to marry Lucie Manette, she began to knit his name into the shroud she was making, symbolizing his impending death. Also, she tried to kill Lucie and her daughter, just because they were related to an Evrémonde, even though Darnay (Evrémonde) denounced his heritage and disconnected all relationships to them. Lucie was in a state of mourning so Defarge jumped on the situation.

"She will be at home, awaiting the moment of his death. She will be mourning and grieving. She will be in a state of mind to impeach the justice of the Republic. She will be full of sympathy with its enemies. I will go to her." (p. 349)

She had no mercy, her main goal was to kill all descendants of the Evrémonde family, women and children included and even non-blood relatives. At the end of the novel, she receives an end fitting her ways; she was killed by Ms. Pross, who is the epitome of love and kindness. It is evident from here that Dickens believed that good would always win over bad. Madame Defarge was going to kill out of hate and revenge, but she got killed because of the love Ms. Pross had for her friend Lucie.

Another key theme in the novel has to do with courage and sacrifice. There were many sacrifices in this novel by many different characters. Charles Darnay went back into the war-torn France from his safe house and family in England to save his former servant Gabelle from the hands of the rebels. He did this, for the simple reason that he gave his promise, many months ago. Also, Dr Manette 'sacrifices' his love for her for her love to Darnay. After the wedding, we see how much Lucie means to Dr Manette in his return to cobbling shoes.

Sydney Carton made the ultimate sacrifice. Because of his love for Lucie and his friendship with Darnay, Carton's actions portray one of the most important themes implied in this book. Carton helps others, and does not think so much of himself. As we first see Sydney Carton, he is a lazy man, who drinks his life away. However there is more to him as he said "I cause no harm to any man on earth, and no man on earth cares for me" (page 99). He does not like the other people's view of him, and he wants to change it. When Darnay was sent to the guillotine, Carton could have let him go, and possibly have Lucie for himself. However, he ended up being the true hero, and sacrificed his life for the life of another, in the name of love. Right before going to the guillotine, Carton visualizes a better life, a life where he gave to others, not thinking of himself. It shows the complete turn-a-round in his view of life for the better. Sydney Carton is really a courageous, loving man.

The final main theme in the book is the idea of resurrection. Book one of A Tale is entitled 'Recalled to Life'. This shows resurrection being a major theme. An example of this is Dr Manette's resurrection after being in prison for nearly eighteen years of mental torment, and when he got out, he was asked the question, "you know that you are recalled to life". We know that he has been, as he no longer refers to himself as "105 North Tower". He is spiritually resurrected with his daughter when they first meet. Lucie forms a relationship with him, which gives Dr. Manette a sense of pride.

"The Doctor was in his best condition, and looked especially young. The resemblance between him and Lucie was very strong at such times, and as they sat side by side, she leaning on his shoulder, and he resting his arm on the back of her chair, it was very agreeable to trace the likeness".

Throughout the novel, Dr. Manette has gone through several mentally tragic episodes. Every time he goes into a relapse, Lucie is the only one that can help him regain normalcy. Darnay also took a part in this theme of resurrection. Charles Darnay's soul had been spiritually resurrected and saved from being killed. Due to being an Evrémonde and for portraying his own family, he was tried and sentenced to death by the guillotine. Dr Manette tried to save Darnay many times, though Barsad would always seem to find a way to get him back to prison and succeeded in sentencing him to death. When the final day of Darnay's life came, it turned out a happy one for him, "The door was quickly opened and closed, and there stood before him face to face, quiet, intent, upon him, with the light of a smile on his features, and a cautionary finger on his lip, Sydney Carton". Sydney Carton, who resembled Darnay very closely, exchanged places with him. Feigning illness, Darnay was thus snuck out of prison, and physically resurrected.

Often when reading a book, the individual tends to draw parallels in the literature. One parallel often used is the difference between the beginning and ending of the book. A Tale of Two Cities began and ended with a journey. In the second chapter of the novel, Jarvis Lorry travels to recall Dr. Manette to life. In the end of the book, Sydney Carton is taken to his death, because of Defarge's revenge. He saved his friends life. Lorry began with the theme of resurrection, and Carton finished off with the theme of sacrifice, dying because of revenge.

Themes of "A Tale of Two Cities"

Themes are the fundamental and often universal ideas explored in a literary work. The ever present possibility of Resurrection with A Tale of Two Cities Dickens asserts his belief in the possibility of resurrection and transformation both on a personal level and on a societal level. The narrative suggests that Sydney Carton's death secures a new peaceful life for Lucie Manette, Charles Darnay, and even Carton himself. By delivering himself to the guillotine, Carton ascends to the plane of heroism, becoming a Christ-like figure whose death serves to save the lives of others. His own life thus gains meaning and value. Moreover, the final pages of the novel suggest that, like Christ, Carton will be resurrected-Carton is reborn in the hearts of those he has died to save.

Two of the most outstanding and obvious themes in this novel are resurrection and renunciation. Resurrection appears here in several forms. Dickens elaborates his theme with the character of Doctor Manette. Early on in the novel, Lorry holds on imaginary conversation with him in which he says that Manette has been "recalled to life". As this statement implies, the doctor's eighteen-year imprisonment has constituted a death of sorts. Lucie's love enables Manette's spiritual renewal, and her maternal cradling of him on her breast reinforces this notion of rebirth.

The theme of resurrection is introduced at the very beginning when Mr. Lorry, who is travelling by the Mail-coach to Dover, sends a message to Tellson's Bank through the messenger, Jerry Cruncher. The words of Mr. Lorry's message are "Recalled to life." Under the circumstances, to bring Dr. Manette to England and to enable him to live again as a free man is nothing short of recalling him to life. It is truly a resurrection or a rebirth after death for Dr. Manette.

But a second resurrection for Dr. Manette has yet to take place. Dr. Manette cannot lead a normal life or enjoy his new found freedom unless he recovers his sanity. Under the loving care of his daughter, Dr. Manette begins to improve both physically and mentally. This, then, is Dr. Manette's second resurrection. If his release is a physical resurrection for him, his recovery from insanity under the care of his daughter is a mental resurrection for him. Then Charles Darnay is saved from the jaws of death at least three times,once at Old Bailey and twice in Paris after his trials by the Revolutionary Tribunal.

The necessity of sacrifice connected to the theme of the possibility of resurrection is the notion that sacrifice is necessary to achieve happiness. Dickens examines this second theme, again on both a national and personal level. For example the revolutionaries prove that a new, egalitarian French republic can come about only with a heavy and terrible cost-personal loves and loyalties must be sacrificed for the good of the nation. Also, when Darnay is arrested for the second time, in book the third chapter the guard who seizes him reminds Manette of the primacy of state interests over personal loyalties. Moreover, Madame Defarge gives her husband a similar lesson when she chastises him for his devotion to Manette an emotion that, in her opinion only clouds his obligation to the revolutionary cause. Most important, Carton's transformation into a man of moral worth depends upon his sacrificing of his former self. In choosing to die for his friends, Carton not only enables their happiness but also ensures his spiritual rebirth.

Among the obvious themes of this novel is social injustice. This theme is related, of course, to the French Revolution which was largely a result of those oppressive conditions under which the common people in France had been living for many decades. The first glimpse of the prevailing social injustice in France is given to us in the chapter called "The Wine - Shop"."A large cask of wine had been dropped and broken in the street."

After briefly describing the scene of poverty, the author goes on to describe the hunger which was rampant among the inhabitants of Paris"Hunger was pushed out of the tall houses."

Hunger was prevalent everywhere, says the author. The incident of a child being run over by the Marquis's carriage and getting killed also points to conditions of social injustice.

"That you people cannot take care of yourselves and your children ………. He threw out a gold coin for the valet to pick up ………… The tall man called out again with a most unearthly cry, "Dead!"

The Marquis throws a gold coin towards the bereaved father as if that would compensate him for the death of his child. The Marquis' attitude towards the widow who meets him on his way is another example of the gulf between the rich and the poor, between the privileged classes and the common people. But the most shocking example of social injustice in those times is the prolonged imprisonment of Dr. Manette."Did you ask me for my name?" … Assuredly I did."…"One Hundred and Five, North Tower."

It shows how much influence the members of aristocratic and titled families wielded in those days at the royal court and with the government ministers, and how ordinary people were victimized by them."To destroy the corrupt old world, they must seize absolute power. Yet absolute power is unjust, corrupt by nature."

The French Revolution and the violence and bloodshed led to constitute another obvious theme. Without any direct analysis of the Revolution, Dickens succeeds in conveying us the logic of cause and effect. The Revolution took place because of the conditions of social injustice which prevailed exercised by the government over the common people to whose needs it had become completely indifferent. The revolutionary scenes and episodes show clearly Dickens' view that, when the common people acquire unlimited power, they are capable of becoming as ruthless and cruel as the privileged classes had previously been. The revolutionary mob in the novel goes to the extreme and commits kinds of excesses.

The excesses come afterwards when for instance; eleven hundred persons are butchered by the mobs during a period of four days and four nights. The excesses are represented by two blood-curdling incidents, the sharpening of swords, knives etc. by a crowd of people on a grindstone, and the dancing of the Carmagnole. The obvious inference from these scenes and accounts is that revolution is a monster which should be shunned and that the only way in which it can be avoided is that the rich people should realize their responsibility towards the poor and take the necessary steps to relieve the misery of the poor before it is too late. Thus the novel contains an implied warning to the rulers and the privileged classes of all countries.

Coming to the less obvious themes, we find that much of Dickens' own life and experience in the past as well as at the time of his writing this novel has gone into the making of it."A Tale of Two Cities" equal history plus Dickens".

A Tale of two cities is deeply coloured by Dickens's early experiences in life and by what was happening to his emotional life when he started writing his novel. His childhood, like many of those portrayed in his novels, was not a particularly happy one, owing in the main of his father's inability to stay out of debt. This led in 1824, to his father's imprisonment. Memories of this time haunted him for the rest of his life.

Early in his life he had been a helpless and miserable witness to be imprisonment of his father, and this imprisonment had left an unforgettable impression upon his mind.

Dickens elaborates his theme with the character of Doctor Manette. Early on in his novel, Lorry holds an imaginary conversation with him in which he says that Manette has been "Recalled to Life". As this statement implies, the doctor's eighteenth-years imprisonment has constituted a death of sorts, Lucie's love enables Manette's spiritual renewal and her maternal cradling of him on her breast reinforces this notion of rebirth.

The two lovers of Lucie seem to symbolize the duality in Dickens's own heart. Darnay and Carton who physically resemble each other were self-projections by Dickens. These two men represent the two different sides of Dickens's literary personality. Darnay represents the light, sunny and optimistic aspect of Dickens nature.

Carton, on the other hand represents the dark side of Dickens. Carton loves Lucie but at first he denies her by describing her as "a golden haired doll" and then he fails to claim her.

Madness is also a theme in this novel. Dr. Manette goes mad during the long years of his imprisonment. After he has been rescued, he is brought back to health through love and care. This recurrence of madness is a doubling of the original condition, and it produces a feeling that one is never to be free. Doubling in this sense and in several senses is part to the structure of this novel.

Other examples of this kind of doubling are Darnay's double arrest, and the sudden announcement that Dr. Manette is one of the three persons who have denounced Darnay. The latter development is a notable irony because Dr. Manette had earlier been represented as an innocent man who had suffered a gross injustice. These cases of doubling symbolically represent examples of the contradictory nature of subjective experience even of the self, in relation to events. Certainly Dr. Manette had as much reason to curse the Evrémonde race as to protect his son-in-law.

Symbolism in "A Tale of Two Cities"

The word `symbolism' refers most specifically to a manner of representation in which what is shown (normally referring to something material) means by virtue of association, something more, or something else (normally referring to something immaterial).Anything that signifies something is a symbol. Even a word may be symbol. What a simple word or even a long sentence or a paragraph or even a whole poem cannot do what a symbol can. A symbol, thus, connotes (indicate) a huge corpus (quantity) of thought. Charles Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities is replete with symbols.

Let us review some of the major symbols of A Tale of Two Cities. Some of the names of characters in this novel have a symbolical significance. Manette, for example, is the diminutive (miniature) of `man'. A full-blooded `man' is crushed into a Manette. Lucie may mean the luminous one. Evrémonde may mean `everyman'.

Sydney Carton is the symbol of self-sacrifice and service. Charles Darnay symbolises composure (calm, mixture). Lucie stands for sweetness and grace. Jarvis Lorry stands for disinterested service. Stryver symbolizes pomposity (arrogance) and selfishness. Madame Defarge stands for cruelty, revenge and hatred. `Monseigneur' represents decayed aristocracy. Marquis d'Evremonde is the symbol of inhumanity and barbarism.

Blood is a major symbol. Gaspard of Saint Antoine Street dips his fingers in the red-blood wine that has spilt on the street, and scratches the word `Blood' on the wall. Blood becomes the symbol of the French Revolution, the leaders of which forgot the ideals of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity (union) and plunge Paris into a blood-bath. Marquis d'Evremonde watches the blood-red glow of the setting sound. He drives rashly on Saint Antoine Street and Gaspard's son is run over, lying in a pool of blood. The entire atmosphere looks as red as blood when the magnificent Chateau of the Evrémonde is set ablaze. The indiscriminate slaughter and the non-stop use of the guillotine have shed so much human blood.

Water is Dickens' favourite symbol. The water of the river, of the sea, of the fountain, of the reservoir is the elixir of life. At times the water is contaminated and ends the life. Water flows as time flows. In chapter seven of Book Two Dickens comments: "The water of the fountain ran, the swift river ran, the day ran into evening, so much life in the city only ran into death according to rule". Running its own course is the law of nature. The water ran not in the city alone it flows in the village as well.

`Footsteps' is also a recurrent (repeated) image that becomes a symbol. Even in the tranquil atmosphere in Soho Square, London Lucie hears the sound of footsteps, the stampede (charge) of the frenzied (hyperactive) and furious revolutionaries that would not give a moment's rest to the poor Manette, who is destined to suffer.

Right at the beginning of Book one, the Mail Cash bound for Dover is symbolical. The journey is arduous, and has ominous associations. Horses are fighting shy as if they have seen something uncanny. All the passengers wear looks of suspicion and distrust. Even the guard grows suspicious. All things, living and dead, feel that dark days are ahead. And what can be darker than the French Revolution, the activists of which are on the spree (extravaganza) to shed blood.

Dickens uses personal symbols while referring to the woodcutter and the farmer. They are not babblers. They work continuously. They are represented here as not the bringer of fuels and the producer of daily food that sustains us. The woodcutter is the symbol of unchangeable destiny, at whose wish a man may live or die. He represents the inevitability of the Revolution that would overcome mankind. The farmer is the sower of the seeds of death—death that would come in the wake of the Revolution.

The Bastille spreads out before us as Dante's Inferno (firestorm), at the gate of which it is decorated: "Abandon hope, ye all who enter here". Hundreds of innocent men, who have caused the least irritation either to the monarchy or the aristocracy, have been committed to the vast prison with its dark cells to languish (decay) away. The human beings are reduced to mere numbers. Dr. Manette has forgotten his name and become Prisoner No. 105, North Tower. Tyranny, cruelty, injustice, exploitation—these are the vices the Bastille stands for. The Fall of the Bastille on 14 July, 1789 heralds (indicates) the end of tyranny.

The Grindstone is apparently harmless. In reality it is not Dickens who looks upon the grindstone not as a machine for grinding wheat into flour that keeps us alive. Most of the inhabitants of Saint Antoine Street area had to work round the clock at the Mill for their bare subsistence. As the wheat was being crushed by the grindstone, they were also crushed and bled white. Hence the grindstone had a dual role to crush the wheat and also the poor labourers. Child labour was there. Children worked at the Mill and lost their childhood-the period of primal joy, bubbling (sparkling) with life. Dickens must be thinking of his factory days. The Mill and the grindstone have more or less similar functions. Both crush wheat and the labours, children included.

The grindstone during the frenzied (hyperactive) days of the Revolution had another role to play. Men, women and children had to use the grindstone for sharpening not only swords and daggers (blade), but all metallic instruments to be used as improvised (unplanned) weapons to kill the enemies of the people.

La Guillotine becomes the symbol of quick extermination (killing) after summary trial. In the common parlance (idiom, manner of speaking), the guillotine was `the national Razor to behead the aristocrats with. The King and the aristocrats- had their conventional, but lethal weapons for the liquidation (collapse) of the poor and the oppressed. Since the table was turned, the revolutionaries devised a new weapon, namely, the guillotine.

Resurrection is a major symbol. A devout (pious) Christian, Dickens believes in Resurrection. What Sydney Carton heard from the priest, while quite a child, at the funeral of his father—"I am the Resurrection. I am the life," had little meaning for him then. But with the passage of time, particularly when he chooses to be Charles Darnay, he is inspired by the words of Christ, "I am the Resurrection, I am the Life". From the temporary earthly life he is stepping into life eternal. It is Sydney Carton who resurrected Charles at Old Bailey. Dr. Manette is resurrected on his release from the Bastille, and gets a new lease' of life in the company of Lucie. Sydney Carton, who was suffering death-in-life, is resurrected by the profound sympathy and compassion of Lucie. He finds a new meaning in life, a purpose, a mission, to live for, and also to die for. And towards the end Sydney Carton's death and resurrection inspire all even amidst blood and vengeance.

Carmagnole, the frenzied dance of a section of the revolutionaries strikes terror in the delicate heart of the delicate Lucie. Flaunting (showy) their red caps, they gnash (grind) their teeth and sing in prison to give vent (expel) to their excessive joy over their well-organized and yet chaotic victory. What was a symbol of joy to the masses was a symbol of horror to Lucie.

So many symbols are there only to heighten the horrors of the Revolution and the supremacy of Resurrection in the long run.

There is another symbol, not public or conventional, but a personal one. It is the symbol of the lion and the jackal. Stryver is a symbol of pomposity and conceit. A barrister-at-law, he has an extensive practice. He, therefore, calls himself a lion, and Sydney Carton a `jackal'. A lion is the king of animals. Stryver, therefore, prides himself upon describing himself as the king of the beasts. The lion always takes the lion's share and the leavings are shared by the lioness, the cubs, and when practically nothing is left in the carcass (skeleton) the timid jackal steps in. Carton is far more talented and intelligent than Stryver. It is he who, with his quick perception and critical acumen (intelligence) easily solves the intriguing problems of the clients. Stryver owes his success to Carton. Stryver, in the fitness of things, takes more than the lion's share, and Carton, who has absolutely no material ambition, is thoroughly satisfied with wine that Stryver provides. Stryver does not understand that he is "stout fond bluff'. An egocentric person, he does not understand that his assistant, `the jackal' is the source of his professional success. He with his usual self-complacency claims to be the lion, the patron of Carton. And Carton, the charge, accepts the appellation `jackal'. He has no vanity, no inflated ego. That is why he dances attendance upon Stryver, as a jackal does upon the lion. We, however, feel that the position should have been reversed. But the jackal becomes the Christ-like figure and serves not one master, but the whole humanity with love and inspires them to avoid all cruelty and hatred, and make the world a better place to live in.

To sum Up, Dickens has used symbols artistically and significantly in A Tale of Two Cities. The symbols are a part of the plot and they are so well integrated with the theme of Revolution, resurrection and love that they make the novel rich in meaning, significant and dramatic.

A Tale of Two : A Sad Tale of Two Cities

The focus of A Tale of Two Cities concerns the impetus and fervor of 18th century European socio-political turmoil, its consequences, and what Dickens presents as the appropriate response of an enlightened aristocracy and just citizenry.

The tale opens with Dr. Manette having spent the last 18 years of his life in the Bastille - innocent of all crimes save his disdain for the base actions of a French Marquis. The heinous nature of his confinement induced a madness remedied only by the devoted love of his Lucie.

We next encounter these characters five years later attending the trial of Charles Darnay - a nobly born French immigrant who relinquished his station rather than partake in the barbarous class structure of 18th century France.

The beautiful and virtuous Lucie Manette is admired by both Sydney Carton and his repugnant legal partner, Stryver. It is the inherently ethical Carton, not the aristocratic (and bellicose) Stryver who realizes that marriage to Charles Darnay would bring the greatest happiness to Lucie. Their bliss is short lived however,as the honor bound Darnay returns to Paris.

His prosecution is propelled by a vengeful and newly empowered Madame Defarge a "patriot of the revolution" who utilizes the revolutionary "People's Tribunals" to redress grievances committed by the Evrémonde clan. Aided by her cohort (aptly given the code name of "Vengeance") retribution, not justice, is her sole concern. "...I have this race a long time on my register, doomed to destruction and extermination."

This savage character - "Madame's resolute right hand was occupied with an axe,...and in her girdle were a pistol and a cruel knife".- exhibits resolute and ferocious anger.

Dickens does not portray Madame Defarge and her compatriots as morally bankrupt but rather depicts their inevitable creation in the oppressive aristocratic class structure of 18th century Europe. A Tale of Two Cities is written in a perfectly linear progression of this theme. It initially portrays the oppressive nature of the aristocracy (the imprisonment of Dr. Manette, the accidental death of a child and the trite response of the Marquis - among other graphic illustration) which leads to the fervor of revolutionary assassins seeking justice. These zealots empty the Bastille and destroy all remnants of the oppressive regime in freedom's name, yet as products of this abusive system there is hatred latent in their persona. These "patriots" recreate the system which they so despised - "...the new oppressors who have risen on the destruction of the old..." (404); as Madame Defarge, they no longer seek justice but vengeance. The graphic depictions of mob bloodlust hammer this point home.

European aristocratic society is not doomed however. Carton redeems his wasted existence by sacrificing his life for the life of Darnay and thus insures the happiness of his beloved Lucie. This redemption brings honor to his name for generations to come. Charles Darnay's renouncement of his Family's ill-gotten wealth results in his ultimate happiness. The implication is clear: the wastrels of the British aristocracy may yet redeem their virtue and save their love (Mother England) by pursuing societal equity and justice. It is only the noble pursuit of justice which can produce a society of the just. The hatred latent in oppressive societies results only in socio-political turmoil and the manifestation of evil.

Dickens harkens to the moral fiber of Charles Darnay and Sydney Carton as a necessity for the preservation of British society and European aristocracies in general. The heroism displayed by these two characters would avert the horrors of a mob inspired rebellion in England - thus such sacrifices would be - to paraphrase Dickens, a far, far, better thing to do.

"A Tale of Two Cities" equals history plus Dickens."

"A Tale of Two Cities" pertains to the period before and during the French Revolution.Dickens' projection of himself and his personal crisis into the story of this novel is a deeply personal quality (At the time this novel was written, Dickens was passing through a period of acute mental struggle and torture because of the collapse of his married life and his love affair with the young actress Ellen Ternan). At the same time "A Tale of Two Cities" is Dickens most impersonal novel, especially because of the grand objectivity of historical events with which it deals and the steady movement of its action.

It is the story of Dr. Manette, Lucie, Darney, and Carton. This story is told against the historical background of the French Revolution. The French Revolution was the great political upheaval which was caused by the evils of taxation and land-owning system which oppressed the lower classes in France.

"A Tale of Two Cities" is not a particular historical event that is his chosen dramatic setting but rather the relationship between history and evil". In 1792 the monarchy was overthrown and France was declared a Republic with "Liberty, Equality and Fraternity" as its slogan and motto. The Reign of Terror started in 1793, the King and afterwards the Queen becoming the victims of the guillotine. The action of 'A Tale of Two Cities' covers the period from 1775 to 1793 which includes the years of the Revolution (1789-93).

"The human spirit, distorted by systems, produces distorted societies."Carlyle's book "French Revolution is Dickens main source for the historical scenes and events which find a place in 'A Tale of Two Cities'. By the time he wrote 'A Tale of Two Cities' he was interested in history and was convinced of its importance in relation to his own times.

"It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of light, it was the season of darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair, we had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to Heaven, we were all going direct the other way."

Dickens novel does not by any means depict the enormous sweep and drama of the French Revolution in all its complexity. Dickens has condensed the basic threat of the Revolution and the basic lesson that can be drawn from it by depicting the effects of the Terror, or the revengeful side of the Revolution, on a small group of people who get involved in these public events against their will.

In 'A Tale of Two Cities' Dickens depicts the beginnings of popular discontent in France, the rising dissatisfaction of the people with members of the privileged classes the turmoil caused by public fury, and the excesses and barbarities committed by the revolutionaries during the years of the French Revolution. Dickens gives us no connected account of the French Revolution, its progress and its culmination. He gives us brief and scattered accounts of some of the principal episodes. At the same time, Dickens takes no notice of the leading historical personalities of the French Revolution.

"Dickens emphasis is not on physical actions, speeches, battles, riots (the stuff of history) but on the pure passions, the dreams, joys, sorrows and self communings of his imagined characters."

In the first part of his novel Dickens sympathizes with the poor and down trodden people, but in the end these very people became the villains who therefore repel him. Dickens first reference to the outward causes of the French Revolution comes in the chapter called "The Wine shop" in which he uses the symbol of the mill to convey the grinding poverty through which the people of Saint Antoine are passing. Then there are the three chapters in which the arrogance of a particular nobleman is depicted. He also symbolizes the entire privileged class. One of the best known episodes of the French Revolution is then briefly described by Dickens in the chapter entitled "Echoing Footsteps." But the real excesses and brutalities of the French Revolution are conveyed to us in the final part of the novel, where we have a depressing description of the prisoners in La Force, a frightening description of the sharpening of weapons by the revolutionaries on the grindstone.

"To make an omelet you have to break a few eggs."

However, Dickens debt to Carlyle is much greater than has been indicated above. For instance, Dickens accounts of the trials, of prison, procedures, of the tumbrels, and of the guillotine all come from Carlyle.

Dickens main achievement lies not only in giving us graphic and stirring account in the manner of Carlyle, but also in interweaving the personal lives of a group of private characters with the events of the French Revolution. These private individuals are Dr. Manette, Lucie Manette, Darney and Carton, besides such less important figures as Mr. Lorry, Miss Pross, and John Barsad. The leading characters are drawn into the whirlpool of the revolutionary events not because they have any ideological interest in the events of the time but as innocent victims who have done nothing at all to deserve the suffering and distress caused to them. The sentence of death against Darney is most unjust when we realize that he was on the side of the people. He was visiting France briefly in an attempt to save the life of a poor man who was in danger. The others are drawn into the whirlpool for the sake of Darney and Catron's sacrifice of his life and his execution flown primarily from Lucie's involvement.

Although Dickens does not present any systematic theory of the revolution, he certainly reveals a well-defined attitude towards the revolution and seems to have formed certain definite views about it. Dickens was encouraged by Carlyle's views to regard the past primarily as a store house of lessons, and a terrible Moral drama. In writing his novel, he was very particular about integrating the personal lives of his characters with the wider pattern of history. It is the principal scheme of the novel to show the individual fate mirroring and being mirrored by the fate of the social order.

"The rape itself implies social exploitation or oppressing of the messes. The raped girl stands for thousands of unjustly executed victims—an historical fact well documented by Charles Dickens."

The doctor returns to life and finds its place in the new world. And Carton embodies both the novel's central narrative theme and its profoundest moral view: his past of sinful negligence parallels the past of 18th century Europe; his noble death demonstrates the possibility of rebirth through love and expiation. According to one critic:-

"There is no other piece of fiction in which the domestic life of a few simple private people is in such a manner knitted and interwoven with the outbreak of a terrible public even, so that the one seems to be part of the other."

Although Dickens was evidently obsessed with the violence which had erupted during the French Revolution, yet he was by no means a revolutionary himself. He makes it clear that the French Revolution was the natural and inevitable consequence of the social oppression which had continued in France for centuries. It is true that some critics have treated "A Tale of Two Cities" as a work of revolutionary intentions, and have claimed Dickens as one of them. It is also true that Dickens has always been a favourite author with revolutionaries. Both Marx and Engels appreciated his novels and regarded him "As a fellow fighter in the war against the social abuses and injustices of Victorian England."

Madame Defarge is the ultimate personification of the French Revolution in 'A Tale of Two Cities' and she is a person whose uncontrolled desire for revenge has changed her into a monster of pure evil. The final struggle between her and Miss Pros is a contest between the forces of hatred and of love. It is love that wins when Madame Defarge is self-destroyed through the accidental going off of her own pistol. This incident shows that Dickens feels no sympathy whatever for the revolutionaries of Madame Defarge's type.

The actual fact is that Dickens regarded that revolution as a monster. That is why we remember the revolutionary scenes of A Tale of Two Cities, these scenes have the quality of a nightmare, and it is Dickens own nightmare. The moral which Dickens therefore wishes to teach us through his treatment of the French Revolution is that violence leads to violence, that prison is the consequence of prison, and that hatred is the reward of hatred."

He wanted that governments should not allow the people to become so frustrated and angry that they are compelled to revolt and become frustrated and not only violent but ruthlessly violent."Dickens attempts a painterly

A Tale of Two Cities : Story of Vengeance & Blood

In A Tale of Two Cities, Charles Dickens depicts how pointless the revolutionbecomes when the original goal of equality becomes lost when the anger,frustration, and desire for revenge of the third estate is finallydischarged. The trial of Charles Darnay, the words and actions of Madame Defarge and use of symbolism and foreshadowing show how anger drove the revolution to a state of pointlessness.

One major reason the revolution became out of hand was due tounscrupulous people running the courts and the imprisonment of innocentpeople for no reason. Charles Darnay happens to be a character in diretrouble, when he finds himself being imprisoned and tried before an unjusttribunal. Darnay was a wealthy man who left France, but returned to helpa former servant and "was accused by the public prosecutor as an emigrant, whose life was forfeit to the Republic, under the decree which banished all emigrants on pain of Death". One way to impose revengeon the higher classes was to sentence them to death for little or noreason, which was the case with Darnay. At his second trial Darnayrealized that "before the unjust Tribunal, there was little or no orderof procedure, ensuring to any accused person any reasonable hearing.

There could have been no such Revolution, if all laws, forms, andceremonies, had no first been so monstrously abused, that the suicidalvengeance of the Revolution was to scatter them all to the winds.The chaotic and murderous atmosphere within the courts reflected thefrenzied state that lay outside of its dreaded doors. Another example ofrevenge can be seen in the character Madame Defarge.

Madame Defarge represents the people in France who gave in to hate tosatisfy the hurt and pain that had churned inside of them for so long, andis finally released in murder and acts of revenge. She was a womanwithout pity and virtue. It was nothing to her that an innocentman was to die for the sins of his forefathers; she saw, not him, butthem. It was nothing to her that his wife was to be made a widow and hisdaughter an orphan; that was insufficient punishment, because they wereher natural enemies and her prey, and as such had no right to live". Many people showed this same type of vindictiveness, which createda curtain that blocked the original goal of the third estate.

Of course,there is a reason as to why Madame Defarge is the way she is. When MadameDefarge says, " All our lives, we have seen our sister-women suffer, in themselves and in their children, poverty, nakedness, hunger, thirst, sickness, misery, oppression and neglect of all kinds," she isrepresenting all of the pain the third estate had suffered, and why it finally boiled over. Other instances of suffering and pointless actionsinclude the girl who stood by Sydney Carton while waiting to be executed,and a small boy run over by the Monseigneur. Symbolism and foreshadowingalso exhibit the peoples hate and suffering and how it's released inviolence.

A small girl is sentenced to La Guillotine and a boy is run over, bothare actions in which there is no meaning or gain. Neither helps to win the revolution. The girl has faith in the Republic, but questions what willbe gained from killing her.Addressing Sydney Carton she says," I am notafraid to die, Citizen Evrémonde, but I have done nothing. I am notunwilling to die, if the Republic which is to do so much good to us poor,will profit by my death; but I do not know how that can be CitizenEvrémonde". Wine is used to show how bloody and gruesome therevolution would become. When a wine barrel spills, Dickens usessymbolism and foreshadowing of death by writing, "The time was to come, when that wine too would be spilled on the street-stones, and when the stain of it would be red upon many there,".

The French Revolution was fuelled by vengeance and crime. Instead ofsticking together in a mutual quest for equality, people turned againsteach other, and tangled the sticky web of the revolution even more. Although some positive reactions came out of the revolution, "Far and wide lay a ruined country, yielding nothing but desolation. Every green leaf, every blade of grass and blade of grain, was as shrivelled and poor as the miserable people". Everyone makes mistakes, but theimportant thing is to learn from them. Each of us needs to take themistakes of the French Revolution and learn from them, so that theneedless death and suffering doesn't ever repeat itself.

Theme of Love and Hate in “A Tale of Two Cities”

Love and hate are both emotions that are used in our attempt to express ourselves to certain people. Hate is more sinister of the two, without hate, the scales would be upset. We cannot always get the best of everything. However, in the novel “A Tale of Two Cities" by Charles Dickens, hate only adds to the story's appeal.

In the novel, both emotions are displayed by the characters in the book through the actions they carry out and the words that they speak, even though it can be justified that there are more examples of love than hate. The love between Lucie Manette and her father, as well as that of Charles Darney and Lucie and indeed many other characters are just some of the many examples of love. The more baleful emotion of hate is also revealed many times in the novel, by the French commoners and especially by Madame Defarge when it came to Charles Darney being an aristocrat and the suffering of her own family.

The first strong example of love we read about in the novel is that of Lucie Manette and her father, Dr. Manette who has been kept in the Bastille for eighteen years. Lucie meets him with the help of another character, Mr.Jarvis Lorry, and tells her father that his agony is over and that she'll bring him to London and away from his previous sufferings. Later in the story, the night before Lucie is to be wedded to Charles Darney, we learn that Lucie has saved her last day as a single woman to be with her father and to reassure him that she'll still be with him even though she is to be married. "Lucie was to be married tomorrow. She had reserved this last evening for her father, and they sat alone under the plane-tree."

Throughout the whole conversation with her father that evening, it is evident that her love for her father prevails even that between Charles and herself. "If I had never seen Charles, my father, I should have been quite happy with you."

The affection for her father does not go only one way. Her father's for Lucie is also clear as we can see by the following quote:

"Quite sure my darling! More than that, my future is far brighter, Lucie, seen through your marriage, than it could have been - nay, than it ever was - without it.".... "Believe it, love! Indeed it is so. You, devoted and young, cannot fully appreciate the anxiety I have felt that your life should not be wasted-wasted for my sake. Your unselfishness cannot entirely comprehend how much my mind has gone on this; but, only ask yourself, how could my happiness be perfect while yours was incomplete?"

In the first parts of Book Three, Dr. Manette helps to protect Charles Darney after he was captured by the French commoners and manages to free him after some time. During that time Lucie stood outside a window in the Bastille every day in all weathers so that Charles could see her when he walked past even when it was impossible for Lucie herself to see him. In other words, he could see her, but she could not see him. She begs Madame Defarge, who undoubtedly hates all the French aristocrats to help Charles and not harm him. "As a wife and a mother, I implore you to have pity on me and not to exercise any power that you possess, against my innocent husband, but to use it in his behalf."

Likewise, the fondness Charles has for Lucie has not gone unnoticed. "He had loved Lucie Manette from the hour of his danger. He had never heard a sound so sweet and so dear as the sound of her compassionate voice; he had never seen a face so tenderly beautiful, as hers when it was confronted with his own on the edge of the grave that had been dug for him."

He confesses his love for her to Dr. Manette and asks for his advice on the matter and says that he would never weaken the bond between father and daughter. That shows that he is willing to share Lucie with her father, and that in turn shows his love and respect for Lucie and her wishes. "But I love her. Heaven is my witness that I love her!"

Besides Charles Darney, Lucie has other suitors but only one other character, Mr.Styver went forward with the idea of having Lucie as a wife and even thought of proposing to her. Sydney Carton, who works for Stryver, also has feelings for Lucie, but knows that he isn't good enough for Lucie, and says that he is willing to do anything for Lucie and her loved ones. He later carries this promise out by dying in place for Charles, thus saving his life.Even at his hour of death, Carton demonstrates his good heart by showing his love to a seamstress who is led to the guillotine before him.

There is one more character that is practically made of the emotion. Miss Pross, Lucie's maid, shows her unfailing devotion to Lucie, her ladybird, and near the end of the book, we discover that Miss Pross fights it out with Madame Defarge who is determined to exterminate Lucie and her entire family, so that Lucie, Dr. Manette and Mr. Lorry will have enough time to get away before they get caught and denounced for showing grief for a prisoner.

Another example that manifests love in the novel is that of the French commoners for France, and their own kind. That is shown after the riots started out; when families got together hoping that they would soon be free of the hold the aristocrats had over them.

The novel also has its fair share of hate which is displayed through the likes of Madam Defarge and her fellow knitters as well as her husband, Ernest Defarge, and the Jacques. There is no mistake that we can make regarding the relation between Madame Defarge and the emotion she lives by, Hate. Wherever she goes, she brings Hate around with her. She undeniably loathes the aristocrats and anyone with any relation to the higher breed of France, and we can see that by the conviction of innocent employees of the aristocrats such as the seamstress who saw the love and goodness in Carton. The following text rightly explains that Madame Defarge is a creature of hate.

" See you, I care nothing for this Doctor, I. But, the Evrémonde people are to be exterminated, and the wife and child must follow the husband and father." ... " In a word I cannot trust my husband in this matter, not only do I feel, since last night, that I dare not confide in him the details of my projects; but also I feel that if I delay, there is danger of his giving warning, and then they might escape."

She goes to look for Lucie but is stopped by and accidentally shot to death by Miss Pross. Although the hate between the French commoners and the aristocrats is not as sinister and fearful as that of Madame Defarge's, there are examples of them too. One of the more obvious examples is the storming of the Bastille where the French commoners invade the prison with many various weapons.

"Muskets were being distributed - so were cartridges, powder, and ball, bars of iron and wood, knives, axes, pikes, every weapon that distracted ingenuity could discover or devise. Every pulse and heart in Saint Antoine was on high-fever strain and at high-fever heat. Every living creature there held life as of no account, and was demented with a passionate readiness to sacrifice it."

The mob is ruthless and almost no one in their registers is spared. Monsieur Defarge and his allies, Jacques as they call themselves are mainly responsible for the revolution in Saint Antoine and organised most of the attacks and riots. Monsieur Defarge once said to Charles Darney that he would do nothing for him, and that his duty was to France and its people. "I am the sworn servant to both (France and its people), against you. I will do nothing for you."

In conclusion, the two themes of Love and Hate are indeed strong and widely shown, one if not the other, by each and every one of the characters. As a result of that, the novel is more engaging and tangible than if it lacked the presence of both emotions. Not only do the characters show that love and hate are strong themes, the events that unfold in the novel are evidence that support it as well. Love and Hate will continue to battle it out for the rest of humanity for purity and virtue, but also for the enjoyment of those who sit back and relax and who love to read books such as 'A Tale of Two Cities'.

Social Conflict in "A Tale of Two Cities "

Conflict is a necessary element in a novel to build a historical fiction. It is mainly used to build plot and suspense. In "A Tale of Two Cities "Charles Dickens used the development of a conflict between the French lower class and the French government and aristocracy to build plot and suspense. The nobility (the government and aristocracy) is extremely rich and the French lower classes are exactly the opposite, very poor. The French lower class suffered for a long time under the tight rulings and restraints of the French government and aristocracy. The lives of ignorant French poor people are described by Charles Dickens as dreadful:

"And who among the company at Monsignor's reception in that seventeen hundred and eightieth year of our Lord, could possibly doubt, that a system rooted in a frizzled hangman, powdered and gold-laced, pumped, and white-silk stockinet, would see the very stars out!"

The deaths of seemingly worthless peasant-like poor people had not affected what so ever upon the wealthy. This created the strong and continual conflict between the two, totally opposite from eachother, classes in France. The poor rebelled against the aristocrats who had been oppressing them for so long and afterwards France took a long time to recover. Darnay was arrested twice mainly because he was born basically as a French aristocrat and revolutionists wanted him killed. With the help of others, Darnay's conflict was resolved, but no doubt still stands an individual example of the larger external conflict of the Revolution.

It seems that the narrator of "A Tale of Two Cities" does not want or know to take a side in the conflict between the French lower class and the French government and aristocracy. He does not approve the actions of nobility but he does not approve the actions of the poor people as well. Especially in the first two paragraphs of chapter 15

(book third), the narrator uses very negative and sometimes strong words for the poor people but also for the noble people. Words like Monsters, the carriagesof absolutemonarchs, the equipages of feuda nobles, the toilettes of flaring Jezebels, changeless and hopeless are used quite often. In the entire novel it is also very clear that he sometimes understands the nobility and at another moment he understands the poor people. He also understands the reaction of the poor people but then at the same time he does not approve this. It is shown in the first paragraph already:

"It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair, we had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to Heaven, we were all going direct the other way- in short, the period was so far like the present period, that some of its noisiest authorities insisted on its being received, for good or for evil, in the superlative degree of comparison only." (Charles Dickens, p. 3)

Dickens is now contrasting things to show or emphasize how everything has two sides in the time of the French Revolution as well; the side of the nobles and the side of the poor people. The narrator's opines that both sides are not acting rightly and both are making mistakes. The narrator views that the lower class people have good reasons to act the way they do, reasons like the way they have been treated by the nobility but at the same time he thinks the nobility is treated too badly for the barbarous things which happened or which they did in the past.

The main difference in the opinions of the narrator on the social struggles is that of the positivity and sympathizing with one side or both sides. Dickens does not know or seems to not want to choose a side. He thinks both are making mistakes and both are not acting totally correct but still he can understand the poor people as well as the government and aristocracy.

Dickens gives a lot of arguments why both, the nobility and the French lower class, are good in some way or another. He also could have left this out because they both did monstrous things to each other so why should he be kind to forgive them by mentioning their positive sides. This surprises the reader and makes him more able to understand the characters.

To conclude Dickens used the conflict between the social groups to build suspense and the plot. He sympathizes with people and gives the reader different images of the social conflicts. So in the end it is shown again that the way of narrating and using conflict as a kind of storyline leads to a well done work of literature.

A Tale of Two Cities : Resurrection through Love

The theme of rebirth is common in Charles Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities. Many characters are re-born or resurrected as they grow emotionally. They find meaning in their lives and become better people through love. The love that makes this rebirth possible comes through the character of Lucie Manette. Lucie Manette, the female heroine of this book, is the source of the resurrections of Dr. Manette, Mr. Lorry, Charles Darnay, and Sydney Carton.

Lucie Manette is a compassionate and benevolent young lady who, at the beginning of the book, is only seventeen. Though her age would suggest the girl to still be a child, it is revealed that her wisdom goes far beyond her years. Lucie could be seen as an old soul who is wise enough to be able to find the good in everyone. We are unsure of this when Lucie is first introduced in her meeting with Mr. Lorry, as she seems to be over taken by emotion and fear. Yet Mr. Lorry takes note of her mature nature through the way she contains herself as he describes the perils of her father. "You speak collectedly, and you – are collected. That's good!" Lucie Manette, after being reunited with her father, devotes her life to restoring is mental and physical health. She finds a purpose and satisfaction in their mutual bond of unconditional love for one another. Lucie is reborn through her new relationship with her father, and through this relationship the window to Lucie's future is opened.

Just as Lucie Manette is given life through her father, her father is also reborn through her. After eighteen long years in the Bastille he is rescued by the Defarges who bring him to their wine shop. This is where he meets Lucie and Mr. Lorry. He is depicted as completely insane, and when asked his name he replies, "One Hundred and Five, North Tower," the number of his old prison cell. Tormented by his days in the Bastille, he is often scared and appears to be completely defenseless. He is wholly incapable of functioning in the outside world. Lucie loves him unconditionally and assists him in regaining his sanity. Dr. Manette makes slow but definite progress with the help of his loving daughter and family friends. It is a long and tiring process but eventually he is fully recovered. As time passes, Dr. Manette becomes increasingly stable and through Lucie's love he is taught how to be human again.

Five years later we see Dr. Manette at Charles Darnay's trial, and he appears to be rehabilitated. Charles, however, is in danger of losing his life in quite a grotesque way.

"Ah!" returned the man, with a relish; "he'll be drawn on a hurdle to be half hanged, and then he'll be taken down and sliced before his own face, and then his insides will be taken out and burnt while he looks on, and then his head will be chopped off, and he'll be cut into quarters. That's the sentence."

Charles is on trial for treason, and although Lucie's testimony is very harmful to his quest to be found innocent he can't help but fall in love with her. Charles is found innocent, despite the testimonies from Lucie and her father. This escape from death is Charles's first rebirth in this novel. After Charles becomes a free man he cannot help but retain his fondness for Lucie. After a year of unrequited love, Charles pays a visit to the Manette household in order to wed Lucie. Charles has become a successful French tutor and is very well off. He has become a new man, renouncing his noble heritage in order to take-out a living of his own. After he and Lucie are married Charles finds bliss with his new wife, and though Lucie wishes to retain a close relationship with her father, this becomes too difficult. Thus, Lucie now has a new life that involves Charles and their new daughter, Little Lucie. Little Lucie is as beautiful as her mother and has the same gentle nature, and through her daughter, Lucie's spirit is born again and carried-on.

Sydney Carton was the man who was responsible for Charles' escape from his death sentence of being convicted of treason. He is inspired to live a meaningful life through Lucie's belief in him. As the jackal, Sydney was a drunk who believed his life was worthless. He is a clerk for Stryver, the lawyer. He does all the work for Stryver, yet Stryver receives all the credit. Though Sydney has no inspiration, he longs for a life with meaning. He wants to have served a purpose, yet he is convinced that existence holds nothing for him. When he professes his love for Lucie Manette he describes himself as a "self-flung away, wasted, drunken, poor creature of misuse." He is convinced that his life will never get better, but Lucie discloses her faith in him and says that he is capable of better things. As he leaves Lucie that night, he says he will do anything for her. After this conversation with Lucie Manette, Sydney changes his life. He believes in himself now that he knows the woman he loves has faith in him. He endeavours to become the lion. He stops getting drunk and becomes a better person. It is because of Lucie that Sydney begins a new life. Her love gave him the strength to start over.

It is due to this great change in Sydney Carton that Charles Darnay is saved the second time. While in France, Charles Darnay is sentenced to death due to his family's past. Carton, who bears a great resemblance to Charles, traded places with him on the day of his execution. Sydney fulfills his promise to Lucie, sacrificing his life to show his love for her. His wish is finally granted; his life serves a purpose. By trading places with Charles he will surely die, but he will live on in the memories of the Darnay's and their children. Sydney is now resurrecting Charles through this ultimate sacrifice, and though Sydney wasn't particularly fond of Charles, his love for Lucie was stronger than one can imagine. The resurrection of Charles by Sydney is made possible only by the resurrection of Sydney by our heroine, Lucie.

It is also Lucie who creates significant changes in the minor character, Mr. Lorry. Mr. Lorry is a man who wants nothing to do with human emotion or human sentiment. "Feelings! I have no time for them, no chance of them." It is through Lucie and Dr. Manette and all of the other's changed by Lucie's charms that Mr. Lorry changes as well. Mr. Lorry eventually realizes there's more to life than business, and thus he truly begins to live. Since Mr. Lorry is not seen as often in the novel as the other characters, we don't see a gradual change in him. Instead, we see how his humanity has grown by leaps and bounds. "Thank God," said Mr. Lorry, clasping his hands, "that no one near and dear to me is in this dreadful town tonight."

It is Lucie who is the central figure of rebirth and resurrection in Charles Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities. All of these characters, as they reform, have a heavy impact on one another's lives. Resurrection is prominent theme throughout the book. Lucie resurrects her father, marries Charles, and inspires Sydney to change his life. It is because of Sydney's rebirth that Charles' life is spared. Through Lucie's unconditional love and non-judgmental nature, hope is sparred in this otherwise dismal setting.

Sydney Carton from Zero to Hero

Charles Dickens extraordinaire (excellent)revolutionist novel A Tale of Two Cities portrays an excellent character of Sydney Carton who develops dynamically throughout the novel. Carton overshadows Charles Darnay who is the true lead character by being the actual centre of attention within the plots. Dickens characterizes Carton as the pivotal figure in his novel, not because of his heroic suicide at the end but merely because he embodies all the contrasting elements of the novel.In total, there are three arguments which can be say about Carton which are his character is personifies as Jackal by Dickens because of his personalities, have an affection towards Lucie Manette and one who finally proven himself worthy after all.

At the beginning, Dickens describes Carton as a Jackal due to his negative personality that overwhelms himself. Dickens has also portrays Carton as an alcoholic lawyer with no interest and motivation within his life as well as everyone who is around him. Firstly, Carton is a lawyer that does not really care about his owns obligation towards his duty. This can be seen during the trial of Charles Darnay of who is accused for spying in England.

"Mr. Carton, who had long sat looking at the ceiling of the court, changed neither his place nor his attitude, even with this excitement."

Dickens describes that during the trial, Carton only take a few notes while the rest of the time, he only stares at the ceiling and only speaks when is needed. Carton is a drunken lawyer who takes no credit for his own works. Next, Carton faces a serious drinking issue who like no other chooses alcohol to tranquil himself from his problems and stress. "Think? You know I've been drinking." Here, Carton confesses that he has a drinking issue that keep him from concentrating for his work and socializing with those around him. "Then, bring me another pint of the same wine, drawer, and come and wake me up at ten."

The relationship between Carton's character with his moral values are deeply intervened by Dickens when he writes masterpiece based on society ethic. Besides that, Carton is the one who does not care about anyone around him. "I care for no man on Earth, and no man on Earth cares me." Substantially, Carton's ignorance towards people around him brought an external conflict between him and the other characters in the novel especially those who care of him.

Despite his moral conflict that is within himself, the 'forbidden' love between him and Lucie Manette change Carton over the course period of the novel by interfering with his attitude and personality. Lucie possessinga charismatic charm mesmerizes (hypnotizes) Carton into changing his attitude by saying "There is a great crowd coming one day into our lives, if that be so." Carton admires Lucie's cleverness; he tells her how she makes him believe that, despite his ruined past, he still has a shred of goodness deep within him. Slowly, Carton develops the feeling of love towards her but is afraid to let it out. He knows that Lucie will be marrying Darnay and his chances of proposing her will not be accepted and he did not want to get dumped again by a woman. "I know very well that you can have no tenderness to me; I ask for none; I am even thankful that it cannot be."(Dickens 156) Here, Carton tells Lucie that due to his weakness in his heart, he is contempt to express his feeling towards her.

Next, Carton promises Lucie that he will offer to help her whenever time comes. Due to his feeling of rejected love, Carton decides that, to gain Lucie attention he will do anything for her in whatever circumstances it will be. "Think now and then, that there is a man who would give his life, to keep a life you love besides you!." Carton sacrifices himself at the end, fulfilling what he had promised to Lucie; shows how great and deep Carton loves towards her. Lucie did notice what he has done at the end and silently thanks him for the huge sacrifice.

At the end, Carton finally proves that his life on Earth is worthy after all in which Dickens expresses it as the greatest sacrifice of all. He not only proves to him that he is useful but also advertises that he really cares about those who are around him. When Carton heard that Darnay is captured by the revolts in Paris and is about to be hanged at the guillotine, he quickly plans on how to save Darnay and bring him back to England.

Finally, Carton sacrifices himself and is hanged at the guillotine by the revolts. "I see the lives for which I lay down my life, peaceful, useful, prosperous and happy, in that England I shall see no more."(Dickens 320) Carton keeps on reminding him on a verse from the bible that a priest had once said during his father funeral that is "I am the Resurrection and the life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet he shall live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."He dies quietly without uttering any words other than praying within his mind. His final quietude is to be accounted for in relation to Dickens aim to let Carton embodies 'quiet heroism'.

To summarize, Sydney Carton begins his acts as an unmotivated lawyer, drunken and selfish towards himself and those who are around him. However, as the plots develop, Carton starts to change his attitude and personality after having a short date with Lucie Manette which eventually changes his life forever. He now knows his own abilities and starting to realize how useful he is in the world he lives. Dickens designs Carton to be a secretive hero that emerges out from nothing to a great hero in French revolution history.

Objectivity in A tale of Two Cities

Dickens, as a novelist, stands out for drawing attention to social evils, his humanism, his philosophic vision of life, his belief in the goodness of man, his characters and his use of humour, pathos and imagination. A Tale of Two Cities is a tale of two cities Paris and London and the French Revolution against which the story of a few characters is narrated. He skillfully weaves private lives and public events, fact and fiction, history and imagination. A tale of two cities is Dickens's most impersonal novel, especially because of the grand objectivity of historical events with which it deals.

Fantasy: - His blend of reality and fantasy is a result of his creative imagination. Though he writes about the Revolution, he has coloured the novel with fantasy. Though he focuses on the Revolution, its causes and effects, his main emphasis is on the meaningless horrors of the Revolution as in the context of the lives of a few private individuals. In doing so he makes use of fantasy. '

Insanity: - The element of fantasy is a result of his creative imagination. Insanity as a theme also enhances this element. Dr. Manette looks insane after his release and his ghost-like appearance lends an element of fantasy to the novel. He makes shoes to escape from his past. He gradually overcomes his fits of madness due to the love bestowed on him by Lucie. However, when he comes to know that Charles is an Evrémonde, the past haunts him once again and he resorts to shoe-making. The ghost-like man once again borders on insanity. Thus, the state of fantasy becomes an important part of his character.

When Charles is imprisoned the other prisoners appear to be ghosts of their former selves. All this is a part of fantasy having its root in psychic impulse.

Graphic Details: - The basic details of the Revolution are interwoven with the effects of Revolution on individuals. The graphic details of its horrific and nightmarish side, the fall of the Bastille and the Grindstone etc., all make the novel a mixture of reality and fantasy. However, to Dickens the Revolution is a lurid story of violence, vengeance and malevolence. He has drawn vivid pictures of execution and the La Guillotine. Insanity and frenzy is seen all round as corpses rot and the tumbrils move to and fro. The revolutionaries are waiting to devour the aristocrats who in their turn are waiting to be guillotined.

Doubling: - "Doubling" plays a major role in the novel as a part of fantasy. It appears bit improbable to our natural senses. Dr. Manette is imprisoned and he loses his sanity. He is then restored to normal life by his daughter but this insanity recourse with the unveiling of Charles's actual identity. It is the doubling of his madness. Darnay is re-arrested. Now Dr. Manette is the accuser who was once victim. Sydney Carton resembles Charles Darnay in his appearance. All these have been criticized as improbable or forced but they do contribute to the fast-paced action of the plot.

A Story of Suffering: - Against this view of the revolution, Dickens has given another picture that is imaginative. Dr. Manette is a symbol of suffering whose past haunts him throughout. Lucie is sweet loving and compassionate towards all. Charles disowns his legacy to expiate for the sins, of his ancestors. Sydney Carton, the profligate who cares for no one becomes a symbol of self-sacrifice, love, humanity and resurrection.

Thus, the Revolution incorporates personal incidents with history. As a result the larger dimensions of history are ignored. Dickens is not a historian, but a novelist. As an artist, he successfully blends reality and fantasy

Use of humour 'A Tale of Two Cities'

Humour is the quality of being amusing or comic, especially as expressed in literature or speech.A Tale of Two Cities, though tragic and full of bloodshed, violence and hatred, has abundant humour, comic elements, farce and satire. The humour, wit, satire, caricature and farce are an integral part of his work and relieve us of the monotony of endless seriousness and bloodshed.

Dickens' use of new devices of humour was a contribution to English literature at that time. Ungrammatical sentences uttered by the illiterate, fun in the contrariness of inanimate objects, the absurdity of the apt, the humour of the professional and over-riding egoism are the trademarks of his humour. In fact, though his humour is not intellectual, it creates laughter as it arises from contrast and humour of character, situation and theme. Humour is the soul of his work and mingled with pathos, it reflects his attitude to life.

Humour of Character: - Dickens lives chiefly in his comic characters. His humour of character is unsurpassed and we remember him more for his humorous characters than his stories. In fact he points out social evils with satire and fun instead of being serious. His wit, farce, satire and irony are not biting. He even treats the oddities of character, kindly.

In A Tale of Two Cities humour of character can be seen in abundance. Though Lucie, Charles, Sydney and Dr. Manette command our respect, the other characters are all comical in some way or the other.

Stryver, the lawyer is an egoistic character who makes a fool of himself. He is shallow and has no regard for Sydney to whom he owes his success. He is conceited like a lion but is vain and hypocritical from within. He takes credit for Charles's acquittal though actually Sydney had been responsible for it. His marriage proposal for Lucie is ridiculous as he is no match for the delicate Lucie. He is so self-opinionated that he thinks that he is doing a favour to Lucie by considering her as a marriage partner. According to K.J. Fielding, "his decision to honour Lucie with a proposal is magnificently comic with a rightful place in the story." Stryver the lion and Carton the jackal, create laughter. All this is possible in the hands of master of humour like Dickens.

Jerry Cruncher, too, is a comic figure. His spiked hair tickles us as much his humorous character and humorous interpretation of his secret profession do. Though he calls himself a "Resurrection man", he is irreligious and resurrects or digs dead bodies to eke out an existence and to promote the cause of science.

His mannerisms in calling himself "an honest tradesman", his profession of being a body snatcher, his habit of talking to himself and scolding his wife for "flopping, are a source of comedy in the novel. He fears that his wife's prayers will prolong people's lives, and his profession as a resurrection man, will suffer. The trait of malapropism is conspicuous in his dialogue that induces our laughter. For example, he calls a year "Anna Dominoes" instead of "Anna Domini". His belief that "Dominoes" is a popular game in England which was introduced by a sport-loving English woman Anna, creates humour and provides comic relief.

However, his presence, besides providing relief, is important for the plot In the course of his "resurrection business," he digs up the coffin of Roger Cly and finds the coffin empty as Cly had faked death to escape the wrath of his enemies. Later, he escapes to France and became a revolutionary spy. This information helps Sydney in blackmailing Barsad into allowing him to enter Charles' cell in prison and allowing him to die instead of him. So though a comic figure, he is important for the plot.

Miss Pross too is also a comic character who is good at heart. She is described as a wild looking woman, with red hair, covered with a bonnet like a Grenadier's wooden measure. She lays a brawny hand upon Mr. Lorry's chest and makes him fall. After this she fusses over Lucie and calls her "my bird".

Her exaggerated remarks about dozens of suitors who come to visit Lucie, create laughter. Her confrontation with Madame Defarge is comical as well as dramatic and serious. When she tells her "I'll not leave a handful of that dark hair upon your head, if you lay a finger on me", the tussle between the two assumes comic proportions. Though a comic character, she is a symbol of love triumphing over hatred. She also plays an important role in bringing about the death of Madame Defarge.Dickens sums up that the peculiar quality in "her character dissociated from stature was shortness."

Even JarvisLorry, 'a man of business' is comical. He keeps on telling Lucie that he is a man of business and this heightens the comic effect at times.

On the other hand, two characters who are comical in a grotesque manner are the mender of roads and Madame Defarge. When he shouts "God save the king, God save the King", he is funny because as a revolutionary he is supposed to hate the aristocrats, and not cheer them for a long life.

Later, again when he compares his wood-cutting activities to Solomon, the guillotine-master, he appears grotesquely funny and humorous. Equally grotesque is Madame Defarge who continuously knits the names of the doomed, inveterately.

Thus, it can be seen that Dickens' humour is sympathetic and satirical. While sympathetically portrayed characters make us laugh with sympathy, the grotesque and evil characters are portrayed satirically. His sympathetically delineated characters like Micawbers, Pickwicks and Miss Pross are simpletons and arouse our feelings.

Caricatures: - Dickens also evokes laughter by exaggerating the manners and oddities of his characters. His caricatures arouse laughter. Jerry Cruncher's spiky hair, Miss Press's red complexion and red hair and the mender of roads' funny gestures are all sparkle of Dickens's humour. His remarks about Tellson's Bank also create humour. The partners were "proud of its smallness, proud of its darkness, proud of its ugliness, proud of its incommodiousness".

Humorous Situations: - Besides humour of character, he creates humorous situations or scenes or themes. For Dickens, funerals and journeys are a source of comedy. Roger Civ's fake funeral procession is vividly described to arouse laughter.

Pathos and Humour: - Thus, we see that Dickens, the master of humour is comparable to Shakespeare. His humour is mingled with pathos, and this shows his realistic approach towards life. Life too is full of laughter and tears. However, he does try to wring an extra tear by giving vivid details. He does not let the situation speak for itself. For example, when Gaspard's child dies he overstates and exaggerates and does not let the situation speak for it.

Conclusion: - However, all said and done, his humour is commendable. He highlights evils and monstrosities in a humorous vein. His humour is present in his characters, phrases, descriptions, situations and contrasts while Miss Press's eccentricities are a foil to Lucie's gentleness, Cruncher's spiked hair and ridiculous clothes provide a comic contrast to the conservative Jarvis Lorry. The moody, morose Carton is a contrast to boastful, egoistic Stryver whose attitude often becomes out of the way and ludicrous.

John Forster complained that the novel has little humour. In comparison to his other novels, A Tale of Two Cities stands out for the grimness and gravity of the theme where the plot is focussed and characters are not abundant. Within this compact structure, which is absent in Dickens's other significant novels, we get few sparkles of the writer's treatment of humour which are brilliant, vivid and ludicrous with a tinge of irony.

Dickens Art of Characterization in“A Tale of Two Cities”

Characterization is the creation and convincing representation of fictitious characters. A Tale of Two Cities, written by Charles Dickens, has many different characters with interesting personalities. Some of the characters in the novel all share one common fact that Dickens used throughout the book. Charles Dickens based the characters of A Tale of Two Cities on himself and his life.

Charles Dickens based the virtuous Charles Darnay as a version of himself. Dickens portrays himself through Charles Darnay in the fact that Dickens and Darnay have the same initials. Dickens might be portraying that Darnay and himself have so much in common, so Dickens gave Darnay the same initials. Charles Dickens also presents Darnay’s relationship with Carton to himself. Charles Darnay’s relationship with Sydney Carton could portray Dickens’ own problem with his honorable and commonly negative side. Darnay’s relationship with Carton was strong, as seen in the last book where Carton takes Darnay’s place on the guillotine to be killed. Dickens might have done this to symbolize love Dickens had for another friend, just like Darnay had with Carton.

As Dickens based himself on Darnay, Dickens might have also based Dr. Manette as a version of himself.Charles Dickens might have portrayed himself through Dr. Manette We can trace parallels between Manette’s career as a physician and his selflessness in reporting the abuses of the nobility with Dickens’ career as a journalist and advocate for social improvement”. Dickens might have done this through Manette to show what issues Dickens stood for. Dickens portrayed himself through Dr. Manette in one more instance. We can see resemblance in Dickens’s conception of alternative worlds in his books with Dr. Manette’s conception of a place where he is only a cobbler. Dickens might have done this to basically resemble the two lives he has lived: one as a child working in a factory, and two growing up and becoming a great author. Dickens went through a lot in his “two lives”.

As Dickens portrayed himself through Dr. Manette, he will now portray Mr. Stryver on a lawyer friend.Charles Dickens might have based Mr. Stryver on a lawyer Dickens knew. A Gale research source says, “It has been surmised that Dickens based the character on an actual person, Edwin James, a notoriously, unscrupulous lawyer…"Dickens might be portraying Mr. Stryver on this lawyer to show the rudeness and lying nature lawyers sometimes possess. Dickens also might have based Mr. Styver on one other characteristic. Charles Dickens based Mr. Stryver on a lawyer who had a bad reputation; hence, Mr. Styver gets a bad reputation. Dickens might have chosen Edwin James to portray Mr. Stryver to show that all lawyers have bad names. It is sad that even lawyers back then had bad reputations. Dickens now portrays Dr. Manette in many different ways.

Charles Dickens might have based Dr. Manette on his own father. Dickens' father was not well with finances, and in 1824, Dickens' father was imprisoned for debt (Dickens: A Brief Biography", par 1). Dickens' father was imprisoned probably for not paying what he owed to other people. In the novel, the confounded Dr. Manette is also imprisoned. A Gale research source says, "Imprisoned in the Bastille for his attempt to imprison the Marquis St. Evermonde's treachery, Manette was permanently altered from this experience". Dr. Manette was also imprisoned, but in a different way than Dickens' father. Dickens might have portrayed his own father through Dr. Manette and his own imprisonment. As Dickens might have based his father's imprisonment with Dr. Manette's, Dickens might have also based the emotional and psychological problems with imprisonment on this experience.

Charles Dickens might have based the emotional and psychological side of imprisonment with his father's and Dr. Manette's imprisonment. When the finances of Charles Dickens' family were put to at least partly to rights, his father was released, the twelve-year-old Dickens, already scarred psychologically by the experience, was further wounded by his mother's insistence that he continued to work at the factory. The young Charles Dickens was hurt emotionally and psychologically because his father was in prison and he was forced to work in a factory with his whole family. Dickens might have portrayed emotional and psychological sickness through Dr. Manette and his experience with prison. Dr. Manette only identified himself as his jail cell number. Dr. Manette is emotionally and psychologically hurt so bad, it has effected his communication and social skills. Charles Dickens might have based his own emotional and psychological problem through Dr. Manette. Charles Dickens might have also based another event on imprisonment.

Charles Dickens might have based solitude and loneliness through work and imprisonment on himself and Dr. Manette. David Cody writes, "His[Dicken's father] wife and children, with the exception of Charles, who was put to work at Warren's Blacking Factory, joined him in the Marshalsea Prison" . Charles Dickens must have felt solitude and loneliness when he was put to work and all of his other family members were in jail. Dickens might have portrayed this event in his life through Dr. Manette and his imprisonment. While Dr. Manette was in prison, all he did was cobble, or shoemaking, which was all he learned to do in prison. Dr. Manette was so lonely and in complete solitude, no wonder all he did was shoemaking. Dickens might have portrayed his own case of solitude and loneliness with work through Dr. Manette's case of solitude and loneliness in prison. As Dickens based imprisonment on solitude and loneliness, he might have also based Lucie rescuing her father on an event in Dickens life.

Dickens might have based Dr. Manette's rescue by his daughter on an event in Dickens' life where he was rescued. His father, however, rescued him from this fate, and between 1824 and 1827, Dickens was a day pupil at a school in London. Even though Dickens' mother wanted him to stay working in the factory, Dickens' father rescued him from this doom and put him in school. Dickens' might have symbolized this event through Dr. Manette and when he was rescued. Lucie Manette travels with Mr. Lorry to rescue her father, Dr. Manette. Dickens might have allowed this event to take place to symbolize his own rescue from his father when Dickens was a child. It might have also felt good to remember as he wrote what happened and how his relationship with his father was strong. Dickens also bases some characters off love and relationships.

Charles Dickens based many characters off love and relationships. Sydney Carton loves Lucie Manette so much, he took the place of her, husband Charles Darnay, and Carton died because of his love for Lucie. Dickens might be portraying this relationship of love on Dickens own relationship with Ellen Turnan, an actress who Dickens fell in love. Charles Dickens also bases another relationship of his life off of one relationship between parent and child. Lucie Manette loves her father, Dr. Manette, so much that Lucie takes care of Dr. Manette after he escapes and leaves the prison, La Bastille. Dickens might be portraying his own love for his father through Lucie and her relationship with her father. Dickens' relationship with his father was much like Lucie's relationship with her father. Charles Dickens aptly based many characters on love and relationships.

Charles Dickens based the characters in A Tale of Two Cities on himself and his life. Charles Dickens portrays himself through the characters Charles Darnay, Dr. Manette, Mr. Stryver, and different relationships with certain characters. The way Dickens portrayed himself through his characters is brilliant and clever.

Conflict of interest &clash of characters

Next to Shakespeare, Dickens has created a world of rich, complex, simple and grotesque characters. His books are like mobs with people running to and fro. His galaxy of characters is individualized, alive and life-like. According to Compton Rickett, Dickens has both normal and abnormal characters.While the normal characters are tenderly portrayed, the abnormal characters are divided into grotesques, caricatures, villains and satirical portraits. The rest are comical and humorous. In general, he focuses on the external characteristics, physical oddities and mental quirks of his characters. He feasts on the face, gestures, clothes, and words of the character. Since he lays greater emphasis on the peculiarity and individuality of the characters, his characters become caricatures. They are exaggerated versions as they are a result of close observation

An Artist: - Though his characters are symbols and types who do not develop under the stress of circumstances, they are not abstractions but true to life, individuals and real persons of flesh and blood. He is an artist and not a psychologist and as such his characters are generally portrayed from outside. In fact, he is a like painter, who creates his characters imaginatively.

The Poor, the Rich and the Good: - A Tale of Two Cities is an apt illustration of Dickens' greatness in character portrayal. As a socialist and an advocate of the poor and oppressed, he focuses on the lower middle classes of London. In A Tale of Two Cities the focus is on the poor and oppressed lower middle classes of England and France. He satirises the rich and the egoists, like Stryver. His criterion of character is humanity, goodness and love and these qualities are present in Lucie, Sydney, Charles, etc.

Symbols: - Most of his characters embody ideas or values. While Lucie stands for goodness, Dr. Manette embodies suffering; while Charles Darnay symbolises passive goodness, Sydney embodies action, love, sacrifice and resurrection; while Jarvis Lorry is a symbol of goodness and service, Jerry Cruncher is a symbol of corruption; while Miss Pross is a symbol of love and duty, Madame Defarge is a symbol of evil and hatred.

Individuals: - Though symbolic, his characters are individualized. Dr. Manette is a victim of insanity who is resurrected by Lucie's sweetness and love. Lucie is a typical Dickensian heroine who is sweet and loving. Lucie in her goodness stands apart from Madame Defarge who is full of hatred and vengeance. Miss Pross, too, is different. So are Stryverand Jerry Cruncher. Though Charles and Sydney look alike they represent the dark and light aspects of man. One is passively good and the other is actively good.

Dialogue and Action: - Each of these characters is presented either through dialogue or action. While Charles is presented mainly through dialogue, Sydney is presented through action. His supreme act of sacrifice and love raises him to a divine plane. While the Defarges are presented mainly through action, Jarvis Lorry is presented through dialogues. Thus, both dialogue and action play important part in character portrayal.

The characters of Charles, Sydney, Dr. Manette and Jarvis are normal. Charles is noble, good and sacrificing. However, he hardly thinks or takes any initiative. He is too passive, even though he loves Lucie immensely. He is an honest and sincere man. He renounces his lineage, rushes to Paris to help Gabelle and faces his imprisonment with fortitude.

On the other hand, Sydney is a dynamic man of action. Though he appears as a wastrel and drunkard in the beginning, later he proves himself to be full of zeal instigated by Lucie's faith in him. He is rejuvenated and he sacrifices his life for Charles and humanity. He becomes a martyr and a saint, a symbol of love and sacrifice.

Jarvis Lorry, too, is a good man who is a normal character. He is a man of business with loyalty and devotion towards Tellson's Bank. He is equally devoted to the Manettes to whom he owes his resurrection from a man of business. He goes out of his .way to help the Manettes.

Dr. Manette, too, is a normal man who has become insane due to his suffering in the Bastille. His sweet daughter resurrects him and he becomes sane again. However, when Charles is imprisoned, he musters up his strength and desperately searches for any way to have him released. Fate keeps, torturing him and his past keeps haunting him. Eventually, he comes out stronger.

Abnormal Characters: - Besides these good and conventional characters, Dickens delineates some abnormal and evil characters. The Defarges are leaders of the revolutionaries and they symbolise hatred. While Defarge tosses back the coin at Evrémonde, storms the Bastille and digs out Dr. Manette's letter, he has a soft corner for Dr. Manette and Lucie. Madame Defarge is totally inhuman. She speaks less and conveys her attitude by her impassive face, raised eyebrows and her knitting. However, she does act when she beheads the Governor and engages herself in a jostle with Miss Press. She is a symbol of hatred and vengeance.

Vengeance, Jacques, and the mender of roads are also evil characters who are typecast. Their names suggest their characters. While vengeance stands for revenge, Jacques stands for the common man who has no identity of his own. It is a common name and the Jacques are tools in the hands of the Defarges.

Comic Characters: - The third category of characters is the humorous characters like Miss Pross, Jerry Cruncher and Stryver. Their idiosyncrasies and foibles are portrayed through their eccentric physical appearances and their mannerism. While Miss Pross has red hair, Jerry has spiked hair. Stryver, the lion - is stout and odd looking. The red haired Miss Pross has a habit of exaggerating, but she is devoted to Lucie and calls her "LadybirdThough Jerry Cruncher calls himself an honest tradesman; he is a resurrection man who digs out dead bodies and sells them. His manner of talking is comic. References to his wife's flopping are funny. The tag words attached to these minor characters are an important part of Dickens' characterization.

Stryver, too, has the tag 'lion' attached to him. He is pompous and egoistic like a lion. His proposal to Lucie and his dialogues with Sydney bring out the boorish aspects of his character, and create humour.

Female Characters: - Dickens' women characters are either sweet and loving like Lucie, or eccentric and comic like Miss Pross or shrewish and tyrannical like Defarge.His picture gallery of women characters generally consists of foolish, ridiculous, offensive or sweet characters.

Conclusion: - To sum up, Dickens is a master artist with a vast picture gallery of portraits. Though his characters are conventionally virtuous or vicious, he cannot draw very complex characters. His characters are characters of melodrama and he does not go into their psyche. According to Baker, he deals with characters and not character, with individuality and not a whirlwind of passions. In fact, his characters generally do not develop. However in spite of all this his characters are fantastic creations of his imagination. They are flesh and blood characters and they leave a deep impact on the minds of the reader.

Dickens as a Novelist

English novel in the hands of Dickens and his followers is entirely different from what it was in the hands of Scott. In short, there is now less of romance, more of realism. His is the romance of dreary London streets. Dickens was the first novelist who possessed extreme sensibility with which he felt the sufferings of the poor, an intense imagination with which he depicted pictures of their lives, and aroused the conscience of the people. Dickens was immensely popular. His popularity is due to the fact that with the exception of Shakespeare, he is the greatest creative genius of England. He is among the greatest humorists of the world and for sheer variety and abundance of invention he has no equal. Dickens' novels are conspicuous for the following characteristics:

Realism: - Dickens is the pioneer of realism in nineteenth century novel. Chesterton says: "Dickens used reality while aiming at an effect of romance, while Thackeray used the loose language and ordinary appearance of romance while aiming at an effect of reality. Dickens writes realism in order the incredible credible." Dickens' power of minute and keen observation coupled with poetic imagination, retentive memory and remarkable instinctive power of reading character make him a realist of a high order. As a realist he centered his eye on London and low life. To him London was the epitome of contemporary English life. He knew London thoroughly. Hugh Walker remarks: "He knew it topographically, industrially, socially within the limits of middle and lower classes. He could penetrate into all obscure nooks. He was familiar with all its strange trades and with those who followed them—the dustman, the articulator of skeletons, the marine-store dealers, the, man who made a living by recovering bodies from the Thames, and many less innocent than he—Dickens knew them all better than we know our next door neighbours. It was from this material that he built his books." He was the first genuine story-teller of London life. He did not know the manners of high society. His gentlemen are colourless abstractions. His best characters are portraits from life, and the life that he knew best was lower class life. Instead of the pageant of the Middle Ages, Dickens showed the Pageant of contemporary English life, strikes and riots, factories and granaries burning, employee shooting employer, underground tenements, workhouses, truck-stores, wretched schools, model prisons, model cottages.

Dickens exposes various evils of Industrial Revolution, especially the employment of child labour. Child labour was inhumanly exploited. The sufferings of David as a child of ten in David Copperfield are the sufferings of many Victorian children. The sordid condition of English Prisons is brought to light in David Copperfield and Great Expectations. His Oliver Twist is a powerful indictment of the education of poor children Pt. his day. Abuses of the legal system and delays in the meeting out of justice are also criticised in David Copperfield. In one novel after another Dickens is sharply critical of poor laws and the working of the work-houses.

Prophetic Note or Purpose in the Novel of Dickens: - Dickens is a novelist with a purpose. He tended to suspect all institutions, churches, government offices, charitable institutions, laws, reformatories and even schools because he felt that they were attempting to do by mechanical means the good which could only come from the spontaneous action of the individual. He hated all class distinctions and the aristocratic system because they checked the natural free current of benevolence which should flow from one man to another. Dickens "is also a prophet," says David Cecil, "he is out to expound a gospel, a view of life, a score of values which he wishes his fellowmen to accept. As was to be expected, it is a very simple gospel; it does not appeal to the intellect, it is the result of intuition rather than of logic and learning. It centres round a single belief — a belief in the primary, simple, benevolent impulses of man, his natural affections for home, mother and wife and sweetheart, his unconsidered movements of charity and gusts of gaiety, his instinctive wish to love and laugh and give and share."

Humanitarian Note: - All novels of Dickens are characterised by humanitarian note. He attacked the abuses in the existing system and throughout he considered himself as the champion of the weak, the outcast and the oppressed. Hudson remarks: "Humanitarianism was indeed the keynote of his work, and as his enormous popularity carried his influence far and wide, he may justly be reckoned one of the greatest social reformers of his age." Dickens' sympathy was always with the out-castes, the poor, the downtrodden, the exploited and all victims of society. In most of his novels a child is usually presented as a victim of society. Oliver Twist, Little Nell, Florence Dombey and David Copperfield, stand out in celestial innocence and goodness, in contrast to the evil creatures whose persecution they suffer for a season. They represent vividly the complaint of the individual against society. The cruelty the malign characters inflict on children is a manifestation of social wrong. Bumble's savage blow at Oliver Twist asking for more food, and Squeers' wicked exploitation of his pupils in Nicholas Nickleby expose utter want of human love and sympathy in the existing social system. In his novels we find a deep-seated reaction against the organised authority and established institutions. His three novels, Oliver Twist, Nicholas Nickleby and Old Curiosity Shop established Dickens as the pioneers of humanitarianism. He tried to arouse the conscience of the people against the exploitation of the oppressed and the downtrodden. Dickens saw life from the viewpoint of the poor and oppressed. He had himself known the lot of the persecuted at the root of the zeal for reform was the memory of his own bitter childhood.

Characterisation: - The genius of Dickens was for characters, not character. He could portray innumerable kinds of human beings, but he could not analyse the individual. He could vividly describe every detail of manners, appearance, dress and other external details of his characters. "Despite the broad brush of caricature, despite the over ¬insistence on the externals of his characters, he makes them live; and they live," says Rickett, "by virtue of their humanity."

It is generally said that Dickens gives us types, not individuals. His characters are types of the most abstract kind, something like the figures in the old moralities: embodied hypocrisy, selfishness, pride, and so on, masking as everyday mortals. Mr. Pecksniff is hypocrisy personified; Mr. Dombey embodies pride and Tom Pinch is amiably personified. His characters are oddities personified. But it must be admitted that this remark is applied only to a certain number of satirical portraits and not to his characters at large. Gissing remarks that Dickens "sees in them, not abstractions, but men and women of such loud personalities, so aggressively individual in mind and form, in voice and form, that they forever proclaim themselves the children of a certain country. Clothed abstractions do take hold upon the imagination and the memory as Dickens did from the day of their coming into life. The secret of this subtle power lay in the reality of the figures themselves."

Leaving aside the portraits of children, Dickens imparts some abnormality, some eccentricity of manner, some mental twist, some intellectual slowness to his characters.

He treats his characters primarily from without, and he highlights only such characteristics which may express themselves externally. He fashions his characters from skin inwards, never getting near the heart of them. His characters do not react upon each other; in truth, they do not act at all, they only behave, and show off their unlikeness one to the other. "Dickens," writes Rickett, "was not a scientific student of character; he was a shrewd observer of certain types of character, and although he did not confine his character studies altogether to these types, yet he was rarely successful when he diverged from them."

Humour and Pathos: - Humour is the soul of the novels of Dickens. Without his humour, he might have been a vigorous advocate of social reform, but as a novelist assuredly he would have failed. Humour is present in his writings from the very beginning. The Sketches have a touch of true humour, but there is much more of merely youthful high spirits, tending to be farcical. The admixture of humour, satire and farce is an important characteristic of Dickens as a novelist. Pickwick Papers is a veritable storehouse of humour and farce.

Dickens' humour arises from the heart and not from the lips. The farce inch is early work always results from the exuberance of spirits; later he introduces it deliberately, with conscious art, save perhaps at those moments when the impulse of satire is too much for him. The wild absurdity of the Miffin Company at the beginning of Nicholas Nickleby and the first chapter of Martin Chuzzlewit are examples of his early humour and farce. Dickens reaches the highest point of humour in the scene describing the marriage of Jack Bransby to the great Macstinger. It is the ludicrous in the purest form and it leaves behind it nothing but the wholesome aftermath of self-forgetful mirth.

The humour of Dickens is "broad, humane and creative". He is par excellence in creating humorous characters—Mr. Pickwick, Mrs. Garnp, Mr. Micawber, and Sam Weller. His humour is not very subtle, but it goes deep, and in expression it is free and vivacious. His humour takes a satiric turn when he exposes the evils of his age. His satire covers a great part of English life, public and private likeeducation, charity, religion, social morality in its broadest sense, society in its narrowest legal procedure, the machinery of politics and the forms of government.

Dickens is superb both in pure humour and satiric humour. "Satire, however, is one-half of Dickens' humour," writes David Cecil, "and not the most characteristic half. Dickens' unique position as a humorist lies in his mastery of "pure humour", jokes that are funny not for the satirical light they throw but just in themselves. The humour does not illustrate anything or tell us anything, one needs no extraneous information to see its points, and it is simply self-dependently, intoxicatingly funny.

Dickens' humour and pathos cannot be sharply differentiated. Like his humour the pathos of Dickens is overdone and too long drawn out. It shows lack of self-restraint. The theatrical element is repellent in his pathos. Dickens most effectively mingles humour and pathos when he deals with childhood. Rickett writes: "There we have a humour that caresses, a pathos that brightens, and a rainbow humour where the author is smiling at us through his tears. It is hard to overpraise Dickens' sketches of child life. Dickens did not describe a child—he became a child for the time being. He lived over again his own childish days. Hence the poignancy and actuality of his pictures." Paul, David and Pip are his memorable studies of childhood, which combine humour and pathos. There is plenty of pathos in his descriptions of prison life. Pathos of the graver and subtler kind is the distinguishing note of Great Expectations. The old convict Magwitch, if he cannot he called a tragical personality, is certainly an impressive pathetic figure. Dickens' gentlest, brightest humour, his simplest pathos occurs in those unexciting pages which depict the everyday life of poor and homely English folk.

Dickens' Plots: - Dickens' novels, writes David Cecil, "have no organic unity, they are full of detachable episodes, characters who serve no purpose in furthering the plot. His characters are almost irrelevant to the actions of the books in which they appear. We remember the story for them, but the story could perfectly well go on without them." Dickens' early novels are usually simple in structure. Following the tradition of Smollet and Le Sage, he built his early novels on the picaresque tradition. Pickwick Papers and Nicholas Nickleby are, like Smollett's, bundles of adventures, connected, so far as they are connected at all, only by the characters who figure in them. In Martin Chuzzlewit, Dombey and Son and David Copperfield some effort is made towards greater unification, but even these books belong substantially to the loose, chronicle type. In his later books, however, he gained the power of constructing elaborate plots, and of creating characters of heroic dignity and tragic intensity, such as, Sidney Carton in A Tale of Two Cities, and Lady Dedlock in Black House. It is his first systematic attempt to gather up all the diverse threads of the story into a coherent plot. Little Dorrit, A Tale of Two Cities, Great Expectations, Our Mutual Friend and the unfinished Edwin Drood are planned, but there is still in them a great deal of episodic material. Moody and Lovett remark: "Dickens is remembered not as a dramatic artist in the novel form, but as a showman of wonderful resources. He is a master of vast and fascinating stage, crowded with farcical characters, with grotesque and terrible creatures, more devils than men, and with the touching forms of little children. The action is sometimes merry, sometimes exciting, sometimes pathetic. We have laughter, and horror, and tears; but the prevailing atmosphere is one of cheerfulness, as befits a great Christmas pantomime."

Dickens' Style: - Dickens is one of the masters of prose in his own way, though his style cannot be admired for flow of pure idiom or command of subtle melodies. His style is often too much mannered. At its best Dickens' style is neither polished nor scholarly, but it is clear, rapid and workmanlike, the style of the working journalist. His style in the early books is spoiled by funs, cockneyisms, and tiresome circumlocutions. The style of Barnaby Rudge is simple, direct and forcible.

Rickett writes: "None but a genuine dramatic artist could modulate his style as Dickens can so as to take on the mood of the moment." He could picturesquely describe the marshes at the beginning of The Great Expectations, with its creeping fog and flat loneliness in a language which consists of "a mist of words and phrases". In his description of a coach ride, the language quickens and slackens, becomes rollicking or deliberate, according to the pace of the coach. Dickens adopted a lyrical style, a kind of verse-in-prose in his more aspiring flights, in particular, in his deeply pathetic passages. Clutton-Brock says: "Dickens was a master of sound and even classical prose style. His teachers were Smollett, Fielding and Defoe, and he had learned from them thoroughly. He wrote like a man, with a masculine weight, clearness and balance." Rickett writes about his greatness as a stylist: "With all its mannerisms there is the element of greatness about Dickens' style. For colour, movement and variety it is a remarkable style. Tawdry and mannered at times, if you will, but despite this, fascinating, arresting, and with the impress of the writer's infectious personality."

Dickens' Place: - Dickens, according to Hugh Walker, is the most original novelist of England. "A hint here and there, a turn of phrase, a situation, the outline of a character—he certainly adopted, but the substance of his novels comes from his own experience. Keen observation, a retentive memory and a remarkable instinctive power of reading character, were the gifts to which he owed his literary success." Dickens has left us a rich and varied inheritance. His characters, some remarkably humorous and not a few genuinely pathetic figures, are a memorable contribution to the world of noveldom. Dickens was a humanitarian who has touched with pity and tenderness the springs of our national life, and English life no less than English letters.

Adam Bede

GEORGE ELIOT: 1819-1880

Mary Ann (or Marian) Evans was born in Warwickshire in 1819, the youngest child of Robert and Christina Evans. She was deeply religious during her childhood and adolescence, a trait she developed partially from her family background and partially under the influence of Miss Lewis, the "principal governess" of a boarding school which Mary Ann attended from 1828 to 1832.

After her mother died and her sister married, Mary Ann ran her father's household. But in 1841, her brother Isaac married and took possession of the house, and Mary Ann and her father moved to Coventry. In the city the young woman's intellectual horizons widened and her early faith diminished; under the influence of Charles Bray and Charles Hennell, she became interested in the "new criticism" of the Bible and anonymously published her first work, a translation of D. F. Strauss' LebenJesu (Life of Jesus), in 1846. She also published a few articles and reviews in a periodical edited by Bray during this period.

Mary Ann cared for her invalid father, who strenuously objected to her changed religious views, until he died in 1849. After traveling in Europe for a time, she returned to England, where she became involved with a group of rationalists, best known of whom was John Chapman. In 1851, she became assistant editor of Chapman's Westminster Review. While in London, she met many prominent people, among them the philosopher Herbert Spencer. Through Spencer she came in contact with George Henry Lewes, a drama critic and author who was separated from his wife, and the pair fell in love. Lewes could not obtain a divorce, and he and Mary Ann decided to ignore the prohibitions of society and live together as man and wife. The union was a marriage in every aspect but the legal one and lasted until Lewes' death in 1878. Two years later, Mary Ann married J. W. Cross, and she herself died on December 22, 1880.

Mary Ann Evans did not begin writing fiction until relatively late in life. Her first pieces were three short stories, "Amos Barton," "Mr. Gilfil's Love-Story," and "Janet's Repentance," which were published in Blackwood's Magazine in 1857 and reissued collectively as Scenes of Clerical Life in 1858. They appeared under the pseudonym George Eliot, a penname which Evans used throughout the rest of her career. In 1859, Adam Bede, Eliot's first full-length novel, came out, and her reputation was established. The Mill on the Floss, an autobiographical novel, and Silas Marner both appeared in 1860. Romola, a historical novel set in Renaissance Florence, was published three years later and Felix Holt, the Radical in 1866. Middlemarch, widely considered to be Eliot's masterpiece, came out in 1871-72, and Daniel Deronda in 1876.

Eliot's work represents a definite break with the work of her immediate predecessors in several ways. In Adam Bede, she issued her declaration from convention and announced her intention to write realistically. "So I am content to tell my simple story, without trying to make things seem better than they were; dreading nothing, indeed, but falsity." We, looking back towards Eliot, may be inclined to dispute her claim; her work may not seem realistic when compared with more modern efforts. But we must not lose sight of the fact that a number of the most admirable qualities in modern fiction derive, either directly or indirectly, from Eliot; her work was revolutionary in its own day and opened new directions for the development of the novel as an art form.

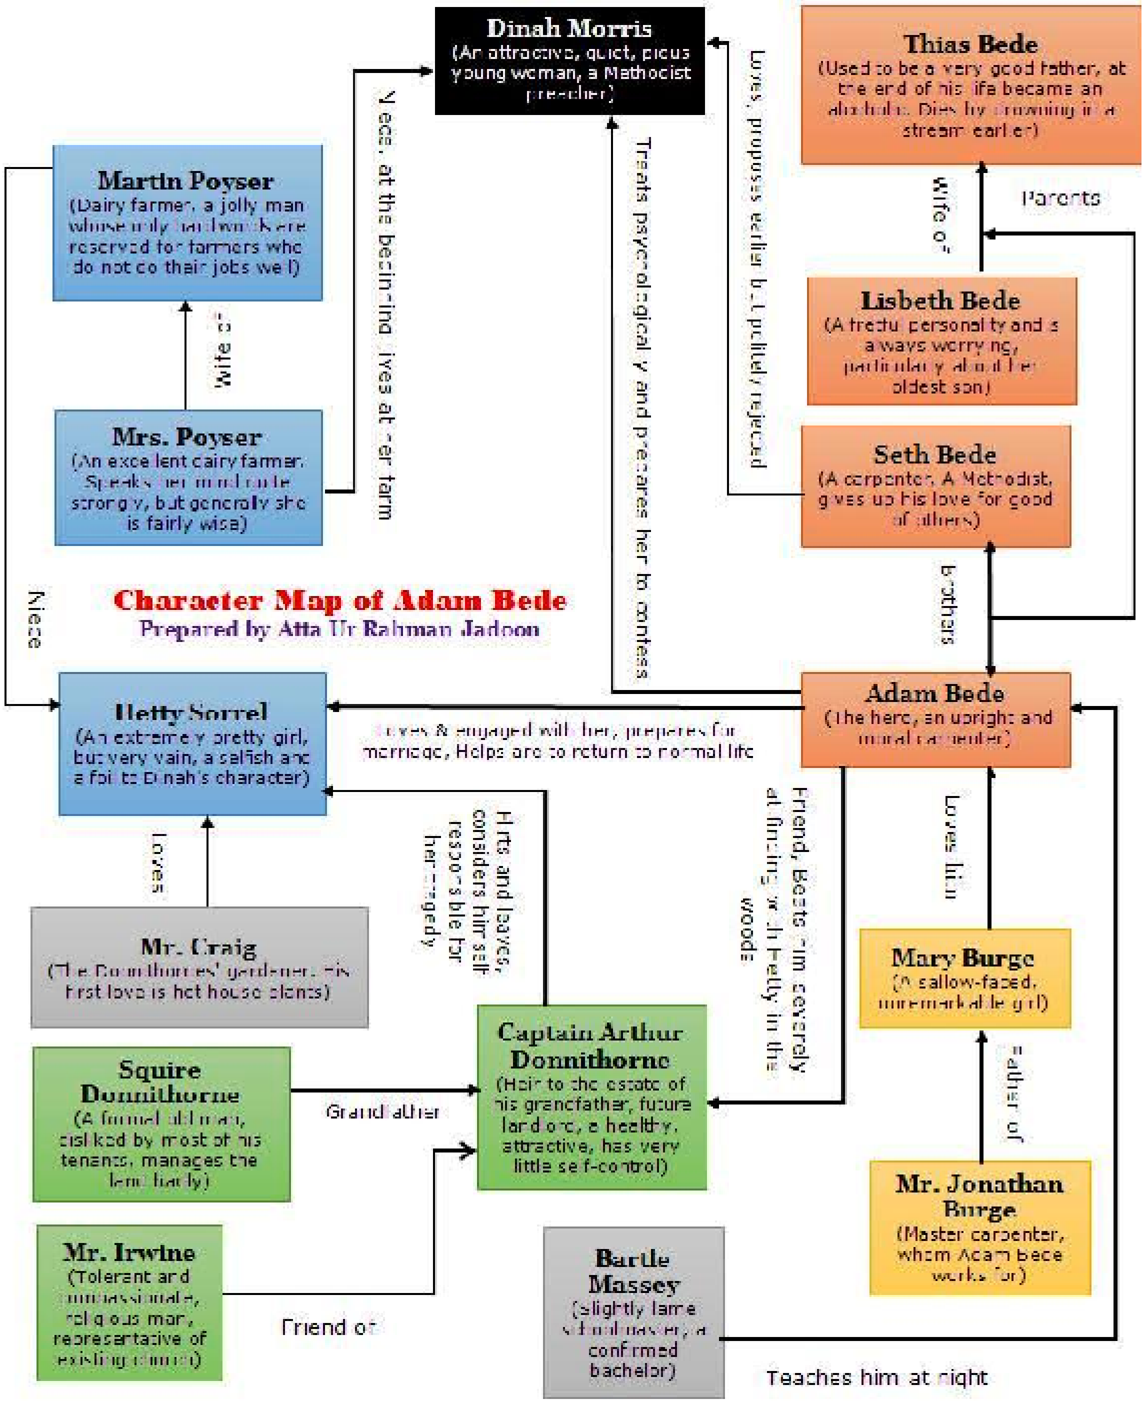
Eliot's writings are more realistic than those of her famous contemporaries in that she habitually presents characters which are not simplistic caricatures of human beings but complex, ambiguous, ultimately indefinable figures like those we meet on the street every day. They are analyzed at great length in the novels, and this psychological approach, in which the subtleties of motivation are laid bare, enables Eliot to present human situations as they really occur; both the mental and physical aspects of action are reproduced. She also attempted, perhaps with imperfect success, to break the stranglehold which popular morality had on the novel by showing that the good or bad fortune which comes to her characters is not the work of some unseen divine hand whose laws have been either followed or violated, but is the result of human will-choices. And finally she made the novel a more serious art form than it had hitherto been by using it as a vehicle for the discussion of significant moral and philosophical issues.



All of these qualities are observable in Adam Bede; indeed, as Eliot's first novel, it is her first experiment in the new fiction. Its revolutionary aspect is generally recognized; many scholars point to 1859, the year in which Adam Bede, Meredith's The Ordeal of Richard Feverel, Darwin's On the Origin of Species, and Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities were published, as one of the major turning points in the breakdown of mid-Victorian certainties. Adam Bede is a test case for a new view of the function of prose fiction; Eliot clearly feels that the novel need not be merely a form of entertainment for those seeking diversion from the problems of real life, but that it could, like poetry, be a vehicle for the expression and teaching of fine and serious ideas about the quality of the human condition.

It is difficult to see how the issue of man's responsibility towards himself and his fellows can cease to be vital, and the resurgence of interest in Eliot in our own day indicates how improbable it is that the relevance of her ideas and the value of the books in which she expressed them will "vanish altogether" in the foreseeable future.

Adam Bede : Summary

Adam Bede follows four characters in the rural village of Hayslope in 1799. It opens with the Bede brothers, Adam and Seth, at work in a carpentry shop. The other men tease Seth about his Methodism and the fact that he is in love with Dinah, the Methodist preacher. Dinah preaches in Hayslope that night and captivates even her skeptical audience. Seth walks her home and asks her to marry him for the second time, but she refuses, saying that it will interfere with her preaching.

Adam returns home to his mother, who is worried that his father is not yet home because he has promised to make a coffin for the next day. Thias Bede used to be an honorable man who taught his sons carpentry, but he has become a drunk in the last few years. Angry with his father, Adam stays up the whole night to complete the work on the coffin. He hears a strange rapping on the door, but nobody is there.

Captain Arthur Donnithorne visits his mentor, the vicar, and tells him about Dinah's preaching. They travel together to visit the Poyser farm so that the vicar can meet Dinah. At the Poysers' farm, Mrs. Poyser's niece, Dinah, and Mr. Poyser's niece are living with their aunt and uncle. Captain Arthur Donnithorne, whose aristocratic grandfather is the Poysers' landlord, asks to see Mrs. Poyser's dairy, while Dinah impresses the vicar by explaining to him why she feels called to preach. In the dairy, Arthur flirts with Hetty and ascertains that she walks alone to his estate to learn lace-making from his housekeeper.

In the morning, Adam sets out to the village pub to find his father, but he finds him face-down, drowned in a stream. The news of the Bedes' misfortune spreads fast around the village, and Dinah visits Lisbeth Bede to comfort her. Despite the fact that she does not usually like Methodists-or any young women who she suspects could take her place in her sons' affections-Lisbeth takes to Dinah. She stays overnight with the Bedes to help Lisbeth.

Arthur intercepts Hetty in the woods on her way to his estate. He flirts with her and kisses her. After she goes home, he decides that it is not a good idea to lead her on, and he resolves not to see her in the future. That night, Hetty dreams of marrying Arthur, becoming a gentlewoman, and owning beautiful women. Dinah surprises and frightens her by knocking on her door and saying that if she is ever in trouble, she should come to Dinah.

There is a well-attended burial service in the parish for Thias Bede. Adam visits the Poysers afterward to continue his well-established courtship of Hetty. Hetty's uncle and aunt both approve highly of the match, but Adam is frustrated because he cannot tell whether Hetty loves him or not. After this visit, he attends night-school, where he is learning mathematics to improve his skill at carpentry. Bartle Massey, the schoolmaster, tells him that he would be better off to stay a bachelor.

Arthur's and Hetty's secret affair continues, and he gives her a pair of beautiful earrings and a locket. At a celebration for Arthur's twenty-first birthday, he announces that he has appointed Adam Bede the steward for his estate's forest. This appointment will finally make Adam financially viable enough to ask Hetty to marry him.

Walking through the woods a few days later, Adam is reflecting on how happy he is until he sees Arthur and Hetty kissing. Hetty runs away, and Adam confronts Arthur. The two get in a fistfight, and Adam knocks Arthur down. He makes Arthur promise to write a letter to Hetty that will end the affair. Adam personally delivers this letter to Hetty, who is devastated. The letter says, however, to call on Arthur if she is in any real trouble. Hetty tries to think of how she can get out of her situation and decides that her best move would be to marry Adam. Adam thinks that she has learned from her mistakes. They get engaged.

As the marriage approaches, Hetty grows more and more worried. She gladly accepts as a pretext to run away her uncle's idea that she should leave to fetch Dinah from where she is preaching in Snowden. She takes all of her money and follows Arthur to Windsor where he has been stationed as a soldier. It takes all of her money to arrive there, and when she is informed that Arthur's troops have been sent to Ireland, she faints away. She remembers her cousin's invitation to look to her if she is ever in trouble. Hetty sets off in the opposite direction with the resolution that if she is too cowardly to commit suicide, she will find Dinah.

Hetty's family becomes worried when she does not return after a number of days, and Adam Bede sets out in search of her. When he arrives in Hayslope, he finds that she has never visited to collect Dinah at all. Alarmed, he traces her to Stoniton. When he returns back to Hayslope, the vicar informs him that she has just been arrested for the murder of her own child.

Adam is convinced that she is innocent until he attends her trial and sees the incontrovertible proof against her. One of the witnesses is a woman in whose house she delivered the baby. Another is a workingman who saw her near the spot where she partially buried the baby in a field before it died of exposure. Hetty is sentenced to execution. Dinah visits her in prison, persuades her to confess for the first time, and gives her spiritual counseling.

Adam has sent for Arthur, who receives word first that his grandfather has died, so Arthur returns to Hayslope without knowing what has happened to Hetty. When he hears the news, he rushes to get a special pardon for her. It is delivered in the nick of time. He rides up to where Hetty is riding in the death cart accompanied by Dinah with the pardon. Hetty is re-sentenced to exile rather than death. Adam and Arthur meet again and agree to end their old argument. Arthur says that he is joining the military, and the two shake hands.

Years later, Adam visits the Poysers as they try to convince Dinah not to leave on her preaching circuit yet again. She insists that she must go because of personal temptations. When Adam says that whatever she chooses will be right, she begins to cry. He brings her home to his mother, who is ill and wanted to see Dinah again. Dinah blushes every time that Adam talks to her, and Seth and Lisbeth see that she is in love with him. Lisbeth informs her son, who, after asking his brother's permission, asks her to marry him. She refuses, saying that her first priority is religion. She leaves for Leeds to preach. After she has been gone for a few days, Adam follows her to where she is preaching. He meets her on a hill, and she admits that she has been listening to her heart and what God is trying to tell her--and that it is to marry him. The two marry, and the epilogue depicts them living happily with their entire family, including two children.

Adam Bede : Introduction & Appreciation

Its Publication; Its Origin: - George Eliot finished Janet's Repentance on the 9th October, 1857, and began Adam Bede on the 22nd October, 1857. She completed the first volume by the following March: wrote the second during the tour in Germany which followed and after returning to England, at the beginning of September, completed the third volume on 16th November. It was published in the beginning of 1858. When recording these dates in her journal she gives also an interesting account of the origin of the book. It was suggested by an anecdote which she had heard from an aunt, the Methodist preacher, Mrs. Samuel Evans:

"We are sitting together one afternoon during her visit to me at Griff, probably in 1839 or 1840, when it, occurred to her to tell me how she had visited a condemned criminal—a very ignorant girl, who had murdered her child and refused to confess; how she had stayed with her praying through the night, and how the poor creature at last broke out into tears, and confessed her crime. My aunt afterwards went with her in the cart to the place of execution…..I then conceived the idea of blending this and some other recollections of my aunt in one story with some points in my father's early life and character.

The character of Dinah grew out of my recollections of my aunt, but Dinah is not at all like my aunt, who was a very small, black eyed woman, and (as I was told, for I never heard her preach) very vehement in her style of preaching.The character of Adam and one or two incidents connected with him were suggested by my father's early life; but there is not a single portrait in Adam Bede, only the suggestions of experience wrought up into new combinations. When I began to write it, the only elements I had determined on, besides the character of Dinah, were the character of Adam, his relation to Arthur Donnithorne, and their mutual relations to Hetty, i.e. The girl who commits child-murder—the scene in the prison being, of course, the climax towards which I worked. Everything else grew out of the characters and their mutual relations."

Time of Action: - Though Adam Bede was published in 1859, its action takes place in 1799. Those were stirring times when momentous events were taking place both at home and abroad. But Adam Bede is not a historical novel, and these stirring events are not even mentioned in the novel. The only historical event which is of any significance in the novel is Methodism. The Methodists or non-conformists or dissenters were people who did not agree with the doctrines of the established church. The founder of the Methodist movement was John Wesley, and he had allowed women to preach, but the Second Wesley Conference, 1798, forbade women preachers. This conference is mentioned in the novel towards the close. Methodism has been presented through Dinah Morris "the preacher-woman", and through her the best in Methodism has been highlighted. Besides this historical event, the novel is concerned with universal human passions, the tragedies of Sophocalian grandeur that take place in country solitudes. Hence the perennial appeal of the novel.

The Setting: - The setting of the novel is provided by the village of Hayslope in the county of Loamshire, and Snowfield and Stoniton in the county of Stonyshire, in the English Midlands where the novelist had been bred and brought up, with the characters, scenes and sights of which she had been familiar since her childhood, and which had fertilised her imagination. Indeed, the rendering of these country places is so faithful and the evocation of the Midland flavour is marked with such fidelity, that when the novel was first published anonymously, it was at once felt that its writer must be a resident of those parts, and many conjectures as to its authorship were made. No one, of course, suspected that an unknown and inexperienced, woman, like Mary Evans, was the authoress. Various landmarks of the places mentioned above have been given, and devoted scholars and George Eliot-lovers have visited the Midlands and tried to identify the villages and the counties with their real counterparts. However, all such attempts have remained futile, for Hayslope, Broxton Stoniton, etc., are dream countries or "countries of the mind". It is reality transmuted, glorified and modified by the imagination of the novelist.

The Characters: - The canvas of the novel is a crowded one, there being a number of characters both major and minor. First, there are the Bedes, village carpenters. The family consists of Adam Bede, the central figure, his brother Seth Bede, and mother Lizbeth and father Thias Bede. Then there are the Poysers, tenants of the Hall Farm. The group consists of Mr. Martin Poyser, his old father, his wife Mrs. Poyser—an immortal figure of fun—their two nieces Dinah Morris and Hetty Sorrel, and their children, Totty and others. Another group consists of the old Squire or landlord of the village and his grandson Arthur Donnithorne heir to the state. They live at The Chase with a number of attendants. Rev. Mr. Irwine, the Rector of Hayslope and Broxton, his old mother Mrs. Irwine a majestic lady, and his two unmarried sisters complete the list of characters who occupy the front of the stage. In the background, are such figures as Bartle Massey, the school-teacher,Jonathen Burgess, the carpenter, "wiry" Ben, a romping girl called Bess, Molly, the maid servant, and a number of other minor figures. Through these characters, George Eliot has given us a cross-section of village society, of its various professions and occupations, of its sorrows and sufferings of its joys, traditions and customs, of its jealousies and tragedies and of its narrowness and conservation. In this way the novelist has presented a faithful picture of the life and society of Midlands, as she knew it.

The Story: - The tragic tale of Hetty Sorrel forms the core of the novel and all other events and characters are related to it in one way or the other. Adam Bede is in love with Hetty Sorrel, a pretty, empty-headed girl who lives on the farm of Martin Poyser, her uncle. Arthur Donnithorne, is unaware that Adam, his old friend, loves Hetty; since he is attracted to her himself, he meets her on several occasions secretly in the woods. As Hetty's fondest dream is to become a country lady, she encourages Arthur.

One day, Adam surprises the lovers in the woods and forces Arthur to fight. The bewildered Arthur tries vainly to make light of the situation. Conscience-stricken, he writes a farewell letter to Hetty and goes off with his regiment, in which he holds the position of a captain. Hetty, to make the best of a bad bargain, then agrees to marry Adam in the spring. But as the wedding day approaches, her pregnancy can no longer be concealed. She thinks of suicide, but vainly goes in search of Arthur. On the way, she prematurely gives birth to her child. In despair, she murders it and is arrested.

At the trial her stubborn silence arouses great indignation; she is found guilty of child-murder and is condemned to death. At the last moment, Arthur arrives with a document, showing that her sentence has been commuted to transportation. Later, Adam marries Hetty's cousin, the gentle Dinah Morris, the Methodist preacher. The novelist had abided an Epilogue to the novel, which shows them living happily together with their two children. Seth Bede also lives with them, and we are told that Hetty is released after eight years, and that she dies on her way back home.

Greatness of the Novel: - Adam Bede is one of the most powerful novels in the English language. W.H. Hudson, speaks of George Eliot's "power of weaving tragedy, and tragedy as poignant and deeply moral as anything to be found in Aeschlyus or Shakespeare, out of home spun material". He shows how the story of Hetty moves "from weakness to sin and from sin to Nemesis". The story of Arthur and Hetty is indeed so moving, painful and tragic that the novel loses much of its power when they pass out of the narrative.

The novel is outstanding, too, for its rural background the pictures of farm life and the delightfully drawn groups of characters—the tragic Hetty and Arthur; the moral and spiritual Adam and Dinah; the amusing Poyser family; the Squire's household, the Irwine family and the rustics.

Religion and its Treatment: - Edmund Goose, tells us: "What really made the book remarkable was the manner in which the novelist brought her philosophical training to the study of religious character. This was quite new, and the world, much exercised at the moment by religious questions, saw the souls of Dinah Morris, the Methodist missionary, and of the other converts analysed, by a sympathetic outsider, in accordance with close actual experience, and not caricatured from a distance, as is often the case with Dickens."

Wisdom and Psycho-analysis: - George Eliot was the most intellectual novelist of her time. She was critical, observant, a deep thinker, highly intelligent and imaginative. Many examples of her wisdom are to be found in Adam Bede:

> "When death, the great Reconciler, has come, it is never our tenderness that we repent of, but our severity."
>
> "Our dead are never dead to us until we have forgotten them."
>
> "It is the favourite stratagem of our passions to sham a retreat, and to turn sharp round upon us at the moment we have made up our minds that the day is our own."
>
> "Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds."
>
> "There is no despair so absolute as that which comes with the first moments of our first great sorrow."

It is in the novel that for the first trial George Eliot is seen as a modern novelist. The analysis of the motives and the mental processes in this novel would do credit to any of the great psychological novelists of recent times.

Mrs. Poyser, the Cause of the Popularity of the Novel: - However in the final analysis, it is neither the treatment of rural life nor psycho-analysis nor Dinah Morris nor Adam, that at once raised George Eliot to the first rank among English novelists. Says Leslie Stephen, "Adam Bede for most of us means pre-eminently Mrs. Poyser and owes its popularity to her presence. Her dairy is really the centre of the whole microcosm. We are first introduced to it as the background which makes the kitten-like beauty of Hetty Sorrel, irresistible to young Captain Donnithorne. But Mrs. Poyser is the presiding genius. She represents the very spirit of the place; and her influence is the secret of the harmony of the little world of squire and parson and parish clerk and schoolmaster and blacksmith and carpenter and shepherd and carter. Each of these types is admirably sketched in turn, but the pivot of the whole is the farm in which Mrs. Poyser displays her conversational powers. The little rustic world is painted in colours, heightened by affection. There is, it may be, a little more of Goldsmith's beautifying touch than of Crabbe's uncompromising realism. But it is marvellously life-like, and Mrs. Poyser's delightful shrewdness seems to guarantee the fidelity of the portraits. She has no humbug about her, and one naturally takes it for granted that they must be as she sees them. It is, indeed, needless to insist upon her excellence for Mrs. Poyser became at once one of the immortals." In her later novels one sometimes regrets that Mrs. Poyser did not come to the fore to temper the graver moods. Mrs. Poyser may take rank with Sam Weller as one of the irresistible humorists.

Adam Bede : Major Themes

Honor: - Honor is an ancient theme with special resonance in medieval times, which is fitting in a novel set in a town that has an almost feudal landlord. There are two types of honor in this novel: that of females, and that of males. Female honor is fairly passive and relies entirely on chastity. If women lose this chastity, they are helpless to regain their honor. Male honor is more complicated and more active. Honor is tied up in their profession, land, and overall identity. When Adam runs away as a young boy because of family unhappiness, he chooses to return partially in order to maintain the honor of his family by keeping it economically afloat. He knows that the only way to provoke Arthur to fight is by insulting his honor, so instead of reproaching him, he calls him a coward.

Love: - The novel includes a few examples of true love based on mutual attraction. One positive example of mutual love is the relationship between Adam and Dinah at the end of the novel. But it takes others around them to work out their feelings for them, showing that it is not only mutual love that is important, but also a mutual love that is recognized and supported by both of the families of the lovers. Indeed, society matters for love; in other relationships, the complicating factor is always socioeconomic class, because the novel is set in a time period when marriage was more of a contract than a romantic affair. This problem extends to both men and women. Adam Bede is expected to marry Mary Burge merely because it would be an advantageous business proposition. Afterwards, he could become partners with her father, a man who had been his boss. What is more, there are two class-related barriers to a love affair between Arthur and Hetty. The first is obvious: Arthur cannot easily marry someone so far below his social class. The second is more subtle: it is unclear whether Hetty would be as attracted to Arthur if it were not for his wealth. When she does dream of their future together, she imagines the luxuries that he could provide her with, rather than the life that they could have together. There is even an impediment to Adam's courtship of Hetty, a pair who might seem to be of the same social stratum. Before his promotion to steward of the forest, some townspeople say that Adam is reaching too high trying to land the niece of a large dairy farmer.

Nature: - Nature is a constant presence in all of Eliot's novels. Unlike many romantic novelists, she does not make the weather correspond directly with her principal characters' moods or feelings. Rather, she comments on the sort of injustice that the weather always seems to be at its most beautiful when man is going through a particular hardship. This disconnection of natural life from human life is part of Eliot's literary doctrine of painstaking realism. Rather than have the weather reflect her characters' feelings, she quite accurately has her characters mark their memories and experiences in the context of their actual environment. Adam marks his movement from happiness to adulthood by the beech tree that he contemplated moments before seeing Hetty and Arthur kiss under it. Hetty marks her homeward journey not to return to the family farm, but to regain some scenery that is familiar to her. Dinah and Adam always refer to his interception of her in Snowfield and their agreement to marry as "the meeting on the hill."

Industry: - Eliot wrote Adam Bede at the time that the Industrial Revolution was beginning to change the face of life in Britain. More and more ingenious inventions meant that farmers were caught up in industry, and many moved away from their small towns into bigger cities. The village that Eliot portrays is a holdout against this new lifestyle, but the presence of new industry is indicated by the mill that Dinah works at when she is home. Eliot comments that Dinah is drawn to this town as well as to the industrial town of Leeds which, along with Manchester, was at the forefront of the Industrial Revolution. Dinah is drawn to such towns because of the great misery in them. Eliot seems to side with many poets and authors in lamenting the onset of industry insofar as it alienates people from nature. Eliot personifies the spirit of Leisure in contrast to this new industry, describing him as a portly old gentleman with excellent digestion.

Motherhood: - As a novel which centers on an infanticide by a mother, Adam Bede is necessarily preoccupied with motherhood. The most obvious example of a strong mother figure is Lisbeth Bede, who loves her son, Adam, almost too much. She is constantly worried about where he is, what he is doing, and whether he has had enough to eat. Her constant nagging, which irritates Adam, also ashamed him.Lisbeth's relationship with Seth is a much easier one, perhaps because she loves him just a little less--and therefore nags him just a little less. It is important to note that neither Hetty nor Dinah has a mother anymore. Both of them were orphaned and live with their uncle or aunt, respectively. The lack of a mother figure affects each of them profoundly. Dinah quickly grows into a mother figure herself, looking after and waiting on others before herself. Seth describes a young boy even climbing into her lap to be held during one of her preaching sessions. Hetty, in contrast, lacking strong guidance, grows up vain and petty. When she has a child of her own, admittedly under extremely tough circumstances, she kills it by burying it. She does have some motherly feelings, however, noting that she could not bear to look at its "little hands or little face" before she buried it. She imagines that she continues to hear it crying. This is why she returns to the spot where she buried it, and this is why she is apprehended as a criminal.

Sacrifice: - Because religion (in particular, Christianity) is of such importance in this novel, the issue of sacrifice and its nobility comes up quite often. The character most inclined toward sacrifice, Dinah, is also the most religious. Dinah is content to spend her life serving others if she thinks that she can bring them some comfort. This notion of sacrifice is parodied by Mrs. Poyser, who thinks that Dinah takes the idea to an extreme. Mrs. Poyser is upset that Dinah moves back and forth between different parishes, trying to calculate in which one the life is hardest so that she can choose the one needing the most help. Her aunt says of Dinah that she would only marry if the man were a Methodist and lame, consistent with her doctrine of help and sacrifice. Dinah must struggle against her conscience in order to allow herself to marry Adam, because she thinks that she loves him too much--it would be too little of a sacrifice. Eliot makes it clear that this argument (if not Dinah's whole perspective on sacrifice) is somewhat ridiculous, and besides, Dinah changes her mind in a short time and agrees to marry Adam. Eliot suggests that sacrifice is worthwhile for the most part, but not to an extent whereby it prevents overall personal happiness or other goods such as the creation of a family.

Female Identity and Autonomy: - The issue of female identity is often at the forefront of George Eliot's novels, even in one named after a man, such as Adam Bede. Of course, in the mid-Victorian period Eliot was writing in a male-dominated world; for instance, she saw a need to assume a male pen-name in order to protect her identity and popularize her writing. Among the most memorable characters in the novel are women with strong voices who are attached to men.

The most confident female character is Dinah Morris, who asserts her identity to Lisbeth Bede in Chapter Ten, announcing: "I am Dinah Morris and I work in the cotton-mill when I am at home." Dinah is also a confident and effective female preacher. Her resistance to marriage because she is worried that it will curtail her religious teaching is resolved by Eliot in a manner calculated not to upset the male hierarchy. It turns out that Dinah was not in fact prevented from a traditional marriage by religiosity, but rather by the fact that no man that she truly loved had yet asked her to marry him. Indeed, she quiets into a typical housewife at the end of the novel, even consenting to discontinue her preaching because the Methodist men have decided that it is not a good idea.

Another strong female voice in Adam Bede is Mrs. Poyser. She is much more intelligent than her husband, and she has much more control over their farm than he does. She inevitably has her "say out," which involves working up her courage to tell her hated landlord what everyone in the community thinks of him. She prefaces this opinion with, "Then, sir, if I may speak--as for all I'm a woman, and there's folks as thinks a woman's fool enough to stan' by an' look on while the men sign her soul away, I've a right to speak..." Still, Mrs. Poyser's marriage to Mr. Poyser gives her an added ethos in contrast to that of an outspoken maiden or, in Victorian fiction, the stock character of a dangerous widow.

Hetty Sorrel, in contrast to these stronger women, lacks the power or the initiative to speak up for herself. Hetty does not speak very much, and her preferred method of seduction is to burst into tears rather than to have a conversation. She pays dearly for this quietness, because she is not able to ask for help when she becomes pregnant. When she finally admits to Dinah in the jail cell that "I did it," this first instance of her assertion of agency comes far too late.

Inner vs. Outer Beauty: - Eliot contrasts inner and outer beauty throughout the novel to express the idea that external and internal realities do not always correspond. Although Hetty is more physically beautiful than Dinah, she is cold and ugly inside. Hetty’s outer beauty masks her inner ugliness, especially to Captain Donnithorne and Adam. Even when Hetty cries or is angry, she still appears lovely to both men. Adam is so blinded by Hetty’s appearance that he often misinterprets her tears and excitement as love for him. Hetty’s outer beauty also blinds Captain Donnithorne such that he loses control when she cries and he kisses her. Unlike Hetty, Dinah has an inner beauty because she helps and cares for those around her. She comforts Lisbeth through the mourning of her dead husband, and Adam takes notice of this. Adam does not think Dinah is as physically beautiful as Hetty, but he is drawn to her love and mission to help those around her. His feelings for Dinah change after he witnesses Dinah consoling Hetty, and Adam begins to see Dinah as outwardly beautiful. Eliot’s description of the natural beauty of the English countryside also shows the contrast between internal and external beauty. On the day Hetty wanders off to find Captain Donnithorne, the day is beautiful and the countryside is magnificent. However, Hetty suffers enormously under the weight of her plight. Eliot uses this contrast to encourage the reader to look beyond the surface and explore a deeper meaning.

The Value of Hard Work: - One of the chief differences between the good characters and the evil characters is their commitment to working hard. Most of the characters in Adam Bede are hard-working peasants who spend their days laboring on farms, in mills, or in shops. Those characters are generally characterized by gentle intelligence and simple habits. They do their best not to harm others, and they produce goods others can use and value. Examples are Mrs. Poyser, whose dairy supplies the other villagers and whose cream cheese is renowned in the area; Adam, whose skills in carpentry are unmatched and who is a good and fair manager of people and resources; and Dinah, who works in a mill. By contrast, those few malingerers in the novel are generally evil as well as lazy. The strongest example of laziness is Captain Donnithorne, who often complains that he has nothing to do, and whose boredom may well have contributed significantly to Hetty's downfall. If Captain Donnithorne had been busy sowing fields, he might not have engaged in his illicit and unwise affair. Those who work hard take pride in their work, and they do not harm others because they are careful and meticulous and do not have time for idle self-indulgence.

Love as a Transformative Force: - Love has the power to transform characters in the novel. The characters who love are portrayed as gentle, kind, and accepting. Dinah, for example, is a preacher but is never preachy. She accepts Hetty as she is, even when Hetty is peevish and selfish toward her. Dinah's love transforms Hetty in jail because she comforts and listens to Hetty and does not judge her. Before, Hetty was selfish and only thought about her own happiness. After, she is sincerely sorry for the shame she caused her family and even apologizes to Adam. Another example is Mrs. Poyser, and how she can be harsh toward those she loves. When Hetty's crime comes to light, Mrs. Poyser is the only one in her family who does not seem to judge Hetty. Here, Mrs. Poyser transforms from strict and critical to a loving and accepting woman. The one character that is not transformed by love is Mrs. Irwine, who is critical and sharp and never manages to help others. She does not feel, and so she is neither transformed by love nor capable of transforming others. For example, at Captain Donnithorne's coming-of-age party, one of her presents to a peasant girl is an ugly gown and a piece of flannel. This gift only aggravates the girl and makes her reject the present. Mrs. Irwine thinks she is giving the girls only what they deserve, and therefore she is not transformed by love because she does not care for anyone. Love only transforms the characters that want to help people other than themselves.

The Consequences of Bad Behavior: - Bad behavior and wrongdoing have consequences that extend beyond the wrong-doer, and even relatively small transgressions can have massive collateral effects. The central lesson from Hetty's experience with Captain Donnithorne is that doing the right thing is important because doing the wrong thing might hurt others in ways that cannot be controlled. Though Captain Donnithorne is not inherently evil, he provokes bad behavior in Hetty because she cannot go to him for help when she learns that she is pregnant. Hetty is ashamed and only thinks of herself when she commits her crime. As she awaits the trial, Hetty does not think about how her bad behavior affected anyone else: she does not consider the shame she has caused the Poysers or the effect her crime has on Adam. Hetty feels no real remorse for her sins and just wishes to not be reminded of any wrong she has done. Eventually, she apologizes to Adam and asks God for forgiveness, but the lesson of the story is that bad behavior, evil, and wrongdoing cannot be undone.

Adam Bede : Historical Background

The Isolation of Hayslope: - Adam Bede was published in 1859, but its story takes place in 1799. They were momentous times and stirring events were taking place in Europe and in England, but Hayslope, a remote isolated community which forms the setting to the novel, remains unaffected by these events. It is as if they did not happen at all, and the outside world for this agricultural community was a vague, remote entity, of which they sometimes heard, but which did not affect them in any way.

Some Historical Events: - Adam Bede cannot be called a historical novel, for the earth-shaking political events of the day are of no consequence and have no impact on the action of the novel. In the United States the Civil War was fought, slavery was put down, the West was all but conquered, and the Industrial Revolution (and with it the rise of the rich capitalists) changed the form and face of American life for all time to come. Italy saw the emergence of Garibaldi and the drive for Italian unity and independence. Japan stood on the threshold of the door of the world after centuries of self-imposed isolation. And Russia, freed her serfs, whose bondage was prior by hundreds of years to the slavery of American Negroes. Prussia arose as a great European power, first conquering Austria, then France, and then providing the military and political force that culminated in the proclamation of the German Empire. Defeated France fell into the throes of internal strife, and finally there was the establishment of the Third Republic.

None of these momentous events are in any way fore-shadowed in Adam Bede, which takes place, as George Eliot says, in 1799. As a matter of fact, none of the great happenings in the world that were contemporary or prior to the action of the novel seem to have had any effect on Hayslope. The American colonies had fought Great Britain for their independence and won, establishing themselves as the United States. Liberation movements were beginning to flare all over Latin America, and France had executed her king and queen in the ten bloody years of her revolution. Napoleon Bonaparte had begun his far-flung conquests and was on the verge of proclaiming himself Emperor of France. By 1799, England had been at war with France for six years, her great leaders, Wellington and Nelson, battled to contain Napoleon. To these French wars, the only reference in the novel is that Arthur Donnithorne goes out to France with his regiment, falls ill, is advised rest at home and so comes back to Hayslope. Otherwise, all these great happenings sound as remote to the people of Hayslope as if they happened on the other side of the Moon. They have no impact at all on Hayslope life, or on Adam, Seth, Hetty, Arthur and Dinah, the principal figures in the novel. The only historical event that makes its impact on the novel is the movement for religious dissent from, or non-conformity with, the established Church, known as Methodism.

Brief Survey of Religious Dissent—Methodism: - It should be remembered that the established Church of England is based on compromise between Catholicism and Protestantism and there have been dissident movements ever since the days of Chaucer. This tendency towards religious dissent or separatism continued through the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and the Stuarts down to the eighteenth century and even beyond into the 19th century. Methodism or 'Evengelical Methodism' was the most important form religious dissent took in the last decades of the 18th century. In the novel the established Church is presented by Mr. Irwine and Methodism by Dinah Morris, a staunch Methodist preacher and the heroine of the novel, thus providing the novelist an opportunity for comparing and contrasting the two. Methodism may be defined as, "a movement of reaction against the apathy of the Church of England that prevailed in the early part of the eighteenth century". The name 'Methodist' was originally applied to the members of a religious society established at Oxford in 1729 by the Wesleys and other members of the university, "having for its object the promotion of piety and morality. It was subsequently extended to those who took part in or sympathised with this movement." The term 'Evengelical' was applied from the eighteenth century onwards to that school of Protestants which maintains that the essence of the Gospel consists in the doctrine of salvation by faith in the atoning death of Christ. It lays more stress on faith than on action or on grace, and also strictly upholds the verbal inspiration of the Bible. It is the theoretical or philosophical aspect of Methodism.

Methodism: Its Founder: - The 'Methodist' movement was founded by John Wesley who was born in 1703 in Lincolnshire. He was educated at Oxford, and took holy orders in 1725. He became the greatest religious figure in eighteenth century England. The Methodist society was formed in 1729 when a few young men at Oxford came together under his, leadership. Their purpose was to observe strictly the fasts and festivals of the Church; to celebrate Holy Communion regularly and to keep them unspotted from the world.

In 1739, Wesley experienced great spiritual development. He now felt that he had a special message to deliver. He took the whole of England as his parish and went preaching from place to place. His influence was tremendous and thousands were converted, experiencing what they called "the new birth". His success was the greatest among the lower classes, which hitherto had often been beyond the influence of the established Church.

Its Popularity: - It became essential to have some organization to provide religious discipline for the thousands of converts, and the Methodist Society was strengthened, and its organisation extended to meet the need. Lay preachers were appointed; there were band meetings, class meetings and meetings in houses. Women who were able to preach, were allowed to do so. In the beginning they worked within the established Church but as the society grew, it became more independent, and in 1744, the First Wesleyan Conference was held. Formal separation from the Church of England, did not take place till after Wesley's death in 1791.

Dinah, a Typical Methodist: - Dinah is an example of the most sincere type of Methodist, whose greatest aim was to know the will of God and to follow it. "They believed in present miracles, in instantaneous conversion, in revelations by dreams and visions; they drew lots; and sought for Divine Guidance by opening the Bible at hazard." Dinah believes in all this, and she consults the Bible in this way whenever she has to take some crucial decision. Thus she consults it when she rejects Seth or accepts Adam.

Her Sermon and Her Impact: - Dinah's sermon on the village green is characteristic of Methodist preaching. The appeal is at the first general, with an emphasis on, God's love of the poor, then particular, with a rousing call to repentance, painting the misery of souls lost in sin. Dinah communicated her belief in the visible manifestations of Jesus, so that Christ's agony in the garden became very real to the listeners. Then came the warning against worldly vanity. Compare the passage on the ear-rings and finery in Dinah's sermon with the following passage taken from one of John Wesley's sermons: "Wear no gold, no pearls or precious stones, use no curling of hair, buy no velvet, no silks, no fine linen, no superfluities nor no mean ornaments, however much in fashion. I do not advise women to wear rings, ear-rings, necklaces, laces, etc." It is also to be noted that the stress throughout is on the poor, and what the saviour would do for them. Chad Bess is moved by the sermon, and tries to hide her large ear-ring, though by and large the people of Hayslope are not affected by it. On the other hand, the poor and suffering people of Snowfield are more receptive to it.

From the Epilogue we learn that after a time the second Wesleyan conference forbode women preachers, for most of them "did more harm than good with their preaching". Dinah too stops preaching and is thoroughly domesticated. However, this is a loss to the movement, for she is a devout and inspired preacher who did only good, and caused no harm at all, through her preaching. Remember, the way in which she consoles Lisbeth in her grief, and goes to poor Hetty in the prison and moves her to open out her heart and confess. From the way in which she moves Bess Carnage with her preaching, we may safely presume that she must have made many converts from among the sinners and saved their souls. Even Mrs. Irwine, who belongs to the opposite camp, has profound respect for her, and regards her as a force for good.

The Element of Universality: - The fact is that the people in Hayslope are moved by universal human emotions, and the themes, "of God and godlessness, love and jealousy, life and death, sin and repentance, are universal and come about regardless of the Napoleons and the Hitlers, or perhaps inspite of them. What happens in Hayslope in Adam Bede can well happen in almost any agricultural community on earth and in almost any period of recorded history." The soil was rich and nature was kind, but for a tenant who farmed land he did not himself own, life was always hard, and only the most provident fared well. Despite the establishment of factories in nearby Coventry and other embryonic industrial centres, England was still largely an agricultural country in a time in history when agriculture, handicrafts, and trade were the dominant influences. "Except for the universal emotions, the only significant aspects of the background to Adam Bede in the village of Hayslope were the need to work hard and skilfully in order to survive, and the fermentation caused by Evangelical Methodism." The upheaval in the rest of England, on the Continent, and in the New World was indeed in another world. It was as if Hayslope existed by and for itself. If these rustics appear quaint to us we should remember that all over the earth, thousands of Hayslopes and their people still work hard for a living and lift their political hearts for a moment to listen to a passing preacher.

In India, of course, there are thousands and thousands of such Hayslopes, where the people live in isolation from the great and historical movements of the day, and still cultivate, plough and reap in their age-old primitive ways. However, tragedies of Sophoclean grandeur and intensity are daily enacted in these remote, isolated rural communities, and the Hetty-Adam-Arthur Donnithorne story is only one such instance.

Adam Bede : Major Moral Conflicts

George Eliot believes in "art for morality's sake". She feels that a piece of art must exercise an ethical influence on readers. That's why all of her novels are "dramas of moral conflict". Her moral conception can be defined as:"Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds".

To Eliot, if someone breaks the moral laws, either consciously or unconsciously, the consequent sufferings and punishment are bound to come.

"Adam Bede" also presents a moral conflict aroused by failure, to resist temptation, of both the characters of Hetty and Arthur. Both of them are creatures of "weak moral fibres", and this weakness invites the intensive tragedy into the story. Thus, Arthur – Hetty story shows:"The movement from weakness to sin and from sin to nemesis"

Eliot does not draw her characters as tempestuous or villainous, but it is always a slight error of judgment or a desire of a character or some weakness, which brings the downfall. Hetty is also drawn simply as a village girl, with her girlish dreams of leading an "aristocratic life" with her prince charming.

In the beginning, she is leading a "protected" and contented life at her uncle's farm, unaware of the hardships and difficulties of man in the outer world. But she is vain and frivolous, loves finery and always lost in her fantasy world. Adam Bede, an honest, hardworking but poor man, who cannot provide her the "luxuries of life", loves her. That's why when Arthur casts admiring glances on Hetty she does not care for Adam and feels that her dreams of splendid life come true, for Arthur is a squire's son with a huge fortune. As Eliot remarks:"(Arthur's) … bright soft glance had penetrated her, and suffused her life with a strange happy languor".

Through his attention, Hetty becomes "thoroughly aware of her own beauty", and not considering the "social and economic gap" between Arthur and herself; She presumes that she can lead her desired life, after marrying Arthur. This is the very flaw and weakness of her character, which leads her to the sin and the consequent sufferings.

She and Arthur meet in the woods, until one day Adam, who forces Arthur to put an end to his contact with Hetty, observes them. Thus, there is an abrupt ending to their relationship. This is the time when Hetty's sufferings begin and all her dreams and fancies, to lead a splendid life, scatter. Here Eliot beautifully exclaims:"There is no despair as absolute as that which cones with the first moments of our first great sorrow".

Hetty's desperation becomes acute, when she realizes that she is pregnant and that the marriage with Adam is "out of question". Torn out by depressive and torturing thoughts, she comes out of her sheltered world and there starts her "physical sufferings". She reaches Windsor, in search of Arthur but for it is good for nothing. While returning back to Stoniton, she gives birth to a mail child prematurely. Next evening half ashamed by abandoning the child but, naturally, being a mother, fails to stop the haunting cries of baby that follows her, she returns to the child but too late.

This is the point, when Eliot beautifully describes the condition of a weak person, experiences social condemnation. As Hetty has no "guiding principle" to follow, though she attended the church, regularly, but could not absorb a single Christian idea or feeling. Therefore, when she faces "public disgrace" of her trial, Hetty "shut her heart against her fellow creatures". She is sentenced to death, for the crime of child murder. Later her punishment is reduces to transportation by the efforts of Arthur. Thus Hetty "pays full price of her unthinking folly".

It is, but to tell half the story, with an account of Hetty's weakness and its consequences, for Arthur is also responsible for her tragedy as well as his own, rather he holds a much greater responsibility. As Arthur James points out:"A weak woman is indeed weaker than a weak man".

Arthur Donnithorne is a young, squire's son, with high and noble ambitions and innate desire to do "good to everyone". He is naturally good and king hearted man and his flaw lies in his goodness and his lack of control of his emotions. He is an "admirer of beauty" and when beauty comes in front of him in the form of Hetty, he cannot have power over himself from being tempted by that beauty. Getting conscious of his sentimental state, he tries to forget Hetty, but it results only in the more intensified thoughts of her. It can be seen when he blames Mr. Irwine for his feelings: "If Irwine had said nothing, I should not have thought half so much of Hetty's as of Meg's lameness".

If Eliot has not given the "insight to his mind and thoughts" it would have been very hard to differentiate Arthur from a perfect villain, for he treats Hetty as a "juicy morsel" to satisfy his lust. It is Eliot's "art of X-ray", which makes her different from her contemporary writers. Arthur does hectic efforts to overcome his passion to meet, even to see Hetty, only because he is "naturally noble" and does not want to be a part of any scandal. But all his efforts prove in vain, when he finally reaches the woods to see her. Eliot comments:"It is the favourite stratagem of our passions to sham a retreat, and to turn sharply round upon us, at the moment we have made up our mind that the day is our own".

Thus, through Arthur, the author brings to light the psychological fact that the more he tries to suppress a passion, the more it grows stronger and fierce. The moral weakness in yielding to temptation, results in the devastating tragedy. Arthur also suffers from deep spiritual anguish. He tries his best to make amends and reduces the intensity of the catastrophe, which he had inflicted on himself, on Hetty, on Poysers and on Adam but could not save Hetty from transportation. However, by going away for several years, Arthur makes it possible for Adam and Poysers to remain at Hayslope. Thus, he"Drinks the bitter cup of repentance to the full".

In short, the novel is a study in "moral weakness and its terrible consequences". It seems that Eliot does not spare even the slightest "moral lapse" in her characters, and through their sufferings, gives definite "moral lesson". "There is a sort of wrong that can never be made up for".

Adam Bede : Plot-Construction

A compact whole: - The plot of Adam Bede is much better constructed than that of many other contemporary novels. This is so because the novel was not published in parts. It was not serialized in a magazine. There is not a single character or even in the whole of novel which doesn't further its action. The novel is a compact whole. It is like a well-constructed building from not even a single brick can be taken out without damaging the whole structure. The novels are George Eliot are 'organic wholes' in as much as the story, the character, the social environment are well-integrated. In AB, the life of Hayslope envelops the tragedy. It is an active society in which most men or women have work to and their characters are affected by that work.

Integrated Four stories and thematic unity: - George Eliot was quite alive to the problem of plot-construction. There are four different stories in the novel: (a) Adam-Hetty love story, (b) Hetty-Arthur love story, (c) Adam-Dinah love story and (d) the mutual relations of Arthur and Adam. The problem was how to integrate the four stories into a single whole. The story of Hetty, the heroine of the novel who is seduced by the Squire and later convicted of a child murder forms the core of the novel. The inter-linking of the various stories is made possible by the relation of Adam and Arthur to each other and to Hetty and the marriage of Adam and Dinah rounds up the whole and satisfies the contemporary conventions by linking the lives of the hero and heroine at the close. Even integrating the four stories has not kept away from the thematic unity of the novel. The theme is furthered by each action and event caused by the characters. The story grows up like a plant out of the idea or theme that, a failure to resist temptation is a moral weakness and any yielding to temptation is sure to followed divine punishment and consequent suffering. This theme is interlinked with the theme of moral enlightenment, self- education and regeneration. Such are the themes out of which the story evolves step-by-step, logically and the characters are their stories are exposition and illustration of these themes and ideas.

Social environment & the central tragedy: - The central tragedy is intimately connected with this background. The full effect of Arthur Donnithorne's yielding to the sensuous appeal of the pretty child-like Hetty depends on the relationship of the two to the world. The pride and well-grounded self-respect of the Poysers established in the reader's mind by the vivid pictures of their surroundings, their working, their home life, their Sunday observance and the neighbors' opinion of them, all play their part in causing the tragedy and in heightening the bitterness of its effect. It is the social background that the Poysers have provided for their niece and the standard of conduct that make it inevitable for Hetty to take flight before the birth of her baby; it is the esteem in which they are held by which the reader measures their shame. Similarly, it is Arthur's upbringing, his relations with his grandfather, his high conception of love and esteem, he will earn from all his dependants when he inherits the land that explain the price he pays for the weakness and his suffering. Not only are the story and characters integrated with their social environment, they are well-integrated in the present novel with their physical world. They are symbolic of it. They have the softness and fertility of Loamshire and it hardness, its spiritual deadness. They are not receptive to religion, for their life of ease and self-indulgence has made them spiritually dead. Dinah serves as a link between the two physical worlds. She has come from Stonyshire, rocky, hard and barren, but the people there are more receptive to religion, they are spiritually better alive. So whenever she feels that she is going to be engulfed by the spiritual deadness of Loamshire, she retires to Stonyshire. It is also to be noted that nature-background changes in keeping with the change in the fortunes of poor Hetty. Her early happy life is lived in the physical environment of Hayslope; from here she goes to the barren and rocky Stonyshire where she is convicted and sentenced to death.

Major Flaws and Ending of the novel: - Even best of us have their faults andweaknesses so does Adam Bede. Despite being the best constructed novel in the world, its ending has come in for a great deal of criticism. It has been pointed out that the marriage of Adam and Dinah Morris is not properly motivated, so it seems unnatural and forced. It is merely conventional that Hero and Heroin must be united at the close. George Eliot is first a philosopher and her critical and intellectual ability often impedes her artistry in telling a story. The author's commentary sometimes holds up the story and makes it laboured. For example, the writer labels Hetty as the sinner and she considers Adam and Dinah well-nigh perfect, but the modern reader finds Adam a bore and Dinah an impossibly perfect.

Melodrama: - The fight between Adam and Arthur in the wood is melodramatic and it was introduced at the suggestion of George Lewes. The story of seduction, a child-murder and conviction of an innocent girl, is the common stuff of a cheap melodrama. According to Robert Speaight, "Too much space has been taken up building up the background." Joan Bennett says, "If the characterization of Dinah partially fails to produce the effect intended, it is not because she is too virtuous but because of the author's treatment of the subject." Dinah is afraid to accept Adam because she thinks that her love would come in the way of her vocation. She retreats to Stoniton to ponder over the issue and accepts Adam when she meets him at the top of hill in Stoniton. Obviously, a change has come over her. But we are not permitted to see the process of this change and this is a major flaw in Dinah-Adam lovestory.

Arthur James remarks, "The central figure of the novel is Hetty Sorrel and the story should have ended with the conviction of Hetty. The continuation of the story after the point is fatal to the artistry integrity of the novel. His marriage with Dinah waters off the real sorrow for the tragedy of Hetty. As matter of fact, the further end of the story is a matter for another novel."Lettice Cooper's comments are worth-noting here, "The weakness of the book, besides the oppressive virtue of Adam and Dinah is, as with many Victorian Novels, the sacrifice and probability to plot, and the tidiness of the ending. George Eliot was moving towards a new kind of novel in which representation of life was to be more important than the plot. Despite all these life-like and natural situations and atmosphere drawn in AB, the marriage between Adam and Dinah seems like a mechanical device to round off the story." However, Joan Bennett justifies the marriage of Adam and Dinah on the ground that it enables the novelist to put the last touch to her definition of Adam's character to make him realize that there was too much of self and pride in him. A better justification for the close of the novel is that life at Hayslope had been shaken and disturbed by the drama of Hetty and it has returned to normalcy because of Adam-Dinah marriage. George Creeger points out that Dinah-Adam marriage is not an anti-climax, but it essential, otherwise Dinah and Adam would remain incomplete human beings, for there can be no fulfillment without love. It also enables the novelist to point out the moral that common suffering results in sympathy and it is sympathy which is the basis of truelove story. Sorrow is needed to make love true and lasting.

Conclusion: - The novel has its faults, but they are minor faults and they in no way detract from the novelist's skill in construction. It should be judged in the context of the age in which it was written and not by modern standards.

Adam Bede : A Psychological Novel

Introduction: - George Eliot is one of the founding-fathers of the modern psychological novel. As W.J. Long points out, "George Eliot sought to do in her novels what Browning attempted in his poetry. That is, to represent the inner struggle of a soul, and to reveal the motives, impulses and hereditary influences that govern human action.

Browning generally stops when he tells his story and either lets you draw your own conclusion or else gives you his in a few striking lines But George Eliot is not content until she has minutely explained the motives of her characters and the moral lesson to be learnt from them. It is the development of a soul, the slow growth or decline of moral power, which chiefly interests her. The Characters of Dickens and Thackeray are already formed when we meet them and we know what they will do under certain circumstances, but George Eliot's characters develop gradually as we come to know them. They go from weakness to strength and vice versa. " Her novels are a study of mental processes. As A.E. Baker rightly points out, "George Eliot's sphere was the inner man, she exposed the internal clockwork. Her characters are not simply passive. They are shown making their own history, continually changing and developing as their motives issue into acts and acts become a part of the circumstances that condition, modify and purify or demoralize the will. " George Eliot's power of psycho-analysis and her understanding of mental processes are fully exposed in AB. Therefore, many critics have called AB the first psychological novel as later exemplified by Joyce and Woolf because the psychology of the main characters, Adam, Hetty, Arthur and the Poysers is the theme.

Analysis of causes and motives: - The chapter called A Journey in hope; George Eliot spends far more time in Hetty's poor brain and heart than Hetty spends on the road in her unwise search for her runaway lover. This is psychology and the chapters immediately before and after this sufficient activity to keep the story rolling; there is much more inner activity than outer. George Eliot is deft in her psychological approach. Shortly after the death of Thias Bede, his wife Lisbeth was in the Bede Home alone with the body. After doing the necessary ritual cleansing and purification of the chamber where Thias lay, she slumped into a chair and contemplated her grief. When George Eliot's characters think we share their thoughts. When Adam accidentally comes upon Arthur and Hetty embracing in the woods, Hetty scurries away, and Arthur saunter forwards to Adam. He thought, "After all, Adam was the bet who could have happened to see him and Hetty together: he was a sensible fellow and would not babble about it to other people. Arthur felt confident that he could laugh the thing off, and explain it away. " But he misunderstood him. George Eliot's grip on psychological essentials enables her to draw complex characters much better than her predecessors.

Temptation and Moral Chaos: - The field of her most characteristic triumphs is the moral battlefield. Her eagle eye can penetrate though the entire sock and the smoke of struggle. She is particularly good at showing how temptation triumphs. No other English novelist has given as so vivid a picture of the process of moral defeat, as Arthur's gradual yielding to his passion for Hetty. She, with clearness, shows how temptation insinuates in the mind. David Cecil says, "Her characters always hang together, are of a piece, their defects are the defects of their virtues. We are not surprised that a man, so anxious for the good opinion of others as Arthur Donnithorne, should selfishly seduce Hetty, because we realize that the controlling force in his character is the desire for immediate enjoyment." With equal insight, she can portray the moral chaos that takes possession of the mind after wrong has been done. The guilt ridden conscious of Arthur is analyzed and we are shown the scorpions that sting him and prevent sleep. She lays bare the conscious and semi-conscious motives of Arthur. We see the workings of his innermost mind: He had been awake an hour, and could rest in bed no longer. In bed our yesterdays are too oppressive, if a man can only get up, though it is but to whistle or smoke, he has a present which resists the past. For Arthur, the loss of Adam's respect was a shock to his self-contentment, which suffused his imagination with the sense he had sunk in all eyes; as a shock. Arthur would so gladly have persuaded himself that he had done no harm if no one had told him the contrary.

Conclusion: - It is George Eliot's psychological insight into the springs of human action, the subtle analysis of character and motive accompanying the external action, which gives her peculiar and individual place among the Victorian novelists. She is one of them and yet how every different and original. She is the first of the great modern novelists who have a high conception of their art, who regard the novel as a serious art form, and who are given to the probing of the human psyche, to the subtle analysis of the subconscious and unconscious.

Adam Bede : A Novel of Rural Life

English Midland: - George Eliot began her career with a loving attachment to the region in which her youth was passed. Her interest was in a particular locality – English Midland which had a powerful pull on her imagination. Even in the simplest of provincial situation, life is revealed clearly, wholly and in depth. The Tragedy of Hetty Sorrel, a tragedy of Sophoclean intensity and grandeur, takes place in this rural setting.

Major divisions: - The rural world in AB possesses two major divisions: the counties of Loamshire and Storyshire (With their villages, Hayslope and Snowfield). Loamshire – most of the action takes place here and around the village of Hayslope. Regarded together, the Midland-shire and village constitute a kind of earthly paradise. Loamshire is a region of corn and grass – a fertile and sheltered land. Prosperity is not common and poverty is rare. Exile from this snug land is regarded by its inhabitants as the worst evil so the Poysers don't want to leave it. Stonyshire – throughout the novel we are reminded of a different kind of county which is naked and barren under the sky 'where the trees are few, so that a child might count them, and there is very had living for the poor in the winter' Poverty is common of these people. Loamshire is apparently soft and fertile, but it has a core of hardness, so also Hetty beautiful and soft apparently, there is hardness within her which is perceived by Mrs. Poyser. This is expressed in her 'stubborn silence' after the child-murder. Dinah tells Mr. Irwine, the Rector of Hayslope, "But I have noticed that in these villages where the people lead a quiet life among the green pastures and the still waters, there is a strange deadness to the world." Loamshire people are spiritually dead, while those of Stonyshire are more responsive to religion, more spiritually awake though they live in a hard region.

Sight and scenes: - The background against which the drama of AB takes place is picturesque and graphic and faithful descriptions of the region are abundant in the novel. Its scenes and sights, landmarks and customs, professions are transitions have been faithfully rendered. The geographical features such as inns, churches, mansions and road life have been honestly recorded. These sights and scenes play an important role in the novels of George Eliot. They appear and reappear in her novels and this imparts to them rare organic whole. The magic of the world works upon the reader in such a way that he finds himself passing through those instances of scenery. George Eliot's novels are highly pictorial and graphic in nature. She is a product of rustic and pastoral environment. She uses rich descriptions in this novel to provide a credible setting and to bring out the individual character of the setting and places where her characters live and to which they are bound by traditions, love, family, memory, work and affection. Finally, George Eliot uses landscapes to define, reinforce and foreshadow the events of the plot and moral situation. There are many scenes in the novel which we should not merely pass over as background materials. Mrs. Poyser is the voice of rural tradition and community, her home, the Hall Farm, provides a background that illustrates her character vividly. The Hall Farm is the center of orderliness, comfort, love, energy, security and peace. As Walter Allan says, "Mr. Poyser's images with his similes from unripe grain, are those of the farmer: Mrs. Poyser's those of the housewife."

Language, Professions & nature: - According to Anne Morley, "We do not know if our literature anywhere possesses such a closely true picture of purely rural life as Adam Bede presents it." The noblest achievement of George Eliot in the novel is the fact that she has succeeded in conveying to us the quality or flavor of the life at Hayslope. Its rude language, its typical dialect and the people in the novel all truly represent the rustic life. The characters in the novel represent a cross-section of Midland occupations and professions. The carpenter, the preacher, the Rector, the clergy, the farmer, the dairy-maid and the dairy hands, the common laborers and the vain village girls are all present in the world painted by George Eliot.

The symbolic word of Adam Bede: - George Eliot communicates the meaning of her novel partially by employing symbolism in the description of the physical world in which her characters live. These patterns point up contrasts and support, by an appeal to the visual imagination, some of the book's central ideas.

It is obvious that the names of the two counties mentioned in the novel and the names of the two towns where principal characters live are significant. Snowfield, Dinah's home town, is located in Stonyshire; as the names indicate, this is a bleak, forbidding region in which people eke out a poor living on the rocky hills or else work in a factory. Hayslope in Loamshire, on the other hand, is a pleasant spot where the farmers are prosperous and the workers comfortable; there are no factories, but only small neighborhood businesses like Jonathan Burge's workshop.

The "world" of the novel thus divides into light and dark, or hopeful and gloomy areas. Taking this world to represent life, we can see that Eliot is dividing experience into the pleasant and the unpleasant--giving us symbols for the "light" and "dark" sides of life. Dinah lives in Stonyshire; she is familiar with the darker side of life, accepts human suffering as necessary and inevitable, and knows how to deal with it. Adam, Arthur and Hetty, on the other hand, take a much more optimistic view of things and must learn what Dinah already knows. The crisis of the novel takes place in Stonyshire (in a town called Stoniton, as a matter of fact) and it is here that the three Loamshire people discover the meaning of "irremediable evil."

This division is supported by another one-that between controlled and uncontrolled human actions. We noted in the commentaries that the seduction, the fight between Adam and Arthur, and Hetty's abandonment of her child all take place in the woods. These actions, prompted by "natural" urges rather than by a "civilized" use of intellect and will, form one of the two primary causes of suffering in the novel.

The other cause is that part of reality which is beyond man's control. This area of human experience is symbolized by the tapping at the door in Chapter 4 which, though a superstition, turns out to be a valid portent of death, by the force of blind circumstances, and by God. Religion in George Eliot's novels seems to mean a respectful attitude towards the great unknown. Dinah, the completely religious woman, realistically recognizes the existence of evil and is patient and humble. Adam, who is religious in a naturalistic way, and Arthur and Hetty, who are not religious at all, have pride in them and must learn humility through experience.

Thus the world of the novel is set up to show that man must recognize that life has its less pleasant side and that suffering derives from the nature of things and from a lack of self-control. Like Dinah and Mr. Irwine, he must act upon this knowledge, avoiding evil whenever possible, accepting and dealing with it when it cannot he avoided.

Adam Bede : Changing nature of individuals & their relationship

When we compare George Eliot with her predecessors, successors and contemporaries, she enjoys unique position because of many qualities which make her a true artist of prophet like stature. Her understanding of human character and circumstances allows her to portray character with realism as well as sympathy.

Her main concern in all her novel is individual and individual's relationship with other individuals as well as individual's relationship with the society he or she lives in. Another quality which we do not find in the writings of other writings is individual's relationship. Tracing individual's relationship with the self makes her novels what we now call psychoanalysis. Then relationship is not something static in George Eliot's writings. They keep on changing and evolving. The final result of this change and evolution is an ideal state. Though this ideal is attained after lot of pain and suffering.

No novelist achieved this before George Eliot. Characters and relationships in the works of her predecessors and contemporaries and successors, to a great extent, are already formed and they remain static throughout their writings. On the other hand George Eliot shows complete understanding of human relationship. She portrays and shows all the intricacies and complexities which involve human relationship.

In Adam Bede relationship between different characters changes and evolves and it is never static and the changes which the writer shows are based on reality and authentic. The relationship between Adam Bede and Arthur passes through different stages of development and finally reaches an ideally state where Adam forgives Arthur for all the suffering and wrong which Adam has to undergo because if Arthur. If we consider relationship between Adam and Arthur we see how circumstances affect their relationship. Adam and Arthur remain friends till Adam discovers Arthur with Hetty in the woods. His reaction to the situation is natural and rash. His animosity with Arthur continues and Adam really thinks of killing Adam for destroying Hetty's life when latter is arrested for the child murder. George Eliot shows the storms and whirlwinds of hatred building in the mind of Adam. He would have really destroyed Arthur and finally himself in his anger had there been no Irwin to guide him. The relationship remains strained between the two till they finally meet in the forest where they had quarreled once. Here Adam is convinced of sincerity and good nature of Arthur and comes to believe that Arthur would never have done what he did if he had a very slight idea of the consequences of his affair with Hetty. All this has been shown with such skill and dexterity that Arthur finally avoids the demonic status which would have become his fate if he would have been treated anyone else but George.

It is not strange that we do not fond villains in George Eliot's novel. Actually she had complete understanding of human nature and character; she knew that human beings are product of the circumstance in which they are placed; they are neither devils nor angels.

In Adam-Hetty relationship George Eliot shows us the emotion side of love on the part of Adam. He clings to Hetty even after he discovers her affair with Arthur. He never tries to understand what Hetty wants in her life. His egoism does not let him any other thing. Hetty's beauty is a madness for him. When Hetty gets ready to marry him, he feels himself in the seventh heaven without caring that he was not the first thing for Hetty. Adam's relationship with Hetty has all the overtones of adolescent love which is always blind and selfish. George Eliot shows all this like no one showed before.

Arthur-Hetty relationship has also been portrayed with meticulous details. Hetty lets Arthur love her because she thinks that finally Arthur would marry her and she would live a life of a lady with all the comforts and luxuries which she loved more than anything else. She was not wrong; same could have happened if Hetty could have met Arthur during the time of her trouble. On the other hand Arthur's love for Hetty was based only for the time being for he did not knew the consequences of this kind of relationship. However, once he comes to know the harm he has done to Hetty, his love comes in the fore and he becomes ready to go to any length to save Hetty but alas it was too late then.

So is the case with all the other relationship treated in the novel. In every case the writer seems to be showing her concern as an honest recorder of details of changes which take place in relationship under varying set of circumstances. Everywhere whether it is relationship of Adam's father and mother or Mrs. Poysers relationship with her nieces and children, the novelist gives us useful insight into human relationship. Adam's mother grief over the death of her husband is realistic representation how wives are affected by the deaths of their husbands whether their husbands are good for nothing. Mrs. Poysers love for her kids shows the relationship between mother and her children. Mothers always love their children no matter how fussy they are.

The way Poysers behave when they learn about the allegation on Hetty and the way they change with the passage of time are very realistic. So is the change in Adam during the trial of Hetty. All this could not have expected from anyone else. Only George Eliot could have traced human nature and forces which govern human nature.

Actually George Eliot was unique genius. She was a woman living in Victorian England but through her observation, deep study and concern to show human being as they live she achieved superiority over all her predecessors and contemporaries and she showed characters from the inside of their souls and heads. The result is that she shows human relationship with all their shades and colours

Adam Bede : Literary Realism

Realism means the mode of writing that gives the impression of recording or reflectingfaithfully an actual way of life. The term refers, most of the times confusingly, both to a literary method and to a more general attitude. But what it interests us here, is the literary method which is based on detailed accuracy of description (i.e. Verisimilitude- which is very important in this period).

Adam Bede is believed that it is one of the best examples of literary realism in England and English literature. Realism, as we said above, has to do with 'recording' the life exactly as it is. So, writers do not have to imagine characters and plots that could fit in the real world. Furthermore, realists (and here George Eliot) focus more on the characters than on the plot. Also, realist literature appeared in England in 1840 and 'remained' for about fifty years. It had many differences from the previous movement, Romanticism, and people in the beginning found it difficult to 'deal with' the new idea of Realism and its meaning.

In Adam Bede George Eliot creates the false illusion of a steady and immemorial rural world. We can say that it is a realistic novel, first of all, because of the manifesto on realism in Chapter 17 and because of the plentifully observed details, which are really important in a realist novel. It also charts the consequences of moral action. The world of Adam Bede is immemorial and the village that George Eliot had chosen for her book is really very difficult to change, rather than a city, and many of the conditions of change would come from the outside (e.g. From cities).

George Eliot establishes the world in which the events of the novel take place, a world in which we live in, governed by the same natural laws that govern human existence in the world we know.

The first requirement for a true fiction is the 'hard' presence of a recognizably real world, and as we can see in many points George Eliot supplies it throughout the novel. For example, when she describes the workshop of carpenter (Adam's workshop), she tries to give us the sense of how difficult it is this work, by the use of details and descriptions. Also, in the description of the dairy in which Hetty Sorrel makes butter, we have 'a symphony' in colours and textures. These details make us feel like we watch the whole scene and smell the fresh butter. Adam Bede offers the radical contrast of a world shaped through and through by moral judgment and moral evaluation.

The massively slow movement of Adam Bede is her shape making technique. It is true that we are generally persuaded of the actual slow movement of rural life, and it is rural life – the life of villagers, tenant farmers – that George Eliot describes. Actually, as we can see up to now, George Eliot uses many descriptions, many images and many details in order to succeed her purpose: to write a realistic novel. She also uses facts from common people who live in the country-side and they are much more sensitive to the changes of life. Of course George Eliot has done very well her job and we continue.

The characters in Adam Bede are ordinary in either social class or native endowment and frequently in both, its tragic action grows out of a commonplace seduction, and its setting is humble and representatively agrarian. Perhaps, even more important is the treatment of these subjects: there is a high degree of consistency and historical accuracy in details of time and place, the background is richly and minutely crowded with particulars, and the account of characters' motives always stresses ordinary causes, rationally explicable.'

The distinction between realism of subject and realism of procedure is an important one. Both kinds of realism exist in Adam Bede, as they do in most realistic novels, detailed presentation tending to go hand in hand with the selection of commonplace and usually unfamiliar and unconventional subject. Realism of subject in the novel has perhaps had the most thorough treatment, particularly in discussion of the rustic background and the 'unheroic' nature of the central characters.

Another 'key' of the realistic novel of Adam Bede is the description of the natural beauty of English's countryside, especially in scenes of sadness or evil. For example, when Hetty tries to find Captain Donnithorne, the countryside is very 'luxurious' and the day is beautiful . Many people would think that this appearance of the day, represents also the beauty of Hetty; the outside,but also the outside beauty. But George Eliot here, tries to mislead us and she encourages us to look beyond the surface of people and things to their deeper characteristics. So, Eliot as we can see, tries to pass to the readers some messages about the people in the real life and she wants to make her readers more 'conscious'.

In Adam Bede George Eliot also tries to represent the life of the 19th century in England and especially in the countryside. As we can see from the novel, people faced many difficulties and the community was pretty 'strict'. Even if some people were 'good' sometimes they had to become 'evil' and face the real life and the problems. George Eliot was also very careful about the use of language. She used the every-day language of that period in order to make the novel more persuasive about it realistic style.

An example of the difficulties that people faced in the society of 19th century is the life of Adam. Adam is a hard man who learns, first through the death of his father and then through the suffering of an inferior being whom he loves, sympathy towards weakness. But what the idea of Adam represents in one's mind is not such a development, but something much more static. What it remains to the readers about him, are the qualities that he has from the first, summed up in his words to Arthur. ('I've seen pretty clear, ever since I could cast up a sum, as you can never do what's wrong without breeding sin and trouble more than you can ever see' (Chapter 16)). As we can see, Adam is a massive representation of the central Eliotic belief, but his dramatic existence, his learning through suffering, even his suffering itself, are by comparison notional.

As it mentioned in many books, the story of Adam Bede was actually the representation of the real life of George Eliot. In the beginning when people learned about that were a bit confused and 'afraid'. It was pretty hard for them to believe that everything or pretty everything that was written in Adam Bede was in reality the life of George Eliot. This shows us why the novel had so many details and descriptions. Also, because at first, the book was published anonymously, most of the readers believed that it was written by a man.

Finally, to sum up, we could say that Adam Bede is one of the first realist book in England. It represents reality in many different ways, using many descriptions, a lot of details,use of everyday language, representations of landscapes full of colours and 'smell'. Using the right methods and techniques George Eliot managed to write a realist novel which flurried not only because it was the story of the real life of George Eliot, but also because it was from the first novels with a realist context and it was pretty difficult for the readers of that period to understand it and understand its meaning. Unfortunately, there were many who 'fight' George Eliot and Adam Bede but when the years passed, they understood the value of this novel and they used it also in university studies.

Adam Bede : Social realism

George Eliot's Adam Bede is realistic novel of Victorian society including the social problem of highlighting the poor social presentation together with the retrace of rural areas of the country. Adam Bede is an example of Victorian literature aiming to reflect the social realism. Almost every literary genre of Victorian literature are engaged to reflect the realism of the contemporary society. So does this novel too.

At the central position of Eliot's Adam Bede there lies the basic tenant of social realism. The very rigid Victorian society has been reflected in the novel. Entire gamut of Victorian literature is inseparably linked with realism. Poetry, novel, drama and all pieces of Victorian writings are engaged in the representation of realism of either kind. In the same vein George Eliot's Adam Bede aims at representing social realism. At the core of Adam Bede lies the basic tenant of social realism. Let's examine in the narrative where the fundamental tenet of social realism lies.

Victorian society was rigid. It had a strict view concerning women. Victorian society was affiliated with blazes and prejudices. It has baize against women. If any women tried to move in the world of freedom and employment, she was mocked and ridiculed. Women were also expected to work in confined circles live household work. In this novel George Eliot represented a character Dinah Morris. She was a Methodist preacher. When Dinah Morris becomes preacher, many people indirectly criticized her. Dinah Morris was beautiful by appearance. People were attracted towards her. Many people used to listen to her preaching. But it was simply pretence. They actually went to listen to her because they were actually tempted to see her beautiful face. Most of those who attempted Dinah Morris's preaching were hypocritical, under the mask of religious devotion of those Sermon listener ran the sexual intention and corrupt selfish psyche.

Victorian age was the age of Thomas Carlyle. Carlyle was extremely critical of the growing Victorian attachment with materialism. People were distractingly crazy for comfort and happiness. They hardly believed in the dignity of work. Victorian people were neglectful of the fact that the worker should derived pride and joy from the work they do. During Victorian time workers were becoming increasingly mechanical. To correct his age Carlyle introduced the most repeated and very much hallowed maximum work is worship. To work is equal to worshipping, God. Through your absolute belief in work you can make God happy. It is work which links you with God. The impact of this maxim of Carlyle was unbelievably pervasive. George Eliot must certainly have been influence by the motto of Carlyle work is worship. That is why her character Adam Bede is shown climbing the ladder of social success by virtue of his belief in work. Adam Bede is a carpenter. He has achieved excellence in his profession. He was popular as a good carpenter. His name spreaded far and near. Due to his growing popularity he was invited to attend the birthday party of Arthur Donnithorne. Even the owner of Hall farm was eager to accept Adam Bede as a partner. Adam had a vision to leave the world more liveable for the further progeny through cultivating an eternal belief and pride in work. Respect dignity and prestige not from birth but from good and excellent deeds was the guiding principle of Adam Bede. And Eliot shows Adam being successful in society by virtue of his cherished beliefs and ideals. From this viewpoints also we can catch a glimpse of one extra brand of social realism.

Social chasm was another problem. The vestige of feudalism was still alive in Hayslop village. Hetty sorrel belonged to working class. Arthur Donnithorne belonged to the feudal class. Feudal class had still certain fascinating charm to the working class people. Hetty Sorrel was madly attracted to Arthur Donnithorne. She was from a poor family. Her family background was not nice. So she had a dream to marry Arthur Donnithorne and be a wife of a respectable feudal man. But such a fantasy driven effort of Hetty ruined her own life. Her tragic end created a deep wound in the psyche of Hayslop people. This accident in the personal life of Helty Sorrel suggests one bran of harsh reality the society faces when two different unequal classes try to meet at a point through emotion not through reason.

Social realism consists of how several characters were conscious of their class status at a significant social gathering. At the time of Arthur Donnithorne's birthday several people came to see and celebrate their feudal master's son's birthday. People were represented as conscious of their class background. Only Adam was given a respectable place in the birthday celebration because Adam had elevated his position through hard work and labour. This moment of birthday celebrations serves as screen in which social realism concerning the class consciousness of several people get reflected. In this way whether it is the position Adam or it is the position of caption Donnithorne or Dinah or Hetty, even characters gives symbolic reflection of Victorian society. Their depiction has been highly coloured with the image of Victorian society. Overall novel is realistic It includes the elements like realistic, social presentation, reflection of social problems, highlighting the poor people, setting in rural areas, presentation of Victorian morality, sense of brotherhood, religious, truth etc. are objective correlative to show the social realism in Eliot's Adam Bede.

Adam Bede : Ending of the Novel

George Eliot is a realist story teller. Her stories begin, develop and end realistically. As far as her novel Adam Bede is concerned, it not exception in this regard.

Adam Bede ends optimistically. Adam Bede marries Dinah, the Methodist preacher and they are shown living happily with their children. Seth also lives with them. Adam tells that Arthur has returned from his wandering in very poor health. We get information that Hetty was released from prison and she died on the way. We are also told about Poysers settling on their farm.

However, this ending of the novel has been criticized by many people because of many reasons. First great criticism on the novel is Adam-Dinah marriage. According to them this marriage is contrived and forced as an afterthought. Another criticism on the novel is the pardon which Arthur secures for Hetty through which her capital punishment is turned into life imprisonment and transportation. This seems to be ruin of what would have been otherwise a realistic piece of art. The way Arthur comes on his horseback is an episode which would have been accept in a romance but not in a realistic novel.

According to these critics the last part of novel is superfluous and unnecessary. They say that novel should have ended with the confession of Hetty and her punishment.

Let us see whether or not ending of the novels is satisfactory. Suppose the novel would have ended with the confession of Hetty and her punishment. The Victorian readers might have felt something lacking in the novel who always demanded poetic justice. We must remember George Eliot wrote Adam Bede for the Victorian readers and they always wanted all stories to be finished with a ray of hope. They demanded the punishment of the vile and reward for the virtuous. Both Adam and Dinah are virtuous characters and their union was central to the design of the novel. It is not strange that Dinah is introduced in the very beginning of the novel.

Dinah-Adam marriage provides this ray of hope. And to say that their marriage is contrived and forced as an afterthought lose ground when we see the whole design of the novel and George Eliot’s comments on the story and characters of the novel we feel that from the beginning Dinah was meant to be the heroin of the novel. In fact novel was meant to be show growth of two pure souls and their final union. It is true that the writer does not provide any clue that Adam and Dinah will be married till the time of Hetty’s punishment but does not mean their marriage was an afterthought. Dinah refused Seth’s proposal on religious grounds. But she accepted Adam’s proposal on the same grounds. In fact the novelist wants to show that like souls finally reach one another and Adam and Dinah finally reach other not because of contrivance and force on the part of the novelist. From the beginning it was clear that Hetty was not suitable and perfect match for Adam who was perfect human being in many respects and woman like Dinah should have a husband like Adam.

It does not make any difference that Dinah does not marry one brother and marries the other. It is something very common and we observe it even today when man does not marry a girl but marries her sister or vice versa. So it is not defect in the novel.

Now let us say something about the present ending of the novel and also see any other possible ending of the novel. The most important issue in this regard is if the present ending of the novel is against the principles of realism. Answer is no. it is very much common in real life that people marry someone else if something happens to the girl whom they want to marry. As far as Seth's love for Dinah is concerned, Seth himself gives his claim of marrying Dinah. It is also very common in real when brother fails to marry one girl and the other succeeds. So it must not be very shocking.

As far as the contention that the novel should have ended with the confession of Hetty and her punishment is concerned, by continuing the story afterwards the novelist shows us the regeneration of her characters. If she had finished the story where critics demand she might have left out a lot of things which she wanted to teach her readers. It is true that realism demands that life in literature should be like the life it is actually lived but this is narrowing down the scope of realistic literature. It should also show how life should be and how life should be restructured and reframed if some catastrophe disturbs actual course of life. We know that catastrophe keep on disturbing life and men should know how to behave and conduct during the time of crisis. This is what the ending of George Eliot's novel shows.

Still another objection on the ending of the novel is Hetty's death. Critics demand that Gorge Eliot killed because she did not know the solution of her problems. They say that George Eliot leads her heroines in difficult situations and when she fails to bring them out she kills them through some accidents. They say that she cuts the knot which she fails to straighten or untangle. This allegation is true to some extent. George Eliot was realist to the core of her heart. She once fallen if victim is a woman is fallen forever and only relief is the death.

We can conclude our essay that ending of the novel is appropriate and satisfactory and this ending allows the novelist to convey her message completely and convincingly. If she had ended the novel another way, she might not have told a story through which we erring human beings can learn lessons of care and optimism when we live our lives on this earth where we have but limited options.

Adam Bede : Maturity and education of Dinah

Dinah: Her Immaturity: - It is generally recognised that Adam, in the beginning of the novel, is not a fully integrated and mature personality. The head in hm outweighs the heart. He is proud, hard and self-righteous. But this truth is not generally recognised as far as Dinah is concerned. She is also not a fully mature person. She also lacks the balance of head and heart, the sign of maturity. The novel shows how, through her love of Adam, she attains this balance and becomes a fully integrated and mature personality. Thus it is also seen that the marriage of Adam and Dinah is not an artistic fault but promotes the central philosophical and intellectual purposes of the novelist.

Her Lack of Vitality: - Dinah in the beginning of the novel is mild, compassionate and a true and selfless devotee of God, but she strikes one as having very little genuine vitality. She is all heart. She scarcely seems to breathe in the midst of her enduring calm and takes little or no nourishment—only scant victuals as Mrs. Poyser would say. Confronted by a vigorous fruitful world, she retreats. The cause of her retreat is the fear of selfishness and hardness resulting from too great abundance of world by goods.

Lack of Involvement in Life: - There is a kind of unwillingness implicit in her fear to become fully involved in life. In this respect she is like her creator, who once said that it was a pity her life could not be managed for her, while she stood by, the passive but interested spectator. Just such a one is Dinah: she observes the human condition, with sympathy and compassion; it is true, but without involvement. Selfless is a word used frequently in describing her but, selfless means not only something different from selfish; it means also lacking in self. To lack this sense of human identity is to become something either less or more than human—a clod, perhaps, or a divinity." Talking of herself to Mr. Irwine, she says: "I'm too much given to sit still and keep by myself: it seem as if I could sit silent all day long with the thought of God overflowing my soul—as the pebbles lie bathed in the Willow Brook. For thoughts are so great—aren't they, sir. They seem to lie upon us like a deep flood; and it's my bestowment to forget where I am and everything about me, and lose myself in thoughts that I could give no account of, for I could neither make a beginning nor ending of them in words.

Her Retreats: - Such a psychological state represents a complete withdrawal from life, and withdrawal (or retreat) is characteristic of Dinah. Whenever, the going gets rough, that is, whenever life begins, paradoxically, to seem too pleasant and seductive, Dinah flees back to Stonyshire, barren and sterile under the "overarching sky". The most notable of these strategic retreats occurs after Adam has told her of his love. Following his declaration, Dinah replies that she could return his love save for the fear that she would 'forget to rejoice and weep with others', even forget the divine presence. Her peace and joy come from having no life of her own. Adam's love only raises the fear that she will forget Jesus, the man of sorrows, and become hard: "And think how it is with me, Adam:—that life I have led is like a land I have trodden in blessedness since my childhood; and if I long for a moment to follow the voice which calls me to another land that I know not, I cannot but fear that my soul might hereafter yearn for that early blessedness which I had forsaken, and where doubt enters there is not perfect love. I must wait for clearer guidance: I must go from you".

Here is clear expression of Dinah's fear of accepting full maturity; for the land which faces her (i.e. Loamshire and, of course, Adam) is a strange one; and who knows what life there may hold for her? Better, then, to return to the other land (Stonyshire and the self-contained world of childhood). There is at least no risk is run. If Hetty was incapable of growing up, Dinah is afraid to.

Her Growth and Maturity through Love: - We are not permitted to see the process by which Dinah is enabled to overcome her fear, and it is a serious flaw in the novel that it is so. All, we learn is that having been told by Adam of his love for her and having admitted in turn a love for him, Dinah once more retreats to Stonyshire, not staying even long enough to participate in the Harvest Supper. Adam, after waiting for several weeks, is no longer able to endure the strain and sets out for Stonyshire to find her. As he leaves the Loamshire world and enters gray treeless Stonyshire, he is reminded of the painful past, but in an altered light, for now he possesses what George Eliot calls a "sense of enlarged being", the consequences of the fuller life brought about by his suffering. He sees Stonyshire now through Dinah's eyes, as it were, and if his vision includes the barren land, it also includes the wonderful flooding light and the large embracing sky.

Adam waits for Dinah to return from her Sunday preaching not at her home, but on a hill top. Here, in the midst of her world, he discovers that Dinah has undergone a change, the power of her love for him has in a sense overcome her fears; she feels like a divided person without him, and she is willing to become his wife. He, therefore, takes her back to Loamshire whence she had so fled. It is not, however, to the green and golden world of June with which the book began; rather to an autumnal mature world. Here, "on a grimy morning in departing November", when there is a tinge of sadness in the weather as well as in the joy which accompanies the wedding, Adam and Dinah are married. And it is fitting that the hint of sorrow should be present, for in the world which George Eliot reveals to us, life not only contains sorrow, it needs sorrow in order that there may be love. It is in the fitness of things that they should so come together, for they are bound together by their common suffering for Hetty and by their painful memories. Suffering gives rise to sympathy, and love based on such sympathy alone can be fruitful and lasting.

Conclusion: - Dinah is domesticated in the end. It is not to be regretted. It is not a reduction of her exceptional destiny to mere commonplace domesticity. Rather it is the giving up of an impressive but rather an eccentric role for the higher destiny of full participation in the common lot of humanity.

Adam Bede : Adam's growth to maturity through suffering

George Eliot's Adam Bede is a masterpiece of literature. The novel shows growth of Adam Bede, a carpenter, to maturity trough sufferings. It may sound strange to people who are contented with the surface meaning and consequently do not try to read between the lines.

Adam Bede seems to be a perfect human being having outstanding qualities of mind and heart. When it is said that Adam Bede grows to maturity during the course of the story, a common reader feels a sort of shock. He cannot think that a man like Adam Bede can also have some flaw. Here lies the craftsmanship of the writer as far as presentation of character is concerned and understanding of human nature as far as life is concerned.

Nevertheless, Adam Bede and growth appear to be opposites. He has been presented as a successful person, highly admired and loved by everyone who knows him. He is a favorite of his mother: his mother shows more concern for him than his brother, Seth, in spite of the fact that the latter is gentler and milder in every aspect of life. His employer, the carpenter in whose workshop he works, wants to make him his partner. He has high esteem in the eyes of the young landlord of the area- the landlord treats him as his friend. With all these things on his side, the concept of Adam's growth appears to be extraneous- an outside idea.

George Eliot is a realist writer and her understanding of human nature is comprehensible that she can easily pick flaws in character which seems to be perfect outwardly. In the very beginning of the novel, the writer tells us that a beggar could easily ask Seth to give him some money but Adam's reputation in the area was established as person who would not give any beggar anything-rather he would scold them for not working and earning what they needed to live. This description of Adam's character is clear indication that Adam does not know the value of compassion and sympathy. This trait of his character is highlighted with respect to his relation with his parents. When he returns from his work and finds that his father has not completed the work which he was supposed to, he becomes very angry and starts working and when his mother asks him to eat something; he does not listen to his mother and goes on working.

Pride is yet another flaw in Adam Bede. George Eliot furnished many episodes to show us pride in his character. When he is given the charge of the management of the woods of the area, Adam's speech is criticized by many people for being devoid of gratitude and reflecting pride. In fact, he is a self-righteous person and this sense of self-righteousness makes him oblivious of the need of gratitude. We see how he finally comes to realize this shortcoming in his character.

He sees just one side of every issue. Rather he sees what he wants to see and what he does not want to see, he either shuts his eyes completely on that or at least does not think why things are not what he wants to see them. Here is lies the tragedy of his life. This trait of his character pushes him suffering. Though at times his suffering seems to be unjustified, he comes to admit this flaw in his personality during his second meeting with Arthur after Hetty's trial. This meeting is very crucial as for as Adam's growth is concerned. Even here Adam blames Arthur his suffering and Hetty's punishment. It is with the passage of time that he sees that Adam Arthur is also a sufferer and Arthur's suffering is as painful-perhaps more painful than anyone else-as that of Adam.

Yet another flaw in Arthur is his rashness and this rashness throws him in situations where he suffers more. His rashness is highlighted again and again throughout the course of the story through action taken by Adam whenever his character is put to test. It was his luck and presence of some very kind hearted people around that his rashness does not throw him in the dungeon of permanent suffering. Suppose he would have killed Arthur during his encounter with him in the Chase when Adam saw Hetty and Arthur love making, then what? Or he would have killed him in a fit of anger if Irwine-the country priest had not stopped him, then what?

If we study Adam's character carefully by shedding our chauvinism and idealism, we can easily see many defects in his personality. We find him a grown up child who does not understand the world and life around him. And because of this lack of understanding he suffers and his sufferings make him mature and Adam Bede at the end of the novel is different from the Adam we meet throughout the novel. He is compassionate, understanding and forgiving in everything now. He tells about his meeting with Arthur and talks about Hetty's death with words drenched in sympathy and forgiveness.

Many people say that the last part of the novel is additional and that the story should have finished with Hetty' confession. This is not a sound judgment on Adam Bede. Adam Bede is not about Hetty. Hetty is in the novel because of her relation with Adam. In other words, Hetty is in the novel as experience to bring about maturity in Adam. Hetty stands for physical beauty like the one that of Eve who tempted Adam, the father of mankind, to eat the apple and bring suffering in Adam's life. Her role is no more than this in spite of the fact that the writer gives a lot of space and attention to her character.

Nevertheless we can conclude our argument once again reiterating that the novel Adam Bede is about the growth of Adam Bede to maturity and this maturity comes through suffering and his rashness, pride and lack of compassion make his suffering inevitable. Adam's maturity comes through experience and Adam is guided by his luck and some very good people on the path of experience. Without these people Adam's suffering would have becoming perhaps permanent. Here the writer seems to be showing her faith in the society. Bartle Messy, Irwine, Dinah and Arthur represent this benevolent aspect of society.

Adam Bede : Methodism and its propagation

Methodism may be defined as "a movement of reaction against the apathy of the Church of England that prevailed in the early part of 18th century. John Wesley, who was a student at Oxford and took holy orders in 1725, founded this movement. Methodist society was formed in 1729 when a few young men at Oxford came together under his leadership. Their object was the promotion of piety and morality. The greatest success of this movement was among the lower classes. When the Methodist movement strengthened, lady preachers were appointed to meet the need. First Wesley Conference was held in 1744, in which women were allowed to preach but later they were restricted to preach. In the beginning, this movement worked under the established church, but as the society grew, it became more independent. However, separation was made after the death of Wesley in 1791.

"Adam Bede' was published in 1859, but the story of the novel takes place in 1799. This was the time of most stirring events all over the world. Civil war was fought in United States, in Italy there raised the Movement of Independence, Japan came out of self-imposed isolation, Russia freed her occupied areas, and France fell to internal strife. But Hays lope in England, in which the action of the novel takes place, remains unaffected by all these events. In "Adam Bede", the famous religious movement of the time, Methodism, is discussed.

Dinah Morris, who is one of the most devoted and firm Methodist, represents this movement. She is a very influential preacher and her sermons show the characteristics of Methodist preaching. Her first appearance in the novel is in a sermon at Hays lope. This sermon has a purely Methodist appeal. At first there is an emphasis on God's love for poor, then there is a call for repentance over the sins and in the end there is warning against worldly vanity. This speech is very much similar to one of the speeches of Wesley.

This speech creates a moving effect on the audience. However, by and large, the people of Hays lope remained unaffected by Methodism, while people of Snowfield are more receptive of it.

Dinah is an example of the most sincere type of Methodist. She has a soft nature and has great sympathy for the sinners. Her chief aim is to know the will of God and to follow it. She consults the Bible before taking any crucial decision. Hence, she rejects Seth and accepts Adam after consolation.

Dinah's Methodist spirit also appears on two occasions. First one is when she visits Lisbeth Bede to console her on her husband's death. With her soothing words and manners, she helps Lisbeth to regain her self-control. Dinah gets this healing touch through her Methodist learning.

The other occasion comes when Dinah meets Hetty in prison and makes her confess. Hetty has no concept of the agony of soul. She fears only for the suffering of the body. But Dinah makes her feel the physical presence of God with them. She urges Hetty, "To put a new fear within her-the fear of her sin. Thus, because of Dinah's efforts and prayers, Hetty realizes the sufferings of her soul, confesses her crime and repents on her sin.

The novel also presents the tolerant attitude of the established church towards Methodism. Through a short speech at the end, it is made clear that Dinah is not going to preach anymore. It is because the Second Wesley Conference has forbidden the women to preach. It was felt that women preachers did more harm than goodness with their preaching. But Dinah does not belong to that group of women. She is a symbol of purity and a force of good. Moreover, much of the story involves Methodism and hence it progresses through Dinah. However, Eliot is more concerned with the psychology of the characters and their moral choice. She wants to moralize the people and Dinah's Methodist approach also highlights the moral elements to be developed in the people.

Adam Bede : Art of characterization

In novel writing, in the same way as the emotional craft the importance of characterization can't be denied. Especially the current authors lay extraordinary stress on the genuine and mighty outline of characters. The incredible the nature of characterization, the higher is the request of fiction writing. This is precisely what we discover in just about all the extraordinary writings of George Eliot. She is rightly credited with presenting a very nearly progressive change in the depiction and presentation of characters. The authors of later era have completely recognized the significance of George Eliot in this respect. D. H Lawrence, a standout amongst the most powerful present day authors pays tribute to George Eliot in the after words: "It was she who started it all; it was she who started to put all the action inside her characters

George Eliot's expertise in characterization is currently completely perceived, however it is by and large accepted that this dominance is shown just in "Middlemarch" and all the more especially in the "Plant on the Floss". To some degree Eliot's inimitable ability is demonstrated similarly well in "Adam Bede", her first full length novel. Indeed here her characters are made impeccably dependable and their intentions are completely settled. It has been specified by numerous commentators that she uncovered all the complex sentiments of soul that strike at the entryways of aggravate cognizant. She depicts the activity before it is submitted. She uncovers the moves when they are making shape into the hearts. When they are conferred their grotesqueness is uncovered. For cases, the character of Arthur is the best case of the change got by the writer herself. In depicting this specific character, she uncovers all the cognizant and in addition semi-cognizant feelings which urge him to activity. We see the working of his inward generally personality.

The characterization in "Adam Bede" is completely vivid and important. In the expressions of a critic, "There is not a solitary character in the novel which is not flawlessly drawn, regardless of the fact that the representation is yet a portrayal still it is a genuine one. Indeed the character of Mr. Irwin, the individual, is precisely drawn and assumes an extremely great part in the last dilemma of Hetty. His religious learning has made him an exceptionally sensible and minding figure. The sufferings and desolations of mankind appear to him his own particular sufferings. He stretches out full participation to anyone who experiences shamefulness, mistreatment and unreasonable treatment. Indeed such a minor character discovers full chance to make an imprint on the pursuers."

The other critic, Hennery James and Gerald Bullet have discovered a few irregularities in the characterization in "Adam Bede". For instance, it is their conviction that the real characters like Adam and Dinah don't stimulate the sought investment. They likewise assert that the character of Mrs. Poysers has been over lauded. Her blamelessness, extraordinary enthusiasm toward life, her imparting ability, and incredible enthusiasm toward human mind and her free and forthright disposition in all matters of life make her an extremely finish character, the most suitable for the current fiction.

The entire exhibition of characters, from major to minor, has been delightfully anticipated to make coveted impact. The flawlessness and blemish of the identities of diverse characters comprehend a superb scholarly triumph by the incredible writer. The crest of characterization gets to be undeniable when we look at the mixture of characters, parts they perform and the internal coordination that they display at each level. The mental example of internal speculation is the trademark of unique endowment of characterization of George Eliot. The complex emotions continue adding to the general impact and the topical elucidations of the distinctive portions of the plot. No other writer of George Eliot's period can claim to have created such grand interlink and mental treatment at such a masterful level. Characterization is doubtlessly an uncommon peculiarity of George Eliot's craft of novel writing, which is hard to surpass.

To close, it could be said with supreme certainty that the writing of George Eliot are brimming with remarkable characters which are overwhelming. The regular kind of George Eliot's own particular identity gives shade and more extensive measurement to her characters. The inimitable characters are the glad result of solid personality of the author. Adam, Hetty, Dinah and few others affirm this reality.

Adam Bede : Hetty Sorrel represents Loamshire

Hetty Sorrel is a typical specimen of the Loamshire world. The background landscape keeps changes in keeping with changes in her fortune and career. In the novel George Eliot's presentation of nature-background is strictly utilitarian, as in that of Hardy in Tess of the D'Urbervilles."

Hetty has the fertility of the Loamshire world and also its beauty but conceals an essential hardness. To think of Hetty as she first appears in the book is to think her a being in certain places, themselves microcosm of Loamshire, the Hall Farm dairy, its garden and the Grove of Arthur's estate. Each of these places has an individual aura, but all are suggestive of fertility and growth. Furthermore, these places are appropriate to a particular phase of Hetty's relations with Arthur. Their first meeting occurs in the Hall Farm. George Eliot emphasizes its cleanliness and purity, but it remains subtly sexualized because of its nature and associated imagery. More explicitly sexual is the meeting which takes place in the Grove of Arthur's estate. Henry James regards Hetty Sorrel as the least ambitious and, on the whole, the most successful of George Eliot's female figures. He is of the view that Hetty's misfortune makes her the central figure of the book. The part of the story which is concerned with Hetty appears to him to be the most forcible. He concludes, "About Hetty Sorrel I have no hesitation whatever. I accept her with all my heart."

A second link between Hetty and the Loamshire world is that of her beauty. George Eliot writes, "a spring tide beauty, the beauty of young frisky things." Such beauty, at once suggestive of fertility and is difficult to comprehend it effect. George Creeger says, "It is a false beauty because it conceals a core of harness, as does the beauty of Loamshire itself. The people of Stonyshire observe her apparent beauty and those of Loamshire know her hidden hardness as Mrs. Poyser says, "Hetty's heart is as hard as a pebble.' She is a heartless beauty or rather a beast personified as beauty. Hetty's hardness is childish or at best adolescent egocentricity. All people and events have value or significance only as they affect the narrow circle of her own life otherwise they are not important. At the news of Mr. Bede's death, Hetty is concerned only as long as she thinks it is Adam who is meant; when she discovers her error, she lapses into indifference. She cares little about the Hall Farm, her family, aunt and uncle. So there is a persistent strain of narcissism in her. One thinks of her inordinate love of fine clothes and adornment. In such scenes she looks as if she were a worshipper. Before a mirror she turns up her own sleeves and kisses her arms with the passionate love of life. Even her love of Arthur is tinged with the same quality; in him she finds the objectification of her day-dreaming desires. What she loves in him is not so much Arthur as her own self."

Loamshire-Hayslope is a sheltered world, an earthly paradise. It is rich, fertile and beautiful world where nature is generous and abundant in this beautiful and fertile world, the poor Hetty has lived a sheltered life, entirely free from cares and worries which are the common lot of humanity. The result is that she has grown up without maturity. Growing up needs struggle; it is a process of facing difficulties and hardships. Childish creatures like Hetty in the Loamshire world are not called upon to face any such challenges; hence they remain immature and childlike. She has fantasies and day-dreaming in which she lives. She has developed a subjective world which entirely prevents her from looking at the objective world with total impartiality. She has always wished finery, clothes and jewelry. She dreams of a majestic life like Mrs. Irwine's and finds herself being taken in a splendid carriage. In the chapter entitled, Hetty's world, the novelist gives us detailed emotional fantasies. She couldn't marry Adam because he didn't come up the standard of her conception of a lover. It was only Arthur whom she adored. Hetty's dreams were all full of luxuries. The admiring glances from Arthur's eyes intoxicated he and she moved about and worked, lost in the world of her dreams. "A new influence had come over Hetty – vague, atmospheric and full of prospects." Hetty was quite uneducated - a simple farmer's girl, to whom a gentleman with a white hand was dazzling as an Olympus god. The Admiration of Arthur is like a strong wine that goes to her head and transports her to a world of fantasy. It is an enchanted world in which Hetty lives and moves. Arthur and Hetty are both wilful children living a sheltered life in Loamshire which may be called an earthily paradise. They are babes who fall an easy prey to the temptations of the devil. They are not mature enough to see the consequences of their actions. They realize only after the fall when it is too late. Much of the tragic catastrophe of both Hetty and Arthur springs from the fact that they are willful children performing adult actions in an age which is not golden. When the fantasy breaks and the dream are shattered on reading Arthur's letter, she is dazed and bewildered and heart-rending tragedy is the result. George Creeger points out that "Hetty is as much a victim of Loamshire as its representative."

To sum up, she has spiritual deadness and hardness so Dinah tries to prepare her for the possibility of pain in life in the early part of the novel, but Hetty remains deaf to all these things because she is self-centered. The effect of Hetty's ordeal is to externalize the hardness which is concealed in her heart, although she changes towards the end of the story. No one in the Loamshire is ready to accept the actions of Hetty not forgive her or in any way help her, but Dinah Morris is able to restore Hetty to humanity - to a better humanity, at least, than that with which she had been endowed by her own world.

Being superior to Hetty both in years and in experience of the world, Arthur's responsibility is much greater for the suffering and tragedy of poor Hetty. Discuss. (P.U. 2006)

George Eliot's' Moral Concerns: - George Eliot's novels are all dramas of moral conflict. She did not believe in art for art's sake, but in art for morality's sake. According to Leslie Stephen, "George Eliot believed that a work of art not only may, but must, exercise also an ethical influence." She believed that, "our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds". If we yield to temptation and sin, suffering and nemesis are sure to follow.

We have to reap the consequences of our own actions. Her characters suffer because they violate some moral code, because they yield to temptation whether consciously or unconsciously, in Adam Bede both Hetty and Arthur suffer for this reason. Poignant tragedy is the result because both Arthur and Hetty are creatures of weak moral fibre. They are unable to resist temptation. This moral weakness results in sin, which is followed by punishment and intense suffering. Arthur-Hetty story traces the movement from weakness to sin and from sin to nemesis.

Hetty: An Intensely Human Figure: - Hetty Sorrel is the central figure in the novel. She is sketched neither as a temptress nor as an innocent virgin ruined by a profligate young man, but simply as a village girl who has romantic dreams of life with a handsome and rich lover. She pays the full price for her unthinking folly. Her suffering makes the reader take a sympathetic interest in the feelings and action of this limited, selfish yet intensely human figure. In respect of the suffering that she undergoes she is regarded as the central figure of the tragedy. In the words of Henry James: "The central figure of the book by virtue of her great misfortune is Hetty Sorrel. Her suffering gives her special eminence. In the presence of that misfortune no one else assuredly, has a right to claim dramatic pre-eminence."

Her Sheltered Early life: -In the beginning of the novel we find her, happy and contended, in her aunt's home, looking after the usual work in a diary. Excepting rebukes from time to time from her aunt Mrs. Poyser, who really is fond of her, she lives a sheltered life and has not to face the hardships and difficulties which are the lot of man on this earth. But she is vain and frivolous. She loves finery, and is often lost in a world of dreams and fantasy. She is a creature of weak moral fibre, and is unable to resist the temptation when it comes to her in the form of Arthur Donnithorne.

Moral Weakness: Inability to Resist Temptation: - Hetty is loved by Adam Bede, a skilled carpenter, hard-working and honest, widely admired and respected for his qualities of head and heart. He is a man of whose love every woman would be proud. Hetty, too, is aware of his sterling worth, but he is poor and so he cannot be her prince charming for he cannot provide her with all those comforts and luxuries, all those means to a splendid life, which she yearns for. Vain and frivolous as she is, the admiring glances of Arthur go to her head even during their first meeting in the dairy of Hall Farm. Foolish Hetty is intoxicated; it is her dreams of a Prince sharing come true. Her imagination is excited and she at once dreams of the splendid life she would lead after her marriage with Arthur.

Her Dream World: -The novelist comments on her dream world and writes, "A new influence had come over Hetty—gay, atmospheric, shaping itself into no self-confessed hopes or prospects, but producing a pleasant narcotic effect, making her tread the ground and go about her work in a sort of dream, unconscious of weight or effort, and showing her all things through a soft, liquid veil, as if she were living not in this world of brick and stone, but in a beautified world, such as the sun lights up for us in the waters. The poor child no more conceived at present the idea that the young Squire could ever be her lover, than a Baker's pretty daughter in the crowd, whom a young emperor distinguishes by an imperial but admiring smile conceives that she shall be made empress. But the baker's daughter goes home and dreams of the handsome young emperor, and perhaps weighs the flour amiss while she is thinking what a heavenly lot it must be to have him for a husband: and so poor Hetty had got a face and a presence haunting her waking and sleeping dreams; bright soft glances, had penetrated her, and suffused her life with a strange happy languor. Since then her inward life had consisted of little else than living through in memory the looks and words Arthur had directed towards, her—of little else than recalling the sensations with which she heard his voice outside the house, and saw him enter, and became conscious that his eyes were fixed on her, and then became conscious that a tall figure, looking down on her with eyes that seemed to touch her, was coming nearer in clothes of beautiful texture, with an odour like that of a flower garden borne on the evening breeze". Hetty was quite uneducated, "a simple farmer's girl, to whom a gentleman with a white hand was dazzling as an Olympian god"

Yielding to Temptation: - Hetty was thus tempted, and the grown up child that she was, she at once yielded to temptation. When Hetty realized that Arthur loved her, she became thoroughly conscious of her own beauty. The scene in her bed-chamber shows her at her vainest. Dinah's serious talk upsets her, not because she responded to it, but because she had the timidity of a luxurious, pleasure-seeking nature which shrinks from the hint of pain.

Consequent Suffering: - But poor, beautiful Hetty was destined to face great pain and her lovely dreams ended in tragedy. "The parting with Arthur was a double pain to her: mingling with the tumult of passion and vanity, there was a dim, undefined fear that the future might shape itself in some way quite unlike her dream." Hetty's girlish happiness died on the night that she received Arthur's letter of farewell. There is no despair so absolute as that which comes with the first moments of our first great sorrow". They met frequently, and Hetty continued to live and move in a world of fantasy; till one day they were observed by Adam. The fight in the wood followed and Adam compelled Arthur to write a letter to Hetty telling her in unambiguous terms that he could never marry her. All the romantic dreams of poor Hetty were thus shattered.

And Punishment: - Hetty was tempted and she yielded to that temptation. This sin, the result of moral weakness, was followed swiftly by punishment and suffering. The two chapters—"Journey in Hope" and "Journey in Despair"—the two most powerful chapters in the novel, are the records of her deep spiritual anguish. She is dazed and bewildered by the tragedy that has over-taken her, moreso for when she realises that she is pregnant and marriage with Adam, has, therefore, become out of question. She is driven to desperation and contemplation of suicide by fear of shame and disgrace. She had no guiding principle to follow, for although she had attended church regularly, she had not absorbed a single Christian idea or feeling. Worn out with her wanderings to Windsor and back to Stoniton, she gave birth prematurely in the house of a stranger, Sarah Stone. The next evening, feverish and half-crazy, she went out and tried to escape from her shame by abandoning her baby in the woods. Its cry haunted her and she returned—but too late. Facing the public disgrace of her trial and the knowledge that she was condemned by all, Hetty "shut her heart against her fellow-creatures". Dinah alone was able, through her loving sympathy, to reach out and help her, convincing her of God's mercy and removing her dread of perpetual remorse beyond the grave. A sort of spiritual regeneration takes place when she opens out her heart to Dinah, confesses her crime, and prays with her for God's mercy. But this is not much of a regeneration. For Arthur is able to save her from execution, but not from transportation.

Arthur—His Weakness: - Thus Hetty's story illustrates the moral truth that sin—any yielding to temptation—is sure to be followed by punishment and suffering. This truth is also illustrated by the character of Arthur. He too is a man of weak moral fibre, he too yields to temptation, and the result is the tragedy that wrecks poor Hetty's life, as well as his own. He knew from the start that he could never marry Hetty, still he flirted with her, and had intimate relations with her. He was a man, superior to Hetty both in years and in experience of the world. As Arthur James points out, "A weak woman is, indeed, weaker than a weak man", and so Arthur's responsibility is much greater for the suffering and tragedy of poor Hetty.

His Responsibility for Hetty's Tragedy: - The way in which Arthur seduces Hetty—treats her as a juicy morsel to satisfy his lust—would make him the conventional villain of a melodrama, without the insight that the novelist has given us into his mind and soul. His is the tragedy of a weak man who is unable to live up to his good intentions. R.T. Jones in writes this connection, "the innocence that Arthur represents consists in cultivating friendly relations with everybody; never willingly doing harm to anybody; and being willing to make amends for any harm he may accidentally do. This innocence is a matter of intentions, of meaning well and meaning no ill, and is necessarily presented in descriptions of his thoughts rather than in actions. Without the account of his intentions, his actions, objectively regarded, would be almost indistinguishable from those of calculated villainy." For example consider the following:

"Do you always come back this way in the evening, or are you, afraid to come so lonely a road?"

'Oh, no, sir, it's never late; I always set out by eight o'clock, and it's so light now in the evening. My aunt would be angry with, me if I didn't get home before nine.'

'Perhaps Craig, the gardener, comes to take care of you?'

A deep blush overspread Hetty's face and neck. 'I'm sure he doesn't, I'm sure he never did; I wouldn't lex him; I don't like him she said hastily, and the tears of vexation had come so fast, that before she had done speaking, a bright drop rolled down her hot cheek. Then she felt ashamed to death that she was crying, and for one long instant her happiness was all gone. But in the next she felt an arm steal round her, and a gentle voice said—

'Why, Hetty, what makes you cry? I didn't mean to vex you. I wouldn't vex you for the world, you little blossom. Come, don't cry; look at me, else I shall think you won't forgive me.'

'Arthur had laid his hand on the soft arm that was nearest and was stooping towards Hetty with a look of coaxing entreaty……'

Comments R.T. Jones, "If Arthur had been conventionally wicked Squire's son setting out to seduce the village maiden he could hardly have made a better start. Yet George Eliot enables us to look at this scene—with the additional knowledge that there is no prospect of Arthur's marrying Hetty—and still remain convinced that he means no ill."

His Good Intentions—His Fatal Error: - For we have seen how Arthur has tried not to allow himself to meet Hetty: "If he lunched with Gwaine and lingered chatting, he should not reach the Chase again till nearly five, when Hetty would be safe out of his sight in the House keeper's room, and when she sets out to go home, it would be his lazy time after dinner, so he should keep out of her way altogether." His error is to underestimate the strength of his impulse to meet Hetty; this becomes more evident in the sentences that follow, but is already implicit in his apparent belief that after-dinner laziness will be an adequate deterrent. He goes, but returns early, and the author's generalisation serves to make the return intelligible to us and, at the same time, to make us aware of a common inconsistency which we may recognise in ourselves. "It is the favourite stratagem of our passions to sham a retreat, and to turn sharply round upon us at the moment we have made up our minds that the day is our own."

Stratagems of Passion: - The 'stratagems of passion' are seen with illuminating clarity when Arthur, after luncheon, is unable to 'recall the feelings and reflections which had been decisive in his decision to avoid Hetty'. We are told of his conscious thoughts, and the self-deceptions and distortions of truth that we see in them make, so to speak, a chart of the subconscious force of his impulse to see her—as a strong underwater current, showing nosing on the surface, is yet known to be present by the extent to which its pull on the keel of a ship alters its course. It is in such accounts of motives, conscious and unconscious, that Arthur is created and exists as a character in the novel. Our recognition of his good intentions, self-deceptions and weaknesses of will makes the portrayal real and acceptable to us.

His Suffering and Punishment: - As a result of his moral weakness in yielding to temptation, Arthur too suffers from deep spiritual anguish. His life is also wrecked. He is miserable, wretched and repentant. He tries to do his best, amends but he fails to save Hetty from transportation, and cannot heal the wounds that he has inflicted on himself, on Adam, on the Poysers, and on all those connected with the tragic tale of poor Hetty. However, by going away for several years Arthur made it possible for the Poysers and Adam to remain at Hayslope. He drank the bitter cup of repentance to the full, for, as he said to Adam, "I was all wrong from the very first, and horrible wrong has come of it. God knows, I'd give my life if I could undo it."

Conclusion: - In short, the novel is a study in moral weakness and its terrible consequences.

George Eliot as a Modern Psychological Novelist

Psychological Novel: It's Nature: - George Eliot is a Victorian novelist, but in many ways she is the first of the great modern novelists. She is a modern in her high conception of her art, in her view of the novel as a serious art form and in her interest in the human psyche.

A psychological novelist analyses the motives, pulses and mental processes which move his characters to act in a particular way. He depicts the inner struggles of his characters and thus lays bare their souls before his reader. Thus in psychological novels there is much soul-dissection, as in the dramatic monologues of Browning, and the novel acquires a hard intellectual tone. Samuel Richardson, George Eliot, and George Meredith are some of the pioneers to be mentioned in this connection.

The Inner Action: - George Eliot is an 'intellectual novelist' and she brought to bear on the art of the novelist an exceptionally well-cultivated and trained intellect, and extraordinary powers of observation and reasoning. Her concerns are primarily serious and intellectual; she is more concerned with the inner drama, the inner action, than with the presentation of the externals of character and action. She goes behind the external action, analyses the thought-processes, the motives, the springs of that action. Her novels are all novels of moral conflict, and the scene of that conflict is not the external world but the soul of the character concerned. Her novels are remarkable for their psychological realism, and this is her peculiar contribution to the English novel.

Spiritual Conflicts: Moral Disorder: - She goes deep into the obscure recesses of human nature, and deals elaborately and in great variety with those spiritual conflicts and moral disorders which bring about the ruin and downfall of an individual. The tragedies which take place in her novels are all tragedies caused by some moral lapse or weakness, and George Eliot shows how that moral weakness slowly but inexorably operates within the human soul, ultimately driving the individual to his doom. Each individual thus is shown to bear his own fate within him. A.E. Baker rightly points out, "George Eliot's sphere was the inner man; she exposed the internal clockwork. Her characters are not simply passive, and they do not stand still; they are shown making their own history, continually changing and developing or degenerating as their motives issue into acts, and the acts become part of the circumstances that condition, modify, and purify or demoralise the will." Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds. Thus she rationalizes life and character, bringing the obscure into clear daylight, with her zeal for truth applying the most rigorous logic to the resolution of each problem, working it out with the accuracy and solemnity appropriate to a judicial inquiry, and issuing verdicts as irrefutable as the results of a scientific experiment. This was to view life tragically, and the novel had to be reshaped to bear the stress of the new conception.

The Internal Drama: - Her novels are all biographies; Middlemarch interweaves the biographies of some fifty individuals. For the merely historical part, the loose epical plan that served Thackeray and Dickens was not inadequate. But the action invariably concentrates sooner or later into a crisis which automatically manifests itself in the inner drama. This is where the implicit idea, the central theme becomes clearly apparent, and the clash of motives and inhibitions which is the working out of the problem, now goes on to the logical conclusion. Such a novel is not dramatic in the sense that the action culminates in great scenes and spectacular events; there is a striking paucity of what usually constitutes incident in her novels. She rarely exhibits characters struggling together as on the stage. The drama is internal, it is the drama of moral conflict. The conflict is that of egocentric impulses, good or bad, with an opposing environment, and the antagonistic forces take many forms.

Portraits of the Inner Man: - Her psychological insight into the springs of human action is best seen in her delineation of her serious characters. She does not begin with the personality that appears to the outward world, but with the psychological elements underlying that personality. Her portrait is pre-eminently concerned with these elements. She may clothe them in outward idiosyncrasy, but this idiosyncrasy is never the principal thing about them. We do not remember her serious characters by their appearance or the way they talked, indeed we do not remember these things clearly at all. Her portraits are all primarily portraits of the inner man.

Probing of the Psyche: - George Eliot's serious characters are envisaged exclusively in their moral aspect. They are portraits of the inner man, but portraits not designed like Charlotte Bronte's to exhibit the colour of his temperament, but the principles of conduct—his besetting sin, his presiding virtue. Such a portrait inevitably omits many of those aspects of a man—his manner, his mood, his face—which make living most of the great figures of fiction. All the same, George Eliot's concentration on the moral side of human nature is the chief source of her peculiar glory, the kernel of her precious, unique contribution to our literature. Her imagination is not a distorting glass like Dickens, vitalising her figures by accentuating their personal idiosyncrasies, nor is it like Charlotte Bronte's, a painted window suffusing them with the colour of her own live temperament; it is an X-ray, bringing them to life by the clearness with which she penetrates to the secret mainspring of their actions.

Penetrating Intellect and Observation: - Her penetrating intellect is the source of her success. Her power of drawing conclusions gave her a naturally sharp eye for symptoms of moral strength and weakness, taught her to discern them in all their varying modes of expression in well brought up girls, in men of the world, a poor weaver, a lusty young man, to note that Dr. Lydgate did not take trouble with an ugly woman, that Hetty always avoided being left to look "after the children." She could also distinguish between different varieties of the same characteristic; see how Dorothea's sense of duty differed from Mary Garth's, Godfrey Cass's self-indulgence from that of Arthur Donnithorne. "And she took advantage of her observation. She traced these expressions of virtue and weakness to their original source in the character, discovered the spark of nobility, the streak of weakness which are their origin. Finally, her disciplined generalising intelligence taught her to see the significance of her discoveries." Having analysed a character into its elements, she was able to distinguish their relative force and position. She could deduce its central principle so that, however complex, and inconsistent it might appear, she saw it as a unity. It is this grasp of psychological essentials which gives her characters their reality. We may not see Godfrey Cass as we see Pickwick, but we understand him.

Psychological Consistency: - The result of such clear understanding of the inner man is that her characters are all psychologically consistent. They have inner consistency which is lacking in the characters of the other Victorian novelists. They also act under the irresistible force of their directing principle, and so they are always true to themselves. Further, this psychological insight also enables the novelist to sketch successfully the growth and development of a character. The stages in the growth and deterioration of a character are well-marked and logically consistent as, for example, has been done in the case of Lydgate in Middlemarch and Silas Marner in the novels of that name.

The Central Principle: - Further, George Eliot's grip on psychological essentials enables her to draw complex characters much better than her predecessors. Writes David Cecil in this connection, "Drawing from the inside out, starting with the central principle of the character, she is able to show how it reveals itself in the most apparently inconsistent manifestations, can give to the most varied coloured surface of character that prevalent tone which marks it as expression of one personality. Her characters always hang together, are of a piece, their defects are the defects of their virtues. We are not surprised that a man so anxious for the good opinion of others as Arthur Donnithorne should selfishly seduce Hetty, because we realise that the controlling force in his character is the desire for immediate enjoyment; so that his wish to sun himself in the pleasant warmth of other people's liking goes along with his inability not to yield to the immediate pleasure of Hetty's embraces. George Eliot can follow the windings of motive through the most tortuous labyrinths, for firmly grasped in her hand is always the central clue."

Source of Moral Defeat and Triumph of Temptation: - Her power of describing mixed characters extends to mixed states of mind. Indeed, the field of her most characteristic triumphs is the moral battlefield. Her eagle eye can penetrate through all the shock and the smoke of struggle, to elucidate the position of the forces concerned, and reveal the trend of their action. We are shown exactly how the forces of temptation deploy themselves for the attack, how those of conscience rally to resistance, the ins and outs of their conflict, how inevitably in the given circumstances one or the other triumphs. She is particularly good at showing how, temptation triumphs. "No other English novelist has given us so vivid a picture of the process of moral defeat, the gradual steps by which Mr. Bulstrode is brought to further Raffle's death, Arthur Donnithorne's gradual yielding to his passion for Hetty, Maggie Tulliver's to hers for Stephen Guest. With an inexorable clearness she reveals how temptation insinuates itself into the mind, how it retreats at the first suspicious movement of conscience, how it comes back disguised, and how, if once more vanquished, it will sham death only to arise suddenly and sweep its victim away on a single irresistible gust of desire when he is off his guard." With an extraordinary subtlety she describes how Maggie's passion for Stephen steals into her inexperienced mind, imperceptibly, so that she only realises it when it has become such an obsession that she is unable to see it in its true proportions. Alone in her room she can make the strongest resolutions but when Stephen appears the violence of her desire so overwhelms her that she can't see her conduct in perspective at all. She lives only in the present, and in the present she is only conscious that she is happy and must at all costs prolong her happiness.

Portrait of Moral Chaos: - With equal insight she can portray the moral chaos that takes possession of the mind after wrong has been done. She exposes all the complex struggling of a spirit striving to make itself at ease on the bed of a disturbed conscience, the desperate casuistry by which it attempts to justify itself, its inexhaustible ingenuity in blinding itself to unpleasant facts, the baseless hopes it conjures up for its comfort; she can distinguish precisely how different an act looks before it is done, shrouded in the softening darkness of the secret heart, and after it has been exposed in all its naked ugliness to the harsh daylight of other peoples' judgment. The guilt-ridden conscience of Arthur Donnithorne in Adam Bede is analysed in this way and we are shown the scorpions that sting him and prevent sleep. With rare penetration and insight George Eliot isolates and detects the various warring elements in Arthur's mind, his genuine compunction, his horror of being disapproved, of his instinctive resentment at disapproval, however justifiable, his inextinguishable hope that things will come right in the end, his irrational conviction that with him, at least, things always must come right.

One grows quite uncomfortable as one watches so merciless, so delicate an exposure of human weakness. The truth it embodies is universal. In exposing Arthur Donnithorne, she also exposes her reader.

Conclusion: - It is George Eliot's psychological insight into the springs of human action, the subtle analysis of character and motive accompanying the external action, which gives her a peculiar and individual place among the Victorian novelists. She is one of them and yet how very different and original. She is the first of the great modern novelists who have a high conception of their art, who regard the novel as a serious art form, and who are given to the probing of the human psyche, to the subtle analysis of the sub-conscious and even the unconscious.

"Eliot's Stories Grow Like Plants Out of a Theme or Idea in a Given Social Environment".

A Compact Whole: - The plot of Adam Bede is much better constructed, it is more coherent and well-knit, than that of many a contemporary novel. This is so because the novel was not published in parts. It was not serialised in any magazine, but was even, at first, published in book-form. So revision and excision could be possible. Loose odds and ends were tied up, and everything superfluous was rigidly excluded. There is not a single character or event in the whole novel which does not further it's action. The novel is a compact whole, it is like a well-constructed building from which not a single brick can be taken out without damaging the whole structure.

The Four Stories—Their Integration: - From George Eliot's own account of the genesis of the novel, it is clear that she was quite alive to the problem of construction. There are four different stories in the novel (a) Adam-Hetty love story (b) Arthur-Hetty Sorrel love-story (c) Adam-Dinah love-story, and (d) The mutual relations of Arthur and Adam. The problem was how to integrate these four stories into a single whole. The story of Hetty—the girl who is seduced by the Squire's son and is convicted of child-murder—forms the core of the novel. The inter-linking of the various stones is made possible by the relations of Adam and Arthur to each other and to Hetty, and the marriage of Adam and Dinah rounds up the whole, and satisfies contemporary conventions by linking the lives of the hero and heroine at the close.

Thematic Unity: - There is also thematic unity. The story grows like a plant out of the idea or theme that, failure to resist temptation is a moral weakness, and any yielding to temptation is sure to be followed by divine punishment and consequent suffering. This theme is inter-linked with the theme of moral enlightenment, self-education and regeneration. The moment of dis-enchantment, when all illusions and self-deceptions are shattered, comes to all alike. This is illustrated by the stories of Arthur, Hetty and Adam. Such are the themes out of which the story evolves step by step, logically and inexorably, and the characters and their stories are seen but to be the exposition or illustration of these themes and ideas.

Organic Wholeness: - The novels of George Eliot are "organic wholes" inasmuch as the story, the character and the social environment are well-integrated. The social environment forms the outer circle which envelopes the inner circle, i.e. the principal characters with whose life and fortunes the novel is concerned. For example, in Adam Bede the life of Hayslope envelops the tragedy. We come to know all grades of its society, artisans, labourers, farmers, rector, schoolmaster, innkeeper and Squire. It is an active community in which most men or women have work to do and their character is affected by that work. That character is also the product of religious influences; we become aware of the impact of Methodism upon the inhabitants of Hayslope and of the more subtly pervasive influence of traditional Anglicanism. In the Third Book the whole community is assembled at Donnithorne Chase to celebrate the young Squire's coming of age; by that time the pattern of living out of which the central characters emerge is clearly established and their drama is already under way. After the climax, when Hetty Sorrel has been condemned to death, reprieved and deported, and another author would feel that the work was complete, there is a Sixth Book balancing the Third. In it the rhythm of Hayslope life is re-established and, with the inevitable gaps made by the intervening event, a Harvest supper reassembles the same community as celebrated the young Squire's birthday.

Social Environment and the Central Tragedy: - The central tragedy is intimately connected with this background. The full effect of Arthur Donnithorne's yielding to the sensuous appeal of the pretty child-like Hetty and of all that ensues depends upon the relation of both characters to their world. The pride and well-grounded self-respect of the Poysers established in the reader's mind by the vivid pictures of their surroundings, their working day, their home life, their Sunday observance, and the neighbours' opinion of them, all play their part in causing the tragedy and in heightening the bitterness of its effect. It is the social background the Poysers have provided for their niece and the standard of conduct imbibed from it that make it inevitable for Hetty to take flight before the birth of her baby; it is the esteem in which they are held by which the reader measures their shame and it is the clear sense he acquires of their identification with Hayslope by which he measures the anguish as well as the probability of their contemplated uprooting when the shame is known to them. Similarly, it is Arthur's upbringing, his relations with his grandfather, the Squire, his high conception of the love and esteem he will earn from all his dependents when he inherits the land, that explain the price he pays for his weakness and his suffering.

There is no part of what we have learnt of the outer circle that does not affect our sense of the inner. The cultured benignity of the Rector, the moral enthusiasm of the Methodists, the simple ignorance of the country-folk, all make their own impact on the central characters and help to determine the events. Although the impression while we read is of a leisurely sequence of naturalistic scenes of comedy or of pathos and of a world richly populated with entertaining characters, when we look back we find that every individual scene or character is directly or indirectly related to the simple story at the core of the book, of the carpenter's betrothed betrayed by the Squire's grandson. In its setting this commonplace story becomes widely significant. The simple, well-contrived pattern conveys the sense of a social structure enclosing four human beings as completely as the soil encloses the roots of growing plant and, in so doing, it illustrates one aspect of the author's vision of life.

Integrations with the Physical Environment: - Not only are the story and character integrated with their social environment, they are also well-integrated in the present novel with their physical environment. They are symbolic of it. They have the softness and fertility of Loamshire, but they have also its hardness, its spiritual deadness. Dinah's preaching on Hayslope green leaves the audience, with rare exceptions, untouched. They are not receptive to religion, for their life of ease and self-indulgence has made them spiritually dead. Adam is hard and self-righteous, the stubbornness and hardness of Hetty comes out during the trial and Arthur is self-indulgent.

Dinah as Connecting Link: - Dinah is the connecting link between Loamshire and Stony-shire. She has come from Stonyshire, rocky, hard and barren, but the people there are more receptive to religion, they are more alive spiritually. Therefore, whenever Dinah feels that she is in danger of being engulfed by the spiritual deadness of Hayslope, she retreats to Stonyshire to carry on her vocation there. Thus she leaves Hayslope without even participating in the Harvest supper, because she senses spiritual danger in the marriage-proposal of Adam. It is also to be noted that the nature-background changes in keeping with the change in the fortunes of poor Hetty. Her early happy life is lived in the idyllic physical environment of Hayslope; from here she goes to the barren and rocky Stonyshire where she is convicted and sentenced to death. Seasonal changes are also carefully noted, and well-integrated with the changing fortunes of the principal characters. For example, the marriage of Adam and Dinah takes place not on a green and golden morning of spring, but on "a grimy morning in departing November". There is a tinge of sadness in the weather as there is in the joy which accompanies the wedding. Their painful memories of Hetty colour and subdue their joy in the present.

Parallelisms and Contrasts: - There is thematic organisation of material and there is also close integration of the action of the novel with the social and physical environment. Further, the heterogeneous material of the novel has been organised and patterned through an elaborate system of parallelisms and contrasts. The structure is symmetrical. The six books of the novel divide themselves into three symmetrical parts, each with a central motif of its own. The centre of interest of Book I is the assembly of villagers on the village green to hear the preaching of Dinah Morris. The incident points to the force of Methodism that tends to take the villagers out of themselves, but it also gives a hint; that the Hayslope community is not capable of any drastic change in this direction. Till this stage the two Methodists, Seth and Dinah, loom large before the reader, but eventually it is not the Methodist, Seth Bede, but Irwine's favourite parishioner, Adam Bede, who will steal the show, in Book III the central incident is the assembly of the villagers at the feast in honour of Arthur's birthday. This can be regarded as a pivotal incident insofar as the evolution of the Arthur-Hetty episode is concerned. The Harvest Supper in Book VI is a similar focal incident. It restores the balance disrupted by the force generated by the outcome of Arthur-Hetty intrigue. Of all George Eliot's novels "Adam Bede" possesses the most clearly discernible pattern.

The Rhythm of Rural Life: - It may also be mentioned that the novelist has succeeded in capturing the slow, leisurely pace of rural life, as it was lived in, isolated communities like that of Hayslope, before the coming of the railways. Dorothy V. Ghent says in this connection, "the pace of Adam Bede is set to Mrs. Poyser's clock, to all that, slow toil and activity that have made daylight and living valuable. Slower, organically, invisibly slow at the months of Hetty's pregnancy; the Poyser's clock, the clock at the Chase, do not keep this time with their eights and nines and half past nines. This other deep, hidden animal time drags the whole pace down to that of poor Hetty's journey in despair, a blind automatism of animal night where the ticking of the human clock cannot be heard."

Adam Bede : The Downfall of Hetty Sorrel

The tragic role of the character Hetty Sorrel is one that is central to the storyline of Adam Bede; her heinous crime of infanticide greatly unsettles the fictional community of Hayslope. Hetty aspires for something more than the manual labour of working on her Uncle's farm; she is initially attracted to the young squire Arthur Donnithorne, Arthur is attracted to Hetty and returns her flirtations without honourable intentions of marrying her, he believes that it would be wrong to marry outside of his own class. During their encounters Hetty naively romanticizes that Arthur will surely marry her, the marriage she visualises however is not one of love but one of luxury and finery, luxuries which would be unobtainable to Hetty as an orphan dependant on the charity of her uncle and his wife. Hetty gives herself to Donnithorne falsely believing that her dreams of grandeur will undoubtedly come true, however she immediately turns her affections to Adam Bede when she realises that Donnithorne will not make her a 'lady'. The characterization of Hetty Sorrel seems to vary throughout the novel in the earlier chapters she is condemned by the author for her vanity and selfishness, however in the later chapters of her suffering she appears to be dealt with more sympathetically.

Hetty is beautiful and is often described using metaphors symbolic of nature and of animal imagery; she has 'a beauty like that of kittens, or very small downy ducks'. 'Hetty's was a springtide beauty; it was the beauty of young frisking things', it was a beauty that seemed 'made to turn the heads not only of men, but of all intelligent mammals, even of women'.

Hetty desires material possessions and she believes that her beauty can be her means to obtain a life of luxury, however, instead of marriage and the life she longs for she gets an unplanned and unwanted pregnancy. It is a pregnancy that Hetty is not emotionally equipped to handle as she repeatedly denies that she ever was and shows little or no emotion at her trial she looks 'down at her hands' throughout the trial and has a 'blank hard indifference', standing 'like a statue of dull despair'. Hetty is unsure what she feels for the baby as she says 'I seemed to hate it', but she is sure of one thing and that is that she 'longed so to be safe at home'. Hetty is continually linked with connotations of maternal ideology from her less than caring attitude towards her cousin Totty and baby animals to her subsequent crime of infanticide.

The character flaws of Arthur Donnithorne are not implicated in the events of Hetty's downfall, though he clearly displays characteristics for which Hetty is condemned. It is after all vanity that drives Donnithorne in his seduction of Hetty. He knows that his desire for her is impractical but he carries on in his seduction of her nonetheless. Arthur is shallow and is ready to ‘pitch everything for the sake of surrendering himself to this delicious feeling’ that Hetty has created in him

Following Hetty and Arthur’s encounter in the woods Arthur asserts he ‘had not yet seen the woman who would play the lady wife to the first-rate country gentleman’. Moreover he is annoyed by Hetty’s expectations of marriage ‘her vision was all spun by her own childish fancy’, and he goes on to say ‘but Hetty might have had the trouble in some other way if not in this’, further trivialising Hetty’s fall and his own role in it. Arthur never offers to marry Hetty although he is free to do so, he writes ‘I know you can never be happy except by marrying a man in your own station’, remaining tenaciously class bound throughout the novel. Arthur’s rejection of Hetty is a great shock for her, her earlier dreams of becoming a ‘lady’ are shattered by Arthur’s letter but moreover her ego. At the conclusion of Adam Bede the reader is encouraged to believe that stability is brought about by learning through suffering and accordingly Arthur carries out a form of symbolic penance by going away to fight at war, on his return home he resumes his place as head of the community. Hetty receives no such redemption; she in fact dies during her journey home following the completion of her sentence, thus disposing of her in order to secure the acceptance of Donnithorne back into his position as head of the community.

George Eliot gives Hetty Sorrel the ultimate punishment of death for her ambition of marrying above her station, consequently George Eliot was merely a pseudonym used by Mary Ann Evans to hide her identity as a woman writer writing in a male dominated world. George Eliot continually presents Hetty ‘in exactly the way she envisions herself, that is, as an erotic object’, but that following Hetty’s ‘flight after she discovers she is pregnant with Donnithorne’s child’ that ‘suddenly the narrator’s condescending remarks about Hetty’s triviality and sensuality become veiled accusations against his own sex.

In conclusion the story of Hetty Sorrel’s downfall is essential to the moral development of the other characters in the novel as they ultimately learn to take responsibility for their individual actions. George Eliot aimed to portray through her characters, their relationships with one another and the eventual ‘downfall’ of Hetty Sorrel, that from suffering and pain there could be lessons learned and some good could be gained from an otherwise completely bad situation. It was also Eliot’s aim to express that ‘commonplace life is heroic’ , her huge concentration on Hetty Sorrel’s socially taboo story is significantly representative of Eliot’s desire to convey the ‘realism’ of human nature and the power of emotional force, it is this coupled with her attention to detail that marks her distinctive approach to realism. Eliot’s pen name was a conscious decision to popularize her fiction in the world of the male writer, therefore the masculine voice that she adopted within Adam Bede was consistent with her awareness of the patriarchal ordered society that she lived in. It was this awareness that lead to her condemnation of Hetty Sorrel’s vanity, however, it can be discerned that it is the characters around Hetty who have provided her with the notion that she is exceptionally beautiful and that it is her most powerful attribute, it is not surprising that she feels a sense of entitlement and when Donnithorne begins to pay her attention and it is not so odd to believe that she would envision a future as his lady wife, with her at the centre receiving sole admiration from him.

Bacon's Essays

Development of English Prose upto Bacon's Time

The English prose of Alfred's days differs radically in its linguistic structure from the English of the 14th century. It has, therefore, little direct influence upon the development of the new literary prose. Alfred and his contemporaries had fashioned a prose which was wonderfully flexible. According to the nature of the subject treated it was either conversational and intimate in tone or sonorous and periodic in expression. The prose of the 14th century consists mostly of translation from Latin and French devotional writings and homilies. They aim more at the edification of the common people than at style. The writers had no conception of the function of the sentence. This defect persisted as late as the end of the fifteenth century. Malory's Morted Arthur illustrates this defect, admirably. It is a quick moving narrative translated and "adopted" from the French. It reveals the author's bold intention of fashioning a prose style from the ordinary speech of his time. Hi often achieved a striking rhythm. But it is clear that he often tried to make his sentences convey far too much. His prose is roughhewn from the common speech and has not yet developed into an art-form.

Elizabethan Prose:- The Elizabethans had a genius for poetry and drama but their prose is often intolerable. They enriched the language by adding to its vocabulary many new words and phrases. But some of their prose is heavy, pompous and undisciplined. This pomp and their indiscipline are one product of a quest of persuasiveness. They occur chiefly in the works of those who sought to achieve their object by writing periodic prose in the manner of Cicero. Other peculiarities mark the work of those who tried to achieve it by writing what is called euphuistic prose. This was a style John Lily made fashionable. Hooker modelled his style on the structure of the Ciceronian periods. His style is a typical example of the way in which the educated Englishman of the day under the influence of the Renaissance were trying to give to English prose the clarity, the massive dignity and rhythm of the choice of classical Latin. Latin construction sometimes plays havoc with the sentences. The style now and then has "a monstrous beauty, like the hind quarters of an elephant." It is unfit for tine discussion of the ordinary affairs of life. Hooker has sought to please his contemporaries by trying to make English prose as pliant, rich and dignified as Latin prose. But he has often sacrificed the two important essentials of good style i.e. perspicuity and appropriateness.

Lyly was a conscious and skilful artist and introduced euphuistic prose. The distinctive feature of Euphuism are the courtly affectation of smart sayings, epigram and antithesis. In each sentence he tried to achieve balance, rhythm and perspicuity by neatly pointed antitheses and parallel construction but the resulting effect is generally unspeakably artificial and tedious to the modern ear. He tried to give to English prose a definite and obvious brilliance by his peculiar method of writing. It must be said that Lyly hit upon a fundamental aesthetic principle when he devised a prose style that was distinct from colloquial speech. He sought to satisfy the Englishman's desire "to hear a finer speech than the language will allow." But in this quest of persuasiveness he often sacrificed the virtue of appropriateness.

Bacon's Essays, much of the prose in Shakespeare and the Authorized Version of the Bible show the evolution of a prose style that combines dignity and rhythm with simplicity of expression. Bacon's writing is the distillation of many manners of prose writing up to 1602. The two main defects of English prose were unwieldiness and a tendency to "find writing". Bacon is the first scientific philosopher to write English in a clean, and terse style. The Essays have a note of authority about them. There is in his writing pithiness and relevance that hitherto had rarely been found in prose. But despite the brevity of his utterance, Bacon was Elizabethan in his power of imaginative suggestiveness. In their final form the essays are illumined with beautiful and moving imagery. Bacon's prose seems at times to lack appropriateness. He uses the same idiom and the same rhythm in his essays on 'Death' or 'Truth' and in his essays on trivial themes such as 'Travel', and 'Masques and Triumphs'. The Authorized Version of the Bible of 1611 is a production that towers above anything hitherto done in English prose. It is simple and concrete in language, rich and graphic in imagery and possesses supreme lyrical power. It yields its meaning with the utmost ease and directness. Bacon's Essays and the Authorized Version of the Bible helped to show to the writers of that age that the vernacular was capable of achieving literary excellence and dignified rhythm.

Sir Francis Bacon; 1561-1626

Bacon (afterwards Viscount St. Albans), son of Sir Nicholas Bacon (Keeper of the Great Seal under Elizabeth), born 1561. Became successively Solicitor-General and Lord Chancellor; deposed in 1621 for taking bribes. Died 1626. His philosophical reputation rests mainly on the Novum Organum (the "New Instrument" for investigating truth), a book written (1620) in Latin; his literary reputation on his English writings.

1597. The first edition of the Essays (ten included), the second edition (forty essays) appeared in 1625. Tennyson said: "There is more wisdom compressed into that small volume than into any other book of the same size that I know". Many of the essays are made up of extracts, compiled from commonplace books and his other published works, and woven together into a new whole.

1605. The Advancement of Learning (in two books). This work really laid the foundation of modern scientific methods.

1612, (?) The New Atlantis-the picture of an Ideal State, a curious but interesting romance, having points in common with More's Utopia.

1621. History of Henry VII. "With the exception of Raleigh's History of the World and Knolles's History of the Turks, there is no historical work produced at or near this period which will in any degree bear comparison with the polished style of Bacon." (Lumby)

Three Divisions of Francis Bacon's Works

1. Philosophical:
   (i) The Advancement of Learning.
   (ii) Novum Organum (New Instrument)
   (iii) De Augments Scientiarum
   (iv) Sylva Sylvarum
2. Literary:
   (i) Essays
   (ii) The New Atlantis
   (iii) The History of Henry VII
   (iv) Apophthegms (a kind of jest-book) New and Old.
3. Professional:
   (i) Maxims of law (1630, pleadings in law cases)
   (ii) Reading on the Statute of Uses (1642: Speeches in Parliament)

Bacon: A Historian: - As a writer of historical works Bacon is not much known to his readers. They generally associate his name with the famous Essays and some of his philosophical works. But he also wrote a remarkable book of History entitled, "History of the Reign of Henry VII. (1622)" It is the only complete historical work that we received from him.

Bacon: A Political and Moral Thinker: -His most important moral work is the Essays on counsels - civil and moral. These were published in the three editions during Bacon's life time. The first edition appears in 1597 containing ten essays. The third edition appears in 1625 in which the number of essays went up to 58. The moral tone of these essays is at times questionable. Quite often Bacon appears to be an opportunist. In his morals he is absolutely of this world. There are places where there is shallow worldliness which is highly disturbing and does no credit to this great man. For example even "such a noble and powerful sentiment as love appears to him to be a child of folly". Sometimes, even some of his conclusions are ordinary and common place. They do not show a very sharp mind behind them. But these essays are extremely widely read because of their worldly practical wisdom. They come home to men's business and bosoms. He is not preaching things of the spirit and the soul; his only concern is to show to men how to succeed in this life and world. Human nature and how to manage it would be good title for these Essays. As the French critic Legouis points out: "It is the art of success among men which is the subject to his Essays. He points men to the part he should play on the stage of special life, as is indicated in the sub-title of this Book: "Counsels-Civil and Morals." As morals of this world, his sayings have great force and weight. Many of them have become proverbs. Besides these essays there is a collection of ancient and modern sayings which Bacon did during the autumn of 1624 entitled "Apophthegms New and Old". He dictated from memory and they were published in 1625. There are about 300 of them, and some are very striking and some are dull. He also brought out a collection of arguments on moral matters with answers to them. It was entitled "Of the Colours of Good and Evil".

Bacon: A Scientific Thinker: - As a scientific thinker we are not to look to him for any particular discoveries. In fact he did not know very well the many problems connected with scientific enquiry in his own time. In some cases he rejected truth, and followed old fashioned and wrong beliefs. But his influence as a scientific thinker, cannot be denied and at the same time underrated. The influence exercised by him was naturally of a kind which we should expect from a thinker who had taken the whole field of knowledge as his province. F.G. Selby points out: "Inquirers were naturally gratified by the dignity which he gave to their labours, and encourage by the prospects which he held out. He gave to science a human interest. He gave it high hopes and a definite aim." Very often the critics of Bacon try to belittle his importance by saying that he made no scientific discovery and his method of inquiry could never become the method of great scientists later on. This argument does not hold much water. The scientific discovery in itself is not as important as the faith that Science is an important field of human activity which could open up the secrets of Nature. Bush, the critic is very correct when he says "Bacon is not historically negligible a scientific thinker. His scientific deficiency does not essentially weaken the force of his message for his time". Indeed, it was Bacon who substituted the humble and critical interrogation of Nature for the arbitrary concept of traditional authority. It was a very big achievement indeed for a great lawyer, statesman. To quote Bush once again, "he not only summoned men to research, he brought the Cinderella of Science out of her partial obscurity and enthroned her as the queer, of the world. No one any longer could be deaf to the scientific and humanitarian gospel of experiment, invention, utility and progress". Thus Bacon made no scientific discovery as Newton and Harvey made. But he laid the solid foundation of science because he was the first man to point out the importance of experiment hi the study of knowledge. He was the first man who laughed at the idea of authority based on scientific observation. Once arbitrary Authority has been replaced by critical Enquiry and Experiment. Science in its true sense had taken birth. Bacon's contribution in this respect remains unique and outstanding.

Bacon: A Philosophical Thinker: - To the students of literature Bacon will remain a great name and force because of his Essays. But the legal, historical and even the moral works do not sum up his most valuable achievement in scholarship. His greatest contribution to the Advancement of Learning was made possible by his philosophical works. As a philosophical thinker he was inspired by two purposes: 1. He wanted to increase the bounds of human knowledge. 2. He wanted to make man powerful over Nature. In order to do that he had to survey the whole field of human knowledge and fight against many malpractices which had come into existence in the study of Science and Nature. In order to achieve his objects he formulated a grand scheme of philosophical studies which he called Instauration Magna. This scheme was highly ambitious and has six important parts.

Bacon challenged the basic beliefs of man e.g. truth, love, friendship, honesty, secrecy and reshaped them. He challenged the most established norm and ideals of mankind. He questioned everything; he questioned what was, generally, considered unquestionable. He was an iconoclast. His approach was revolutionary. He begins his essays with a challenging statement i.e. what is truth, what is friendship and what is love.

He was very skeptical. He believed that the test of the truth of everything is in practical observation. He believes that experience is the basis of every judgment. This is called empirical approach. And no doubt he was an empiricist. His way of thinking was inductive. It was based upon facts and upon data. His spirit of inquiry and spirit of skepticism was the outcome of Renaissance. Bacon was very utilitarian. Like a scientist, he did only what was useful.

His training had been as a scholastic but his approach was anti-scholastic. He was bitterly against the scholastic approach. He said that the arguments of scholastics appear to be very intelligent and philosophical but actually these are nothing but only mental luxury. He said that scholastic try to prove the proven, means, who is God, what is sin or reward. In philosophy, this attitude is called begging in question. What is to be proved, it is taken as supposed.

Bacon says the reasoning of schoolmen is in fact very smart and full of life but actually this life is like the life of worms in rotten flesh. They appear to be very active but this is a very deadly activity. They are not agent of life rather they are the agents of death. The arguments of scholastics kill the mind than to develop the mind. Thus Bacon demolished the scholasticism with their own tools.

Bacon gave the theory of "duality of truth". He proved that ideals are definitely good but ideals are only for ideal and perfect people. Imperfect people can't follow the ideals and when they can't follow them they go reverse and tell lies. Bacon said that everyone should try to be as good as possible. One must realize his faculties. An imperfect man must compromise with his imperfection. Instead of cursing himself one should compromise with his imperfection. This is called "expediency". That truth is only for ideal people and for common man expediency should be the principle.

Bacon said that there are two kinds of truths – heavenly truth and earthly truth. He further said that heavenly truth is contained in Bible and it is for "salvation". But earthly truth is in the laws of nature and in the means of science and it is necessary for earthly success. And this earthly truth is different from heavenly truth. Both are opposite to each other and can't function for its opposite and one must be able to differentiate between them. This is called relativity of truth or duality of truth. L. C. Knight wrote that Bacon did not give the theory of the duality of truth but he only stated the facts who actually believe in their conducts.

What Bacon's essays reveal is that:

1. Man in relation to the world and society.
2. Man in relation to himself
3. Man in relation his Maker.

The Character of Francis Bacon

Long is of the view that, in Bacon we see; "One of those complex and contradictory natures which are the despair of the biographer".

Bacon had a dual personality. He was mental giant but a moral dwarf. It was this very complexity of Bacon's character which pope stressed in his usual neat, epigrammatic manner, when he wrote,

> "If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shined,
> The Wisest, Brightest, Meanest of mankind"

The facts of Bacon's life amply bear out that he was the brightest of mankind. Though he was born with the silver spoon in his mouth, he was left unprovided and friendless at the threshold of his career. His father died and there was no one to help him to get settled in life. In those days of intrigues and cunning party politics, nobody could hope to make his mark unless he enjoyed the patronage of the influential. Despite such handicaps, Bacon's rise to eminence was meteoric. As a lawyer he became immediately successful. His knowledge of law and power of pleading became widely known and it was almost at the beginning of his parliamentary career that Jonson wrote, "No man ever spoke more neatly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness in what he uttered"

The vastness of Bacon's mind is amazing. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. He commanded where he spoke; and had his judges angry and pleased at his direction. No man had their affections more in his power. The fear of every man, that heard him, was that he should make an end. He was knighted in 1603, made Solicitor General in 1607, Attorney General I 1613, Lord Keeper in 1617, Lord Chancellor in 1618 and Viscount St. Albans in 1621. This immense and rapid success, in spite of bitter enemies and hostilities, can never be attained without wisdom and brightness. Skemp says, while he was discussing the Bacon's character, "Bacon stands second in intellectual power only to Shakespeare"

A man of towering intellect, he could dare to take all knowledge to be his province. It is impossible to regard even the outline of his vast work. He worked endlessly to penetrate the secrets of nature, fathered the inductive system of philosophy, and thus paved the way for emergence of modern science. Many of his principles may sound rudimentary to us, but in Bacon's time they were original and had for reaching consequences. He revolutionized the entire concept of scientific research and ushered in the era of modernism. His head was ever buzzing with huge schemes- the pacification of unhappy Ireland, the simplification of England law, the reform of the church, the study of the nature, and the establishment of a new philosophy. Summarizing his scientific achievements Bush writes, "He not only summoned men to research, he brought the Cinderella of science out of her partial obscurity and enthroned her as the queen of the world"

In the field of literature also his attainments are equally brilliant. He is the father of English essay. No doubt he borrowed the term and the thing from French Montaigne, but he filled it with the products of his own brain. His style is marvelous. It is terse and pithy, packed with thought, in an age that used endless circumlocution. He created a new style of writing- the modern style- and may very well be called the father of modern English prose. His observation was minute and accurate and his essays cover a wide variety of subjects suggested by the life of a man around him. Bacon was one of the greatest scholars of his time and he was as well read in classical literature and history, as in science, philosophy and law. He was as well familiar with the intricacies of politics as with those of trade and commerce. There was no sphere of knowledge or of life in which he did not excel. In many aspects, he was certainly the meanest of mankind. Therefore J.F Selby says that, "He had great brain; not a great soul"

Though he was raised to the highest position in the land, he could bend to the acceptance of the pettiest sums as bribes. He was fond of an ostentatious style of living, kept a large number of servants and was lavish of in matters of food and dress. The result; he was always in need and adopted highly corrupt questionable means to increase his income. He was profuse and greedy, a born intriguer and tuft-hunter, an extremely cunning, selfish and callous individual. His essays clearly reveal that his philosophy of life was Machiavellian. Hudson also agrees that he sacrificed his character for the sake of wealth and power and for the satisfaction of worldly ambitions. Here Hudson critically remark, "His morals were of the narrowest expediency and utilitarianism"

Many of his biographers, including Mr. Spedding, have tried to defend the conduct of Bacon. But the only defense which they have been able to put forth is that his faults were the faults of age, that he was merely the child of his age. It was an age in which the power was concentrated in the hands of a few; intrigue and opportunism were the orders of the days, friendships were violated and sides changed as one's interests demanded, and even the greatest in the land accepted bribes. Living in such an age, Bacon did what he found others doing, and what he realized was necessary to get success. He therefore, sacrificed his ideals, to achieve the aim dear to him. Summarizing his estimate of Bacon's character, Long writes, "Bacon was apparently one of those double natures that only God is capable to judge, because of strange mixture of intellectual strength and moral weakness that is in them"

As we read his essays, we come to know that he was an honest man corrupted by the environment in which he lived. We are very well inclined to believe what Bacon said of himself, "He was the brightest, wisest, and meanest of mankind.

Francis Bacon: Worldly Wisdom

Bacon was, definitely, a worldly wise man. He was the wisest and the meanest of mankind. He was truly of Renaissance; the age of accumulating knowledge, wealth and power. Being a true follower of Machiavellian principles, he led his life for worldly success. He was a man of shrewd and sagacious intellect with his eyes fixed on the main chance. And what he preached in his essays was also the knowledge, needed for worldly success.

There is no doubt that Bacon's essays are a treasure house of worldly wisdom. The term worldly wisdom means a wisdom which is necessary for worldly success. It does not need any deep philosophy or any ideal morality. But Bacon was a man of high wisdom, as he himself pronounced, "I have taken all knowledge to be my province". Bacon also preached morality but his morality is subordinate to worldly success and he never hesitated to sacrifice it for worldly benefit. His essays are rich with the art which a man should employ for achieving success in his life, such as shrewdness, sagacity, tact, foresight, judgment of character and so on.

The subject of Bacon in his essays is the man who needs prosperity in worldly terms. Bacon's essays bring men to 'come home to men's business and bosoms'. He teaches them, how to exercise one's authority and much more. When he condemns cunning, it is not because of a hateful and vile thing, but because it is unwise. That is why the wisdom in his essay is considered a 'cynical' kind of wisdom. He describes his essays as 'Counsels – civil and moral'.

In his essay "Of Truth", Bacon appreciates truth and wishes people to speak the truth. He says: "A lie faces God and shrinks from man."

He warns human beings against the punishment for the liar on the doomsday. But at the same time, he considers a lie as an 'alloy' which increases the strength of gold and feels it necessary for the survival on earth. He says: "A lie doth ever add pleasure." this is purely a statement of a "worldly wise man".

The essay "Of Great Places" though contains a large number of moral precepts yet in this very same essay he also preaches worldly success. "It is a strange desire to seek power and to lose liberty; By pains men come to greater pains". And "Uneasy lies the head that wears the crown."

Then Bacon suggests that men in authority should work not only for the betterment of public but also for their own status: "All rising to great place is by a winding stair; and if there be factions, it is good to side a man's self whilst he is rising and to behave himself when he is placed."

It is purely a utilitarian advice and it surely holds a compromise between morality and worldly success. Even when Bacon urges a man not to speak ill of his predecessor, it is not because of high morality but because of the fact that the man who does not follow advice would suffer with unpleasant consequences.

Bacon's approach towards studies is also purely utilitarian. In his essay "Of Studies", he does not emphasize on study for its own sake, but for the benefit which it can provide to man to be supplemented by practical experience. "Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man and writing an exact man." And then he says: "Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested."

Bacon also points out the effects of different branches of studies on a man's mind and thinks it helpful in the cure of different mental ailments and follies.

His essay "Of Suitors" totally reveals Bacon's shrewd insight. Although he suggests that a suitor should not be disloyal towards his petition and should tell him the truth about the chances of winning the suit without leaving him wandering in false hopes. Bacon suggests that a patron should not charge extensive amounts for a small case. But then he dilutes all this by saying if the patron wants to support the non-deserving party, he should make a compromise between both of them, so that the deserving party would bear not great loss. This is a purely utilitarian approach and it shows what Bacon himself had been in his career, for it was his own profession.

In the essay "Of Revenge" Bacon shows a certain high morality by saying that: "Revenge is a kind of wild justice; One who studieth revenge, keeps his own wounds green." He feels dignity in forgiving ones enemy. But then he says that even revenge is just in the cases when one can save one's skin from the hands of law.

Bacon showed a certain incapacity for emotions. He took the relation of friendship for its benefit and made a purely worldly approach to the subject which intimately deals between two persons. He gave us the uses and abused of friendship. He says: "Those that want friends to open themselves unto, are cannibals of their own hearts."

This essay clearly shows Bacon's cynical wisdom and that his morality is stuffed with purely utilitarian considerations. Bacon considers love as a 'child of folly'. In his essay "Of Love" he says: "It is impossible to love and to be wise."

He considers wife and children as hindrance in the way of success and progress. He says: "He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune." Afterwards in his essay "Of Marriage and Single Life" he tells the 'benefits' of a wife. "Wives are young men's mistresses, companion to middle age and old man's nurse." In his essay "Of Parents and Children" Bacon puts: "Children sweeten labour, but they make misfortune more bitter."

All these statements show his essentially mean and benefit seeking attitude, even in the matters of heart. In short, Bacon's essays are a "hand book" of practical wisdom enriched with maxims which are very helpful for worldly wisdom and success.

Francis Bacon: Wisest, Brightest and Meanest

> "If parts allure these think how Bacon shin'd
> The wisest, brightest and meanest of mankind."

Bacon was the wisest because of his worldly wisdom, he was brightest owing to his powerful intellect and the art of writing terse essays, and he was meanest due to his treacherous character.

The above mentioned remark on Bacon was made by a renowned and marvelous poet, "Alexander Pope". If we observe critically, this statement holds its validity. For Bacon appeared to be a true child of Renaissance. Undoubtedly he was a man of wisdom and powerful intellect. But all at once he was a calculating character, keeping an eye on the main chance. He was a true follower of Machiavelli. He failed to harmonize his mixed motives, complex principles and high aims together. He wanted to strive after the selfless scientific truth but he was conscious that nothing could be done without money and power. So, he strived after material success. Bacon belonged to the age of glory and greatness, surprising meanness and dishonest conduct and he could not avoid these evils.

Bacon was a man of multi-talents. His wisdom was undeniable. The thirst for infinite knowledge and his versatility was truly astonishing. He possessed an intellect of the highest order. He was learned in Greek, French, Latin, English, Science, Philosophy, Classics and many other fields of knowledge. He is regarded as the creator of the modern school of experimental research. He held that "man is the servant and interpreter of nature". He supplied the impulse which broke with the medieval preconceptions and set scientific inquiry on modern lines. He emphasized on experimentation and not to accept things for granted. Bacon was indeed an eloquent prophet of new era and the pioneer of modern sciences.

The essays of Bacon also portray his intellect and practical wisdom. The varied range of subjects too expresses that 'he had taken all knowledge to be his province'. Bacon could utter weighty and pregnant remarks on almost any subject, from "Greatness of Kingdoms" to "Gardens". The essays are loaded with the ripest wisdom of experience and observation conveyed through short, compact and terse sentences. One cannot deny the sagacity and shrewdness of his counsels. Bacon's essays deal with man. He is an able analyst of human nature, and his conduct in public and private affairs. His comments regarding man's behaviour may at times sound cynical but they are undeniable truths. He says: "A mixture of a lie doth even add pleasure."

Bacon is true here for most of the people would find life terrible without false hopes and false impressions. His views about friendship, though lacks in feelings and emotions, yet these are undeniably true to human nature. Following are a few examples of his wisdom.

"One who studieth revenge, keeps his own wounds green". And "Men in great places are thrice servants". So, like a very wise man he coin ideas and teaches them to make people wise in worldly terms.

Bacons brightness is best illustrated in the way in which he clothes his wisdom into brevity and lends the readers a great pleasure. The compactness of thought and conciseness of expression was a virtue in an age when looseness in thought and language was the rule. The essays are enriched with maxims and proverbs. He supports his ideas and arguments with innumerable quotations, allusions and analogies which prove his wide knowledge and learning. The aptness of the similes, the witty turn of phrases and the compact expression of weighty thoughts are evidence enough of the brightness of his intellect.

> "Suspicions among thoughts are like bats among birds."
> "Money is like much, except it be spread."
> "Virtue is like precious adours --- most fragrant, when they are incensed or crushed."

Moreover, the precise and authentic turn of sentences and the condensation of thoughts in them have been enhanced by the antithetical presentation. Such as:

> "A lie faces God and shrinks from man."
> "The ways to enrich are many and most of them are foul."
> "It is a strange desire to seek power and to lose liberty."
> "Through indignation, men rise to dignity."

Thus with the tool of antithesis, Bacon made his argument many times stronger and influential than a simple sentence. He created so much wit and strength in such precise writings that they are still valid and famous. No man individually did provide such strength and simplicity to the English language than Bacon. Bacon tried to reach the reader's mind by a series of aphoristic attacks. Therefore he is considered as the pioneer of modern prose. There is hardly any equal of him for clear, terse and compact writing.

Now, it appears to be an irony of nature that a man with such a tremendous intellect and wisdom had such a mean character. Bacon was not mean in the sense of being a miser. He was indeed reputed to be a very generous. The manner in which Bacon betrayed his friends, especially Essex, proved him most ungrateful and ignoble man. He made friendship and uprightness subordinate to his success. He always kept his eye on the main chance, worshipping the rising sun and avoiding of the setting one.

His marriage was also a marriage of convenience. He did not hesitate to take part in political intrigues in order to promote his ambition. His letter to the king and queen were also full of flattery that it was hard to believe that they came from the pen of such an intellectual man.

Though he was wise yet he showed certain incapacity of emotions and this trait can also be witnessed in his essays. He took the purely personal and domestic matters of a man – like marriage, friendship, love etc. in terms of pure utility. Such as: "He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune." And "Those that want friends to open themselves unto are cannibals of their own heart."

In short, Bacon was a man of the world – worldly wisdom and worldly convenience. He had a "great brain" but not a "great soul". His complex and contradictory characters will continue to be a psychological enigma for the readers to understand. So, he was definitely the wisest, brightest and meanest of mankind.

Francis Bacon: A Moralist

Bacon is not a true moralist. His morality is a saleable morality. He is a moralist-cum-worldly wise man. Bacon appears as a moralist in his essays, for he preaches high moral principles and lays down valuable guidelines for human conduct. Some of his essays show him as a true lover and preacher of high ethical codes and conducts. For instance, in "Of Envy", he puts: "A man that hath no virtue in himself, ever envieth virtue in others."

Then, in his essay "Of Goodness and Goodness of Nature" he says:"But in charity there is no excess; neither can angel or man come in danger by it." Again, he appears to be a lover of justice in his essay "Of Judicature": "The principal duty of a judge is to suppress force and fraud."

In spite of all given examples, one cannot deny the fact that Bacon was a "Man of Renaissance". He had a deep insight in human nature. He knew that man is naturally more prone to evil than good. He was a clear-eyed realist who saw the weakness in human nature and drawbacks of human conduct and also knew that man is not capable of acting according to noble set of 'ideals'. Though Bacon's morality was greater than that of average man's, yet it was not of the highest order. The matter of good and right was important for him but not if it proved too costly in worldly terms. On one hand, he preached high moral principles and on the other hand, he also expressed a mean capacity by compromising upon those morals for the sake of worldly success. For this reason, William Blake, a spiritual poet says about his essays: "Good advice for Satan's Kingdom."

Blake considers any utilitarian advice contrary to God's ways, but Bacon does not bother for that. He considers this world more important and striving after the success in this world is equally important. Bacon discusses man as he "appears" and not as he "ought to appear".

In his essay "Of Great Places" Bacon certainly shows a high morality when he condemns or at least dislikes the practice of 'wrongs' on part of high officials. "In place there is license to do good and evil; where of the latter is a curse." Afterwards he appreciates the power of doing good. "But power to do good, is true and lawful end of aspiring."

But besides these moral approaches, he also supports the idea of adopting certain disloyal means to reach a high position. "It is good to side a man's self whilst he is in the rising and to balance himself when he is placed".

Thus, like a moralist, Bacon preaches the noble dimensions of great place, but with this statement his purely utilitarian approach also comes forth with all its power.

In the essay "Of Truth" he appears to be a 'genuine' admirer of truth and seems to install the love of truth in his readers. "It is heaven upon earth, to have man's mind move in charity, rest in providence and turn upon the poles of truth."

But he also points out that "Falsehood is like an 'alloy' in gold and silver, which makes the metal work better even though it reduces, the value of the metal".

He says: "A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure." By putting this he has diluted all the effect of his own words said in the praise of the truth.

One can find the same strange mixture of high ethics and utilitarianism in the essay "Of Revenge". In this essay Bacon condemns revenge by saying: "Revenge is a kind of wild justice." And "One who studieth revenge, keeps his own wounds green."

He expressed that there is no place of revenge in high society and it is a high quality to forgive an enemy. Hereafter, Bacon spoils the effects by putting that in some cases man is justified in taking revenge, if the avenger can save his skin from the eyes of the law. He says: "But then let a man take heed the revenge be such as there is now law to punish; else a man's enemy is still forehand".

In his essay "Of Suitors" Bacon says that a man should refuse to undertake a suit if it is by giving a false hope to the petitioner and that one should not demand undue reward for his services. Those who employ crooked methods to win suits are the worst offenders of society. But he also says that if a patron wants to favour the undeserving party, he should bring both the parties to a compromise for this would be less dangerous for him. So, to Bacon, morality and ethical codes seem inferior to worldly considerations.

"Of Simulation and Dissimilation" is another example of the strange mixture of morality and prudence. "The best position and temperature is; to have openness in fame and opinion; secrecy in habits; dissimulation in seasonal use; and power to feign, if there be no remedy."

Bacon's morality has also been described as a cynical kind of wisdom. This impression is confirmed by even those essays which deal with strong private relations between men. "Of Friendship", "Of Parents and Children", "Of Marriage and Single life" and "Of Love", all depict a certain kind of utilitarianism and worldly benefit. Here Bacon expresses a definite failure of emotions, for he takes the pure matters of heart in terms of their uses and abuses.

In short, though Bacon's essays portray morality and high ethical standards, yet he does not appear as an ideal moralist and these are but the "flashes of morality". He is not a true moralist.

Bacon as a Prose Stylist

It has been observed by a critic that, "The quality of strength in bacon's style is intellectual rather than emotional"

Indeed the secret of Bacon's strength lies in his conciseness. Hardly any writer, ancient or modern, has succeeded in compressing so much meaning within so short a compass; several of essays- e.g. "those on studies and negotiating"- are marvels of condensation. Perhaps the most fascinating aspect of Bacon's style is that no one can stay indifferent to it. In other words, as a prose writer, he has either ardent admirers or passionate detractors. And, it is interesting to note that both these extreme positions are occasioned by the very same properties of his style. Bacon ushered in the modern era of writing English prose. F.G Selby says that, "The part of Bacon's influence is of course due to the charm of his style"

To be sure, there is a marked difference in the style of his earlier essays and that of his later ones. But, the important fact is that the difference is one of approach and not one of technique. In the beginning, Bacon thought the essay to be nothing more than a diary of "dispersed meditations". Therefore, the earlier essays are terse and pithy jottings of his observations on domestic, political, intellectual, moral, religious and social issue. As a result, the discerning reader can see that these essays are mere skeletons of thought grouped around a single theme. "Of Studies" belongs to this category. In this essay, we see how Bacon has a quick, chatty way of writing almost as if he were talking to himself: "Crafty men contemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them"

It must be noted that the same aphoristic character of the diction is to be found in his later essays. The difference is that, with the passage of time, Bacon toned the rapier-sharp rhythm of his sentences. This is because he perceived that his rapidly growing reading public was made up of people having varying reading tastes and skills. Let us compare the rhythm of above quoted lines with that of passage taken from 'Of Adversity', which is one of his later essays:

"We see in needle works and embroideries, it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon sad, solemn ground, than to have a dark and melancholy work upon a lightsome ground"

The brilliant rhetoric is the same in both the passages. So it is the pithiness and the terse vigour. Even Bacon's predilection for juxtaposition of thesis and antithesis is seen in both instances. The main difference is that the first passage is so constructed that Dean Church was moved to say that the words" "…come down like the stroke of hammer…"

On the contrary, the second passage flows harmoniously more like a melody than like a beat. In his earlier days, Bacon achieved terseness in his style by leaving out superfluous epithets, conjunctions and connectives. Later he aimed more towards crafting balanced sentences which consisted of two parts. The first part would be a statement and second would be an explanatory analogy. For example: "He that hath wife and child hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises either of virtue or mischief"

Bacon's sentences are more modern in their structure than those of other Elizabethans prose writers- being more pointed and less involved. Even his more intricate sentences are so carefully constructed and so free from inversions that meaning is not difficult to catch. The essays, in particular, are remarkable for balance and point as might naturally be expected from their aphoristic style. This is really strange when we consider the fact that he also wrote sentences like this: "A lie faces God and shrinks from man" Or this "The ways to enrich are many, and most of them foul"

It is true that his cavalier attitude towards grammar is clearly visible in the second sentence. But, most people would agree that they have no problem in understanding what the writer has to say. It must be borne in mind that in Bacon's age, little attention was given to the logical division of a subject into paragraphs. One of the most pleasurable aspects in Bacon's style is his use of imagery and analogy. Consider his denunciation of pride in 'Of Vainglory':

"The fly sat upon the axle-tree of the chariot wheel said, What a dust do I raise?"

The above discussion makes it clear that Bacon did not have two styles of writing. Rather, it can be said that it was the same style which he applied in different ways as and when the situation demanded. Certainly, this is only one of reasons why his admirers claim to be one of the greatest prose stylists in English Language.

Bacon as an Essayist

What is an essay? The literary essay is indefinable as a spring day in the wood, but it does suggest some qualities of an essay like the day itself. The root meaning of the term, essay is an attempt or trial. Dr. Johnson defined an essay as "a loose sally of the mind, an irregular undigested piece, not a regular and orderly composition." The emphasis is on the informality of tone and the fact that an essay in not an exhaustive, argumentative disquisition on a theme. The essay could be objective as well as subjective. In subjective essays, the object is not important, any subject will do.

It is the writer's personality which lends charm to this type of essay. J.J. Lobbans's definition of the essay as, "a short discursive article on any literary, philosophical or social subject, viewed from a personal or historical standpoint" includes all types of essays.

Montaigne and Bacon: The essay as a distinct form was born in the 16th century with French writer, Montaigne's Essays. He frankly confessed that his essays were about himself, in the sense that they portray him in a number of moods and habits. Bacon borrowed this form from Montaigne but suited it to his own purpose. Bacon lived in a time and country where life was both serious and vigorous and he is occupied with serious matters. One can say that these essays show his egotism in the sense that they show his ideas and thoughts based on his own experience. But in Bacon's essays we don't find the chatty quality found in Montaigne's or Charles Lamb's essays. Emerson is the one modern writer with whom Bacon may be fairly compared, for their method is much the same. But Hugh Walter rightly says, "With Bacon we enter the world of stark realities, rational and grave, having no place for lively humor or conversational ease. But this doesn't detract us from his greatness as an essayist. To him goes the credit of being the first of English essayists, as he remains, for sheer mass and weight of genius, the greatest"

The form and subject of Bacon's purpose: Bacon's essays come home to men's business and bosoms. Bacon's essays group themselves round three great principles: (a) Man in relation to the world and society (b) Man in relation to himself and (c) Man in relation to his Maker. In all of these categories of his essays he has given variety. Man is the subject of Bacon's essays. This human interest is one reason why his essays are popular and have universal appeal because human beings are most interested in themselves. For Bacon's purpose, only this form was the most suitable. He developed this genre with his essayistic qualities.

The subject of his essays is varied and bears a wide range. He writes on a variety of themes such as family life, politics, marriage, friendship, studies, ambition and many others. Bacon thus proved the capacity of the essay form to be all-inclusive. Later essayists too proved it so we have political, historical and biographical essays. Bacon's intent in writing essays was a serious one. He intended them to be "Counsels Civil and Moral". They were not written for amusements or leisure time. They do not have the personal element that make Lamb's essays too charming. In this differs from Montaigne too. Bacon gives opinions and never speaks of himself. He speaks like a statesman or a moralist, not like a street boy. Bacon is concerned in most of his essays with ethical qualities of men and with political matters and thought it clear that he admires moral and intellectual truth, he is practical and rather opportunistic in the advice he offers. He doesn't expect his reader to aspire to a high standard of morality; he simply approaches to him with practical and worldly didacticism.

His essays have historical significance, too, for they were written for a particular group of men to offer them guidance that they must rise in the world and do good to the state. His essays are brief as any essay should be. He is not lightly dealing with important topics. He deals with all essay topics seriously even if they are unimportant. As he writes about gardens, but authoritatively and in a dignified manner, not humorously and subjectively like Lamb or Montaigne. A man who wants to achieve worldly and material success and popularity could easily find very useful principle here in Bacon's essays. The reader's interest is held by the historical and literary allusions tinged with Greek and Latin references.

Style: His essays are also important from stylistic point of view, too. To Bacon must go the credit, not only of introducing a new literary form into England but also that he developed a style which is marked for its pitch and pregnancy in the communication of thought. It was the first style set in England which later traveled to the age of Addison, Steele and Swift. He discovered the value of brief, crisp and firmly-knitted sentences of a type hitherto unfamiliar in English. He also rejected the elaborate euphuistic style overcrowded with imagery and conceits. The most important characteristic of his style, that which gives the essays the position of a classic in English Language is the terseness of expression and epigrammatic force. He has an unraveled ability of packing his thoughts into the smallest possible space.

The essays may be described as one critic says, "Infinite riches in a little room." (Give sentential examples from his essays). Bacon was a man of the renaissance and in his essays; we find a characteristic of his age: the use of figurative language. Similes and Metaphors and striking comparisons are found in his essays. The scholar's love of learning is evidenced by the frequent use of quotations and allusions in the essays. What is most important regarding his contribution is the terseness and epigrammatic quality of his essays.

Conclusion: Bacon's essays are a proof of his strength of mind, intellect and knowledge. They are packed with remarkable sagacity and insight, shrewd and profound observation. He showed for the first time with (along with Hooker) that English was as capable as Greek or Latin of serving the highest purposes of language. Sercombe and Allen say, "Trite as the subjects are familiar as the treatment of those who know the Essays, the reader is seldom unrewarded by a sensation of novelty, so multitudinous are the face of Bacon's thoughts." John Freeman says, "The intellectual spend-thrift is the true essayist." As one of the world's epoch-making books, Bacon's essays have done much to mould and direct the character of many individuals. The brevity of these essays has been recommendation to readers with limited leisure. They have become a classic of the English Language and they owe this position, not to their subject-matter, but to their style.

Bacon as the Father of English Essay

Neither Nash nor the character writers are the forerunners of essay writing. Bacon is the first great English writer who, in the words of Hugh Walker, is the first English essayist, as he remains for sheer mass and weight of genius, the greatest." His Essays have won him a place apart, and are a source of his fame with the world at large. They introduce a new form of composition into English literature, which was destined to have a varied and fruitful development. They are also in a sense, a record of Bacon's outlook on the world throughout the years of his active life. The slim volume of the essays, published in 1597, grew to thirty-eight in the edition of 1612, and to fifty-eight in the final edition of 1625, and many of the essays were amplified as time went on.

(1) Bacon and Montaigne: Bacon borrowed the general conception of essay from Montaigne's Essais, published in 1580, but he has little in common with them, except that both books consist of notes on human life and human nature by men of the world. In the dedication to Prince Henry, Bacon expounding his conception of essay, writes that they are "certain brief notes, set down rather significantly than curiously, which I have called Essays. The word is late, but the thing is ancient. For Seneca's Epistles to Lucilius, if one marks them well, are but Essays, that is, dis-persed meditations, though conveyed in the form of Epistles." Bacon's Essays are much more concentrated and concise than Montaigne's Essays. The charm of Montaigne is that of shrewd but inconsequent comments on men and things set out at leisure by a humane and open-eyed observer. Bacon's Essays represent rather the reflections of a politic player of the game of life summed up in short, pregnant sayings that strike the imagination and cling to the memory. The effect of the one is diffused humanity, of the other an insight into human nature, pointed with consummate mastery of single words and phrases.

(2) Impersonal and Objective: As an essayist Bacon is not friendly, confidential, intimate and familiar with the reader. If we try to find in them the history of Bacon's inner life, we are disappointed. His essays "are for the most part detached and impersonal, and there is nothing in them to mark the tragedy of his life." But to say that the essays of Bacon do not bear the stamp of the personality of their author is a gross error. He did not consider life lightly and he was too serious a man to view the problems of life in a chatty, gossipy manner. He dealt with life with its varied problems seriously and tried hard to provide solutions. It was in this mood that these essays were conceived and written. Bacon, never for a moment, stoops down to treat life romantically and playfully.

He, according to Hugh Walker, "is too stately, and his thought is so profound to permit us to speak of the essays as the confidential chat of a great philosopher; but in them he comes as near that as his nature would permit. Bacon's attitude to life, the conditions of his time and the frame of his mind compelled him to conceal rather than reveal his personality in his essays. The age of Elizabeth was one of the most treacherous ages of British history. Bacon could not commit anything to writing that could be considered his own views on religion, politics or morality. He was a politician surrounded on all sides with rivals and enemies who could make capital out of his personal utterances. He did not want to be exploited on that account. Bacon had to keep himself to himself. The conditions of his life and his time always kept his pen in check. He never spoke out, and whenever he spoke, he spoke like a philosopher or a statesman. Bacon writes as "a statesman and politician, as Attorney General or Lord Chancellor, with the robes of his office on."

Bacon, therefore, took the form from Montaigne, but filled it with material drawn from his own mind. Montaigne emerges in his essays as "the spectator of life and its shrewd critic" and Bacon comes out as "the ambitious English lawyer and statesman, with one eye fixed upon the pole-star of philosophic truth, and the other watching the political weather-cock."

(3) Neatness and Ordered Compactness: Bacon found the essay as a suitable form to receive many thoughts of his mind. He was extraordinarily discursive in his interests. He took all knowledge to be his province. He surpassed all his contemporaries in the capacity to utter pregnant thoughts on almost any theme. He was short of time and thrifty of his thoughts and his literary material. He wanted to preserve the treasures of his mind for the benefit of posterity in aphoristic utterances. To Bacon, who was thrifty both of time and of literary material, the essay was a Godsend. So, there is a neatness and ordered compactness which distinguish his essays which are occasional and discursive, containing detached thoughts, written down as they occur. They are not set compositions but rather jottings of collections of thoughts that have shaped themselves, as if, spontaneously in the epigrammatic phase. This occasional nature of Bacon's essays set the fashion of essay writing in English literature.

(4) Variety of Subjects: The astonishing range of topics of Bacon's essays is his great attraction. He passes from religion and empire to gardens and buildings. In Montaigne and Lamb, the subject is un-important but in Bacon the subject always is important. He may be unsystematic in his treatment of it but he never wanders beyond his bounds.

(5) Language and Style: In his essays Bacon, writes Rickett, "is the pioneer of clear, sententious English that suggests rather than expounds, and blends dignity with familiarity, in that pleased and attractive manner which is the secret of the power of all our great essayists." He was the first English essayist who employed a style that is conspicuous for lucidity, clarity, economy, precision, directness, masculinity and mathematical plainness. He carefully avoided any fineness or affectation of phrases. His images and figures of speech are simple and clearly illustrate the ideas that he wishes to convey. For example:

> "Revenge is a wild kind of justice, which the more man's nature runs to, the more ought law to weed it out." (Of Revenge)
>
> "Men fear death as children fear to go in the dark." (Of Death)
>
> "Suspicions among thoughts are like bats among birds—they fly best by twilight." (Of Suspicion)

In all these quotations the function of the images is not to intensify the meaning, to make it deeper or richer, but simply to make more effective a meaning that was already fully formed before the application of the illustrative device.

Bacon's style is suffused with wit and fun. Of wit, in the sense of the perception of analogy, there are various examples in his essays. He detects similarities and can give apt illustrations, as he can detect endless analogies in nature. But often Bacon's wit is mere play of words, as "through indignities, men rise to dignity", "by pain men come to greater pain." Sometime we come across ingenious combination of incongruous words, as men who have no friends are described as "cannibals of their own heart", "money is like a muck." Bacon's similes and metaphors are full of wit, for example, "riches are the baggage of virtue", "he that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune".

Flexibility is an important characteristic of Bacon's style. The older style was cumbrous; it could rise, but it could not easily sink. The new style of Bacon fitted itself as easily to buildings and gardens, or to suitors or ceremonies, as to truth and death.

Bacon was a distinguished rhetorician. His command of phrase was extraordinary. No one knows better than he either how to leave a single word to produce all its effect by using it in slightly uncommon sense, and setting the wit at work to discern and adjust this, or how to unfold all manner of applications and connotations, to open all inlets of sight, view and perspective. That Bacon dazzles, amuses, half delusively suggests, stimulates, provokes, edifies, instructs, satisfies, is indeed perfectly true. His literary methods are of the orator, not the dialectician. "But in rhetoric quality— in the use, that is to say, of language to dazzle and persuade, not to convince — he has few rivals and no superiors in English."

As a thinker and stylist, Bacon is the pioneer of rational and scientific thinking, and of lucid and clear style which developed in the age of Dryden and Pope. L. C. Knights rightly remarks: "Almost as much as his explicit philosophy, Bacon's prose style is an index of the emergence of modern world."

Two Styles of Bacon: Critics find two styles in Bacon. The qualities of his style vary with his works. George Saintsbury attributes the change of style to the variety of Bacon's subject matter. He wrote varied kinds of prose — philosophical in The Advancement of Learning, speculative in New Atlantis, historical in Henry VII, aphoristic in the Essays. History of Henry VII and New Atlantis have a style of their own, quite distinct from the aphoristic, epigrammatic and objective style of the Essays and different also from the expository and speculative style of the Advancement of Learning.

The "two styles" theory was, first of all, propounded by Macaulay who illustrated it by highlighting the difference between the first edition of Bacon's Essays, and the second and third editions. He attributed this change to the faster growth of judgment and the slow development of fancy in Bacon. Hugh Walker dismisses this proposition and finds it "in a change in Bacon's conception as to the function and possibilities of the essay form." In 1597 when he published the slender volume of ten essays, an essay was to Bacon an "attempt" at a subject, a group of jottings, "dispersed meditations" and something incomplete. So the style in the essays in the first edition is extremely crisp and sententious. The sentences are short with few connectives. Each sentence stands by itself, the concentrated expression of weighty thought. The essay Of Studies is a fine specimen of the style of the first edition; for example:

> "Read not to contradict and believe nor to believe, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts, others to be read but curiously, and some few to be read wholly- and with diligence and attention."

Edward Albert writes about the style of the first edition: "In the first edition the style is crisp, detached, and epigrammatic, conveying the impression that each essay has arisen from some happy thought and phrase, around which other pithy statements are agglomerated."

In the essays of 1612, and still more of 1625, we find that Bacon imparts warmth and colour to the style. Metaphors and similes are frequently used and sometimes they have a poetical quality. He finds room for conjunctions and connective classes. A few examples given here illustrate the change in the style in the essays of the second and third editions: "Suspicions among thoughts are like bats among birds—they fly best by twilight." "Virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant when they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue."

Hugh Walker points out that the change of style was caused due to Bacon's changed conception of essay. He remarks: "Compositions in which such sentences as these occur are obviously a good deal more than mere jottings. Bacon's conception of essay had developed, and therefore he clothed his 'dispersed meditations' in a richer vesture." Edward Albert also writes: "In the later editions the ideas are expanded, the expression loses its spiky pointedness, and in them we have an approach to a freer middle style. In choice of subject and approach, they reveal the breadth of intellect, his worldly wisdom, his concern with public life and material advancement. They are impersonal, objective, and orderly in thought, and reflect a cool, scientific detachment, which makes them, in spite of an occasional flash of poetic fire, as in Of Death, rather formal and cold. Yet they are written in the language of ordinary men, and the imagery is that of everyday life. The essays are brief and full of condensed, weighty, antithetical sentences, which have the qualities of proverbial expressions, and are notable for their precision and clarity of expression."

Bacon, the Representative of the Renaissance

"Bacon," writes Ifor Evans, "is the most complete representative of the Renaissance in England, learned, worldly wise, ambitious, intriguing, enamoured of all the luxury that wealth in his time could supply and while knowing so much, almost completely ignorant about himself." He represents the wickedness and treachery, deceitfulness and hypocrisy, flattery and lust for power of the Renaissance England. He had a fertile, versatile intelligence. He could employ his genius for good or for evil. He found it expedient to resort to treachery in order to make his way in the world, he did not hesitate in betraying his friend and benefactor, Essex.

Bacon bartered his genius meant for philosophical and humanitarian pursuits of extraordinary sorts for the unworthy and petty worldly achievements. Macaulay writes: "Scarcely any man has been better entitled to be called a thorough man of the world. The founding of a new philosophy, the imparting of a new direction to the minds of speculators, this was the amusement of his leisure, the work of hours occasionally stolen from the Woolsack and the Council Board. This consideration, while it increases the admiration, with which we regret his intellect, increases also our regret that such an intellect should so often have been unworthily employed. He well knew the better course, and had, at one time, resolved to pursue it. "I confess," said he in a letter when he was still young, "that I have vast contemplative ends as I have moderate civil ends." Had his civil ends continued to be moderate, he would have been, not only the Moses, but the Joshua of philosophy." Then, he could have passed his life placidly, honourably, beneficently "in industrious observations, grounded conclusions, and profitable inventions and discoveries".

Bacon's quest for knowledge, truth and power led him to the study of philosophy. He was the first rational thinker who was inspired with the Faustian urge. With the confidence of his genius he could declare, "I am an encyclopedia of learning." The man, who could declare, that he took all knowledge to be his province, was a shrewd observer of facts and men. P. F. and E. F. Matheson point out: "A preacher of research and experiment, full of enthusiasm for discovery, he never succeeds in stating clearly and convincingly the new method which is to revolutionise the world of knowledge. He was significantly out of touch with the actual discoveries of his time. If Bacon did not discover a new method it remains true that by the eloquent and inspiring language in which he laid down the vital importance of experiment and of study of things instead of words, and by the noble conception he made current of what science might accomplish if pursued by enthusiasm and promoted by combined effort, he gave an incalculable stimulus to the progress of thought and experiment in England and in Europe."

In fact, Bacon was "the prophet, if not the founder of modern scientific rationalism." He directed reason towards the understanding and mastery of the material world. He propounded the method of scrupulous examination of how things work and how they influence each other. We call it the scientific method. Bacon defined the aim and the general method. He repeatedly points out that the purpose of knowledge is "the benefit and use of man", "the endowment and benefits of man's life", "the serious use of business and occasions." The method proposed by Bacon is a "laborious and sober inquiry of truth", "ascending from experiments to the invention of causes and descending from causes to the new experiments." The scope of rational investigation is universal. These quotations from The Advancement of Learning sufficiently indicate the main directions of his thought.

In an era of superstitions and ignorance, Bacon believed that the right way was the way of observation and experiment. He said: "Man, the servant and interpreter of Nature, can do and understand so much and so much only as he has observed in fact or in thought of the course of Nature. Beyond them he neither knows anything nor can do anything." First, then, let us collect the data by diligent research and then rearrange it into a well-digested order from which we may formulate axioms. This will serve as stepping stone to new experiments from which we may finally deduce new facts.

The plan that Bacon suggested failed but no one can doubt his sincerity and the value of his ideas. In an age that was infested with superstition, that believed in black magic, that mistook hearsay for science, the value of the new experiments and observations cannot be undervalued. For his ideas he has been the father of modern ideas. His ideas have a forward looking quality. He himself said about his pioneering role in the field of scientific and rational thought: "I only sound the clarion, but I enter not the battle." Dr. Rudolf Metz assigns Bacon an outstanding place as a Renaissance thinker: "For the first time the philosopher meets us not as a sedentary figure closed away from the affairs of the world, not as a mere onlooker who seeks truth for its own sake, but as a being possessed by a passionate impulse to action, who places his knowledge at the service of practical ends and assigns to it as its greatest task the subjection of nature to the will of man In this Bacon's thoughts and feelings are entirely modern and there is no vestige of medievalism left. The science which is placed at the service of humanity has as its final aim technical mastery, which now supplants artistic culture. This shifting from arts to technics represents, it seems to me, an important difference between early and Renaissance thinking. Thus Bacon is the first to celebrate the coming of the technical age and his doctrine is full of faith in future progress."

If Bacon proved his wisdom in philosophy his knowledge of men and manners showed his genius for practical and realistic approach towards life in society. Were we to sum up Bacon's character in one word, it is "reason". This shrewd observer of human nature was never swayed by emotions in life. Heart, it appears, he did not have. He was wisdom, born of reason incarnate. In his attitude towards life he was Machiavellian. A pragmatic man, a man of action, according to him, must not be merely "like the lark that can mount and sing and please himself and nothing else", but must be "like the hawk, that can soar aloft, and can also descend and can strike upon the prey." Emotions and cheap sentiments must be carefully fenced out from the life of man who must rise.

Thus, Bacon, "the ambitious English lawyer and statesman, with one eye fixed upon the pole star of philosophic truth, and the other watching the political weather-cock" is the true child of the Renaissance.

Worldly Wisdom & the Art of Success in Bacon's Essays

Bacon emerges in his essays as the man of the world, "a citizen of the world". He had a strong sense of the imperfections of humanity, so he impregnated his "dispersed meditations" with worldly wisdom and the art of getting success in life. In his dedication to the Duke of Buckingham, Bacon wrote that the essays "come home to men's bosom and business." Yes, it is to both bosoms and business to which he applies himself,—not of course to the technique of a particular profession, nor the examination of bosom as a physician or theologian would approach it. His approach to the "bosom" itself is a part of the general technique of "business". There is a cold, utilitarian and Machiavellian approach in the pearls of wisdom which are scattered all over his essays. But Bacon never forces his wisdom upon the readers. He never claims finality for the correctness of his wisdom, based on observation and experience. Bacon writes: "These are thoughts which have occurred to me: weigh them well, or take them or leave them."

Honesty is always the best policy. It is good in business; it is, therefore, an ideal virtue. A lie faces God, but shirks from man, yet "the mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better", while "clear and round dealing is the honour of man's nature". "Have openness in reputation, use secrecy in habits, dissimulation in seasonable use, and power to feign, if there be no remedy." These are the maxims of a man of business — not of a speculative philosopher or a theorist. These maxims and reflections, if practiced, can lead to the success of man.

Bacon's wisdom is not for the hermit or the anchorite or the speculative philosopher or the theologian, but for the man of the business or of the world. The man, who believes in action, will always find inspiration in his essays. He formulated in his Essays a system for getting on into the world—how to rise and how to prevent a fall. Bacon was one of the earliest high priests of the Goddess of Getting On and he chanted forth the hymns and laid down the rituals of this religion for the use of private men, and particularly for the princes and politicians. Bacon propounded a new technique and a new morality for men at the helm of public affairs, who must rise in the world and yet beware of the incompleteness of Wisdom for a man's self. He advises in the essay on Wisdom for a Man's Self: " ..... divide with reason between self-love and society" for pure self-love is after all "the wisdom of rats that will leave a house before it falls" or "the wisdom of crocodiles that shed tears when they devour". Men in the service of the state should strike a golden mean between self-1ove and love of the public. Kings should be careful about choosing ministers as "are more sensible of duty than of rising...." (Of Ambition). Believing that the interests of the public weal more or less coincide with the interests of the king, Bacon examines the utility of all sorts of things from the point of view of their advantage to the king. Maxims are given for the guidance of the king in the Essay of Empire. What the king must do in the case of his wife and children, in the case of his favourites, in the case of his councillors, in the case of the nobility, in the case of churchmen grown powerful, in the case of ambitious generals and statesmen, this is the burden of song of practically all of Bacon's essays dealing with kings and princes. While nearly half of these essays are thus written for the advice of the king than for the good of men in street — essays full of the teachings of Machiavelli, breathing a gospel of territorial aggrandisement, expansion of colonies, increase of revenue by commerce, manufacture and navigation, and unblushing militarism, there are, of course, a few essays in which the ethics of private life are dealt.

Bacon’s essays are imbued with practical wisdom. The lines: "He that hath wife and children bath given hostages to fortune", "wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity", "clear and round dealing is the honour of man's nature", "unmarried men are the best friends, best masters and best servants", appeal to all times and countries.

Bacon does not believe in conventional morality. His morality is prudential. His essays seem to be the work of an opportunist. Hugh Walker writes: "On the whole Bacon gives impression of singular aloofness from moral considerations. His maxims are prudential. He appears to be looking down with absolute dispassionateness from a height, and determining what course of conduct pays best. He condemns cunning, not as a thing loathsome and vile, but as a thing unwise. Occasionally he even lays down the rules for immoral conduct without a word of overt disapproval."

Francis Bacon is a moral and utilitarian philosopher

Answer: Francis Bacon, the father of English essays, is an Elizabethan essayist, moralist and thinker whose essays are loaded with ripest wisdom of experience. Nobody can deny the wisdom of his understanding of the affairs of the world. He shows an extraordinary insight regarding the problems that men face in life. Even within the utilitarian code that Bacon puts forward, there is a certain code of conduct – a morality that is perhaps as high as is easily practicable in the world as we know it. In addition to that, his essays teach us morality with the practical use of it.

Bacon starts the essay titled "Of Great Place" with the idea that men in great place are three times servants. They are the servants of sovereign or state, fame and business. He calls it a strange desire to seek power and to lose liberty. Then he shows us that in a great place there is freedom to do good and evil but he suggests us not to follow the evil one. "For in evil the best condition is not to will"

Then he tells us that the vices of authority are chiefly four, such as – delays, corruption, roughness and facility. He suggests us how to avoid them, such as, working according to a schedule and being easy of access will help to avoid delays. Regarding corruption, one should not only refuge to accept bribes, but he must be able to stop a person from offering bribes. Again he makes us aware of the fact that any change without clear cause raises suspicion of corruption. So a man should clearly explain his intentions and reasons for the change. And for roughness should be avoided as far as possible.

He finishes the essay with practical teaching that a man should unbend from official rigour when away from the office so that people may say that he is a different man when discharging his official duties.

In his other essay "Of Love" Bacon explicates the disadvantages of the mad degree of love. He arrests our attention saying that it is love which does much mischief in our life like a siren and sometimes like a fury. He keeps on telling us about love's harmful effects one by one that firstly, among all the great and worthy hearts, there is hardly anyone who has been tempted to the folly. Secondly, the passion of love is so strong that it can enter a well-fortified heart if watch be not well kept. Thirdly, to make his argument more convincing, he comments that it is impossible to love and to be wise at the same time. Here he alludes to Helen to impart a practical thought that love can deter us from gaining both riches and wisdom. Fourthly, love brings in trouble in men's life and makes them that they can no way be true of their own ends. Despite those negative aspects of love, Bacon finishes his essay with a moral teaching that reads as:

> "Nuptial love maketh mankind; friendly love perfecteth it"
> On the other hand, it is the wonton-love that corrupts and degrades mankind.

"Of Revenge" is his other spectacular essay that opens with a definition of revenge as it is the wild justice. Soon after that he suggests us to avoid it if possible. This reminds us of his utilitarian philosophy.

> "He is superior, for it is prince part to pardon."

He also urges us not to recall the worthless past action because wise men never waste time brooding over it rather they are busier with the present and the future. He bewares us of the fact that revenge can be taken but in such a case, however, a man would be watchful that his act of revenge does not bring him to trouble with the law, otherwise, his enemy will benefit from it. The above idea bears the testimony that he is a utilitarian person.

Towards the end of the essay Bacon highlights the moral side of revenge that public revenge is far better than private revenge. He stresses the fact alluding to the death of Caesar, Pertinaxa, and Henry the Third of France.

> "Public revenges are the most part fortunate."

The essay "Of Marriage and Single Life" deals with both the advantages and the disadvantages of the married and the unmarried life. The man who has a family to maintain cannot undertake big tasks. He wishes to lead a life of security. At the same time a family is a financial liability. Marriage also imposes certain restraints on a man's freedom. And yet a man who has a wife and children is affectionate and less cruel than a man who is single. On the other hand, an unmarred man is in a position to confer great benefits upon the public. Moreover, he is a good friend, employer and servant although he may not be a good citizen.

Bacon tells us who to marry who needs not. Now he suggests that a clergyman should remain single for the interest of his parishioners.

> "A single life doth well with churchmen;"

If he has a family, more of his attention and affection will go it and he cannot be expected to give undivided attention to his parishioner. So a clergyman will do well to remain single while a soldier will fight better when he thinks of the wife and children he has left behind at home.

It is to be said in conclusion that Bacon's essays show his great awareness of values that ennoble human life. His essays suggest us not to seek morality only by leaving practical idea. There is nothing wrong with the mixture of morality and the practical idea together. Just as no ornament is possible with pure gold, some crude metal should be added with it so only morality without practical concept of a thing cannot do. So as Renaissance man to the core, he advocates a compromise between absolute morality and opportunism.

Aphoristic style of Bacon

Introduction: Bacon's fame as a writer depends most of all on the fact that he is the father of modern English prose. He evolved a prose style that proved for the first time that English could also be used to express the subtleties of thought, in clear and uninvolved sentences.

The critics have noticed that there is a marked difference between Bacon's earlier and later essays. Macaulay, contrasting extracts from of Studies (1597) and Of Adversity (1625) illustrates what he calls the two styles of Bacon.

It is true that there is a vast difference between the styles of Bacon. But it is rather questionable whether this difference could be attributed to the fact that Bacon had gained a maturity of mind and intellect. Bacon wrote in more than one style. The stately movement of The Advancement of Learning and Of Adversity has been achieved in 1605 itself. Does that mean that Bacon had achieved maturity of mind and imagination in eight years? This is not convincing. The explanation lies in the fact that Bacon's very conception of the essay underwent a change. Bacon described his essays as "Dispersed Meditations". The first collection of essays is fully illustrative of Bacon's definition of the essay as dispersed meditations set down significantly rather than curiously. The original idea was to make the essays into a sort of diary in which significant observations on various topics of practical importance. His essays were jotted down in a terse and pithy and concise language. His first essays were a mere skeleton of thought, grouped around central themes with suitable titles. There was no attempt polishing the style or clothing the statements with literary beauty or imaginative grace. When, however, Bacon saw that his essays had gained an unexpected popularity, he thought that it was worthwhile polishing them and making them richer. These essays are very brief in length. The ideas have not been developed. The sentences are all crisp, short and sententious. Each sentence stands by itself. There is so much of condensation that each sentence can easily be expanded into a paragraph. That is to say that one single sentence does the job of a paragraph.

Essays not quite dispersed meditations: It would, however, be a mistake to call all the essays of Bacon "Dispersed Meditations". There are some which have received at his hand, a rather detailed treatment and which cannot be termed as "Sketchy". In these essays, Bacon finds room for conjunctions and connective clauses. Ideas are not left underdeveloped and transitions from one thought to another are not so abrupt. In Of Friendship, there is a logical approach in the enumeration of the principle fruits of friendship. Each advantage is properly handled and ideas are developed smoothly. There is not that abrupt transition of thought that characterized some of Bacon's other essays. Of Empire can be said to contain almost exhaustive treatment of the dangers that beset a king in those days. In Of Seditions and Troubles, there is a quite closely reasoned and connected account of the causes and remedies of discontentment and agitation that may fester and burst out into trouble for the country. Aphoristic sentences are found in these essays too, but attention has been given to other factors as well.

Aphoristic style of Bacon: An aphoristic style means a compact, condensed and epigrammatic style of writing. Bacon's writing has been admired for various reasons. Some have admired them for dazzling rhetoric, others his grace. In Bacon we find a style which is distinct and at the same time characteristic of his age. His style includes various qualities. Firstly, he remains the best aphoristic, so he stands the most quotable writer. There is terseness of expression and epigrammatic brevity, in the essays of Bacon. His sentences are brief and rapid, but they are also forceful. As Dean Church says, "They come down like the strokes of a hammer." The force of aphoristic style depends on other stylistic qualities which supplement it. He weighs the pros and cons of a statement and immediately counter-balances it. (Give examples from the above the extracts).

A Rhetorician: Bacon's style is definitely rhetorical. In this connection, Saintsbury has remarked that no one, "knows better than (Bacon) how to leave a single word to produce all its effects by using it in some slightly uncommon sense. He has great powers of attracting and persuading his readers even though he may not convince them. In prose rhetoric, in the use, that is to say, of language to dazzle and persuade, not to convince. He has few rivals and no superiors in English." There is a constant use of imagery and analogy in Bacon's essays. The apt and extensive use of metaphors, images, similitudes and analogies is in keeping with the view of the rhetoricians of the ancient as well as of the Renaissance. Bacon draws his imagery from the familiar objects or nature, or from the facts of everyday life.

His Allusions and Quotations: The essay bear witness to Bacon's learned mind in the extensive use of quotations and allusions drawn from various sources, classical fables, the Bible, History, the ancient Greek and the Roman writers. Of Truth includes Pilate, Lucian and Montaigne, In Of Great Place; we have Tacitus, Galba and Vespacian, and Of Friendship includes reference to Aristotle. Thus Bacon employs allusions to and quotations in order to explain his point. They serve to make his style more scholarly and enrich it while lending to his ideas. Though, his style is heavy with learning, yet it is more flexible than any of his predecessors and contemporaries. His sentences are short and with this shortness comes lucidity of expression. Thus he shows mastery of the principles of prose. There almost no humor in Bacon's essays, but his essays are packed with astounding wit.

Conclusion: The style of Bacon is not the personal and chatty style of the subjective essayist like Montaigne and Lamb. It is dignified and aphoristic style. He w

Bacon's Essays – a blend of philosophizing, moralizing and worldly wisdom

Introduction: "I have taken all knowledge for my province" says Bacon and "Beyond any other book of the same size in any literature they are loaded with ripest wisdom of experience." Says Hudson regarding Bacon's essays. Nobody can deny the wisdom of Bacon of his understanding of the affairs of the world.

He shows an extraordinary insight regarding the problems that men face in life. But his wisdom is only practical and not moral. Alexander Pope has given the following remarks about Bacon in his epic:

> If parts allure these think how Bacon shin'd
> The wisest, brightest and meanest of mankind

There is some basic truth in this contention. One cannot deny his wisdom, his observation, intellect and genius. Bacon was a very complex and enigmatic character. The dichotomy of moral values what one finds in his essays was to be found in his character, too. Compton-Rickett says, "He had a great brain, not a great soul." He wanted to serve humanity with through the expansion of usable knowledge. He was aware that no headway could be made in this world without adopting certain mean ways. He was a product of the Renaissance with composite qualities such as wisdom, meanness and brightness. Bacon was a man of the Renaissance and that was an age which tried to explore to the full, the opportunities of mind and body afforded to man. The term, Renaissance means Re-birth or more generally the Revival of Learning. It was a series of events by which Europe passed from Medieval to a Modern Civilization. In this age, there was a new spirit of inquiry, of criticism and of passionate scientific inventions. Literature of that age was chiefly marked by this spirit and Bacon's essays have several features that show the spirit of Renaissance.

A very important writer of the Italian Renaissance was Machiavelli whose opportunistic philosophy sacrificed high ethical ideals in the interest of achieving material progress. Man is an individual and an end in himself and this sense of individualism gave rise to the feeling that he must know how to get on in this world. The revival of classical learning and the study of ancient Greek and Roman Literature and history was a hallmark of the Renaissance. The spirit of learning is very much in the essays of Bacon. There are many allusions to ancient history and the references to classical mythology are all evidence of the typical Renaissance culture. Latin writers such as Seneca and Virgil and Lucian have frequently been drawn. His love of learning is portrayed in his essay Of Studies and he substantiates his arguments in his essay, Of Friendship with instances from history.

Blake on reading the essays of Bacon is supposed to have remarked that they were good advice for Satan's Kingdom. Now, a Satan's Kingdom naturally implies a state of affairs in which morality has no place or in which actions are governed by a complete lack of principles. To some extent, it is indeed undeniable that Bacon's advice incorporates a certain cool disregard for high moral ideals. The actual fact is that in Bacon's essays, one find dichotomy of values, the essays present a strange complexity and contradiction of wisdom and values. In order to understand the real meaning of his essays, it is imperative to understand the underlying purpose of his writing. Man was the subject of most literature and man is the subject of Bacon's essays too. Thus the wisdom that Bacon shows in his essays is regulated by the practical consideration. It is frankly utilitarian. This does not mean that the essays don't contain ethical or philosophical values, they do, but the overall hallmark of his essays is practical use.

Wisdom, Meanness and Brightness: To a religious-minded man like Blake, advice such as what Bacon offers in his essays must indeed have been shocking. Blake would regard any utilitarian advice as opposite to God's ways, but Bacon was not so particular, for he is a man of the Renaissance. It is easy to assume that Bacon's wisdom was cynical because many of his advice calmly ignores ethical standards and seems to imply that nothing succeeds like success. Bacon is utilitarian, but he is so because he realized that the vast majority of the people in the world are guided by this attitude and success for them has only one meaning – the material success. His essays reflect the profound wisdom of his mind, his brightness is ascertained by his vast knowledge and literary and classical allusions made in his works, his meanness does not deal with his money. He was reputed to be a very generous man. He was mean because he showed a surprising lack of principle in promoting his selfish interests.

Philosopher – cum – moralist: At least two of his essays present him as entertaining deep regard for high sentiments and the sanctity of truth. Of Truth speaks of truth, love and fair dealings in high terms. Here he is a philosopher who advocates the pursuit of truth. He is also a moralist when he says that "man's mind should turn upon the "poles of truth." Falsehood debases man despite his material gains and success. Bacon advocates man to follow a path of truth and truthfulness. Similarly, his essay Of Goodness and Goodness of Nature is on a purely moral plane. He counsels goodness, charity and benevolence and there is a clear condemnation of evil.

There are some essays in which he puts a number of moral precepts, not ignoring prudential aspects. When we come to Bacon's essays dealing with subjects such as love, marriage, family life and parents and children, we are struck by the cold and unemotional treatment of topics what could easily admit an emotional approach. Prudence governs marriage, love and friendship. Love is an emotion, not fit for life according to Bacon. As a philosopher, he takes a balanced view of everything, weighs the pros and cons of every issue, presents different aspects of the picture and counsels moderation. This is a rationalist's approach and it preludes emotion and feeling. The essays are a handbook of practical wisdom. Each essay is a collection of suggestion and guideline for a man of action. His essays lack coherence and logical sequence, otherwise a quality in a standard essay. But his essays are unity of ideas.

Conclusion: But it has to be pointed out that Bacon is not a moral idealist. He does not preach morality, but not ideal morality. The kind of morality he teaches is tinged with what is called worldliness. We might even say that the guiding principle is expediency. Yet one cannot say that Bacon is amoral or immoral in his advice. In every issue, he balances the advantage and disadvantage. Even within the utilitarian code, there is a code of conduct – a morality that is perhaps as high as is easily practicable in the world as we know it. His essays embody the wisdom and philosophy and morality of a clear-eyed realist who knows quite well that men should be and but also knew what they actually were. Bacon is undoubtedly a man whose morality is greater than the average man's, but it is not of the highest order. The pursuit of good and right are important but not if it proves too costly in worldly terms. His advice is neither for Satan's Kingdom nor for God's, but for the Kingdom of man.

An Epigrammatic and Aphoristic Style of Bacon in His Essays

The vast contribution of Francis Bacon (1561-1626) to the development of English prose can hardly be overlooked or denied. He was the first scientific philosopher to write English in a definite, lucid and terse style. Though he borrowed the compose of the essay from Montaigne, he adapted it to suit his maintain purpose and to his natural ability of writing. His essays are considered a whiff of a new air in the heavy and pompous essays written in Elizabethan age.

Bacon's Essays appreciate a big charm and appeal for readers thanks to their many merits or qualities such as wisdom, superior diction, inviting style of writing, grand variety of subjects, pragmatic reach, sensuousness, wealth of metaphor and analogy and the dispersed meditations of Bacon, whose arresting wit, worldly wisdom and practical advance towards things made his essays unsurpassable and masterpieces of English literature. What makes Bacon's Essays a fresh is compact and epigrammatic style of writing. Bacon was unsurpassable in bringing his mountainous thoughts in nutshell. He had a gigantic and impressive mastery over the art of saying maximum in minimum words.

An aphorism is a short, pithy and a concise statement of a principle and truth while an epigram is a terse, narrative, or witty often a paradoxical saying. Bacon has aptly and effectively demonstrated his singular ability to announce himself aphoristically and epigrammatically in his writings. His essays are replete with aphorisms. Many sentences in his essays are like proverbs, which can be quoted to give weight to the arguments. Almost every sentence in his essays is pregnant with meaning. His utterances are thoughtful, insightful, keen, witty and meaningful to the core. Only a person of high caliber like Bacon can manufacture a considerable style of terseness and condensation. Following are some of the sentences from his essays, which depict vociferously his unbelievable epigrammatic style of writing:

"Wives are young men's mistresses, companions for middle age and extinct men's nurses." (Of Marriage and Single Life) .

"The rising unto spot is laborious, and by worry men arrive to greater grief."(Of ample area)

"Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested." (Of Studies) .

"Studies abet for delight, for ornament, and for ability." (Of Studies)

"Crafty men condemn studies; simple men cherish them; and wise men utilize them." (Of Studies)

"Reading maketh a chunky man; conference a ready man; and writing an staunch man." (Of Studies)

"Revenge is a kind of wild justice." (Of Revenge)

"Men horror death as children apprehension to go in the black." (Of awe)

"Virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant when they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best survey vice, but adversity doth best perceive virtue." (Of adversity) .

These sentences from his essays are but a few glaring examples of Bacon's terse, pithy and epigrammatic style of writing, which lisp volumes of his expansive talent and wisdom. A reader feels inexpressible delight in reading his essays and feels wiser and more enlightened after reading the pearls of wisdom in the essays of Bacon. His essays, beyond doubt, are tremendous literary work in English literature.

In fact, the secret of Bacon's style strength lies in its brevity. Virtually no writer, ancient or modern, has managed to compress so much in so little meaning compass, various tests, such as "studies and negotiations" – are marvels of condensation Perhaps the most. Bacon's style is fascinating that no one can remain indifferent. In other words, as a prose writer is passionate admirers or detractors. It is interesting to note that these two extremes are caused by the same style properties. Bacon, inaugurated the modern era of English prose. FG Selby says,

"Part of the influence of Bacon is obviously the charm of his style. The quality of the force in the style of bacon is intellectual rather than emotional"

Of parents and children

The joys, sorrow and the fears of the parents with regard to their children are personal and private, not to be shared with others.

Pros and Cons of having Children

Children make it easy to bear hard work because the parents labour will benefit the children. But they find it harder to bear misfortunes because of the thought that these misfortunes will affect the children's well-being. Anxiety is increased by children but this is compensated by the thought that their memories will be perpetuated through their children and this makes the thought of death easier to bear.

Every species perpetuates its elder through reproduction, but it is man alone who possesses the intellectual achievements and memory. Childless men do more noble deeds than those who have children. Such men have no image of themselves to leave behind, thus they seek to express and perpetuate themselves through their noble deeds which benefit mankind.

Faults of Parents towards their Children

a) Unequal favouritism: Parents, often discriminate in their love for their children. This is not desirable.

In a large family the eldest child gets some attention and the youngest is often spoilt. The ones in the middle are ignored but often prove themselves to be the best of the lot.

b) Liberality: Parents should not be miserly in giving their children pocket allowance. This is harmful as it will lead them into crooked and dishonest ways and open to over indulgence if they come into plenty in later life. Authority should be exercised but there should be liberality in pocket allowance.

c) Encourage a spirit of rivalry: Another bad practice is to encourage a spirit of competition among children. This develops into disharmony in the family when they are older.

Nephews and own Children

The Italians make no distinction between their own children and those of near relations. This is justified because a nephew sometimes bears a greater resemblance to a person than his own child.

Profession for a Child

Parents should choose a suitable profession for their child. The choice should be made early when the child is yet pliable. Any initial aversion felt by child for the profession will be overcome by custom. if, however, the child's inclination is markedly opposed to the profession of parental choice, then he may be allowed to make his own choice.

Younger brothers generally come to good as they have a strong incentive to hard work. This incentive is withdrawn if the elder brother is disinherited and the younger child hopes to be the beneficiary of a lot of wealth.

Critical Remarks

This essay belongs to the category in which Bacon views man in relation to the world and society. The subject is of the common and widespread interest. The essay contains some indisputably sound advice regarding the bringing up of children. This speaks for the keen insight Bacon possessed. Though the subject could easily involve sentimentality, Bacon considers it in the clear light of unsentimentality. He prepares, as usual, a balance-sheet of advantages and disadvantages which are the lot of parents. Apparently Bacon did not consider people with children an asset to society.

Of Great Place

The essay Of Great Place written by Francis Bacon, a famous English philosopher and scientist whose aphorism Sciencia Potentia est is known to everyone in the world, represents a lot of interesting philosophical ideas. These ideas can be easily related to the present day principles and concepts. The philosophy of Francis Bacon is concluded in the fact that the major goal of scientific knowledge lies in providing benefit to the humanity. (Anderson, 1992, p.124)

My goal in this essay in to give a critical analysis of Francis Bacon's philosophical work Of the Great Place.

The main idea of the essay is to show the readers the position of men in great places. Francis Bacon discusses the life, duties and behavior of those people who occupy high position in the society. He writes that all the people who live in great places are "thrice servants". They are servants of the sovereign or state, fame and business. Moreover, they have no freedom although they enjoy power. It is a very interesting idea that powerful people have no liberty. But its true. They have power over other people who occupy a lower position in the society but they "lose power" over themselves.

Francis Bacon argues that it is very difficult "to raise into place". People should be strong and self-confident to take a high position in the society. He writes that "by indignities men come to dignities". Moreover, they can easily lose their position that is why they should be uncompromising in their goals and desires. Even in the old age great men should not change their manners.

As Francis Bacon is a great philosopher who not only knows a lot about human nature but also tries to teach others, to share his knowledge with people around him. In his essay Of the Great Place, Bacon touches upon the problem of other people's opinion concerning "great men". He writes that great persons should "borrow other men's opinion" because they can get a lot of interesting and important things for them. The great men cannot judge themselves. They should learn what other people think of them in order to remain on the top of the ladder. (Bacon, 2006, p.4)

Bacon expresses a very interesting thought when he writes that the great men are "the first to find their own griefs, though they be the last to find their own faults". He is sure that it is very difficult for those people who have money and power to find their own faults. They do not see their faults. It seems to them that they have no faults while they have a lot of them. Only other people can show them their faults. That is why the great men are interested in learning other people's opinion. When Bacon says that the great people are the first to find their griefs, he means that they love themselves so much that cannot stand any trouble or misfortune. They have power and money and they do not want to have any griefs in their life. (Gaukroger, 2001, p.56)

Francis Bacon calls these people "strangers to themselves". The great men are fully involved in their business that they "have no time to tend their health", their body and their mind. The only things they are thinking about are power and money. Sometimes they simply forget about their health. And only when they get problems with health they come down to earth and realize that they are merely human beings.

The great philosopher also touches upon the theme of good and evil in his essay. He argues that "in place, there is a license to do good and evil". Evil is curse. Only those people who do good will be able to have rest. Good thoughts are better than good dreams because the men have an opportunity to bring their good thought to life. Bacon writes that "merit and good works is the end of man's motion". Any men should learn to do good in his life in order to get award from God at the end of "the motion". Any man can be "a partaker of God's theater" but he should deserve it. (Bacon, 2006, p.5)

The author of the essay tries to explain the readers that any man has an opportunity to analyze not only his own actions but also the actions of other people in order to understand what is good and what is bad. They should "neglect the examples of those that have carried themselves ill". They should follow only good examples. Moreover, the great people should be role models to other people. They should learn good lessons from their past life and take care of their future. Bacon writes: "Seek to make thy course regular, that men may know beforehand what to expect". (Bacon, 2006, p.6)

The great philosopher also touches upon the theme of law. It is a very important question for him because the law in the society is a vital thing. He teaches "to preserve the right of thy place, but stir no questions of jurisdiction". He also wants everyone to preserve the rights of other places.

Bacon argues that there are four major vices of authority. They are corruption, delays, roughness and facility. In order to overcome delay, the great people should be punctual. Bacon writes: "give easy access, keep time appointed". (Bacon, 2006)

Special attention is paid to corruption. Bacon writes that the great people should be sincere to avoid corruption. In order to avoid roughness, it is necessary to be kinder. The facility is worse than bribery. It is necessary to be more careful.

Francis Bacon argues that the great men should respect other people even if they are no so powerful as they are. He writes: "If you have colleagues, respect them". (Bacon, 2006, p.8)

The author of the essay wants those people who became great to have a change in their nature. He wants them to become another men. (Gaukroger, 2001, p.201)

Conclusion

In conclusion, it is necessary to say that such a wise man as Francis Bacon could not only show the strengths and the weaknesses of the great men of the society but also he could give them some recommendations concerning their way of life, their behavior and their principles. He was interested in investigation of the human nature. His natural philosophy was greatly appreciated because he represented absolutely new philosophical ideas concerning the essence of life. Francis Bacon's essay Of Great Place is one of his bold philosophical works.

"Of Studies"

"People often say that this or that person has not yet found himself. But the self is not something one finds, it is something one creates," said Thomas Szasz. The saying tells that self is not sticking by nature, or what one is from the time of its birth; but it is something nurtured, or developed through time. Such quotation can be realized from one of the best essays of all time, which is "Of Studies" by Francis Bacon. As the essay generally implies the purposes of written records such as of history and literature, it can also be entailed from such how a person can search deeper in himself. And through examination deeper of one's life, he can find the purpose in life. Hence, "Of Studies", in some point of view, serves reading of books as a tool in finding his reason for living.

"Reading maketh a full man; conference a ready man; and writing an exact man" is the most impressive statement a reader can find in Bacon's essay. Reading, in such statement, mainly points out the importance of knowledge in one's life. Making a full man indicates the importance of a person's memory in living his life. Conventions, facts, cultures theories, principles, and ideologies shape a man's behavior and perspectives towards attaining happiness. Conferencing a ready man shows the man's ability to express through declarations of what he knows and arguments of what he believes is true. Here, reading makes a man a good conversationalist; as such, one is able to find meaning in life with upright communication in relationships with people. Writing an exact man signifies efficiency of his daily activities in life. In search of his meaning, the use of logic helps him surpass any kind of natural or human-related obstacle. Moreover, the quotation extends that "And, therefore, if a man writes little, he had needed have a great memory; if he confers little, he had need of a ready wit; and if he read little, he had need of much cunning to seem to know that he knoweth not." Such statement illustrates the absence of books; that without them, man would only stick to what he already has. Here, Bacon can also make his readers realize, in some perspective, that man needs to grow and develop through time not only to survive but also to enjoy life. In search for one's purpose, he should have a tendency of adapting to new ways of thought and living that are influenced by literature and history. To internalize the above statements, as an illustration, a college student dreams of becoming a lawyer someday. The only to attain the skills of becoming a lawyer is through reading. Reading does not only enable the student to know the laws of the land, become a good debater, and win cases. It also makes him understand the rationale of the law in helping people, standing up to his moral principles, and win cases that benefit the public. The former statement entails the becoming of a lawyer in search for wealth, while the latter in search for the meaning of life. Hence, a person reading can either be influenced by what a society dictates him to be, or he can be dictated by what his heart tells him to be. And only through following one's heart can he achieve happiness.

The statement of Bacon "Read not to contradict and confute; nor to believe and take for granted; nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider" is also an effective one. Open-mindedness is the topic of such statement. First, it tells the primary aim of reading is not to fill an empty mind, but to open a closed one. Not only to provided information for the memory, reading enables a person to consider all factors that would contribute to his happiness. In other terms, reading does not really create doubts, but rather it carries people away from depression as it offers much more things to think about. Second, it extends the senses of people due to their physical limitation. Reading cuts the boundaries as sources of information are passed from one place to another. In such case, a person cannot be limited to an existing knowledge in his area and that such is not the only reason for happiness. In short, a person cannot be pressured by a certain culture if he couldn't comply with such because there is a wide variety of ways in order to attain happiness. Reflecting on Bacon's statement, for example, a Business Management major student is unhappy with what his doing because he was only forced by his business-inclined parents as he really wants to be a famous musician and excels indubitably in that field. Considering that he was pressured by the fact that a Filipino should be able to get a stable and high-profit job through being in the field of business rather than of hobby-related careers, reading inspirational books taught such student to be rebellious to his parents. In such case, the books taught him that a person loving what he is doing is more important than being rich and unhappy. And as such, reading books open minds to escape from oppressive thinking.

Lastly, Bacon's statement "Crafty men contemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation" also brings a reader to a deep realization in life. It is a matter of skill versus theories that comes into the dispute between reading and not reading. Bacon argues that the one who reads is better than one who clings to what he already knows and master on his skills. Such provides that in order to improve in a certain skill, reading is necessary. It does not only teach the fundamentals, but also flourishes such abilities due to extensive studies and research. In relation to attaining one's purpose in life, contentment can be achieved is curiosity is continuously satisfied. In explaining this, as an illustration, a regular basketball player wants to become a star player or a primary contributor to a team. Not only through daily practice, in order to be a powerful athlete, has he also studies past plays of legendary NBA players and reading books in improving his game. Thus, in contrary to other athletes' regular way of improving their game only by practice, theories play an important role in mental conditioning and witty plays overcoming the opponent.

Francis Bacon's "Of Studies" serves reading of books as a means in finding man's purpose in life. It emphasizes the importance of knowledge, open-mindedness, and theory empowering skill. Without books, there would not be any needed improvement for man hence no other means of satisfying his curiosity. A man's purpose in life is not limited to appreciating on what he has for, in some perspective, man has insatiable desires and needs. Hence, being alive means wanting to know more. The main point of all of it is that there will always be new discoveries; always a reason to obliterate existing knowledge with a new one. As said by Gelett Burgess, "If in the last few years you haven't discarded a major opinion or acquired a new one, check your pulse. You may be dead."

"Of Friendship"

As a pragmatic and as an empirical thinker Bacon followed two fundamental Renaissance principles—Sepantia or search for knowledge and Eloquent, the art of rhetoric. This explains, to some extent, the impassioned presentation of his ideas and views and the aphoristic style of his writing. But the essay Of Friendship is stylistically somewhat different in that it contains passionate and flattering statements along with profuse analogies and examples to support or explain his arguments perhaps because this essay was occasioned by the request of his friend Toby Matthew.

Bacon begins the essay by invoking the classical authorities on basic human nature. First, he refers to Aristotle's view in Politics: Whosoever is delighted in solitude is either a wild beast or a god. According to Aristotle, a man by nature and behaviour may be degraded to such an extent that he may be called unfit for society. Again, he may be so self-sufficient that he may not need society. In the first case, he resembles a wild beast and in the second, he resembles gods. Here it should be pointed out that Bacon is not ruling out the value of solitude; in fact, he is reserving solitude for higher kind of life, which is possible for a few great men like Epimenides, Numa, Empedocles, Apollonius and some Christian saints. Here too Bacon is following Aristotelian view on solitude as expressed in Ethics, where Aristotle prefers a contemplative life to an active life:

"It is the highest kind of life, it can be enjoyed uninterruptedly for the greatest length of time..."

Bacon's logic is that those who live in society should enjoy the bliss of friendship for more than one reason. First of all, friendship is necessary for maintaining good mental health by controlling and regulating the passions of the mind. In other words, Bacon here speaks of the therapeutic use of friendship though which one can lighten the heart by revealing the pent-up feelings and emotions: sorrows, joys, fears, hopes, suspicions, advice and the like.

Then in order to justify the value of friendship, Bacon points out the practice of friendship on the highest social level. He informs us that the kings and princes, in order to make friends, would raise some persons who would be fit for friendship. Then Bacon tries to glorify friendship by translating the Roman term for friendship, Participes curarum, which means 'sharers of their cares'. He gives instances of raising of men as friends from the Roman history: Sylla and Pompey the Great, Julius Caesar and Antonius, Augustus and Agrippa, Tiberius Caesar and Sejanus, Septimius Severus and Plautianus. Bacon also refers to what Comineus wrote of Duke Charles the Hardy's deterioration of his mental faculty just because of his reserve and loneliness and extends his judgement to the case of Comineus' second master, Louis XI. The point which Bacon strongly wants to assert is that friendship functions for a man in a double yet paradoxically contrary manner: "...it redoubleth joys, and cutteth griefs in halfs".

The second fruit of friendship, according to Bacon, is beneficial for the clarity of understanding. If a man has got a faithful friend, he can be consulted to clarify the confusions of the mind. He calls the counsel of a friend, citing Heraclitus, "drier and purer" than that a man gives himself out of self love, which clouds his judgement. Bacon then counsel of this sort into two kinds: "the one concerning manners and the other concerning business." A friend's constructive criticism of the other friend's behaviour helps him more than a book of morality. In the matter of conducting practical business, Bacon thinks, a true friend's advice can also be helpful in undertaking a venture or averting a danger.

Finally, Bacon speaks of the last fruit of friendship, which is manifold in the sense that there are so many things in life, which can be fulfilled only with the help of a friend. In fact, at a rare moment Bacon gets emotional and quotes classical maxim that "a friend is another self". His point is that a man may have many a desire, which may not be realized in his life-time, but if he has got a true friend, his unfulfilled desire will be taken care of by his friend. Not only this, a friend, unlike the near and dear ones and enemies, can talk to him on equal terms whenever situation demands. Keeping all these things, Bacon concludes that if a man does not have a friend, he may well leave this world. That is to say, he is not fit for the human society to live in.

Of Truth

"Of Truth" is the indicative of the greatness of Bacon's mind and art. Having philosophic and pragmatic bias of mind, Bacon shares with us the astonishing aspects of truth. In this essay, Bacon has presented the objective truth in various manifestations. Similarly, Bacon shares with us the subjective truth, operative in social life. "OF TRUTH", reveals Bacon in different light because he shows his moralistic leaning than his prudential attitude. However, the tone of this essay is Bacon's usual tone, authoritative.

"Of Truth" is Bacon's masterpiece that shows his keen observation of human beings with special regard to truth. In the beginning of the essay, Bacon rightly observes that generally people do not care for truth as Pilate, the governor of the Roman Empire, while conducting the trial of Jesus Christ, cares little for truth:

"What is truth? Said jesting Pilate; and would not stay for an answer."

Advancing his essay, Bacon explores the reasons why the people do not like truth. First, truth is acquired through hard work and man is ever reluctant to work hard. Secondly, truth curtails man's freedom. More than that the real reason of man's disliking to truth is that man is attached to lies which Bacon says "a natural though corrupt love of the lie itself." Man loves falsehood because, Bacon says, truth is as if the bright light of the day and would show what men, in actual, are. They look attractive and colourful in the dim light of lies. In this respect, Bacon rightly observes:

"A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure."

It is a fact that man prefers to cherish illusions, which make his life more interesting. With a profound observation of man's psychology, Bacon states that if deprived of false pride and vanities, the human mind would contract like a deflated balloon and these human beings would become poor, sad and ill. However, poetic untruth is not gone unnoticed by Bacon's piercing intellect. He says though poetic untruth is a wine of the Devil in priest's eyes, yet it is not as harmful as the other lies are. Bacon being a literary artist illustrates this concept with an apt imagery that the poetic untruth is but the shadow of a lie.

Proving himself highly moralistic person, Bacon deems the inquiry of truth as the highest good of human nature as he observes:

".... the inquiry of truth, which is the lovemaking or wooing of it, knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature."

The enquiry of truth, knowledge of truth and belief of truth are compared with the enjoyment of love. Such a comparison lends the literary charm to this essay.

Bacon further says in "OF TRUTH" that the last act of creation was to create rational faculty, which helps in finding truth, is the finished product of God's blessing as he says:

"... The last was the light of reason...is the illumination of his spirit."

Bacon's moral idealism is obvious when he advancing his argument in favour of truth asserts that the earth can be made paradise only with the help of truth. Man should ever stick to truth in every matter, do the act of charity and have faith in every matter, do the act of charity and have faith in God. Bacon's strong belief in truth and Divinity is stated thus:

"Certainly, it is heaven upon earth, to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth."

From the objective truth, Bacon passes judgment, to the subjective truth, which he calls "the truth of civil business". It is the compelling quality of truth, Bacon observes, that the persons who do not practice truth, acknowledge it. Bacon's idealistic moral attitude is obvious in these lines when he says: "..... that clear and round dealing is the honour of man's nature; and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work better, but it embaseth it."Bacon further asserts that the liars are like a snake that goes basely upon the belly and not upon the feet. Imagery comprising comparison is apt and convincing. Moreover, Bacon refers to Montaigne who is of the view that "a lie faces God and shrinks from man". Bacon adds that falsehood is the height of wickedness and as such will invite the Judgment of God upon all human beings on Doom's day. Therefore, Bacon concludes his essay with didacticism with a tinge of Christian morality.

In the essay, "OF TRUTH", there is no digression. All the arguments in the essay pertain to the single main idea, truth. Bacon's wide learning is clearly observed when he refers to Pilate (history), Lucian (Greek literature), Creation, Montaigne (a French essayist). "OF TRUTH" is enriched with striking similes and analogies, such as he equates liars as a snake moving basely on its belly, mixture of falsehood is like an alloy of gold and silver and many more.

The essay "OF TRUTH" is not ornamental as was the practice of the Elizabethan prose writers. Bacon is simple, natural and straightforward in his essay though Elizabethan colour is also found in "OF TRUTH" because there is a moderate use of Latinism in the essay. Economy of words is found in the essay not alone, but syntactic brevity is also obvious in this essay. We find conversational ease in this essay, which is the outstanding feature of Bacon's style. There is a peculiar feature of Bacon i.e. aphorism. We find many short, crispy, memorable and witty sayings in this essay.

Therefore, Bacon's essay "OF TRUTH" is rich in matter and manner. This is really a council 'civil and moral'. This essay has to be read slowly and thoughtfully because it is extremely condensed and it is a model of succinct and lucid prose.

Of Ambition — By Francis Bacon

In medieval times, it was believed that the body has four bodily fluids– blood, phlegm, choler or yellow bile, melancholy or black bile. It was then thought to determine emotional and physical disposition. Choler or yellow bile makes people restless, irritable, and itching for action.

A person bubbling with ambitions can hardly lead an un-hurried, contented, and a relaxed life. Since he sets his eyes high, he will continuously think to do something newer, better, and harder. He will knowingly accept challenges, and strive to solve them. The more he succeeds, the more he will drive himself to do things which others don't dare to do. Such a person will be a go-getter, a perfectionist, and a workaholic. He will be continuously restless with ideas and energy. Naturally, he will find people around him indolent, mediocre, sulking and un-worthy.

Explanation …. If such an ambitious man is restrained, and not allowed to pursue his goal, he will feel stifled, angry and rebellious. Finally, all his creative energy and dynamism will be numbed and wasted. Due to his frustration, he will develop a negative mindset and hostility to other people.

If a person, with ambition burning within him, gets a conducive environment to pursue his goal with little hindrance, he will be totally lost in his work. No ill-feeling will enter his mind. He will not harm anyone. On the other hand, if the same person is held back and not allowed to work towards his vision, he will seethe in frustration and anger. Driven by his internal discontent, he will begin to dislike others and perceive everyone as wicked and hideous. When something bad happens to his boss, the organization, society, or the government, he will derive some wicked pleasure out of the misfortune of others. Employees developing such negative mindset are a liability to the government, and the society, at large.

It is, therefore, imperative that ambitious people be given sufficient freedom to let their creativity blossom. If this is made possible, the individuals will be an asset. They will not be hostile and angry. If it is not possible to afford or grant such freedom to an ambitious person, it will be a good idea not to employ them at all and invite problem later.

If these ambitious employees continue to remain disgruntled, they might bring disgrace and downfall to their employers.

It is now realized that there is an inherent risk in employing ambitious men, so, unless essential, they should not be employed. But, this is not a rule written on stone (meaning 'rigid'). There are situations where ambitious people should be the preferred choice for engagement.

While selecting the right person for positions of key commanders for the battlefield, existence of ambition in the commander-designate cannot be a disqualification. After all, for a man in arms, a contented, laid-back temperament is a huge negative trait. Such a soldier can never fight. Shirking his responsibility, he will run away from the battlefield at the slightest sign of defeat. Only a brave ambitious and egoistic commander can confront the enemy boldly and vanquish it.

Ambitious men are also essential where safeguarding the personal safety of the king or government's senior-most functionaries are concerned. Ambitious men make reliable and astute body guards. For such responsibilities, the guard may have to shed his own life for saving the life of his employer. This calls for a spirit of extreme sacrifice on the call of duty. For the person employed as body guard, nothing is more sacrosanct than the life of the person he has to protect. Such single-minded dedication to duty is akin to the blind-folded dove (a small, robust bird) soaring higher and higher into the sky without bothering to worry about the distance and its limited energy. At one stage, it gets too exhausted to fly and comes crashing on to the ground. An ambitious guard can make similar sacrifice.

Sejanus was a gallant and ambitious warrior who was officiating as the emperor in Rome. Sejanus discharged royal duties in the absence of the real emperor Tiberious, who lived in a distant island. At one stage, receiving credible intelligence inputs, Tiberious began to suspect that Sejanus was contemplating to usurp power by dethroning and destroying him. He did not venture to challenge Sejanus frontally. Instead, he resorted to crafty intrigues to create confusion in the minds of the Senate members. He managed this subterrfuge by sending letters to them with ambiguous messages. Sometimes, he praised Sejanus in his letter, while deriding him in the next letter.

In Rome, Sejanus had created enough enemies by his boastful and brash manners. He was a brute too. Teberious plotted with the valiant and ambitious Marco to kill Sejanous. Teberious returned to Rome and summoned Sejanus early in the dawn ostensibly to decorate him. Marco seized this opportunity to take control of the mounted guards functioning under Sejanus's command till then. After this, he attacked Sejanus and killed him and threw his body unceremoniously to the river.

Had an ambitious man like Marco not been there, Teberious could not have neutralized Sejanus. Hence, kings, generals and senior government leaders need ambitious people around them.

Having thus pleaded in favour of engaging ambitious men, Bacon gives an advice of caution. He suggests that such people in the payroll must be kept under a leash either covertly or overtly. If this is not done, the danger of these men turning against their benefactors and employers is a real possibility.

If these ambitious men offering security to the heads of state or king are from the lower sections of the society, they pose lesser danger than those who are from the aristocratic class. If the security personnel are ill-mannered and boorish, they pose less danger to their employers than those who are suave and popular. Similarly, newer recruits are less dangerous than those bloated ones who have been around for a long time. Since they are privy to the affairs of the palace and the court, they might feel tempted to misuse their knowledge to harm their masters.

In all ages, kings, heads of states and men of importance have preferred to employ their known and trusted people to form the security around them and to give them counsel during crises. Some say, this is an unsound and imprudent policy that smacks of nepotism. As per Bacon, this is a wise policy as it helps to keep unduly pretentious and scheming people reasonably satisfied with the cl;out they enjoy because of their proximity to the emperor. Some disgruntled ambitious people can upstage their superiors and employers whom they are duty-bound to serve. So, keeping them in good humour is a prudent policy.

In course of his duty, the favoured person, chosen by the king to do the duty, may either endear himself or antagonize his master because of his proximity to him. This may not be detrimental to the interests of the state or the king (employer), because the man will not possibly harm his master. On the other hand, an unknown ambitious person, despite his quality and talent does not fit well to this responsibility. He may have hidden hostility which might tempt him to rebel against his master.

If at all such ambitious persons are employed, it is essential to preempt any over-zealous tendency in him by employing another person of equivalent talent in a parallel position.

Bacon says, even this is not enough. What if the two persons collude to plot against the king? They may also fall out with each other creating disharmony and undesirable hostility around the master. To prevent such a situation from happening, a few counselors or high-level officials or ministers may be appointed to bring stability and coherence to the set-up.

The prince / king / employer / head of state may prop up and bring in a person of somewhat lesser upbringing and inferior attributes to the inner circle. Although these persons may appear misfits and, even, disagreeable to be in the inner circle, they offer a counterweight to the overly ambitious and crafty employee.

Bacon exhibits his keen sense of observation and judgment here. If the potential candidate for the post of security-in-charge and advisor (similar to a minister’s job) has an awesome exterior, repulsive persona and an unpleasant aura around him, he may well be the right candidate for the job of the body-guard cum protector. In contrast, if the person is robustly-built with a daring nature, his appointment may invite disaster.

If suspicion arises about the integrity and loyalty of the aides, and they are perceived to be potential usurpers, it would be advisable to ease them out cleverly. No rash action against them should be taken against them, lest they explode and do something nasty. In order not to upset them with the impression that they are facing dismissal, the ruler may confuse them through deception. He may reward them today, reprimand them tomorrow. Such ambiguous signals from the ruler will leave them wondering as to where they stand. Such confusion in their minds will unwittingly freeze their evil thoughts and put their unwanted ambitions in cold storage.

Bacon proceeds to argue that ‘ambition’, per se, is not bad. For example, a budding author wanting to write well to outshine his contemporaries is a good thing. A musician trying to blaze a new trail through his creative music is a great gift to society. A doctor trying to rise to world eminence by his medical skill is a boon to humanity. But, such burning ambition and zeal should be restricted to the area they excel in. It should not spill over to other domains like administration, military and other state’s affairs. In such case, an overly ambitious person is a potential hazard. He carries the seed of destruction of the state.

So, it is welcome when ambitious people excel in their areas through single-minded effort. But it is fraught to have ambitious people in key administrative positions. The ruler depends on these functionaries to run the day-to-day administrations. Ambitious people may play havoc when they realize that the ruler leans on them to run the administration.

Pursuit of excellence, fame and adulation by gifted individuals can never be bad for the mankind. These people should be nurtured and rewarded.

However, if a person wants to tower over others and sway ordinary people to his control, we can conclude that his rise is ominous for the state. If not nipped in the bud early, he will destroy his own state and his generation. Honor, as understood generally, brings the following benefits to an individual.

a. Reaching an exalted position in society,

b. The access to the king and the upper echelons of power, and

c. Affluence, prosperity and well-being.

An ambitious man who limits his aspirations to the above three goals is the right man to be engaged, encouraged and rewarded. The prince who correctly reads these attributes in an aspiring person and decides to take him on board is the wise ruler worthy of appreciation.

In conclusion, Bacon dons the garb of the modern HR manager for the princes, rulers and people in the highest authority of power. He wants a. People with their mind rigidly anchored to their duty to be nominated. b. People, who have propensity to use their position to further their own ambitions, should be shunned. c. People, who are driven by their conscience rather than by their bravery to discharge their duty, are to be chosen. d. People who love to remain engrossed in their work are to be given preference over those who exhibit obedience and servility.

Gulliver's Travels

AUGUSTAN AGE; 1700-1750

The reign of Queen Anne in early 18th-century England covering The age of Pope (dated from about the death of Dryden in 1700 to Pope's death in 1744) is called the Augustan Age or the Neoclassical age. The real Augustan Age refers to the era of Augustus, ruler of Rome from 27 BC to AD 14 and it was noted for a number of classical writers, including Horace, Ovid, and Virgil, and it is considered the Golden Age of Latin literature. The Augustan age of English literature employed the same Roman forms, such as the ode, and emphasized common sense, moderation, reason over emotion and elegance over brevity, hence derived the name. It was relatively a stable and peaceful age in its social and political aspects. The Wars of Spanish Succession (1701-1713) was successful under Duke Marlborough, a Tory Politician the Tories in the reign of Queen Anne (1702-1714), superseded the Whigs. Another political event was that of English succession. All of Queen Anne's children died before her so, in 1701, the Act of settlement was passed, by which the succession was settled upon the House of Hanover. It was a victory for the Whig's. One Queen Anne's death George I of Hanover ascended the throne. The Tories tried to reborn the Stuarts, but failed. In 1745, in the reign of George II (1727-69), the Tories made a more serious effort, but again failed. Under the Hanover Monarch, the first half of the 18th century was a period of stability and stead growing wealth and prosperity.

During this period, the power of middle classes rose. Never the less political power was concentrated in the hands of the nobility whether Whig or Tory. The period was remarkable for rapid social development in England people learnt the art of living together, while still holding different opinion. To bring about reforms, votes were necessary. So, the people were to be approached with ideas, facts and information. Newspaper was born literature in the form of newspaper, pamphlets; magazines became the chief instrument of the nation's progress. The political and with pen rather than with sword, Coffee houses and clubs became centre of social life. The men in these places sat for hours, together and discussed the news of the day and other matters. In London, alone more than two thousand coffee houses spring up and the no of private clubs was quite as astonishing. The typical Londoner of the time was still corrupt, rude and vulgar in taste. But the aristocrats were improving themselves materially and intellectually. They sought excellence in out word from, of dress and manners rather than morals. Their culture was artificial. The literature of the period is highly critical of the shallow and artificial behavior of fashionable men and women.

In the age of Alexander Pope, the classical spirit in English literature reached its highest point, and at the same time other forces became manifest. Dryden's poetry had achieved grandeur, amplitude, and sublimity within a particular definition of good taste and good sense and under the tutelage of the Roman and Greek classics. To the poetry of Pope this characterization applies even more stringently. More than any other English poet, he submitted himself to the requirement that the expressive force of poetic genius should issue forth only in a formulation as reasonable, lucid, balanced, compressed, final, and perfect as the power of human reason can make it. Pope did not have Dryden's majesty. Perhaps, given his predilection for correctness of detail, he could not have had it. Also, the readers of succeeding times have concluded that the dictates of reason do not all converge on only one poetic formula, just as the heroic couplet, which Pope brought to final perfection, is not necessarily the most generally suitable of English poetic forms. Nevertheless, the ease, harmony, and grace of Pope's poetic line are still impressive, and his quality of precise but never labored expression of thought remains unequaled.

Nearly every writer of the age wrote on the contemporary religious and political events but with moderation and reason. They use delicate satire. Great literary figures like Addison, Steele, Johnson and Goldsmith educated and civilized the general public by means their writing. It was the poet Goldsmith who first of all designated the early 18th century, the Augustan Age. The literature of the time has the same quality that distinguished the Latin literature of the day of August. These qualities are simple regularity, proportion and finish. According to Hudson, "in both cases men of letters were largely depended upon powerful patterns. In both cases a critical spirit prevails. In both cases, the literature produced by thoroughly artificial society was a literature not of free creative effort and inspiration, but of self-conscious and deliberate art."

JONATHAN SWIFT; 1667-1745

Jonathan Swift, son of the English lawyer Jonathan Swift the elder, was born in Dublin, Ireland, on November 30, 1667. He grew up there in the care of his uncle before attending Trinity College at the age of fourteen, where he stayed for seven years, graduating in 1688. In that year, he became the secretary of Sir William Temple, an English politician and member of the Whig party. In 1694, he took religious orders in the Church of Ireland and then spent a year as a country parson. He then spent further time in the service of Temple before returning to Ireland to become the chaplain of the earl of Berkeley. Meanwhile, he had begun to write satires on the political and religious corruption surrounding him, working on A Tale of a Tub, which supports the position of the Anglican Church against its critics on the left and the right, and The Battle of the Books, which argues for the supremacy of the classics against modern thought and literature. He also wrote a number of political pamphlets in favor of the Whig party. In 1709 he went to London to campaign for the Irish church but was unsuccessful. After some conflicts with the Whig party, mostly because of Swift's strong allegiance to the church, he became a member of the more conservative Tory party in 1710.

Unfortunately for Swift, the Tory government fell out of power in 1714 and Swift, despite his fame for his writings, fell out of favor. Swift, who had been hoping to be assigned a position in the Church of England, instead returned to Dublin, where he became the dean of St. Patrick's. During his brief time in England, Swift had become friends with writers such as Alexander Pope, and during a meeting of their literary club, the Martinus Scriblerus Club, they decided to write satires of modern learning. The third voyage of Gulliver's Travels is assembled from the work Swift did during this time. However, the final work was not completed until 1726, and the narrative of the third voyage was actually the last one completed. After his return to Ireland, Swift became a staunch supporter of the Irish against English attempts to weaken their economy and political power, writing pamphlets such as the satirical A Modest Proposal, in which he suggests that the Irish problems of famine and overpopulation could be easily solved by having the babies of poor Irish subjects sold as delicacies to feed the rich.

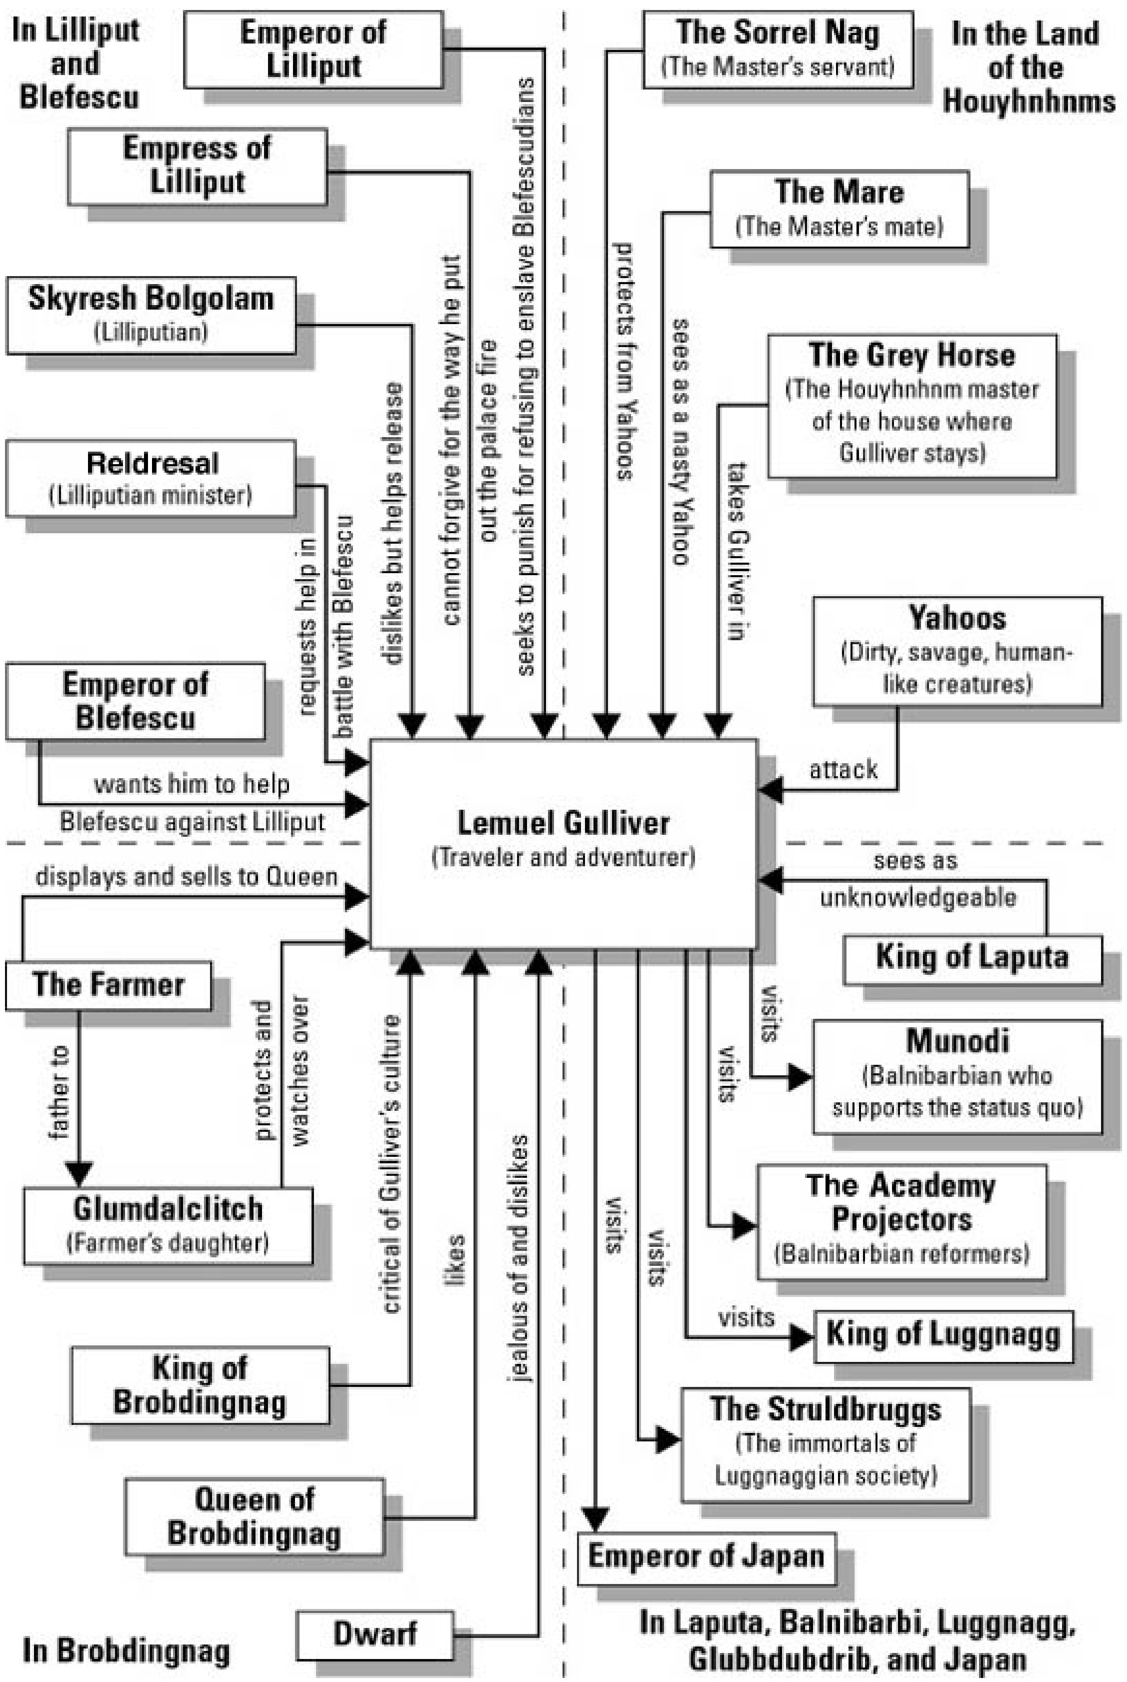
Gulliver's Travels was a controversial work when it was first published in 1726. In fact, it was not until almost ten years after its first printing that the book appeared with the entire text that Swift had originally intended it to have. Ever since, editors have excised many of the passages, particularly the more caustic ones dealing with bodily functions. Even without those passages, however, Gulliver's Travels serves as a biting satire, and Swift ensures that it is both humorous and critical, constantly attacking British and European society through its descriptions of imaginary countries.

Late in life, Swift seemed for many observers to become even more caustic and bitter than he had been. Three years before his death, he was declared unable to care for himself, and guardians were appointed. Based on these facts and on a comparison between Swift's fate and that of his character Gulliver, some people have concluded that he gradually became insane and that his insanity was a natural outgrowth of his indignation and outrage against humankind. However, the truth seems to be that Swift was suddenly incapacitated by a paralytic stroke late in life, and that prior to this incident his mental capacities were unimpaired.

Gulliver's Travels is about a specific set of political conflicts, but if it were nothing more than that it would long ago have been forgotten. The staying power of the work comes from its depiction of the human condition and its often despairing, but occasionally hopeful, sketch of the possibilities for humanity to rein in its baser instincts.

Gulliver's Travels : Plot Overview

Gulliver's Travels recounts the story of Lemuel Gulliver, a practical-minded Englishman trained as a surgeon who takes to the seas when his business fails. In a deadpan first-person narrative that rarely shows any signs of self-reflection or deep emotional response, Gulliver narrates the adventures that befall him on these travels.



Gulliver's adventure in Lilliput begins when he wakes after his shipwreck to find himself bound by innumerable tiny threads and addressed by tiny captors who are in awe of him but fiercely protective of their kingdom. They are not afraid to use violence against Gulliver, though their arrows are little more than pinpricks. But overall, they are hospitable, risking famine in their land by feeding Gulliver, who consumes more food than a thousand Lilliputians combined could. Gulliver is taken into the capital city by a vast wagon the Lilliputians have specially built. He is presented to the emperor, who is entertained by Gulliver, just as Gulliver is flattered by the attention of royalty. Eventually Gulliver becomes a national resource, used by the army in its war against the people of Blefuscu, whom the Lilliputians hate for doctrinal differences concerning the proper way to crack eggs. But things change when Gulliver is convicted of treason for putting out a fire in the royal palace with his urine and is condemned to be shot in the eyes and starved to death. Gulliver escapes to Blefuscu, where he is able to repair a boat he finds and set sail for England.

After staying in England with his wife and family for two months, Gulliver undertakes his next sea voyage, which takes him to a land of giants called Brobdingnag. Here, a field worker discovers him. The farmer initially treats him as little more than an animal, keeping him for amusement. The farmer eventually sells Gulliver to the queen, who makes him a courtly diversion and is entertained by his musical talents. Social life is easy for Gulliver after his discovery by the court, but not particularly enjoyable. Gulliver is often repulsed by the physicality of the Brobdingnagians, whose ordinary flaws are many times magnified by their huge size. Thus, when a couple of courtly ladies let him play on their naked bodies, he is not attracted to them but rather disgusted by their enormous skin pores and the sound of their torrential urination. He is generally startled by the ignorance of the people here—even the king knows nothing about politics. More unsettling findings in Brobdingnag come in the form of various animals of the realm that endanger his life. Even Brobdingnagian insects leave slimy trails on his food that make eating difficult. On a trip to the frontier, accompanying the royal couple, Gulliver leaves Brobdingnag when his cage is plucked up by an eagle and dropped into the sea.

Next, Gulliver sets sail again and, after an attack by pirates, ends up in Laputa, where a floating island inhabited by theoreticians and academics oppresses the land below, called Balnibarbi. The scientific research undertaken in Laputa and in Balnibarbi seems totally inane and impractical, and its residents too appear wholly out of touch with reality. Taking a short side trip to Glubbdubdrib, Gulliver is able to witness the conjuring up of figures from history, such as Julius Caesar and other military leaders, whom he finds much less impressive than in books. After visiting the Luggnaggians and the Struldbrugs, the latter of which are senile immortals who prove that age does not bring wisdom, he is able to sail to Japan and from there back to England.

Finally, on his fourth journey, Gulliver sets out as captain of a ship, but after the mutiny of his crew and a long confinement in his cabin, he arrives in an unknown land. This land is populated by Houyhnhnms, rational-thinking horses who rule, and by Yahoos, brutish humanlike creatures who serve the Houyhnhnms. Gulliver sets about learning their language, and when he can speak he narrates his voyages to them and explains the constitution of England. He is treated with great courtesy and kindness by the horses and is enlightened by his many conversations with them and by his exposure to their noble culture. He wants to stay with the Houyhnhnms, but his bared body reveals to the horses that he is very much like a Yahoo, and he is banished. Gulliver is grief-stricken but agrees to leave. He fashions a canoe and makes his way to a nearby island, where he is picked up by a Portuguese ship captain who treats him well, though Gulliver cannot help now seeing the captain—and all humans—as shamefully Yahoolike. Gulliver then concludes his narrative with a claim that the lands he has visited belong by rights to England, as her colonies, even though he questions the whole idea of colonialism.

In Lilliput and Blefescu
Emperor of Lilliput
Empress of Lilliput
Skyresh Bolgolam (Lilliputian)
Reldresal (Lilliputian minister)
Emperor of Blefescu requests help in battle with Blefescu dislikes but helps release cannot forgive for the way he put out the palace fire seeks to punish for refusing to enslave Blefescudians wants him to help Blefescu against Lilliput
The Sorrel Nag (The Master's servant)
In the Land of the Houyhnhnms
The Mare (The Master's mate)
The Grey Horse (The Houyhnhnm master of the house where Gulliver stays) Yahoos (Dirty, savage, human-like creatures) protects from Yahoos sees as a nasty Yahoo takes Gulliver in attack
Lemuel Gulliver (Traveler and adventurer) displays and sells to Queen
The Farmer
father to protects and watches over Glumdalclitch (Farmer's daughter) critical of Gulliver's culture likes jealous of and dislikes
King of Brobdingnag
Queen of Brobdingnag
Dwarf
In Brobdingnag sees as unknowledgeable
King of Laputa visits
Munodi (Balnibarbian who supports the status quo)
The Academy Projectors (Balnibarbian reformers)
King of Luggnagg
The Struldbruggs (The immortals of Luggnaggian society)
Emperor of Japan
In Laputa, Balnibarbi, Luggnagg, Glubbdubdrib, and Japan

Critical Analysis of Gulliver's Travels

Jonathan Swift wrote Gulliver's Travels in 1762 with the intent of entertaining many people. Entertainment through satire is what Swift had in mind. To fully understand Gulliver's Travels, one must first reflect upon the following: the plot, character, setting, theme, point of view, conflict, climax, resolution, symbolism, and figurative language. These ideas will help the reader comprehend some of the ideas portrayed throughout the novel, as well as why Swift wrote them.

The setting plays an important role in all novels, but in Gulliver's Travels, one must take into consideration that the four different parts of the book have different settings. The first setting is more or less on an island called Lilliput, on November 5, 1699. Gulliver ended up on this island due to a ship wreck. The setting to the second part of the novel happens to be upon his arrival to another island that Gulliver wishes to inspect for water. This was on the 16th of June, 1703. The third part of the book has many different little scenes. The first of which takes place on Laputa an island of deformed creatures. The fourth and final part of the book takes place in the country of Houyhnhnms, in 1711.

The main character, Gulliver, is a well-educated sailor. He has been recommended to be a surgeon. Traveling around the world, exploring new places, Gulliver meets many new cultures and civilizations. Gulliver wears clothes not uncommon to the 1700's. He has long hair, which sometimes restricts him from turning his head. Gulliver is a round character. This can be seen when he refers to past experiences during an adventure. This means that he can compare the two situations, thus learning from it. There are many minor characters. Easier referred to by the names of their people. Them being: the small Lilliputians, the giant Brobdingnags, the creatures at Lugnagg and Balnibarbi, with the islands of Laputa and Blubdrubdrib. And finally, the Yahoos and Houyhnhnms. Gulliver's stories are told in the first person by himself.

Some very important symbols are used throughout the novel to depict some very important ideas. One of these symbols would be when Gulliver relieves himself on the Lilliputians royal castle to put out a fire. It seems, as though how silly something may seem, it just might be an answer to an important problem. A second symbol clearly seen is the relationship to the Yahoos and the Houyhnhnms. This is easily perceived as a representation of the relationship to horses and humans. The superiority of the horses in the novel shows how, although different, they may just be as smart, if not smarter than the owner.

Some very important themes that the reader may have picked up on can be very helpful. One of these themes is that no matter how small something is, it is not inferior. Gulliver stayed with the Lilliputians for a very long time. The fact that they were only six inches tall did not mean that he could do anything he wanted around or to them. Another theme that the reader should have got is that no matter how large something is, it still has to have a small amount of brains. The giants in the second part were very tall, but nowhere did the book say that they were very smart.

There are many different conflicts throughout the novel as well. Some of these being internal, and others being external. One of the internal conflicts can be seen when Gulliver is tied down by the Lilliputians. Gulliver has a chance to snatch up many of the little creatures, but knows that they will most likely shoot him with needle-like arrows. An external conflict is between Gulliver's crew against nature. Many times Gulliver gets blown off course by a storm or has his boat overturned by waves. This is an example of human against nature.

Some of the literary devices that Swift uses in Gulliver's Travels are satire and irony. Swift wrote the novel as a parody of travel books and an indictment of mankind; it is revered as a charming children's story. The ironies Swift intended to be recognized-the small-mindedness of the tiny Lilliputians, the physical and moral abnormality of the giant Brobdingnagians, and the perfect animalizing of the filthy manlike Yahoos (far inferior to the placid horses they work for)-are often ignored or dismissed.

After considering all of this, the reader should have a better understanding of the novel. Being able to pay a greater attention to the details of a novel always helps one understand the greater, broader ideas following them. Jonathan Swift was a magnificent author. Without his Gulliver's Travels, there would be a great gap in the art of Literature.

Philosophical & Political Background of Gulliver's Travels

Swift has at least two aims in Gulliver's Travels besides merely telling a good adventure story. Behind the disguise of his narrative, he is satirizing the pettiness of human nature in general and attacking the Whigs in particular. By emphasizing the six-inch height of the Lilliputians, he graphically diminishes the stature of politicians and indeed the stature of all human nature. And in using the fire in the Queen's chambers, the rope dancers, the bill of particulars drawn against Gulliver, and the inventory of Gulliver's pockets, he presents a series of allusions that were identifiable to his contemporaries as critical of Whig politics.

Why, one might ask, did Swift have such a consuming contempt for the Whigs? This hatred began when Swift entered politics as the representative of the Irish church. Representing the Irish bishops, Swift tried to get Queen Anne and the Whigs to grant some financial aid to the Irish church. They refused, and Swift turned against them even though he had considered them his friends and had helped them while he worked for Sir William Temple. Swift turned to the Tories for political allegiance and devoted his propaganda talents to their services. Using certain political events of 1714-18, he described in Gulliver's Travels many things that would remind his readers that Lilliputian folly was also English folly — and, particularly, Whig folly. The method, for example, which Gulliver must use to swear his allegiance to the Lilliputian emperor parallels the absurd difficulty that the Whigs created concerning the credentials of the Tory ambassadors who signed the Treaty of Utrecht.

Swift's craftiness was successful. His book was popular because it was a compelling adventure tale and also a puzzle. His readers were eager to identify the various characters and discuss their discoveries, and, as a result, many of them saw politics and politicians from a new perspective.

Within the broad scheme of Gulliver's Travels, Gulliver seems to be an average man in eighteenth-century England. He is concerned with family and with his job, yet he is confronted by the pigmies that politics and political theorizing make of people. Gulliver is utterly incapable of the stupidity of the Lilliputian politicians, and, therefore, he and the Lilliputians are ever-present contrasts for us. We are always aware of the difference between the imperfect (but normal) moral life of Gulliver, and the petty and stupid political life of emperors, prime ministers, and informers.

In the second book of the Travels, Swift reverses the size relationship that he used in Book I. In Lilliput, Gulliver was a giant; in Brobdingnag, Gulliver is a midget. Swift uses this difference to express a difference in morality. Gulliver was an ordinary man compared to the amoral political midgets in Lilliput. Now, Gulliver remains an ordinary man, but the Brobdingnagians are moral men. They are not perfect, but they are consistently moral. Only children and the deformed are intentionally evil.

Set against a moral background, Gulliver's "ordinariness" exposes many of its faults. Gulliver is revealed to be a very proud man and one who accepts the madness and malice of European politics, parties, and society as natural. What's more, he even lies to conceal what is despicable about them. The Brobdingnagian king, however, is not fooled by Gulliver. The English, he says, are "odious vermin."

Swift praises the Brobdingnagians, but he does not intend for us to think that they are perfect humans. They are superhumans, bound to us by flesh and blood, just bigger morally than we are. Their virtues are not impossible for us to attain, but because it takes so much maturing to reach the stature of a moral giant, few humans achieve it.

Brobdingnag is a practical, moral utopia. Among the Brobdingnagians, there is goodwill and calm virtue. Their laws encourage charity. Yet they are, underneath, just men who labor under every disadvantage to which man is heir. They are physically ugly when magnified, but they are morally beautiful. We cannot reject them simply because Gulliver describes them as physically gross. If we reject them, we become even more conscious of an ordinary person's verminous morality.

In Books I and II, Swift directs his satire more toward individual targets than firing broadside at abstract concepts. In Book I, he is primarily concerned with Whig politics and politicians rather than with the abstract politician; in Book II, he elects to reprove immoral Englishmen rather than abstract immorality. In Book III, Swift's target is somewhat abstract — pride in reason — but he also singles out and censures a group of his contemporaries whom he believed to be particularly depraved in their exaltation of reason. He attacks his old enemies, the Moderns, and their satellites, the Deists and rationalists. In opposition to their credos, Swift believed that people were capable of reasoning, but that they were far from being fully rational. For the record, it should probably be mentioned that Swift was not alone in denouncing this clique of people. The objects of Swift's indignation had also aroused the rage of Pope, Arbuthnot, Dryden, and most of the orthodox theologians of the Augustan Age.

This love of reason that Swift criticizes derived from the rationalism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. John Locke's theories of natural religion were popularly read, as were Descartes' theories about the use of reason. Then a loosely connected group summarized these opinions, plus others, and a cult was born: They called themselves the Deists.

In general, the Deists believed that people could reason, observe the universe accurately, and perceive axioms intuitively. With these faculties, people could then arrive at religious truth; they did not need biblical revelation. Orthodox theology has always made reason dependent on God and morality, but the Deists refuted this notion. They attacked revealed religion, saying that if reason can support the God described by the Bible, it may also conclude that God is quite different from the biblical God. The answer depends upon which observations and axioms the reasoner chooses to use.

Even before he wrote the Travels, Swift opposed excessive pride in reason. In his ironical Argument Against Abolishing Christianity, he makes plain what he considers to be the consequences of depending on reason, rather than upon faith and revelation. Disbelief, he said, is the consequence of presumptuous pride in reasoning, and immorality is the consequence of disbelief. Swift believed that religion holds moral society together. A person who does not believe in God by faith and revelation is in danger of disbelieving in morality.

To Swift, rationalism leads to Deism, Deism to atheism, and atheism to immorality. Where people worship reason, they abandon tradition and common sense. Both tradition and common sense tell humankind that murder, whoring, and drunkenness, for example, are immoral. Yet, if one depends on reason for morality, that person can find no proof that one should not drink, whore, or murder. Thus, reasonably, is one not free to do these things? Swift believed that will, rather than reason, was far too often the master.

Alexander Pope agreed with the position that Swift took. In his Essay on Man, he states that people cannot perceive accurately. Our axioms are usually contradictory, and our rational systems of living in a society are meaninglessly abstract. People, he insists, are thoroughly filled with self-love and pride; they are incapable of being rational — that is, objective. Swift would certainly concur.

In Book III, Laputan systematizing is exaggerated, but Swift's point is clear and concrete: Such systematizing is a manifestation of proud rationalism. The Laputans think so abstractly that they have lost their hold on common sense. They are so absorbed in their abstractions that they serve food in geometric and musical shapes. Everything is relegated to abstract thought, and the result is mass delusion and chaos. The Laputans do not produce anything useful; their clothes do not fit, and their houses are not constructed correctly. These people think — but only for abstract thinking's sake; they do not consider ends.

In a similar fashion, Swift shows that philology and scholarship betray the best interests of the Luggnaggians; pragmatic scientism fails in Balnibarbi; and accumulated experience does not make the Struldbruggs either happy or wise. In his topical political references, Swift demonstrates the viciousness and cruelty, as well as the folly, that arise from abstract political theory imposed by selfish politicians. The common people, Swift says, suffer. He also cites the folly of Laputan theorists and the Laputan king by referring to the immediate political blunders of the Georges.

The Travels is structured very much like a variation on the question, "Why are people so often vicious and cruel?" and the answer, "Because they succumb to the worst elements in themselves." Man is an infinitely complex animal; he is many, many mixtures of intellect and reason, charity and emotion. Yet reason and intellect are not synonymous — even if they might profitably be; nor are emotion and charity necessarily akin to one another. But few people see Man as the grey mixture of varying qualities that he is. Man oversimplifies, and, in the last book of the Travels, Swift shows us the folly of people who advance such theories. In his time, it was a popular notion that a Reasonable Man was a Complete Man. Here, Swift shows us Reason exalted. We must judge whether it is possible or desirable for Man.

The Houyhnhnms are super-reasonable. They have all the virtues that the stoics and Deists advocated. They speak clearly, they act justly, and they have simple laws. They do not quarrel or argue since each knows what is true and right. They do not suffer from the uncertainties of reasoning that afflict Man. But they are so reasonable that they have no emotions. They are untroubled by greed, politics, or lust. They act from undifferentiated benevolence. They would never prefer the welfare of one of their own children to the welfare of another Houyhnhnm simply on the basis of kinship.

Very simply, the Houyhnhnms are horses; they are not humans. And this physical difference parallels the abstract difference. They are fully rational, innocent, and undepraved. Man is capable of reason, but never wholly or continuously, and he is — but never wholly or continuously — passionate, proud, and depraved.

In contrast to the Houyhnhnms, Swift presents their precise opposite: the Yahoos, creatures who exhibit the essence of sensual human sinfulness. The Yahoos are not merely animals; they are animals who are naturally vicious. Swift describes them in deliberately filthy and disgusting terms, often using metaphors drawn from dung. The Yahoos plainly represent Mankind depraved. Swift, in fact, describes the Yahoos in such disgusting terms that early critics assumed that he hated Man to the point of madness. Swift, however, takes his descriptions from the sermons and theological tracts of his predecessors and contemporaries. If Swift hated Man, one would also have to say that St. Francis and St. Augustine did, too. Swift's descriptions of depraved Man are, if anything, milder than they might be. One sermon writer described Man as a saccus stercorum, a sack filled with dung. The descriptions of the Yahoos do not document Swift's supposed misanthropy. Rather, the creatures exhibit physically the moral flaws and natural depravity that theologians say plague the offspring of Adam.

Midway between the poles of the Houyhnhnms and the Yahoos, Swift places Gulliver. Gulliver is an average man, except that he has become irrational in his regard for reason. Gulliver is so disgusted with the Yahoos and so admires the Houyhnhnms that he tries to become a horse.

This aspiration to become a horse exposes Gulliver's grave weakness. Gullible and proud, he becomes such a devotee of reason that he cannot accept his fellow humans who are less than totally reasonable. He cannot recognize virtue and charity when they exist. Captain Pedro de Mendez rescues Gulliver and takes him back to Europe, but Gulliver despises him because Mendez doesn't look like a horse. Likewise, when he reaches home, Gulliver hates his family because they look and smell like Yahoos. He is still capable of seeing objects and surfaces accurately, but he is incapable of grasping true depths of meaning.

Swift discriminates between people as they are idealized, people as they are damned, people as they possibly could be, and others as they are. The Houyhnhnms embody the ideal of the rationalists and stoics; the Yahoos illustrate the damning abstraction of sinful and depraved Man; and Pedro de Mendez represents virtue possible to Man. Gulliver, usually quite sane, is misled when we leave him, but he is like most people. Even dullards, occasionally, become obsessed by something or other for a while before lapsing back into their quiet, workaday selves. Eventually, we can imagine that Gulliver will recover and be his former unexciting, gullible self.

Swift uses the technique of making abstractions concrete to show us that super-reasonable horses are impossible and useless models for humans. They have never fallen and therefore have never been redeemed. They are incapable of the Christian virtues that unite passion and reason: Neither they nor the Yahoos are touched by grace or charity. In contrast, the Christian virtues of Pedro de Mendez and the Brobdingnagians (the "least corrupted" of mankind) are possible to humans. These virtues are the result of grace and redemption. Swift does not press this theological point, however. He is, after all, writing a satire, not a religious tract.

"Gulliver's Travels" – An allegorical satire

"Swift was a wild beast who worried and baited all mankind…." said Compton and Rickett in the book" The History of English Literature". Pramod K. Nayak marks, "Swift's novel Gulliver's Travels is a mocking account of such journeys to different parts of the earth." Gulliver's Travels shows Swift's gust with man. The novel deals with directly human nature at every moment in the life. There is a great happiness after reading seriousness behind the instruction of each and every place and time in Gulliver's Travels.

What do we think after reading the novel? Can we put the novel among the great books of satire or childish as well as adventure story? The novel has lots of images that we can say the novel of satire and moral tale, a fanciful account of strange and wonderful lands, and therein lie its real charm, one of the most delightful of children's books, an attractive fiction with a utopian concept, or a neurotic phantacy, 'a pseudo-realistic narrative and a playfulness of fancy' says Compton and Rickett, or at last a short story of numerous endeavors of common human being named Gulliver.

But one should also focus on the other side of the novel. Not only a medium of ultimate delight but it is also the novel of great sarcastic remark of whole human being, mordant attack men, great hatred towards human weakness misanthropy toward the whole human kind, irony on human frailty and mockery on human beings' existence and so many other things. There is one striking example of misanthropy in the voyage of Lilliput that Gulliver earns the trust of the midgets of tiny land but he does not wins the trust of pigmies because he is under the benevolence of them otherwise he is misanthropist of tiny inhabitants. These all points are the butts of Swift himself to satirize people and especially people of England who are in the field of Politics. Because of these so many tokens of names given to the novel, Swift has possessed a very gigantic satirist among the novelists and master of irony and satire.

Gulliver's Travels is all about Lemuel Gulliver's various adventures in several unknown lands from where he comes out as complete common human being. These prime four lands like Lilliput, Brobdignag, Laputa and Houyhnhnms in which Swift has enunciated various human weakness and pride of the people, praised rational animals like horses and made a mordant irony upon Yahoos. He has indicated almost all bad habits of the people. For that task, he has used three main 'Modern judgments', Norman A. Jeffers has written about Gulliver's Travels, "It is at once a delightful, fantastic story of adventures foe children, a political allegory, and a serious satire on human nature, on contemporary politics, social institutions, and on the manners and the morals of the age."

The book is written in travelogue. The narrator Gulliver himself becomes a reporter, messenger and inter-mediator like person between readers and the book itself. Our main concern about this book is that Gulliver's travels is basically an allegorical satire on contemporary leaders, Swift's foes like Walpole, Anne, Charles II, etc. before discussing the subject matter let's have a look on the term like allegory, satire and iron.

Generally speaking, an allegory means a curtain or a wall that people have on their faces. If this curtain is removed, we can know what is the reality and fact of life. Indirectly to speak or write or explain is called Allegory. To put it into practice, the novelist always uses an object like animals, any infinite thing or sometimes human being also. M.H.Abrams observes, "An allegory is a narrative, whether in prose or verse, in which the agents and actions, and sometimes the setting as well, are contrived by the author to make coherent sense on the 'literal' or primary, level of significant…."

The third book of Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels, the voyage to Laputa and Lagado is an allegorical satire directed mainly against philosophical and scientific pedantry.

In Gulliver's Travels midgets in initial voyage, giant people Brobdignag, animals like human being, old temple, etc. are treated like allegory. This is deep and rooted meaning or logic among these things. Sometime animals are allegorized but to play a role of any particular character, novelists take the instances of human being. By the behavior of them we recognize what the matter is. Lilliput is also full of so many satires and ironies, characterization of the emperor of the land, Flimnap, the treasurer, queen are suitable paragons. They represent probably P.M.Walpol, Lord Carteret, Anne, etc. and their behaviors. They are very particular in their behavior. Here, by allegory, Swift makes satire on intrigues and schemes against other political parties, human pride and pretension, evils of taboos in Lilliput are main target of satire.

The nondescript picture of baggers who are physically ill represents the baggers of Dublin. The novelist puts all these things in veiled manners.

The very interesting matter about the conflict between big-endian and little-endian, high-heels and low-heels denotes the collision between two major parties in England, the quarrels twixt the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant. Gulliver reduces the mistress of the emperor by extinguishing a fire in her apartment indicates Queen Anne's annoyance with Swift for having written "A Tale of a Tub". First two lands in which bidgets and giants are living, suggest that there are the people who are so much narrow-minded as well as frankly that always lead him towards great annihilation. Their lifestyle, way of speaking, clothes, daily affairs and so many other things are deeply allegorized. Even he also ironically remarked of all most all professionals and second class work like bagging, farming, etc according to upper-class people. Swift says,

"I have ever hated all nations, professions, and communities but principally I hate and detest that animals called man…Upon this great foundation of misanthropy the whole building of my 'Travels' is created."

The tone behind satirizing people sounds like misanthropy. He hates whole human kind and reason behind that may be that human being are not really wholesome or truly moral men. They are faulty and followers of evils.

The striking feature of adventure novel is that human beings always do something new from coming out of the box and made worldly affairs. The moral lesson behind their allegorical satire is that people always do work if they are compelled to do that various serious and bad circumstances make man evil as well as mould his character. Why did Swift opt travels for satirizing people? The answer is, by traveling people come across several other new people and their nature, their moral frailty. Good professionals like philosopher, theologist, etc. are also corrupted. Sometime there is a tone of irony in characters' dialogues that speak something and insinuate something and Swift has chosen negative side of irony.

Each and every place, things, costumes, communication, expressions and feelings of four voyages are very much satiric and allegorical. We find that Swift might have taken out from real life and put them in his novel. One can say that Gulliver's Travels is not simple one but a very lampoon satire on boasted people and pungent satire on hypocritic, is conveyed by Gulliver. He is mouthpiece of the novelist. The readers feel that Gulliver himself is Swift himself who shoots the words towards the people of all four and secondary voyages of the world by making them ridiculous and trivial. For example the hideous behaviour of yahoos, their sudden attack on Gulliver, their style of eating animal flesh shows that Swift is totally against of human nature that indicates he is a misanthropist. He has depicted moral frailty of the people. The sycophancy of the politicians in their efforts to win king's side by the king of Lilliput is more pin pointed. Whoever shows the most dexerity wins one of the ribbons. Flimnap and other characters, narrow-minded communication of the people of the first voyage, etc. all these things deliberately and allegorically satirized. People have not time to make love to their wives because they are only idealists, philosophers and theorists but nothing more than that. They don't know what is practicality? The academy of projectors in Lagado is a satire on the kind of useless work which was being done by the royal society in those days. The human longing for immortality is ironically represented. Such all ideas are mentioned by Gulliver and last voyage perhaps very dangerous and horrible for splendid human race because animals are like moral and wholesome and human being like yahoos are animals. The several images is depicted. Throughout the three voyages Gulliver was admirer of people while here he is in favour of Houyhnhnms that are very ideal as well as morally oriented race. This makes disgusting and boring for Gulliver towards his own England.

Swift is come out as a misanthropist and has conveyed a cynical view of mankind. On another side we can quote M.H.Abrams by saying that Gulliver's Travels is 'a satyre against Mankind'. Gulliver's Travels can be described as the weapon of diminishing or derogating a subject (four voyages) by making them much ridiculous and evoking it attitude of amusement that is portrayed in Lilliput. The six-inches in height pigmy people, the game of walking on the rope and creping under a string in king's palace, clown or dwarf in Brobdignag and his trivial mentality, laziness of king of Laputa and very ridiculous behaviour of Yahoos their appetite for food and clothes, contempt, scorn and indignation. Sometime it sounds like comic satire in prose that evokes laughter. Then readers can accept the statement like,

"It is a great satiric masterpiece."

Swift's limitless ambition to mock people is accomplished in Brobdignag, in the palace of the emperor while on another side he hates human being like Yahoos that he is a contradictory character. But a man of principles and ideas like king reminds him that he (Gulliver) is an 'impotent and groveling insect' and considers gunpowder as a bloodthirsty and inhuman proposal. He visualizes real image of England by giving mordant and pungent remark, "….heap of conspiracies, murders, massacre, revolutions, banishments, the very worst effects that avarice fiction, hypocrisy, perfidiousness, cruelty, rage madness, hatred, envy, lust, malice, or ambition could produce….the most pernicious race of odious little vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth."

Such a great satirical remark on Gulliver shows that Swift himself ironically demerits England have also little in their ideas, thought and ambition. Gulliver is a gullible who is easily humiliated by any person and looks like innocent child before faithful, noble, benevolent people of Brobdignag. Swift according to Maynard Mack, "Swift is able to deliver the most powerful indictment of man's Inhumanity ever written in prose and at the same time to distinguish his own realistic view of man's nature from the misanthropy of which he has sometimes been accused."

The novelist has utilized all most all ornaments of furious anger to satirizing human nature. The vices of Lilliputian, weakness of the Brobdignagians, foibles and follies of Laputa and Lagado and central fault of human being that is Gulibalism in Yahoos are truthfully manifested in "Gulliver's Travels". Swift uses satire as a vehicle to point to the depraved state of human kind. The jealousy of dwarf towards Gulliver, disturbance and torment of monkey and couple of rates, interference by eagle bird and Yahoo's shameful behaviour with Gulliver are described in a sordid and gloomy light.

To satirize and criticize whole human society Swift has made people somewhere six inches of height, somewhere like gigantic figures, somewhere more moral and benevolent people and at last in fourth voyage more lecherous and treacherous mentality of Yahoos. These all things sound like diminutive creature living in wild jungle.

Extracting seeds from cucumber is like digesting iron nuts. The people do not believe in practicality and utilization of various theories and abstractions. Such a grave fault does not make people happy but make them gloomy and exhausted.

Gulliver's Travels' is not sole allegorical satire but also a political allegory like 'Animal Farm' by George Orwell that represents imbalance among upper class and lower class people that believe that some animals are more equal than others. This kind of mentality indicates that leaders should be given more facilities and luxuries because they have serious responsibility not so simple one. The novel 'Animal Farm' is great debate of Marxist concept that should be equality, simplicity and fraternity among common people. At the same time 'Gulliver's Travels' is considered as a manifestation of 'Das Capital'. The bitter condition of baggers and their troublesome predicament of life are more highlighted than royal class families. There are several allegorical references about wearing highly prepared costumes, make up and all such aristocratic lives and on other hand great lamentation and doomed lives of physically ill people are portrayed very bitterly.

The flippancy and hollowness of court life, meaningless time pass on Laputa and Lagado, faulty behavior of pernicious Yahoos and their irrational lives and day-to-day picture, horses' strong control over absurd animals (Yahoos) denotes that people are more dragged toward animal instinct and animals are gradually transferred into Europe, religious clashes between Protestant church and Catholic, European civilization, propensity for destruction, particularly in the parallels that one can draw between Lilliputians' desires to enslave an already defeated Blefescu and the strained relationship between England and France.

Swift, indeed, indirectly criticizes the arrogance of European imperialists who civilize the people through brutality and oppression while masking their chief motifs which was greedy. It looks like; Swift has extracted England from the glob and fitted in his book that represents the mass, milieu and moment of the land.

Sometime 'Gulliver's Travels' is reckoned as an utopian or dystopian novel same like Thomas Moor's "Utopia", 'Brave New World' by Aldus Huxley where ideal state is visualized where no one can get delight and joy from any place. Such a dystopian novel is an imaginative reality and allegorical satire. The dystopian novel is a seething attack on wretchedness and hypocrisy of the royal class people. The novel is a tongue-in-check presentation of factual pertinent to the narrative.

Gulliver's boringness suggests that he is now no more but such adventure like sea voyage makes him feisty and powerful. People are not happy in their own society because of evils of social dogmas and taboos. Such a great affliction leads him toward his social leads him toward great traveling of danger and terror of the life. There is a deep significance and meaningfulness in the storm and the shipwreck that is ironically and satirically manifested. One can say that 'Gulliver's Travels' is an allegorical satire on various kinds of the people.

Is swift a misanthrope?

Swift is not a misanthrope rather he is a philanthrope. It is the misconception of those who think Swift as a misanthrope. Swift only wants to reform mankind out of their follies and stupidities. He says that the chief end of all his labour is: "to vex the world rather than divert it".

Secondly, he declares that: "I have ever hated all nations, professions, and communities and all his love is towards individuals."

Thirdly, though Swift does not believe that: "Man is a rational animal". Yet he believes that: "Man is capable of becoming rational if he makes the necessary efforts."

But we see that Swift is notorious for being misanthrope. He was subjected to this allegation during his lifetime because the critics, identifying Gulliver with Swift, attributed Gulliver's blunders to Swift. That Gulliver, in the last voyage, becomes a misanthrope is undeniable and indisputable. Prima facie, it appears that by developing a negative view of mankind, he starts preferring horses to men, but a solid reason of Swift underlies this act of Gulliver.

We observe that in the fourth voyage, Gulliver reaches a country of animals, ruled by animals. There are two categories of animals living there in: ugly and repulsive brutes – Yahoos: "Yahoos who are unteachable brutes, cunning, gluttonous and disposed to great mischief". And comparatively better and nice-looking animals – Houyhnhnms.

The moment he enters the country he is confronted with Yahoos and they give him such a nasty and obnoxious treatment that he develops a disliking for them in his heart, which is later converted into hatred owing to their disgusting physical appearance and their filthy and mischievous way of life. But his first meeting with Houyhnhnms, on the other hand, proves a nice experience. And this: "First impression proves the last impression".

They secure him against Yahoos, behave properly and gracefully escort him to their abode. "The behaviour of horses shows him to be animals with an extraordinary power of understanding." Naturally, this kind of treatment creates a sort of fondness in Gulliver's heart for Houyhnhnms and their way of life. Up to this time, nothing is objectionable, but his fault begin when he became so enamored of Houyhnhnms that he starts hating man or equating Yahoos with men, he begins to abhor Man. He develops a general hatred against all men. All the subsequent incidents – his hatred against the Captain, against his family, etc. – reflect his misanthropy.

The blunder which Gulliver committed is that, he over-idealizes them because Gulliver is a man who is fed up with Man's corruption. Therefore, he cannot see corruption in Man. He finds Yahoos in a detestable and abhorrent condition on account of their being a slave of emotions, sensuality and sentimentality. He says: "Yet I confess I never saw any sensitive being so detestable on all accounts; and the more I came near them, the more hateful they grew, while I stayed in that country."

Houyhnhnms, in a comparatively better condition, lack that type of corruption that Yahoos have, for Houyhnhnms have no emotion. "Houyhnhnms are free from lust and greed."

Naturally, he attributes whole of Man's corruption to emotions, passions and sentimentality. As a remedy, he starts hating emotions, passion and he falls a victim to pure intellect. "Here was neither physician to destroy my body, nor lawyer to ruin my fortune, here were no gibers, …, backbiters, …, bawds, …, ravishers, murderers or … poxes."

So, he mis-idealizes Houyhnhnms, due to their pure intellect, somehow establishes a subjective ideal before him i.e. to be a man is to have pure intellect. He thinks: "The only remedy for doing away with Man's corruption and pollution is to get rid of all kinds of emotions".

In the country of Houyhnhnms, when Gulliver has a choice, he adopts for the Houyhnhnms way of life, completely rejecting Yahoos' path. But when he is compelled to leave the country and to break away from his beloved way of life, and to come to another way of life which he dislikes, it is but natural for him to hate it. In fact, his this ideal is perfectly erroneous. Swift says: "Idealism leads towards destruction."

So, it is wrong to detest Man, equating him with Yahoos and it is again inappropriate to set up the ideal of perfect man on the basis of Houyhnhnms' pure intellect because neither a Houyhnhnms nor a Yahoo is a man, instead, man is a juxtaposition of both intellect and emotions. "The best code of conduct is Golden Mean which is 'balance'."

So he misdefines Man. However, the fact of the matter remains whether Swift becomes a misanthrope or not, but can we impute Gulliver's misanthropy to Swift? If we virtually succeed to establish, some identity between Swift and Gulliver, Swift, too, will become a misanthrope.

But according to Swift a man is he who strikes a balance between rationality and sensuality and this balance is not gifted by birth. It has to be acquired. That's why even Gulliver is subjected to Swift's satire, for he loses the said balance.

That is the reason we don't identify Gulliver with Swift and, in spite of Gulliver's misanthropy, we call Swift a great philanthropist. As he, himself, says: "I write for the noblest end, to inform and instruct mankind."

Swift's "Gulliver's Travels": A social satire

"Gulliver's Travels" is a great work of social satire. Swift's age was an age of smug complacency. Corruption was rampant and the people were still satisfied. Thus, Jonathan Swift tears the veil of smug complacency off which had blinded the people to realities. In "Gulliver's Travels", there is a satire on politics, human physiognomy, intellect, manners and morality.

In the first voyage to Lilliput, Swift satirizes on politics and political tactics practiced in England through Lilliputians, the dwarfs of six inches height. He satirizes the manner in which political offices were awarded by English King in his time. Flimnap, the Treasurer, represents Sir Robert Walpole who was the Prime Minister of England. Dancing on tight ropes symbolizes Walpole's skill in parliamentary tactics and political intrigues. The ancient temple, in which Gulliver is housed in Lilliput, refers to Westminster Hall in which Charles I was condemned to death. The three fine silk threads awarded as prizes to the winners refer to the various distinctions conferred by English King to his favourites. The Lilliputians were highly superstitious:

"They bury their dead with their head directly downwards because they hold an opinion that after eleven thousand moons they are all to rise again."

Gulliver's account of the annoyance of the Empress of Lilliput on extinguishing fire in her apartment is Swift's satirical way of describing Queen Anne's annoyance with him on writing "A Tale of a Tub". Swift's satire becomes amusing when Gulliver speaks of the conflict between the Big Endians and the Little Endians. In this account Swift is ridiculing the conflicts between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. High Heel and Low Heel represent Whig and Tory – two political parties in England.

In the second voyage to Brobdingnag, there is a general satire on human body, human talents and human limitations. Gulliver gives us his reaction to the coarseness and ugliness of human body. When Gulliver gives an account, to the King of Brobdingnag, of the life in his own country, the trade, the wars, the conflicts in religion, the political parties, the king remarks that the history of Gulliver's country seems to be a series of conspiracies, rebellions, murders, revolutions and banishments etc. Kind condemns the fatal use of gunpowder and the books written on the act of governing. King mocks at the human race of which Gulliver is the agent.

"The most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth."

Swift here ridicules human pride and pretension. The sight is, indeed, horrible and disgusting. Among the beggars is a woman with a cancer in her breast.

"It stood prominent six feet, and could not be less than sixteen in circumference … spots and pimples that nothing could appear more nauseous."

There is a man with a huge tumor in his neck; another beggar has wooden legs. But the most hateful sight is that of the lice crawling on their clothes. This description reinforces Swift views of the ugliness and foulness of the human body.

In the third voyage to Laputa, there is a satire on human intellect, human mind and on science, philosophy and mathematics. However, his satire is not very bitter. We are greatly amused by the useless experiments and researches, which are going on at the academy of Projectors in Lugado. Here scientists wants to extract sunbeams out of cucumbers, to convert human excrement into its original food, to build house from the roof downward to the foundation, to obtain silk from cobwebs and to produce books on various subjects by the use of machine without having to exert one's brain.

"Their heads were inclined either to the right or to the left, one of their eyes turned inward, and the other directly up to Zenith."

Swift amuses us by making a fun of the people whose sole interests are music and geometry.

"They made a lot of theories but practically nill." Swift here ridicules scientists, academics, planers, intellectual, in fact, all people who proceed, only according to theory which are useless when they come to actual practice. He satirizes historian and literary critics though Gulliver's interviews with the ghosts of famous dead. The point f satire is that historian often distorts facts and literary critics often misinterpret great authors like Homer and Aristotle.

In the fourth voyage to Houyhnhnms, there is a bitter poignant satire on human moral shortcomings. Voyage contains some of the most corrosive and offensive satire on mankind. The description of the Yahoos given to us by Gulliver is regrettable. "Yet I confess I never say any sensitive being so detestable on all accounts; and the more I came near them, the more hateful they grew."

By contrast, the Houyhnhnms are noble and benevolent horses who are governed by reason and lead an ordered life. It is, indeed, a bitter criticism on the human race to be compared by the Houyhnhnms. The satire deepens when Gulliver gives an account, to the master Houyhnhnms, of the events in his country. He tells him that war in European countries was sometimes due to the ambition of kings and sometimes due to the corruption of the ministers. He speaks of the numerous deadly weapons, employed by European nations for destructive purposes. Many people in his country ruin themselves by drinking, gambling and debauchery and many are guilty of murders, theft, robbery, forgery and rape. The master speaks of the Yahoo's love of shinning stones, their gluttony and their weakness for liquor. The master also speaks of the lascivious behaviour of the female Yahoos. By contrast, the Houyhnhnms are excellent beings.

"Here was neither physician to destroy my body not lawyer to ruin my fortune; no informer to watch my words and actions … here were no … backbiters, pickpockets, highwaymen, house-breakers … politicians, wits … murderers, robbers … no cheating shop-keeper or mechanics, no pride, vanity or affectation."

They hold meetings at which the difficulties of their population are discussed and solved. They regulate their population and do not indulge in sexual intercourse merely for pleasure. "Everything is calculated as the Plato's Utopian land 'The Republican'."

Swift's purpose here is to attribute to horses certain qualities which would normally be expected in human beings but which are actually lacking in them. Gulliver's reaction o Houyhnhnms fills him so much admiration for them and with so much hatred and disgust for human beings that he has no desire even to return to his family.

Thus we see that "Gulliver's Travels" is a great piece of art containing social satire in it. Every satirist is at heart a reformist. Swift, also, wants to reform the society by pinpointing the vices and shortcoming in it. And he very successfully satirizes on political tactics, physical awkwardness, intellectual fallacies and moral shortcomings.

Jonathon Swift's Prose Style

It has rightly and honestly been said that Swift was the greatest prose satirist of England. He dominated the first half of the eighteenth century as Dr. Johnson did the second: and as an intellectual, he was far superior to Johnson. Some of his satires are obscene, misanthropic, and cynical, but none can question his moral integrity and the unflinching earnestness with which he removes the externals of things to bring out the corruption which lies at their heart. Swift's satire is all embracing. Its rapier-like thrust's spare neither a fraudulent almanac-maker, nor a misguided zealot, nor an airy philosopher, nor a glib politician, nor a conceited fop, nor a pretentious scientist. Indeed, the extensiveness of his satire is remarkable. This greatest of satirists once satirised even satire! The platry Partridge (an almanac-maker) and the great Walpole (The Prime Minister of England) alike winced under his terrible "whip of scorpions".

Swift depicts razor-edged satire. His sensitiveness to the corruption, the numerous frustrations which punctuated the entire span of his life, and the egregious folly, corruption, and self-seeking which he found marring the prospect of "the age of reason and good sense", prompted him to take up his lash. The age deserved satire, and his personal disposition and disappointments made him keen enough to give it. Swift' is perfectly right when he says in The Death of Dean Swift:

Perhaps I may allow the Dean
Had too much satire in his vein,
And seem'd determined not to starve it,
Because no age could more deserve it.

The greatness of Swift's satire is, in the last analysis, a triumph of technique. His arsenal as a satirist is chockful of weapons of all descriptions. Wit, raillery, sarcasm, irony, allegory, banter, and so many more weapons are used to perfection by him in his crusade against folly, injustice, and unreason. Whichever weapon may he be employing for attack, his satire is usually darker and more telling than that of most writers. He may sometimes touch lightly, but very often he pierced deep to the very heart of life. In any case, his satire is very disturbing as it presents things in a fairly unconventional perspective eminently calculated to shatter the complacency of the reader. When Swift points out the acquired follies, he is quite constructive; but when he saves the very nature of man, he is nothing but destructive.

Of all the satiric techniques, the one most effectively used by Swift is irony. With Swift, irony is often much more than just a figure of speech, it is extended so that the entire range of thoughts and feelings presented in a satiric work seem to be coming not from Swift himself but from a fictive character created for the purpose. The irony lies in the difference between the views expressed by the persona and tile common sense views.

Swift wrote a very large number of prose pieces of which the most important are The Battle of the Books, A Tale of a Tub, and Gulliver's Travel. The first is just a feitid' esprit, and was meant to lampoon in mock-heroic terms the opponents of his patron Sir William Temple — particularly Richard Bentley and William Wotton, both of disputed the view of Temple granting supremacy to ancients over moderns. A Tale of a Tub was meant to be a satire -"on the numerous and gross corruptions in religion and learning," It represented the Church of England as the best of all Churches in ""doctrine and discipline," and also lashed the shallow writers and critics of the age. Gulliver's Travels is the most famous of Swift's works. In it he savagely indicted "that animal" called man." Though it 'has the externals of a travel romance, yet in reality it is a terrible but well-calculated satire on all the activities of human life and all the attributes of human nature, not' sparing even the human body. However, its irony is so deep that it has been a favourite gift book for children. Kipling once said that Swift "ignited a volcano to light a child to bed." In fact, the book is enjoyed by all children from nine to ninety.

Credit must be given to Swift for the clarity, precision, and "conciseness", of his prose style. Swift despises all unnecessary ornament. His imagery, however, is prolific and concrete, at any rate, he gives us the impression of an easy mastery of the language. Halliday in the introduction to his Section on Swift observes: "…the various phases of scorn and satire of appraisement and direct denunciation, the various moods and tempers of the writer are expressed with wonderful and subtle skill. The secret of his power over his readers is to be sought for here. He makes you responsive to every emotion and draws you with the magic of his pipe into whatever region desires." No doubt, swift had a mastery over the use of his prose technique.

Gulliver's Travels as an Allegory

"Gulliver's travels" was the culmination of swift's literary achievement- his magnum opus. It was begun in 1720 and finally published in 1726. It is at once a delightful, fantastic story of adventure for children a political allegory and a serious satire on human nature, on contemporary political, social institution, religious controversies and on the manners and morals of the stage. This book is written in the form of travelogue. The hero and narrator and the protagonist character of the story is "Lemuel Gulliver", an English physician who opts to travel as a ship's surgeon when he is unable to take care of his family on his meager income. Gulliver is endowed with a keen, almost journalistic sense of reportage, and a desire to travel. The book is made up of four parts, each dealing with the person's experiences in a different fantasy land. Before we see more about Gulliver's Travels, let's see first of all about allegory and satire.

What is an allegory? An allegory is a literary genre which is structured in such a way that its meaning could be read on two levels, and a secondary and more complex level. An allegory is defined as a narrative in which the characters, plot, setting and occasion, while making sense in themselves also signify a second layer of meaning where they point at another set of people, events and setting either from the writer's mass, milieu or recent historical events. It is a figurative mode of representation where ideas are conveyed through symbolism and metaphor.

In "Gulliver's Travels", Swift uses satire on highlight the allegorical elements in his tale. He has used allegory as a vehicle in an excellent way.

What is a satire? Satire is a literary genre in which human vices, weaknesses, foibles and follies are held up to ridicule. Wit and humor are commonly used as instrument of satire.

In "Gulliver's Travels", Swift uses satire as a vehicle to point out to the depraved state of human kind. Some critics have observed that Swift is a misanthropist because the paints human nature as a whole in a sordid and gloom light, almost as if there are no redeeming features to humanity. Swift seems to be holding up a mirror to society so that in viewing the gross magnification of its vices, humanity has a hope for the future. The allegory and satire, in a sense, are interwoven inextricably and deftly.

A Voyage to Lilliput: - This deals with Gulliver's experiences in the land of the little people, who are no more than six-inches tall. It is on one level an absorbing tale of the adventures of the giant Gulliver among the midgets of Lilliput and on another level rich in England. It is above all a scathing satire on the moral pettiness of human as seem in the behaviour of the Lilliputians. Human beings are filled with and importance and cannot view themselves and objectivity. Their pride and boastfulness are revealed as ridiculous when perceived from Gulliver's great height.

As we saw that the people of Lilliput are more than six-inches tall. All their acts and motives are on the same dwarfish, petty quarrels of these dwarfs, we are supposed to see the littleness and humanity. The statesmen who obtain place and favour by cutting monkey capers the tight rope before their sovereign and the two great parties, the little-endians and big-endians, who plugs the country into civil-war over the momentous question of whether an egg should be broken on its big or on politics of Swift's own days and generations.

In society, also, we see that type of people who shows littleness in their nature and also shows the narrow mind. All their actions and aims in life are at low level. They never try to come out from it. Their narrow and they live their life.

They are always busy in petty things because they can't think they can't think to go ahead in life. This shows in trivial matters.

A Voyage to Brobdingnag: - In this voyage, the situation is reversed. Gulliver is now marooned and dwarfed in the land of giants who are over forty feet tall. He now becomes the midget he had laughed at in Lilliput, observed through the microscopic eyes of Gulliver, the Brobdingnagians are hideous in size and stature and Gulliver realizes that he must have been just as hideous to the little people in Lilliput. Here, Swift satirizes the physical grossness of the human and the grotesque ugliness of the human body. Gulliver is little more than an insect in Brobdingnag and at his best, an amusing toy.

When Gulliver tells about his own people, their ambitions and comes and conquests, the giants can only wonder that such great venom could exist in such little insects. Here, in the second part, Gulliver is alone among the giants. He is showed as insects among the Brobdingnagians because they think this way.

Here, Swift satirizes on the Brobdignagian's unpleasant and unattractively large body. In a way, there are lots of people in society who are huge at status but their thinking shows their narrowness.

Also he satirizes on the ugliness of the Brobdignagians. It shows that the thinking of that time of people who has very ugly motif in their life to fulfil their wishes.

We can see this, Brobdignagians, type of people around us and also both we can see the physical grossness and ugliness in people. By this, we can know their aims of life. They just boast on their endeavor, conquest.

This type of people believes that others are nothing before them. They show others inferior but in reality, their unattractivity and ugliness becomes them inferior.

A Voyage to Laputa, Balnibarbi, Language, Glubdubdrib, and Japan: - In this voyage, Swift satires on the Scientist and Philosophers of the age. The people of Laputa have extraordinary physical features- head turned at angle, one eye turned upward and the other inward. Through the people of Laputa, Swift ridicules the experiments of the royal society and allied institution of the time.

The frightening emptiness and sterility of a purely scientific society is evident from this book. The philosophers who worked eight years to extract sunshine from cucumbers are typical of Swift's satire treatment of all scientific problems. It is in this voyage hear of the struldbrugs, a ghastly race of the men who are doomed to live up on the earth after losing hope and the desire for life.

The picture is all the more terrible in view of the last years of Swift's own life in which he was compelled to live on a burden to himself and his friends.

In this third good, Gulliver's journeys go through different people, culture, custom and rules. The strange thing of the people of Laputa regarding the physical structure of the body shows types of people at that time. Also Swift's disliked the society of his time that's why he satires on it.

Here, cucumber is the typical of Swift's satiric treatment of all scientific problems. This shows the ridiculous thing of scientific problems show that time of things. There are different types of people who show different types of culture of swift's time.

A voyage to the country of the Houyhnhnms: - In this voyage, Gulliver narrates his experiences of his journey to the land of the Houyhnhnms and the yahoos. The horses are creatures governed by solely by reason, free from any emotions and passions, while the yahoos who physically resemble human beings are ruled purely by animal's instincts.

Swift seems to indicate to us that the nature of the human is complex and defies definition unlike that of the yahoos and the Houyhnhnms. The book for all its harsh satire and anger, instructs human to see themselves with humility and honesty and it condemns pride ego and myopic self-esteem. It urges every person to use reason to be a good Christian. Swift here tries to say that we have to live our life in a way in which we can show the humanity.

Swift emphasized on the yahoos that despite of human being, they are unspeakable persons who show the brutality of that time. Also by the female yahoos Swift shows the lust in their nature this also a picture of his time.

We have to live like a good Christian and try to avoid that all things which damages humanity.

Conclusion:- By these four voyages, Gulliver's journey goes through different types of people, culture, customs, beliefs etc. they show the society of swift's time. Like, how they cure narrow minded also interested in petty things and unattractive appearances and ugliness of humanity etc. All these, proof of that time of people's way of thinking and living.

The Use of Irony in Gulliver's Travels

Irony is one of the most important weapons of satire. It arises from a contrast, a contrast between appearance and reality, between what a character or the author says and what he really means to convey, between what a character thinks himself to be and what he really is, between what a character believes and what the reader knows to be actually the case, between what a character thinks what he will do or achieve and what he really in the long run does or achieves, and so on. It may also be pointed out that, apart from irony in words, irony may exist in a situation.

A situation is ironical when the reader knows all the facts of the case while the characters, either all of them or some of them, are ignorant of some of the facts of the case. Furthermore, irony may produce a comic effect or a tragic effect, depending upon the circumstances of the case. This means that the use of irony by an author may amuse the reader or may sadden him all the more.

Swift is a comic and satirical writer and therefore his use of irony in his writings adds to the comic effect at which he aims. In Gulliver's Travels we find a plentiful use of irony. Gulliver's Travels throws the light of a superior and destructive irony upon the smallness of the means, the vanity of the motives, the illusions of the catchwords, through which kings retained thrones and magistrates their offices in those days. To serve the needs of his allegory, Swift carries us from the country of the dwarfs to that of the giants, and in the end to the country of the Yahoos and the noble horses. Irony and allegory are fused in one.

Situational Irony

The irony of situation is to be found in all the four divisions of Gulliver's Travels. In Lilliput, Gulliver finds himself in the midst of people who are not more than six inches in height. In Brobdingnag, Gulliver finds himself in the midst of people of a giant size by comparison with whom he himself is a pigmy. In Laputa and in Balnibarbi he finds himself among people who are queer in one way or another. Finally, he finds himself in the midst of the Yahoos and the Houyhnhnms, the former bearing a close physical resemblance to human beings and the latter being horses in their physical shape and appearance but having an intelligence much superior to that of human beings. In all these cases, Gulliver thinks himself to be literally among pigmies, giants, or horses as the case may be; but we realize that in each case Swift is giving us a portrayal of human beings themselves though the description of the various kinds of inhabitants of the different countries as determined by the requirements of the satirical intentions of the author. In the Lilliputians we recognize ourselves reduced to a small size. In the Brobdingnagians we recognize ourselves as seen through a magnifying glass. In the Yahoos we again recognize ourselves, with the good qualities of human beings completely left out. In the Houyhnhnms we recognize ourselves though here our good qualities are idealized and carried to perfection, while our vicious side is completely omitted.

Verbal Irony

There is a plenty of verbal irony which arises largely from the contrast between what is said and what is really intended. In Voyage to Lilliput, we have an example of this kind of irony when Swift describes the Emperor of Lilliput. As the Emperor is taller by the breadth of Gulliver's nail than any member of his court, his appearance is enough to strike an awe into the beholders. The Emperor's features are strong and masculine with an Austrian lip and arched nose, his countenance erect, his body and limbs well proportioned, all his motions graceful, and his deportment majestic. Now this description of the Emperor is clearly ironical because a person, who is just six inches or a little more than that in height, cannot be regarded as awful; and yet, as judged by the Lilliputian standards, the Emperor certainly strikes fear among his people by his greater height. The description is ironical in another sense also. In thus portraying the Emperor, Swift is having a laugh at the actual English monarch of the time, namely George I who could not be described as being graceful and majestic in his appearance. There is irony also in the remark which Gulliver subsequently makes when he describes the Emperor as a "most magnanimous prince". Gulliver of course, means what he says, but Swift intends this remark as having just the opposite meaning. The diversions of the Emperor are also ironically described. These diversions consist in the candidates for his favour dancing on a rope or creeping under a stick or leaping over it. The rewards for the winners in these contests are silken threads of different colours. This whole account is an ironical reference to the sycophancy of the English courtiers of the time and the manner in which the Emperor rewarded them by an arbitrary conferment of titles and distinctions on them.

The customs of the people of Lilliput are also ironically described. Gulliver remarks that the laws and customs in this empire were very peculiar and directly contrary to those of his own dear country, England. Gulliver then proceeds to describe those laws and customs as if they were indeed "peculiar" or even crazy; but actually many of these laws and customs are wholesome. All crimes against the State are severely punished in this country; but if a person, who has been accused can prove his innocence, the accuser is immediately put to death. These people look upon fraud as a greater crime than theft, and therefore seldom fail to punish it with death. In short, many of the laws and customs do credit to the Lilliputians, but they are described by Gulliver as if there were something wrong with them. We have another example of irony when we are told that the Emperor, wanting to give a lenient punishment to Gulliver, decided to have him blinded instead of ordering his death. Blinding the culprit is regarded by the Emperor as a lenient punishment though actually it is even more cruel than the penalty of death.

In the account of the voyage to Brobdingnag we have striking examples of the use of verbal irony. When Gulliver describes the features of the national life of England to the King of Brobdingnag, the King makes certain adverse comments upon Gulliver's country. Gulliver feels offended with the King because Gulliver thinks his country to be "the mistress of arts and arms, the scourge of France, the arbitress of Europe, the seat of virtue, piety, honour, and truth, the pride and envy of the world". He genuinely believes his country as possessing these qualities, but Swift means this description to be ironical, because Swift had just the opposite view of England. Subsequently Gulliver gives to the King of Brobdingnag a detailed description of the English parliament, the Courts of Justice, etc. The King finds fault with all these English institutions. Gulliver thereupon attributes the King's condemnation to the King's narrow-mindedness. Gulliver describes the members of the House of Lords to be champions always ready for the defence of their prince and their country by their valour, conduct, and fidelity. Gulliver describes them as the ornament and bulwark of the kingdom. Gulliver also gives high praise to the Lords spiritual. As for the members of the House of Commons, Gulliver says that they are selected by the people for their great abilities and love of their country to represent the wisdom of the whole nation. Now Gulliver may mean all that he says here. But we can clearly see that Swift intends this praise to be ironical, and Swift uses the King of Brobdingnag to deflate Gulliver's pride in this context.

There is verbal irony in Gulliver's view of the narrow-mindedness of the Brobdingnagian King. On hearing the criticism and the condemnation of England and English people by the King of Brobdingnag, Gulliver says to himself (and to us) that great allowances should be made in the case of the King who lived a wholly secluded life from the rest of the world and was therefore completely unacquainted with the manners and customs prevailing in other nations. The lack of knowledge, says Gulliver, had produced many prejudices in the King, and a certain narrowness of thinking in him. Now all this is ironically intended by Swift because we know that the King's criticism was perfectly sound and justified. Swift continues this irony when Gulliver attributes the King's adverse reaction to his description of the destructive power of gunpowder to the miserable effects of the King's confined or limited education. Gulliver's comment on the King's horror on hearing about the gunpowder is: "a strange effect of narrow principles and short views!" According to Gulliver, the King suffers from "a nice unnecessary scruple". All this shows the irony of Swift because the King of Brobdingnag expresses a perfectly sound view which Gulliver attributes to narrowness and lack of adequate knowledge. The same kind of irony continues when Gulliver cannot understand the King's view that there is no need for books on the art of government and that a government should be run in accordance with the principles of common sense, reason, justice, and lenity.

The use of irony by Swift may also be illustrated from the third voyage of Gulliver. In the school of political projectors in Lagado, professors are working upon schemes for persuading monarchs to choose favourites upon the basis of their wisdom, capacity, and virtue; for teaching ministers to consult the public good; for rewarding merit, great abilities, and eminent services; for choosing for employments persons qualified to work efficiently; and so on. The irony here lies in the fact that, while all these schemes are perfectly sound and wholesome, Gulliver describes them as wild, impossible chimeras or impractical and fanciful notions. These schemes are being equated with the really absurd projects such as the one for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers. The irony here arises from the contrast between the apparent meaning and the underlying intention of the author. There is irony also in the description of the method used by the King of Luggnagg to put to death those courtiers with whom he was offended. Gulliver here tells us that this King was really kind-hearted in so far as he got the floor of his apartment properly wiped and cleaned after a particular courtier had been killed by means of the poisonous powder which had been scattered on the floor. On one occasion the floor was not properly cleaned and an innocent courtier died of the poison that had unintentionally been allowed to remain on the floor. But the King did not take any action against the servant who had failed to clean the floor. The whole passage in this context is ironical and brings out, by the use of irony, the fact that to a King the life of a courtier had little meaning. Then there is irony in Gulliver's dream of immortality and the advantages which he thinks can result to a man if he is made immortal. This passage becomes ironical in the light of the subsequent description of the wretchedness and misery of the Struldbrugs who are a group of immortal persons.

Gulliver, a Victim of Irony in Part IV of the Book

It is believed by some that in Part IV of the book Swift's portrayal of the Houyhnhnms is also ironical and that Swift did not really mean to hold up the Houyhnhnms as representing a utopian ideal. This, however, is a debatable point. But about Swift's use of irony in describing Gulliver's mentality and outlook in the two or three closing chapters, we can have no doubt. Swift certainly does not approve of the complete and absolute misanthropy which Gulliver has developed by the end of his final voyage. Swift therefore gives us an ironic description of Gulliver's whole behaviour at this stage. In other words, Gulliver himself now becomes a target of Swift's irony and satire.

Character Sketch of Lemuel Gulliver

Gulliver, a Detached and Impartial Character: - Lemuel Gulliver is a fictitious character invented by Swift to serve his satirical purposes in the book Gulliver's Travels. The book was not intended as a personal memoir. Swift's object in writing it was to express his ideas about mankind in general and about England and English political and religious institutions of the time, in particular.

One method of doing so would have been to write the book in the first person pronoun using '1'. But that method would have made the book look like an autobiography and we would have been inclined to question the validity of the story which is largely improbable and incredible. The account of the various voyages given by a fictitious character called Gulliver carries a certain plausibility because we feel inclined to look upon Gulliver as a detached and impartial person and we easily fall under his spell'.

Gulliver's Four-fold Role in the Book: - Gulliver is primarily an observer and a narrator. He has extraordinary powers of observation, and he narrates all that he has observed and experienced in such a skilful manner as to hold our attention throughout. But, in addition to being an observer and a narrator, he is also a commentator and a medium through whom Swift conveys to us his criticism of mankind and his reactions to English institutions and English politicians of his own time. Thus Gulliver has a four-fold role or function in the book.

Gulliver, Swift's Mouthpiece, but Not to Be Fully Identified with Swift: - Nor can it be doubted that at most points in the course of the story Gulliver serves as a mouthpiece or spokesman of Swift. Of course, we are not to identify Gulliver completely with Swift; the two personalities are to be kept apart. But the fact remains that it is through Gulliver that Swift himself speaks and communicates his views to us. Wherever Gulliver draws any conclusions from his experiences, wherever he offers his comments on what he sees, wherever he moralizes, wherever he characterizes or condemns human beings directly or in a veiled manner, it is Swift himself who is speaking. If Swift had spoken directly to us in his own person, he might not have been able to carry conviction and we might have felt biased against him. At the same time, we should not identify Gulliver with Swift at all stages of the story. In the closing chapters of the book particularly, Gulliver is not Swift and Gulliver's misanthropy is not to be attributed to Swift. Gulliver may there be regarded as an objective, dramatic character, not to be identified with Swift just as Shylock in The Merchant of Venice is not to be identified with Shakespeare.

The General Traits of Gulliver's Character: - Gulliver is the narrator and the principal actor in the book. We look at things through his eyes; we feel his feelings; and we share his thoughts. We remain in his company from beginning till end. In the very beginning he gives us many insignificant biographical details in order to produce a realistic effect about his being an authentic person. We find that in all respects he is an average good man. He has received some university education both at Cambridge and at Leyden where he studied medicine. He is a married man with children. He is keenly observant, reasonably intelligent, thoroughly capable in an emergency, brave, and hopeful. He is simple and direct in his narration. He retains his benevolence throughout the first three voyages, though towards the end of the fourth voyage he becomes morbid and almost crazy.

Gulliver as an Observer in Lilliput: - Gulliver's powers of observation are made manifest to us in his accounts of all the four voyages. For instance, when he finds himself in Lilliput, he observes that the people there are most excellent mathematicians and have arrived to a great perfection in mechanics. He then goes on to describe' in detail the method by which he is transported to the metropolis. When he arrives at the royal palace, the Emperor surveys him with great admiration and orders his cooks and butlers to give him food and drink, while the Empress, attended by many ladies, sits at a distance in her chair to watch him. When he is released from his chains, Gulliver goes round the metropolis and gives us a detailed description of the city as well as the palace. He also devotes a whole chapter to a description of the style of living, the laws and customs, the habits and beliefs of the people of this country whom he has closely watched. As the height of the natives here is only six inches, so there is an exact proportion in all other animals as well as plants and trees, Gulliver informs us.

Gulliver as an Observer in Brobdingnag and in Laputa: - In Brobdingnag Gulliver again observes everything with great care and minuteness. Here again he gives us a detailed description of the country and its metropolis which is called Lorbrulgrud and which stands in almost equal parts on each side of the river that passes through it. The King's palace is no regular edifice, but a heap of buildings about seven miles round. In one striking passage Gulliver gives us his impressions of the beggars whom he sees outside a shop: a woman with a cancer in her breast, a man with a tumour in his neck, another with a pair of wooden legs, and so on. The people of Laputa are also described in detail: "Their heads were all reclined either to the right or the left; one of their eyes turned inward, and the other directly up to the zenith". The minds of these people are so engaged in intense speculations that they can neither speak nor attend to the talk of others without being roused by some external stimulus. In short, Gulliver gives evidence of his enormous powers of observation throughout the book. Indeed, the book would not have been possible without this capacity for observation.

Gulliver's Skill as a Narrator: - Gulliver also shows a good deal of skill as a narrator. This skill enables him to maintain our interest in the story throughout, and to whet our curiosity again and again. He sometimes arouses our interest by dramatic incidents and sometimes by humorous episodes. Indeed, the first three parts of the book are very amusing and entertaining because of their comic quality. However, even in these three parts there are several dramatic and exciting moments. In Part I, Gulliver wakes up from his sound slumber to find himself in chains. Then there are dramatic and exciting incidents such as the threat of an invasion of Lilliput, Gulliver's seizing the bulk of the enemy fleet, Gulliver's extinguishing a fire in the palace by urinating on it (though this is more of an amusing incident than an exciting one), the threat of an impeachment against Gulliver, and the manner of Gulliver's departure from this country. Among the amusing incidents here are the rope-dancing and the creeping under a string (both of which, of course, have a satirical purpose behind them). In Part II, we are greatly excited to learn of the giant size of the inhabitants. It is almost awful to read the account of how a huge woman suckles her child. Gulliver tells us that no object ever disgusted him so l11uch as the sight of her monstrous breast: "It stood prominent six foot, and could not be less than sixteen in circumference. The nipple was about half the bigness of my head." The description of the hugeness of various animals such as cats, dogs, rats, flies, wasps, monkeys and such objects as apples and hailstones, and Gulliver's adventures among them, or with them, are both amusing and frightening. The manner in which Gulliver is tormented by the court dwarf (who is thirty feet high) is also one of the highlights of this part. Then there are the maids of honour who play all kinds of games with Gulliver. The handsomest among these maids of honour sometimes puts Gulliver astride upon one of her nipples and plays many other tricks upon him. Part III is rather discursive and lacks the unity of action of the other parts of the book, but even here our interest is maintained. The flying island of Laputa is in itself a miracle. The experiments which are going on at the Academy of Projectors in Lagado are also very interesting. Part IV contains an exciting and intriguing account of strange creatures like the Yahoos and the Houyhnhnms. We now find ourselves in a country where the horses can talk and can teach their language to a human being. Gulliver has many conversations with his equine master* who enlightens Gulliver on the way the Houyhnhnms run their country. In short, Gulliver's Travels contains a gripping narrative, and the credit for lending so much interest to the story goes to Gulliver.

Gulliver as a Commentator and a Moral Judge: - Gulliver is also a commentator and a moral judge. He is not only a man of action but also one who is endowed with a capacity for thought and reflection. He can ponder over what he sees and he can draw conclusions from his experiences. At one point in Part I, Gulliver reflects thus: "Of so little weight are the greatest services to princes when put into the balance with a refusal to gratify their passions". In Part II, he thus meditates upon one of the situations: "This made me reflect how vain an attempt it is for a man to endeavour doing himself honour among those who are out of all degree of equality or comparison with him". After having witnessed the sad plight of the immortals, in Part III, Gulliver draws the following moral: "They were the most mortifying sight I ever beheld, and the women more horrible than the men. The reader will easily believe that my keen appetite for perpetuity of life was much abated." In Part IV, this is one of his conclusions about the Houyhnhnms and human beings: "But I must freely confess that the many virtues of those excellent quadrupeds, placed in opposite view to human corruptions, had so far opened mine eyes and enlarged my understanding that I began to view the actions and passions of man in a very different light."

Gulliver, as the Medium of Satire: - Finally, Gulliver is the medium through whom Swift communicates his satirical points and purposes to us. When Gulliver dwells upon the conflict between the Big-Endians and the Little-Endians or between the High-Heels and the Low-Heels we can see that Swift is giving us a satirical account of the conflicts between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, and of the party strife of his time. When Gulliver describes the rope-dancing and the creeping under a string, we know that Swift is here satirizing the sycophancy of the politicians in their efforts to win royal favour. The comments of the King of Brobdingnag upon the presumption of diminutive insects like Gulliver to mimick grandeur is also satirical in intention as is the same King's description of the human race as "the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth". In the account of the third voyage, we have a satire on people who remain engrossed in their meditations and cogitations to such an extent that they do not have the time even to make love to their wives; There is also a satirical reference here to Wood's half-pence, the coin which was rejected by Ireland as a result of Drapier's Letters which were written by Swift. The account of the researches going on at the Academy of Projectors in Lagado is a satire on the kind of useless work which was being done by the Royal Society in those days. In addition to that, we have a satire on the human longing for immortality. In Part IV, the satire on mankind becomes very fierce and takes the form of what is known as "invective". We have here a denunciation of war and the destruction caused by the weapons of war; and a denunciation of lawyers, judges, doctors, and government ministers. The horses or the Houyhnhnms impress Gulliver so much that he becomes a great admirer of those beings and a hater of his own species. Thus, it is through Gulliver that Swift here conveys to us his misanthropic and cynical view of mankind, though Gulliver's final attitude of a complete abhorrence and detestation of the human race at the end of the book cannot be attributed to Swift himself.

An Unfair Criticism: - According to one critic, Gulliver by his technique of narration does not create a sense of reality about himself. Gulliver is not a character in the sense in which Tom Jones, for example, is a character, says this critic. Gulliver has the most minimal subjective life and the scantiness of his inner life cannot be doubted. He is, in fact, an abstraction, manipulated in the service of satire. However, this is a view which we cannot accept. Gulliver strikes us as a real, living personality. His inner thoughts and feelings at different stages in the narration have adequately been revealed to us. There was no need for Swift to subject Gulliver to any kind of psycho-analysis.

Gulliver's Travels: Meaning and Significance

Gulliver's Travels is a story of adventure and that it has several elements in it of a fairy tale. Both adventure and fairy-elements in a story appeal greatly to the young mind. They have some charm even for the adult mind. But it would be an incorrect view to regard Gulliver's Travels as merely an adventure story or a fairy tale intended for the entertainment and diversion of young people. Gulliver's tale is an allegorical satire. In other words, there lies below the surface a deeper meaning. Swift's real purpose was to expose the follies, absurdities, and evils of mankind in general. However, this book has established itself not only as a satire on mankind but also as a classic for the young readers.

Let us, then, take a look at Gulliver's Travels as a tale of adventure which it doubtless is and as a fanciful account of strange and wonderful lands. The book tells us the story of the various voyages of a man called Lemuel Gulliver. Every voyage is an adventure in itself. There is, first of all, the voyage to a country called Lilliput. Gulliver, in the course of his first principal voyage, gets ship-wrecked, and has to swim to the shore to save his life. On the sea-shore he falls into a sound slumber and, when he wakes up, he finds himself a prisoner in chains. In the course of his second voyage, Gulliver's ship is overtaken by a fierce storm which threatens to wreck the ship and engulf the sailors including Gulliver. However, when, after the storm, the ship casts anchor, and a few sailors including Gulliver himself, are sent to the shore, Gulliver finds himself a captive in the hands of a giant. In the course of his third voyage Gulliver's ship is overtaken by pirates. The pirates treat Gulliver roughly and, after depriving him of all his belongings, put him on a small boat and set him adrift. Five days later, the boat touches a rocky island where Gulliver gets down, very low in spirits and feeling tired and desolate. In the course of his fourth voyage, Gulliver is attacked by the members of the crew of his own ship and is bound hand and foot. Most of the members of this crew had previously been pirates, and now they threaten to throw Gulliver into the sea if he puts up any resistance. After a few days, the ruffians put Gulliver down on the sea-coast and sail away, leaving him alone to fend for himself. Gulliver finds himself in a new country about which he knows nothing at all.

The above brief account of the various voyages of Gulliver shows the difficulties and dangers that Gulliver faced in the course of his wanderings. Adventure always implies a risk of life or a danger to life. The man who has the spirit of adventure in him is always ready to face risks and dangers. Gulliver sets out nom a comfortable life at home in order to explore unknown countries, knowing full well that he will face many difficulties and hazards. But every time he goes on a fresh voyage willingly and experiences not only difficulties and hardships but also serious dangers to his life. It is a miracle that each time he returns home safely. Such a story is bound to fascinate the young mind because dangers and difficulties never fail to appeal to young people.

Then there are the strange experiences of Gulliver in various lands. Every land which Gulliver visits is a wonderful land, and Gulliver's experiences in every land are strange or exciting, or amusing. In Lilliput the people are diminutives or dwarfs, hardly six inches in height. The very idea that there are human beings so small is funny. But more amusing than that is the manner in which Gulliver is fed. Several ladders are applied by the Lilliputians to his sides, and about a hundred of them climb up those ladders in order to carry baskets full of meat and drink and put them close to his mouth. Similarly, it has taken nine hundred Lilliputians three hours to raise Gulliver to the level of a huge carriage by which he is carried to the royal court. In the metropolis, Gulliver becomes an object of curiosity, and people come nom far and near to look at him. He is given the name "man-mountain". Gulliver here lends his support to the King and the government of Lilliput against the island of Blefuscu which has been hostile to Lilliput, and he cripples the enemy fleet, thus winning the appreciation and admiration of the Lilliputian king. One of the most amusing incidents in this part of the book is Gulliver's extinguishing a fire in the Empress's apartment by urinating on it. The Empress feels greatly annoyed with this action of Gulliver and moves nom that apartment to a different location. Some of the customs of the Lilliputians are also a source of amusement. For instance, they bury their dead with the heads of the corpses directly downwards because they hold a belief that after eleven thousand moons the dead would rise from their graves and that during this period the earth would turn upside down so that the dead would, on coming back to life, find themselves standing on their feet. Another comic absurdity of the Lilliputians is their manner of writing which is very peculiar, being neither nom the left to the right, like that of the Europeans; nor from the right to the left like that of the Arabians; nor from up to down like that of the Chinese; nor from down to up like that of the Cascagians; but aslant from one comer of the paper to the other "like the ladies in England". Gulliver has to go through an ordeal when, on being informed that he will be shortly impeached on several charges, he finds it necessary to make good his escape from this country.

In Part II of the book we find ourselves with Gulliver in another strange and wonderful land. This land is called Brobdingnag. This land is inhabited by monstrous-looking giants who are twelve times the height of Gulliver. By contrast with these huge-looking men, Gulliver thinks himself to be as small as the Lilliputians were by contrast with him. Here too Gulliver becomes an object of curiosity for the inhabitants, though for the opposite reason. When Gulliver is first shown by his captor to his wife (who is as huge in size and proportions as her husband), she screams and runs away as a woman in England might do at the sight of a toad or a spider. In other words, Gulliver looks like an insect to the people here. The youngest son in the family of Gulliver's captor lifts Gulliver by the legs and holds him so high in the air that Gulliver begins to tremble with fear. Then Gulliver sees a cat which is three times larger than an ox in England, and he feels greatly alarmed by its fierceness. When the lady of the house begins to suckle her child, Gulliver feels thoroughly disgusted on seeing the huge, monstrous breasts of the woman, with their nipples about half of the bigness of Gulliver's head. When Gulliver wakes up from his sleep, he is attacked by a couple of rats which are of the size of a big dog. When Gulliver is afterwards bought by the Queen, he becomes a favourite with her. As a consequence, the royal dwarf begins to feel jealous of Gulliver and plays much mischief with him. On one occasion, the dwarf makes Gulliver fall into a large bowl of cream. On another occasion, he thrusts Gulliver's whole body into a bone from which the marrow has been taken out. Gulliver also feels uneasy for another reason. There are too many flies in Brobdingnag. The flies here are very large, like all other creatures, and Gulliver feels much troubled by them as they hum and buzz about his ears. He is also much tormented by the wasps, which are as large as the patridges in England. Referring to the royal kitchen Gulliver says that, if he were to describe the size of the kitchen-grate and the size of the pots and kettles, the reader would perhaps not believe him and think that Gulliver is guilty of exaggeration. There are several mishaps during Gulliver's stay in Brobdingnag. Once an apple, falling from a tree, hits Gulliver on his back and knocks him down flat on his face, because the apples here are also very large. On another occasion, when Gulliver is standing on a grassy plot, there is a sudden shower of hailstones which are nearly eighteen hundred times as large as those in Europe. Gulliver is badly injured by these hailstones. The royal maids of honour often play with Gulliver as if Gulliver were a toy. On one occasion Gulliver is carried off by a monkey which is also very huge, and he is rescued with great difficulty. Eventually Gulliver is carried off by a huge eagle which drops him into the sea from where he is picked up by a passing ship. This is Gulliver's last adventure on his second voyage.

Laputa, the voyage to which is described in Part III of the book, is another wonderful land. Laputa is an island which keeps flying at a height of about two miles from the earth over the continent of Balnibarbi. This in itself is a miracle. The people of Laputa have strange shapes and faces. Their heads are all reclined either to the right or to the left, one of their eyes being turned inward and the other directly up to the zenith. Many of the Laputans are followed by flappers who carry in their hands blown bladders fastened to the ends of short sticks. The function of these flappers is to draw the attention of their masters to anything that might need their attention, because the minds of their masters are so occupied with intense speculations that they can neither speak nor listen to others without being roused by some external action. Another strange feature of life on Laputa is that mutton, beef, pudding, and other eatables are given geometrical shapes or the shapes of musical instruments. When these people want to praise the beauty of a woman or any other animal they do so in geometrical or musical terms. The men on this island are so busy in their cogitations that their wives feel compelled to make love to strangers instead of to their husbands. When Gulliver goes to Lagado, he witnesses the many experiments which are in progress at the Academy of Projectors. There is a project for extracting sunbeams from cucumbers, a project for restoring human excrement to its original food, a new method for building houses by beginning at the roof and working downwards to the foundation, and so on. There are several schemes being developed at the school of political projects also. These are all very amusing and impractical schemes. Gulliver's visit to the island of Glubbdubdrib is also very interesting because Gulliver here finds himself in a place where ghosts and spirits are in attendance upon the governor and where Gulliver is enabled to hold conversations with the spirits of such great men of the past as Alexander, Hannibal, Aristotle, Homer, and Brutus. Gulliver also sees a group of immortal people in this place. These immortals are feeling wretched and miserable because they long for death which does not come to them.

The appeal of all the first three voyages for the young reader is manifest from the above summary. There is plenty of fun and mirth in the accounts of these three voyages. Indeed, some of the episodes are bound to give rise to boisterous laughter among the readers. In other words, the description of some of the incidents is really hilarious. No wonder that one of the early commentators called Gulliver's Travels a merry work. It is evident, too, that improbability is the keynote of most of the incidents. The grown-up readers, for instance, will not even believe in the existence of Lilliputians and Brobdingnagians. But the young readers are bound to feel excited by descriptions of these strange people and their doings, and will not doubt the existence of pigmies and giants. For them the accounts of these people's life will have a charm of their own.

The country of the Yahoos and the Houyhnhnms, described in Part IV, is also a wonderland. This is a country in which human beings are no better than beasts, while the horses show themselves to be superior to human beings. The horses or the Houyhnhnms are the noblest conceivable animals. They are wholly governed by reason; they have a language of their own which they are able even to teach to a human being like Gulliver; they have their own excellent customs and methods of government; they are guided mainly by the principles of benevolence and kindness. These strange or marvellous beings are free from all kinds of evil, so much so that there is no word in their language for lying or falsehood. They hold a periodical assembly to discuss their affairs and to take necessary action to rectify things which have gone wrong; they have their methods to control their population; and they do not marry for love or for the pleasures of sex but only to reproduce and yet to keep their members under check. The Yahoos, who symbolize human beings, are on the contrary despicable creatures who arouse our disgust and abhorrence. This part of the story is not likely to appeal to the young mind very much because it is replete with symbolism, the understanding of which is essential for the appreciation of the entire part. In this part, Swift's message is more important than the adventurous elements or the element of wonder and enchantment.

Finally, it must be pointed out that it is not enough to describe Gulliver's Travels merely as an adventure story or a tale of wonder. We must recognize that in it Swift has lashed human institutions and human passions. It is a satiric masterpiece in which Swift exposes human follies and absurdities, and the consequences of human irrationality.

The Enlightenment in Gulliver's Travels

Jonathan Swift's novel, Gulliver's Travels outlines a very odd sequence of events that are experienced by a sailor named Lemuel Gulliver. Throughout these adventures, Gulliver finds himself, on four different occasions, accidently coming across different races of peoples and creatures. These races teach him new languages, customs, lessons, and general knowledge of their own individual societies. These descriptions are many times believed to be Jonathan Swift's way of critiquing The Enlightenment that occurred during the eighteenth-century all over the world. This critique brings a satirical look at religion, morality, equality, and the ability to adapt to other societies.

In Gulliver's first adventure, he comes across the land of Lilliput. In this land, there are two groups of people, the Lilliputans and the Belfescuans. These two groups of people used to be one society until there was a disagreement over how the people were to crack their eggs. The disagreement was whether they should crack their eggs from the large end or the small end of the egg. Because of this disagreement, there was a war and many people died and the Belfescuans decided to move to the other side of the island and start their own society. This disagreement of cracking eggs is a comparison to the religious differences occurring in Europe just before the Enlightenment. Although the Lilliputan's disagreement over cracking eggs is a much more minuscule and quite elementary disagreement than those of religions during the Reformation, there are still some comparisons. The religious reformations began when Martin Luther decided that there were several things about the Catholic Church that he disagreed with. When Martin Luther went to the church to complain about these issues, such as the ability to "buy" indulgences from priests, the church ignored these ideas. Therefore, after posting the 95 Theses on his thoughts for change and spreading his ideas, Luther decided it was time to branch away from the Church. Although Luther was one of the beginning revolutionists to go against Catholicism, there was hundreds of others who followed in his footsteps to create societies that would act in ways that they thought were just. Similarly, the Belfescuans were formed when the then-emperor cut his hand breaking an egg large-end first and decided eggs should in fact be broken small-end first. After this declaration, there was a split among the society and the two societies were formed to break eggs as they pleased.

On Gulliver's second accidental journey, he comes upon a land of giants in Brobdingnag who are a very simple people, it seems. Unaware of the invention of gunpowder, Gulliver demonstrates the purpose of gunpowder to the king of Brobdingnag. The king becomes very frightened and decides that he does not want to have anything to do with the gunpowder, thinking of what kind of physical and moral destruction this could cause to his empire (Swift, 94). This is similar to the ideas of many Enlightenment thinkers, like Cesare Beccaria, who believed that humans should begin taking a more moral and rational approach at punishing criminals. With the absence of gunpowder, Brobdingnag has been able to keep crime rates low and overall morality high, it seems. Swift alludes that the introduction of such a weapon could lead to inhumane practices, such as the unfair punishments that were handed out before the Enlightenment. These unfair punishments however were criticized by many philosophers of the Enlightenment, which sparked more humane practices for punishing criminals.

Slavery is also a big issue during Gulliver's travels. Whether it be when Gulliver was first captured outside of Lilliput, or whether it was during the time he was captured in Brobdingnag. Swift compares Gulliver to a slave during the Enlightenment. Many Enlightenment thinkers were too afraid to abolish slavery in fear of any revolts that might arise. "Slavery corrupted its victims, destroyed their natural virtue, and crushed their natural love of liberty. Enslaved people, by this logic, were not ready for freedom" . This is how the Lilliputans felt with Gulliver. They were afraid that if they let Gulliver be free all together, that he would be furious and destroy their buildings and kill their citizens. This is why they only allowed Gulliver small freedoms over long periods of time, so they could make sure that he was not a threat to society. With this gradual sense of freedom, Gulliver proved to have adapted to the Lilliputan's society and turned out to be very useful in the community. The Enlightenment thinkers also believed that giving slaves small amounts of freedom would make for an easier transition into society.

In addition to the equality of slaves, another main theme throughout Swift's novel is the idea of equality for all persons. During The Enlightenment, there were social, economic, sexual and many other inequalities among different types of people. Swift incorporates this thought when Gulliver is in the land of the Houyhnhnms. In this land, there are Houyhnhnms, who are in essence a group of intelligent horses. Also, there are Yahoos who are a strange animals that are comparable to a human. The Houyhnhms are much more superior and intellectually advanced than the Yahoos. Although it seems ironical that horses are superior to a human-like being, this is a way of showing how, for example, some thought that men were superior to women. Jean-Jacques Rousseau fought for many rights for people and the idea that people should not be ruled by a government unless they chose to. However, he still believed that men should be superior to women in almost all aspects. This is comparable to the Houyhnhms being superior to all Yahoos, without any regard for advancing the intelligence or social standing of the Yahoos. During the Enlightenment, women, such as Mary Wollstonecraft, began to make strides towards equality with men. Just as Rousseau compared the inequalities of men and women to limiting women's duties to "being a mother and wife", Swift shows that the inequalities of the Houyhnhms and the Yahoos as being very large and that the Yahoos were not to be used for much except labor.

Not only does Swift discuss the ruling of individual groups of people, but he also discussed the point of societies falling under strict rule. In Gulliver's adventure to Laputa, he is told the many ways that the island as a whole is used to rule over the cities on the ground. They rule by using the ultimate power of being able to control weather and cause severe destruction to cities. Swift is alluding that the island of Laputa is similar to that of absolutist rulers in England. Absolutist rulers have almost all powers to do almost anything they wish to those that they rule. However, similar to the city that successfully rebelled against the floating island of Laputa, such philosophers as David Hume and Immanuel Kant taught people that they should only be ruled if and by whom they want to be ruled. In the case in Gulliver's Travels, the city below the island did not want to be ruled by the floating island, so they took action and were able to set up their own government to live by their own society's standards.

Throughout all four islands that Gulliver comes across, he learns a new, totally different, way of living at each island. Whether if this involves a new language at each island, new types of food, or different ways to govern, Gulliver adapts to each and finds strengths in each society's rules and realizes that their rules are well-suited for their specified needs.

This ability for Gulliver to adapt relates to the ability of societies across the world to learn and accept new cultures and ideas from each other during the Enlightenment. This spread of cultures has allowed societies to adapt ideas that allow for the betterment of their society. Although Swift takes a very comical view of this using examples such as the fact that the peoples of Laputa must be hit with "flappers" in order to talk or to listen, this still shows that some societies act differently and Gulliver had to adapt also by being hit several times on the ears and mouth while in conversation with the Laputans.

Throughout Jonathan Swift's novel, Gulliver's Travels, there are many satirical relationships between Swift's adventures and the events of The Enlightenment of the eighteenth-century. These relationships are usually very extreme, but do provide parallels, sometimes criticizing, main themes of events during the Enlightenment. Throughout his travels, Gulliver becomes a better-rounded person from interaction with creatures of all sorts. Similarly to Gulliver, the Enlightenment period put the world as a whole under massive changes in technology, culture and religion. These changes have allowed for the successes and downfalls of today's society as we know it.

Feminist Approach to Gulliver’s Travels

Swift's view of woman was influenced by the times and the society that he lived in. The paucity of love in author's childhood and the little exposure he had to women when he was growing up also attributed to the corrosive personal isolation. Some critics like Lord Orrery, Middleton Murry and Norman O. Brown have suggested that Swift was a misogynist, because of the way in which he is attacking women's physical aspect. Jonathan Swift often mentions the female body with repugnance. He very often dwells with exaggerated horror at the sight of a woman’s body performing its normal bodily functions. Many have concluded from this that he hated women and considered them inferior to men. Gulliver hates humanity through women. Swift portrays women as inferior creatures, comparing them to lusty, dirty, and ignorant animals, ultimately leading to Gulliver's disgust in women in general at the end of the novel. In the moral domain, women inspire as much aversion as they do on the physical side.

In Lilliput, Gulliver illustrates the carelessness of women, when he retells the story of the fire. The only way to extinguish the fire is through urination, an act so lude and grotesque that a woman could not handle it. The queen is autocratic and infuriated when Gulliver urinates on her apartment to keep it from burning. She decrees that public urination be banned and that the contaminated building be left as it is. The method by which Gulliver describes this event, leads the reader to believe that only a woman would act so harshly to his actions.

In "A Voyage to Brobdingnag", when the farmer shows Gulliver to his wife, she screams with disgust, the way a woman would react to a bug.

Gulliver in Brobdingnag discovers that his sense was more acute in proportion to his littleness. He sees everything magnified, he examines everything as if through a microscope. Looking up close at the women's anatomy, Gulliver notices that their skin seems very rough, discolored and greasy. Also he has difficulty breathing because of their strong and repugnant scent. He is disgusted by the sight of their huge pores, spots, pimples, hair and moles and even more repulsed by one maiden who places Gulliver on her nipple to play. Swift uses the Maids of Honor to illustrate flaws in a woman’s beauty that are generally overlooked or hidden. Gulliver expresses his aversion to their naked bodies. They were, "very far from being a tempting sight", and gave him, "any other emotions than those of horror and disgust". Gulliver makes the connection that the women of England, that he normally finds so beautiful, have the same flaws, but he just does not see them as easily because they are of the same size: "This made me reflect upon the fair skins of our English ladies, who appear so beautiful to us, only because they are of our own size, and their defects not to be seen but through a magnifying glass, where we find by experiment that the smoothest and whitest skins look rough and course and ill coloured." Only the women are described as having such horrible discolored skin. Men had it too, but he only brought attention to the women.

When Gulliver describes a grotesque vision of humanity in Brobdingnag, he generally uses women as the objects of repulsion. It is the Empress who eats in a grotesque fashion. When Gulliver sees beggars and homeless, he describes in unkind detail the lice crawling on their clothes. The homeless beggar with cancerous breast is a horrific sight to Gulliver as he can see into the crevices and cavities in her body, destroyed by vermin and disease. That is "the most horrible spectacle that ever an European eye beheld". Swift deploys the rhetorical "instruments" necessary for such disavowal figuring the decaying body as female.

In Brobdingnag, Gulliver is shocked to see the "monstrous breast" of a nurse giving suck in front of him. Even the act of feeding does not escape his disgust: "I must confess no object ever disgusted me so much as the sight of her monstrous breast..."

The flying island of Laputa (from the Spanish la puta, "the whore") has been the object of several feminist discussions particularly to show that women are repeatedly described separately from men. The women are described by geometric shape and mathematical figures. Furthermore, the women are not allowed to explore or travel off the island without specific doctrine from the King. In Laputa, a wife is someone who would rather prostitute herself than stay with her neglectful husband. According to Susan Bruce, Gulliver's Voyage to Laputa enacts men's ultimate inability to control women's bodies and desires.

In Houyhnhnms women were also supposed to be gross, lusty, sexual, benevolent and disgusting as the description of the Yahoo female shows: "The females . . . had long lank hair on their heads and only a sort of down on the rest of their bodies. . . Their dugs hung between their fore feet and often reached almost to the ground as they walked." A young female Yahoo gets “inflamed with desire” at the sight of Gulliver. Never does Swift suggest they are more than what he presents them to be, nor does he suggest that they think, feel, love or are morally responsible. The Yahoo female who, driven by sexual craving, throws herself on Gulliver is a strikingly horrific image.

While the Houyhnhnm females are sexually modest and controlled, the Yahoo females are sexually aggressive: "A female Yahoo would often stand behind a bank or a bush, to gaze on the young males . . . and then appear, and hide, using many antic gestures and grimaces . . . and when any of the males advanced she would slowly retire, looking often back."

Swift is attracted to women on one hand but repelled by them on the other. Women's artifice and smells, to Swift, must have been both erotic and disgusting. We never hear the voices of the women however. Gulliver encounters several women in his travels but we never hear their opinions. We never find out how women think or what they feel about their own society. We also never find out what they think about Gulliver's society. The reason for this is that women did not have figurative voices. The conversations that he had with the queen, the lady and the women in Laputa are not brought up because it doesn't matter. Women's voices were not important.

When Gulliver returns home from the Land of Houyhnhnms, he finds the smell of his wife and children revolting, intolerable, due to his experiences with the Yahoos.

A closer examination of Swift's work shows that attacking women is a misconception. Swift did not believe, as his society did, that a woman should not be educated. Although he does utilize the feminine gender as a vehicle for his social thoughts, his text is more concerned with satirizing humanity, in order to express his ideal for their existence. Swift is exaggerating the characteristics of each society, so that they can be clearly seen. In fact, Swift perceives women to be on an essentially equal plane with men in three different areas. These areas are as follows: social accountability, educational abilities and purpose of existence. Actually, considering the century in which Swift lived, his views are extraordinary and differ drastically from the views of most of his contemporaries.

Jonathan Swift's writings convey that he believed that women should hold a larger role in English society. Swift also dismissed the idea that a woman should be valued on her physical appearance, rather than her actions as a human being.

Swift believed that people typically behaved immorally. Swift did not judge men and women separately for their actions, but looked at them as equally contributing factors in a society that was plagued by immorality, injustice and corruption. Swift writes "the handsomest among these Maids of Honor, a pleasant, frolicsome girl of sixteen, would sometimes set me astride one of her nipples..." The sexual reference and the attention to the girl's age, signify the lack of morals instilled in some young women of Swift's time. Swift makes examples of these women, not so much as to degrade them, but to condemn their behavior.

Swift is bashing, as much as the behavior of men and women in general. Swift puts women on the same level as men, where they are to be judged based upon their capabilities, and of being a worthwhile person, instead of an object of beauty. He goes to the extreme of using bodily functions as a means to symbolize equality, which also serves to express the ridiculousness of the entire situation. Essentially what Swift is saying is that the value of a woman should be based on who she is and not what she appears or what a man desires her to be.

Jonathan Swift desired a better human race than existed in the 1700's. He wanted a society in which women were educated equally with men. He wanted a society in which men and women placed a great deal of importance on their virtue, morals and intelligence. Through his satirical views of the human condition, Swift illustrates the weaknesses of mankind and his own ideal for the improvement of humanity.

Science Fiction and Utopia in Gulliver's Travels

Jonathan Swifts Gulliver's Travels is one the most famous satires written in the history of English literature. Many critics consider this satire as one of the earliest science fiction writings, while many others exclude this book from the science fiction genre. Although Gulliver's Travels may not completely fall in to the category of science fiction novels, but it shares some major elements with them that makes them become close together. One this major elements, is the utopian and the dystopian outlook conveyed in this work.

'Cognition', with its rational, logical implications, refers to that aspect of science fiction that prompts us to try and understand, to comprehend the alien landscape of a given science fiction book, film or story. 'Estrangement' is a term from Brecht, more usually rendered in English-language criticism as 'alienation'; and in this context it refers to that element of science fiction that we recognize as different, that 'estranges' us from the familiar and every day. If the science fiction text were entirely concerned with 'estrangement' then we would not be able to understand it; if it were entirely to do with 'cognition' then it would be scientific or documentary rather than science fiction. According to Suvin, both features need to be present; and it is this co-presence that allows science fiction both relevance to our world and the position to challenge the ordinary, the taken-for-granted. The main 'formal device' of Suvin's version of science fiction is the novum.

Robert Scholes, while appreciates the cognitivism of science fiction, also tries to add structural elements to make the analysis more solid on the matter. Jones's ideas on science and novum are also identical with what Suvin says (10-11). Broderick also appreciats the previous idea as Roberts says: "Broderick develops and deepens the Suvinian sense of 'cognitive estrangement' and Scholes's 'structural fabulation'"(13), but he also tries to add more other factors to it and also objects on many science fiction writings that do not have the required quality.

What is evident in all these defintions is that they all agree on the three aspects Suvin defines for science fiction and take them as the foreground of their studies. Therefore relying on these critics, one may conclude that a work of science fiction is the one that uses esrangement as a literary technique in order to achieve a cognitive end in an imaginatory framework or novum.

In Gulliver's Travels, the notion of estrangement can be traced in all four books without difficulty. The first book depicts the journey to Lilliput. The little man's themselves create the estranged effect as well as the setting of their land with small trees and a village with small houses:

When I found myself on my feet, I looked about me, and must confess I never beheld a more entertaining prospect. The country around appeared like a continued garden, and the enclosed fields, which were generally forty feet square, resembled so many beds of flowers. These fields were intermingled with woods of half a stang, and the tallest trees, as I could judge, appeared to be seven feet high. I viewed the town on my left hand, which looked like the painted scene of a city in a theatre. (10)

The size difference although creates an estrangement effect in this book but does not satisfy the notion of "novum", as the Lilliputian world resembles the world of the author or the narrator in this case. Both worlds consist of similar social and political systems of monarchy and hierarchies while one of the main aspects of science fiction is to create a world which is completely different in social and political grounds to the world of the author: novum. This does not happen in this book. As well as this point, one can also add that no scientific matter is also considered in this book to contribute to the science part of science fiction. Therefore this book lacks the notion of novum and the scientific part of the SF genre. It can be concluded in here that this book is merely a satire on the British monarchy and society.

A similar analysis can be done for book two, where Gulliver on his second voyage to "Brobdingnag" meets the "Giants". The setting again has been estranged by the thought of giant men and giant landscape and towns. But the notion of novum can't be concluded from it as it again consists of similar social structures. As for scientific matters, again there are no significant scientific elements to be discussed. Overall both books one and two fail to be considered as a science fiction work.

The third book however can be considered with more concern. The "Floating Island" of "Laputa" itself contains all science fictional elements. It is based on a pseudo-scientific fact that a piece of land may float and move about space via a controlled electromagnetic field. The whole estranged setting of the Laputans reflected in their clothing, language based on abstract sciences such as mathematics and music, their strange anti geometrical behaviors, their interest in celestial bodies contribute to the estrangement effect required for a science fiction work. Their social and political systems also vary greatly, as the king had used the floating island as a weapon to control and punish the disobeying towns-fixing the island on top of their towns and depriving them out of sun and rain; and at the end had failed and is trapped to stay on the island forever.

So Swift is able to present a novum society, a novum world in his third book of Gulliver's Travels where conventional monarchy system has to some limits failed to control its people by implying force. Another important part of this book is "the academy". Gulliver tells us that the Laputans make him feel neglected and that he is bored by their constantly talking about mathematics, music and geometry and etc. He is told that he can visit the academy. In his visit to the academy he finds absurd treatments of science and language and he becomes even more shocked. The position of mad scientist in an educational and research facility itself contributes to an estrangement effect in this book.

But the other important complementary factor needed to put this chapter among SF writings is "cognition". This chapter by showing us a different kind of society and also by the way it presents the academy brings to mind questions about man, knowledge and the limits in them. Questions that initiate from the usage of science and technology (the giant magnet of the floating island) and that ends in the mere philosophy of knowledge showed in its absurd end (in the academy). These questions lay among epistemological questions aimed to give cognition. Therefore the third book of Gulliver's Travels can be considered as a science fiction story.

The fourth book of Gulliver's Travels is perhaps the most favorable among the whole book. The setting is a forest similar to that we find in our own world but what can create an estrangement effect is perhaps the people who populate it: the talking, intelligent horses, "the Houyhnhnms" and the savage human beings or "Yahoos". Nothing scientific again goes on, even though horses speak in their own language, there is no reference to any sort of scientific explanation, so it is considered as mere fantasy. The comparison between the Yahoos who look like man but act like animals and the horses that look like animals and act and speak as man is interesting as it raises questions that lead to cognition. In any how any satirical work leads us to cognition as it questions the way we live, it criticizes our societies, our habits, our ways of life and thinking; but it does not necessarily have to have science fictional elements. This is the case with Gulliver's Travels, except for its third book.

But Gulliver's Travels can easily fall into the sub-genre of science fiction: Utopia. Michael Holquist in his article "How to Play Utopia: Some Brief Notes on the Distinctiveness of Utopian Fiction" explains the different aspects of utopia by comparing it to the game of chess and they are: abstraction of the society, the order that reigns in a Utopia, the need for limits, borders and exclusions (time and space),its inflexibility of mending rules as it is perfect in itself and the fact that it takes place in a peculiar time and place, a place "outside our world" and a "time off our clock" and its arbitrariness. (Rose 130)

Utopia has … is a simplification, a radical stylization of something which in experience is of enormous complexity, often lacking any apparent symmetry. Chess substitutes for war, Utopia for society. In each case what was rough is made smooth, what was chaotic is made orderly. (132)

By applying these rules to Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels, one can see how in the first three books Swift pictures dystopia in three sets of societies of little, giant and normal sized men and how in the fourth book, in a society of horses he pictures a utopia for his readers. All the four societies are found outside our world as a result of a journey to unknown places, unknown lands. So it is obvious that they are all set outside our place and time. They are all abstracts and are arbitrary as they only know their own existence and are cut off from the rest of the world and they even neglect the existence of other worlds.

The societies showed in all four books are to be compared with the society of England in Swift's time. The Lilliputians are smaller creatures; they are depicted in a way to show the falsies of Swift's England. The election of government members done by "rope dancing" for example is showed here to ridicule the election of government members in England. The constant wars between them and the "Blefuscus" that started over the way they should eat an egg resembles the constant wars between England and other countries such as Spain and France and this satire is aimed to show the dystopia that leans on unimportant affairs and loses many men for it.

The second book shows the small mindedness of England's society in comparison to the giants. The giant's king is unable to understand Gulliver's explanations about England, the necessity of wars "gun powder", etc. The line between dystopia and utopia somehow merge in this chapter as the giants' world has its perfect and imperfect sides. Poverty and hierarchies still remain in this society but the notion of peace is something fixed that its lack is not understood by them. The order reigns more fully in this kingdom.

Laputa depicts man’s desire for knowledge and technology and shows it as something bad and destructive, which results in force, isolation and madness. The dystopia depicted here is more understandable as this book also possesses stronger science fictional roots. It has been shown that the knowledgably, intelligent people of Laputa eventually used their knowledge for force and power but they failed and they were forced to stay on the floating island and never leave it. The academy again is another good example of how this society and its mere reliance on knowledge lead to destruction and decay. Another important thing that happens is the children who are born with a red mark on their foreheads and are immortal. Swift shows us through these immortals that immortality is not desirable and it again leads to decay.

The "Houyhnhnms" in the fourth book are the only race that has achieved a utopian society. They are wise and are deprived out of all negative desires and qualities. They are shown in contrast to the "Yahoos". The world of the Houyhnhnms is so perfect that Gulliver does not want to ever leave it. But as explained above, utopia is so perfect that it becomes unbendable to change, so the Houyhnhnms refuse to accept him as a part of their societies, because accepting him means a change and may result in the decay of their system. So Gulliver is forced to leave. When he arrives home he buys two horses and wants to repeat the utopian experience by conversing with the horses. But utopia is a place out of our world and its experience is not repeatable.

Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels shares some aspects of science fiction genre in its use of the estrangement technique and the use of utopia and dystopia in its context. But overall the thing that brings this satire close to science fiction is mainly the way it makes the readers think. The epistemological questions that are raised in this book among our realization of social faults and the depiction of man in several conditions with its strengths and weakness both in body and mind, all lead to a "cognition" that are promised by a good science fiction story. Therefore although Gulliver's Travels does not fall completely in to the genre of science fiction, but it could have been one of the main inspirations and predecessors of this genre.

Exploring the Humanity in Gulliver’s Travels

The wars which is portrayed between the Lilliputians and the Blefuscians seems to be interesting and well mentioned since the Lilliputians and the Blefuscians were only 1/12 in height or 1/1728 in volume when compared to Gulliver. Gulliver confronted to his first war which was more like a dispute over the manner of eating an egg. Swift mentions in the book about a former king who seemed to take the personal right from his people by telling them to eat the egg from the small end instead of the large end. Swift through this tried to portray the nature of dictatorship where a dominant ruler oppresses his subjects, which even continues in present day scenario. He also tried to portray how a ridiculous act like this can cause a war which continued through generations, when the people actually continued to fight without realizing the reason, a trend which reflects even in today’s society where a mere fight/war causes so much of loss but still people fail to understand why they are actually fighting.

Swift seemed to mock at the nature of contemporary wars or conflicts which are fought by the people in order to win control over some trifling matters, like to win more wealth or property as well as to get access to more power. Swift also uses the family to explain the extent of war by pointing out that not only war can destroy nations but it can also destroy the strong bonds of family.

Swift expresses a satire on war with the incident that Gulliver visits a man who can bring to life important figures or war heroes from the past. This is another example to point out that war is really very influential on society. Later on in the land of the horses, it is observed that there is no conflict or war, but rather it reveals a disintegration of societies in the form of separation to avoid those conflicts. The land is split into two societies of the barbaric Yahoos and that of the peaceful and logical horses. However, Gulliver understood that life seems to look beautiful without any war or conflict. He desires to live in this peaceful society of horses, but his nature of conflict seems to have got deep roots. He is unable to live up to the expectations of the horses. Swift is trying to point out that people want to live their lives in peaceful manner but it is also true that some form of conflict exists within the society. People constantly fight with one another since they never feel satisfied with what they possess. Therefore, they hold grudges against one another which cause constant turmoil.

In the book it is shown that war often seem to create the social classes, which is evident most highly when Gulliver encounters the giants. He comes from a world that considers him a giant and therefore, he offers little more entertainment to the giants, but that is in order to get him to the queen’s palace. Swift argues upon the fact that upper class always tend to look down upon the poor people in society. Similarly, it is noticed that the Queen can afford to hire new people who can render better service to her by bringing her more entertainment, therefore replacing others who were previously in the service.

This is a common fact which is evident even in a modern society. Swift therefore, trying to point us that society seems to be divided into two strata- the rich and the poor. The upper greedy rich people tend to exercise their control over the poor people in the society, thus this seems to be the basic human instinct which drives the upper classes not to treat the lower strata people equally.

Gulliver's views on certain issues started changing as the story goes on. He encounters the real world when he visits the horse society, where he found life is without violence or oppression. He understood the fact that man as superior species is not true. He finds that power can be gained not through the means of domination but through tolerance. The horse society can at any moment destroy or cause harm to the Yahoos but that would never happen since they know that would make no difference between them and their enemy. When Gulliver witnesses the destruction of all his belongings his true nature is portrayed. Swift claims that human beings tend to find the violent means and methods easier to win over a situation rather than resolving an issue through peaceful means.

The story of Gulliver's Travels pushes the aspect of imagination, which reflects a strong example of the use of satire to make society see things from a different point of view. The lessons that Gulliver learns throughout his entire journey focuses on the different nature of human beings. It creates the structure of a modern society and reveals that all kinds of wrong methods are used to control it. The story of Gulliver focuses not only into human culture but also explores the true nature of the human beings living in that society. It also points out to what extent potential lies in patience, determination, as well as in perception. Swift applied his satiric technique to offer an important message to the readers by pointing to the fact when Gulliver came back to his own home, he realized that his attitude towards looking at surrounding things have changed completely, since he no longer desire to be a part of the human race which only reflects their greedy attitude rather than treating each other with respect and love. He started disrespecting his leaders whom he looked at once with a feeling of proud. Gulliver developed a positive attitude towards his own family and learnt to respect it and preserve it. He in fact, recognized the true meaning of life and tried to analyse things from a rational point of view. He understood his true identity and realized that one should take a sense of pride of where they are from, and treats everyone with love and upheld the ideals of brotherhood to promote peace everywhere.

Gullible Gulliver and His Hoaxes

Gulliver's Travels is a brilliant masterpiece that has stood the pressures of time. It is a witty (and sometimes biting) and satirical portrait of modern London. Like Alice in Wonderland, it is also an amazing book containing brilliant science fiction and travel literature, but at the same times it effortlessly parodies both. These facts are acknowledged by its readers. However, what most readers tend to forget is the continuous comical interlace that sustains the book from becoming a boring lecture on man. In "Part 4: A Voyage to The Country of Houyhnhnms", readers have mistaken the comedy as serious facts and therefore are bewildered by Swift's cruel and dismal portrayal of the European man. Unable to explain Swift's wounding tone and dialogue they have dismissed him as a crazy, rampant misanthrope.

I on the other hand, reject this coupling of Gulliver's actions as akin to Swift. I believe that Swift has been thought misanthropic for several reasons: (1) both Houyhnhnms and Yahoos have been symbolized incorrectly and their representations have been misinterpreted; it is not Swift but Gulliver who equates Yahoos with humans (2) the usage of the beast-fable tradition was not to be taken seriously, it was a genre of satire quite popular in London and was meant to invoke comedy. (3) After Gulliver's voyage from Houyhnhnm-land, critics have interpreted Gulliver's disgust for mankind in Swift. Gulliver should not be substituted for Swift. At the most our "misanthropic" sea captain has become the comedic satirical butt of travel yarns, where upon taking one too many journey he has lost his marbles.

I have found, from my limited knowledge that most critics have misunderstood the representation of the Houyhnhnms and the Yahoos. That the Houyhnhnms symbolize Swift's version of the ideal man, and the Yahoo's the current man, is a fact that that I disagree on.

Gulliver was proud to be associated with the "perfection of nature," the Houyhnhnms. He was proud of his exposure to the Houyhnhnms, their rationality, stoic nature and simple wisdom. Swift never meant for us to become like the Houyhnhnms, because what makes us humans is the exact thing that these horses lack. As Monk states, "Houyhnhnmland is the perfect rationalistic Utopia and the horses are the embodiment of reason" (67). They lack in every emotion and prefer to solve their matters systematically while maintaining control. Their economy is controlled by a "democratic council" and "government is entirely conducted by periodic assemblies" (Monk 67). There is no hatred, selfish desires, or lust and everyone is loved equally. "Courtship, love, presents, jointures, settlements, have no place in their thoughts" (1376).They practice eugenics, and "marriage" for them is just to produce suitable offspring-therefore, even the amount of offspring is monitored. As one can see, the Houyhnhnms do not possess any of our vices, but they do not possess any of our qualities either. This was not Swift's version of the ideal man. I am in an agreement with Monk when he states that it is Gulliver, not Swift, who is fascinated by the Houyhnhnms; it is Gulliver "who aspires to rise above the human condition and to become pure intelligence as these horses and angels are" (68).

The Yahoos are one of the most important symbols in the book, as they warn us what humanity could become, in the absence of reason. I support Monk's opinion, where he states that Yahoos were not mean to represent the current man, but the "bestial element in man, the unenlightened, unregenerate, irrational element in human nature" (67). This is why the female Yahoo, wishes to have sex with Gulliver, and why the Houyhnhnms lump Gulliver with the Yahoos. Besides, Yahoos are amphibious creatures and unlike us, they walk on all fours. In addition, Gulliver observes, that they "appear to be the most unteachable of all animals, their capacities never reaching higher than to draw or carry burthens" (1375). Gulliver disgusted by his relation to the Yahoos and distraught by the Houyhnhnms grouping grows to hate himself for being a "Yahoo." Furthermore, when Gulliver finds a connection between "human depravity as they exist in European society" and the "society and conducts of the Yahoo" he is repelled by the similarity (Monk 68). During the three years in Houyhnhnmland Gulliver finds all the vices of humankind and he concludes that both Yahoo and man are "cunning, malicious, treacherous and revengeful" (1375). Here in Houyhnhnmland, there were no "factions of parties; no encouragers to vice by seducement; [...] no cheating shopkeepers; [...and] no scoundrels raised from the dust upon the merit of their vices or nobility thrown into it on account of their virtues." As Monk says, Gulliver was aiming to cross the boundaries of human rationality, into the angels, but since he could not, he resorted on equating himself and the rest of humankind to Yahoos.

When the kind Don Pedro, a man much like Gulliver before his madness, saves Gulliver, Gulliver instead of thanking him his tries to "leap into the sea and swim for [his] life" (pg 1385). Sadly, Gulliver is not able to see the hospitality of the Houyhnhnms in Don Pedro, because he only sees the Yahoo Don Pedro and can no longer recognize the traits of kindness and tolerance in a human being. What Swift is trying to demonstrate here are the two dualities, the Houyhnhnms and the Yahoos that make up humankind. Gulliver representing humanity is a blend of both dualities; deviating towards either pole would be disastrous. Gulliver makes the mistake of pursuing only the Houyhnhnm pole; therefore, the rest of his society alienates him. Additionally, he commits the same error of the Houyhnhnms in equating human beings with Yahoos. Sadly, he is left in a place where is accepted neither as a Yahoo, or a Houyhnhm, for he has betrayed the middle link.

I believe, that most readers can agree that the Yahoos are disgusting characters. Nevertheless, according to Stone, Swift's readers would not have only found them disgusting, but his "audience [would have] had good reason for appreciating the cleverness of what may revolt us" (368). According to Stone's sources, "Yahoo like Hottentots, Hodmadods, and Indians" were common in the time of writing and Swift and his readers were familiar with them (369). Furthermore, to even suggest the idea that the gross Yahoos, "were faintly like [them] would evoke laughter" among Swift's readers (Stone 369). Stone believes that what Swift was using was "theriophilism." Theriophilism is a belief that "beasts are more prudent, temperate, and chaste than men, and more restrained in their desires; their pleasures are natural ones, they have no useless arts, they are clever at learning, and so on" (Stone 370). These "beast-fables" were a popular concept with Swift's London. Moreover, readers were familiar with this concept of animals possessing human rationality, and therefore found it more amusing. I am not saying that all of Swift's satire is to be taken comically, but the exaggeration of the characters, particularly the Houyhnhnms in Part 4 is quite comical. Where is "horse sense" that enables the Houyhnhnms to build houses, or to thread needles? Gulliver himself is "much surprised" (1359) when he witnesses the Houyhnhnms raising their hoofs to their mouth, while eating.

Stone believes that this type of gifted animal belongs "to the same group as Pliny's crabs which reach the oyster by throwing pebbles between its open shells so that they cannot close, and as Martin Martin's dexterous seals, which eat no fish till they first take off the skin" (371). In addition, there are also recent media references to these kinds of gifted animals. For example, Alice in Wonderland has its fair share of gifted animals, such as the Caterpillar, the Cheshire Cat and the Jabberwocky all of whose dialogues are human-like and comical. The Caterpillar who advises Alice to ponder on important issues resembles the rational mind of the Houyhnhnms; however just like the horses, when he smokes his Hookah the Caterpillar is as funny as the Houyhnhnms reciting poetry. Stone believe that Swift employed the usage of the beast-fables, for comical reasons and "simply to wound man's pride [and to] reduce his arrogance" (370).

Gulliver, our narrator is a middle-class English sea captain. He is not a brilliant satirist, essayist or writer; on the other hand, Gulliver is quite dull and sometimes a bore. This is why I wonder why critics and readers sometimes substitute Swift for Gulliver's disgust for mankind and when he pursues his "misanthropic" adventures. According to Stone, the protagonist of Swift's misanthropic comedy is, "if anything, is the scornful reader of travel books gone a-traveling himself" (372). Why is it then poor Gulliver has lost his wits? First, what most tend to forget is that Gulliver has been living with the Houyhnhnms for 3 years without any human company. Lonely Gulliver has no humans to converse with, share his views, or support him-he has no one to agree or disagree with when the Houyhnhnms declare him a "gifted" Yahoo. Secondly, his closest brethren, the Yahoos have mistreated him, who infuriate Gulliver and as a result, he distances himself from them. As Stone says, "his allegiance [to the Houyhnhnms] was only a natural one" but tragic as his mind becomes temporarily unstable (373).

Examples of Gulliver's derangement or "misanthropic" adventures are when he stuffs his nostrils with "rue or sometimes with tobacco" (1385), at the "touch of that odious animal, [his wife he falls] into a swoon", and to top it all off, he has great conversations with his stone horses for "at least four hours every day" (1386). As I imagine these instances, instead of feeling Gulliver's misanthropy, I feel the comedy that Swift has created. Don Quixote a parallel of Gulliver, goes mad from reading too many chivalric romances, and finds examples of them in the mere instances of life. Gulliver, in return goes mad from living in isolation and because of his awe for the horses (his only role models), he "denounces all of mankind in a list of vices that is magnified to absurdity" (Stone 373). An example, of Gulliver's madness, is Gulliver's wife who used to be "lovely, chaste and submissive" (Stone 373), has now become a "ranting, lewd expensive" wife (1380). Three years before, in Houyhnhnmland Gulliver stated, "there were a few great lovers of mankind, at that time, than myself" (1359). However, at the end, he criticizes the European man in his rant against the "backbiters, pickpockets, bawds, buffoons, tedious talkers, [and] fops, bullies, drunkards..." (1380); we can safely conclude that Gulliver is not the same man he was before. Agreeing with Stone, I believe that, "Swift is employing the familiar technique of mock-serious satire...like the pseudo-misanthropic spectator and the beast-fabulists" (Stone 373). I am not saying that all of Part 4 of the Travels is a satirical comedy, for Swift did want us to learn a lesson on the moral dangers European man was approaching, but I believe that Gulliver's return was set to lighten the mood, not to pronounce Swift as a misanthropic man.

Gulliver's Travel is an amazing book, which encompasses various genres in one book. From satire that challenges and entertains, to a children's story, to a developed Science Fiction, Gulliver's Travel is at the same time a humorous and grave masterpiece where its readers are educated without being bored. I believe the Travels have stood to be popular, because of its slippery and controversial nature, where critics and readers are never sure about Swift's intention of writing the Travels. I agree with Monk and Stone, that Swift never meant for Part 4: A Voyage to the Country of Houyhnhnms to be a tale that ends in misanthropy. Yes, Swift was tired of the "sinfulness and folly of mankind" (Monk 71) but I do not think he had deemed humankind hopeless. By examining the Houyhnhnms and the Yahoos we understand that dualities that make up human nature, the rational and the sensual. Man is incomplete without either, and through Gulliver, Swift has illustrated what becomes of a man when he pursues only the rational. Through the Yahoo, we receive a warning from Swift where he poses the question of whether man is doomed to be corrupt or that he becomes corrupted. Overall, the last voyage of Gulliver's Travels is one that is comic, serious and reformative.

The Redress of Poetry

SEAMUS HEANEY; 1939-2013

Seamus Heaney, the eldest of his nine brothers and sisters, was born in April 1939. His father dealt mainly in cattle besides having a small farm of some fifty acres in County Deny in Northern Ireland. Heaney's mother belonged to a family called McCann whose connections were more with the modern world than with the traditional rural economy. His parentage thus contains both the Ireland of the cattle-herding Gaelic past and the Ulster of the Industrial Revolution. He considers this to have been a significant tension in his background, something which corresponds to another inner tension, also inherited from his parents, namely that between speech and silence. His father was conspicuously thrifty of talk and his mother notably ready to speak out, a circumstance which Seamus Heaney believes to have been fundamental to the quarrel with himself out of which his poetry arises.

Heaney grew up as a country boy and attended the local primary school. As a very young child, he watched American soldiers on military exercises in the local fields, in preparation for the Normandy invasion of 1944. They were stationed at an aerodrome which had been built a mile or so from his home and once again Heaney has taken this image of himself as a consciousness poised between 'history and ignorance' as representative of the nature of his poetic life and development. Even though his family left the farm where he was reared in 1953, and even though his life since then has been a series of moves farther and farther away from his birthplace, the departures have been more geographical than psychological: rural County Deny is the 'country of the mind' where much of Heaney's poetry is still grounded.

When he was twelve years of age, Seamus Heaney won a scholarship to St. Columb's College, a Catholic boarding school situated in the city of Derry, forty miles away from the home farm. This first departure, for him, from Mossbawn was the decisive one. It would be followed in years to come by a transfer to Belfast where he lived between 1957 and 1972, and by another move from Belfast to the Irish Republic where Heaney has made his home, and then, since 1982, by regular, annual periods of teaching in America. All of these subsequent shifts and developments were dependent, however, upon that original journey from Mossbawn which the poet has described as a removal from "the earth of farm labour to the heaven of education." It is not surprising, then, that this move has turned out to be a recurrent theme in his work, from "Digging", the first poem in his first book, through the much more orchestrated treatment of it in "Alphabets" (The Haw Lantern, 1987), to its most recent appearance in "A Sofa in the Forties" which was published this year in The Spirit Level.

At St. Columb's College, Heaney was taught Latin and Irish, and these languages, together with the Anglo-Saxon which he would study while a student of Queen's University, Belfast, were determining factors in many of the developments and retrenchments which have marked his progress as a poet. The first verses he wrote when he was a young teacher in Belfast in the early 1960s and many of the best known poems in North, his important volume published in 1975, are linguistically tuned to the Anglo-Saxon note in English. His poetic line was much more resolutely stressed and packed during this period than it would be in the eighties and nineties when the "Mediterranean" elements in the literary and linguistic heritage of English became more pronounced. Station Island (1984) reveals Dante, for example, as a crucial influence, and echoes of Virgil—as well as a translation from Book VI of The Aeneid—are to be found in Seeing Things (1991). Heaney's early study of Irish bore fruit in the translation of the Middle Irish story of Suibhne Gealt in Sweeney Astray (1982) and in several other translations and echoes and allusions: the Gaelic heritage has always been part of his references and remains culturally and politically central to the poet and his work.

Heaney's poems first came to public attention in the mid-1960s when he was active as one of a group of poets who were subsequently recognized as constituting something of a "Northern School" within Irish writing. Although Heaney is stylistically and temperamentally different from such writers as Michael Longley and Derek Mahon (his contemporaries), and Paul Muldoon, Medbh McGuckian and Ciaran Carson (members of a younger Northern Irish generation), he does share with all of them the fate of having been born into a society deeply divided along religious and political lines, one which was doomed moreover to suffer a quarter-century of violence, polarization and inner distrust. This had the effect not only of darkening the mood of Heaney's work in the 1970s, but also of giving him a deep preoccupation with the question of poetry's responsibilities and prerogatives in the world, since poetry is poised between a need for creative freedom within itself and a pressure to express the sense of social obligation felt by the poet as citizen. The essays in Heaney's three main prose collections, but especially those in The Government of the Tongue (1988) and The Redress of Poetry (1995), bear witness to the seriousness which this question assumed for him as he was coming into his own as a writer.

These concerns also lie behind Heaney's involvement for a decade and a half with Field Day, a theatre company founded in 1980 by the playwright Brian Friel and the actor Stephen Real. Here, he was also associated with the poets Seamus Deane and Tom Paul, and the singer David Hammond in a project which sought to bring the artistic and intellectual focus of its members into productive relation with the crisis that was ongoing in Irish political life. Through a series of plays and pamphlets (culminating in Heaney's case in his version of Sophocles' Philoctetes which the company produced and toured in 1990 under the title, The Cure at Troy), Field Day contributed greatly to the vigour of the cultural debate which flourished throughout the 1980s and 1990s in Ireland.

Heaney's beginnings as a poet coincided with his meeting the woman whom he was to marry and who was to be the mother of his three children. Marie Devlin, like her husband, came from a large family, several of whom are themselves writers and artists, including the poet's wife who has recently published an important collection of retellings of the classic Irish myths and legends (Over Nine Waves, 1994). Marie Heaney has been central to the poet's life, both professionally and imaginatively, appearing directly and indirectly in individual poems from all periods of his oeuvre right down to the most recent, and making it possible for him to travel annually to Harvard by staying on in Dublin as custodian of the growing family and the family home.

The Heaneys had spent a very liberating year abroad in 1970/71 when Seamus was a visiting lecturer at the Berkeley campus of the University of California. It was the sense of self-challenge and new scope which he experienced in the American context that encouraged him to resign his lectureship at Queen's University (1966-72) not long after he returned to Ireland, and to move to a cottage in County Wicklow in order to work full time as a poet and free-lance writer. A few years later, the family moved to Dublin and Seamus worked as a lecturer in Carysfort College, a teacher training college, where he functioned as Head of the English Department until 1982, when his present arrangement with Harvard University came into existence. This allows the poet to spend eight months at home without teaching in exchange for one semester's work at Harvard. In 1984, Heaney was named Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory, one of the university's most prestigious offices. In 1989, he was elected for a five-year period to be Professor of Poetry at Oxford University, a post which requires the incumbent to deliver three public lectures every year but which does not require him to reside in Oxford.

In the course of his career, Seamus Heaney has always contributed to the promotion of artistic and educational causes, both in Ireland and abroad. While a young lecturer at Oxford University, he was active in the publication of pamphlets of poetry by the rising generation and took over the running of an influential poetry workshop which had been established there by the English poet, Philip Hobsbaum, when Hobsbaum left Belfast in 1966. He also served for five years on The Arts Council in the Republic of Ireland (1973-1978) and over the years has acted as judge and lecturer for countless poetry competitions and literary conferences, establishing a special relationship with the annual W.B. Yeats International Summer School in Sligo. In recent years, he has been the recipient of several honorary degrees; he is a member of Aosdana, the Irish academy of artists and writers, and a Foreign Member of The American Academy of Arts and Letters. In 1996, subsequent to his winning the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1995, he was made a Commandeur de L'Ordre des Arts et Lettres by the French Ministry of Culture.

Redress of Poetry : Introduction & Short Summary

Ever since Plato, poets have been a victim of the allegation that poetry is a useless thing and that it does not have anything to offer. And poets have always been trying to defend themselves. It is probably Heaney who has defended poetry the best. He starts with the argument that a Heckler might question about the use of poetry but might not have a thorough reading of poetry. He would have his allegations based merely upon the little reading he might have had in his lifetime. He might say that politics, science and other fields of knowledge have contributed towards the development of mankind but poetry has not served mankind at all, as poetry is something associated only with imagination and poets are the imaginative people who do not have anything concrete to offer.

To answer these charges, Heaney proposes a number of advantages of poetry. First of all, poetry has a redressing effect. It renders hope to its readers by saying "it is a state of mind not the state of the world." Secondly, a poet sees the society and finds out the reasons of disturbance in the equilibrium in a society. He is the one who not only recognizes the source of disturbance but also adds weight to the lighter scale to restore the equilibrium. Similarly, poetry gives an outlet to the powerful emotions of the poet as well as the reader and hence protects them from "violence without".

Heaney also answers the question why we do not enjoy poetry. He says that we enjoy poetry only when our experience coincides with the experience of the poet. As "the taste of apple does not lie in the fruit itself but in its contact with the palate".

The first poem quoted in full in this book is George Herbert's 'The Pulley'; the last is one of Heaney himself, a twelve-line section from a sequence called 'Squarings'. The 'Squarings' poem tells the story of an apparition experienced by the monastic community in Clonmacnoisie sometime during the Middle Ages: a crew-man came down to them out of a visionary boat in the sky but could not stay and had to be helped back out of the human element because, as the abbot perceived, he would have drowned in it if he had remained. 'The Pulley' is a parable about God devising a way to keep the minds and aspirations of human beings turned towards the heavenly in spite of all the pleasures and penalties of being upon earth. Both poems are about the way consciousness can be alive to two different and contradictory dimensions of reality and still find a way of negoti-ating between them, but I did not notice this correspondence between their thematic and imaginative concerns until the whole book had been assembled in manuscript.

Redress of Poetry : Critical Appreciation

Introduction: Comprised of the lectures Seamus Heaney delivered as professor of poetry at Oxford, this book is evidence not only of the commitment of the new Nobel laureate to his craft, but of the generosity of his spirit and the eloquence of his tongue. The apparently casual and unsystematic nature of the approach, with lectures on poets as diverse as, among others, Christopher Marlowe, George Herbert, Brian Merriman, John Clare and Elizabeth Bishop, serves only to emphasise the coherence and integrity of his view of poetry.

He says that he felt that "a reliable critical course could be plotted by following a poetic sixth sense". That sixth sense is by now utterly trustworthy, and one of the great pleasures of the volume is to see how heterogeneous poets are yoked so stimulatingly together, not by violence, but by a lovely unforced sensitivity. The lectures examine different ways in which poetry may redress the imperfections of our state (and of our states) and yet remain stubbornly itself: "the idea of poetry as an answer, and the idea of an answering poetry as a responsible poetry, and the idea of poetry's answer, its responsibility, being given in its own language rather than in the language of the world that provokes it" this is how Heaney sees his central theme.

Heaney's belief and faith: Heaney's basic belief is that poetry helps us to have life and have it more abundantly. There is nothing grandiose or solemn in his advocacy: the more abundant life may be derived from our attention to John Clare's old mouse bolting in the wheat, or to the tender eroticism of Marlowe's "Hero and Leader", as much as from our respect before the sonorities of Yeats. Heaney's vision of poetry is, nevertheless, religious in the wider sense of the term, and this book is his defence of poetry in terms which Joyce, another priest of the imagination, would have approved: "the imaginative transformation of human life is the means by which we can most truly grasp and comprehend it".

Dancing alongside the gravitas, as has also been the case in Heaney's recent volume of poetry, Seeing Things, there is a high-spirited celebration of the sheer pleasure of poetry. Indeed, Heaney himself insists on the correct priority: "the movement is always from delight to wisdom and not vice versa". There is throughout the lectures a most attractive insistence on the freedom of poetry from all kinds of political correctness, on the way in which the achieved or fully imagined poem is "a great unfettered event".

Thus he speaks generously about Dylan Thomas, of his desire to "affirm his kind of afflatus as a constant possibility for poetry, something not superannuated by the irony and self-knowing tactics of the art in postmodern times"; thus he praises the "spirit of hilarity and transgression" in the extravagance of Merriman's "The Midnight Court". The essay on Merriman is especially fine in its unforced demonstration of the truth of Heaney's belief that great poetry should "answer" to the conditions of the world (in this case, 18th-century Ireland suffering under the penal laws), yet remain unconstrained in the imaginative largeness of its procedures, so that "it represents not a submission to the conditions of the world, but a creative victory over them". One thinks of many great poems by Heaney himself, such as "The Other Side", "Casualty", and "The Strand at Lough Beg", which offer the redress of poetry to the intransigent conditions of his own province.

His tone and style: Heaney's tone is celebratory, but he cannot be confused with a chit-chat show. While duly praising the "inspirational" qualities of Hugh MacDiamid, he also speaks of his "linguistic overweening", of his doctrinal extremism, his anglophobia, and his "vindictive nativism", and even, woundingly, says that "the blether of William McGonagall" sporadically overwhelms MacDiarmid's own voice. Dylan Thomas was the "in-house bohemian" of the literary establishments on both sides of the Atlantic, offering himself too readily as a form of spectator sport. Oscar Wilde's "literary tragedy was that he did become like his mother" in the fervency of the rhetoric of parts of "The Ballad of Reading Gaol".

Heaney never gives in to malice pure and simple, however, and one keeps returning to the sense of his openness to many different types of literary experience. His most telling rebukes are aimed at trends in contemporary criticism which are producing a narrowing of the reader's arteries. Here is his sturdy defence of the "untrammelled climb" of Marlowe's verse in Tamburlaine: "Though I have learned to place this poetry's expansionist drive in the context of nascent English imperialism, I am still grateful for the enlargements it offered, the soaring orchestration, and the roll-call of place names and of figures from classical mythology. . . It is necessary to find a way of treating the marvellously aspiring note of his work as something more than a set of discourses to be unmasked."

Heaney's religious Redress: For Seamus Heaney, as it is for many who originate from Northern Ireland, religion is closely allied to politics. Heaney's religious ideals, however, extend beyond the divisiveness of sectarianism, and stem from the desire for unity, balance and redress. He finds these religious and social ideals voiced by Simone Weil, the religious writer and social activist. The religious nature of Heaney's early poems originates in part from his regard for the landscape as a sacramental book that offers an alternative reality beyond the covert level of meaning. By naming or renaming a place, one has written or rewritten one's meanings onto it, endowing it with an alternative reality. Hence, the first task of historical redress is to recover the poet's alternative or Celtic heritage beneath the Anglicisation of place names. The second task, which balances and interrogates the first, is to seek out the linguistic heritage shared by the Celts and their British colonizers. Heaney's etymological endeavours, therefore, work to uncover and unite the different and yet interrelated cultural identities of Ireland and Northern Ireland. Likewise, his desire for equilibrium enables him to reread and interrogate the wounded text-bodies of sectarian 'martyrs', thereby challenging their apotheosis. He compares the poet to a medieval poet-scribe whose function was to negotiate between two differing visions of reality, the 'pagan' and the Christian. Similarly, he believes the present-day poet may offer the middle way of peace and redress.

Conclusion: Heaney is a great critic because he is a great reader, ever alert to "minor points of major importance". He speaks of "the immaculate ballet of courtesy and equilibrium" in that poem of Herbert which begins "Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back"; he writes of Clare's "totally alert love for the one-thing-after-anotherness of the world". The humanist theme of the great essay comparing the attitudes of Larkin and Yeats to death has already been much commented upon, but not its beautiful sensitivity to the contrast between the rooks of Yeats's cold heaven, Hopkins's dapple-dawn-drawn falcon, and the carolings of Hardy's darkling thrush, and the silence of the birds in Larkin's dawn-song. Here is where the poet-critic does his real work. Reading Heaney on poetry makes one want to say with George Herbert, one of the poets celebrated in these lectures, "I once more smell the dew and rain, /and relish versing".

Redress of Poetry : Heaney and the concept of Poetry

Introduction: The good of poetry has come to be an article of faith, not just in poetry's commercial promotion (which is perhaps fair enough), but in the messages sent to a reading world by many poets themselves. In his introductory remarks to Finders Keepers, a generous and valuable selection from thirty years of his own critical writings, Seamus Heaney speaks of how his essays are mostly "appreciations, reports on the good of poetry itself", and goes on to acknowledge that they "are also, of course, testimonies to the fact that poets themselves are finders and keepers, that their vocation is to look after art and life by being discoverers and custodians of the unlooked for".

Heaney's "of course" speaks much of redress. It is interesting that an announcement like this of the poet's vocation to "look after" us at the same time as - indeed in the very act of - looking after art, can be passed off as a matter of course. The "of course" is perfectly justifiable though, since Heaney is voicing a matter that is at present one of genuine consensus. For many of us, the goodness of and in poetry reflects on the society in which it is appreciated, and validates those best instincts which in all our areas of concern - the personal, the cultural, and even the political - we tell ourselves that we share. In this scenario, the poet-critic becomes a wise family doctor who prescribes the artistic medicines and pick-me-ups to keep us all in good shape.

Like any consensus, this is comforting. Yet there are good grounds for being a little suspicious of the authority on which the ministrations of many poet-critics are based. At one extreme, the poet-critic might use his or her eminence to whisper to academic audiences the sweet nothings that convert wilful obscurity, or scholarly waywardness, into the winningly idiosyncratic and whacky, tickling the jaded palates of professional elite. At the other extreme, the spectacle of a media poet-pundit calling for unmetaphorical blood to be shed in the Middle East in order to satisfy his own hatred of Zionists might give us pause in considering the large-scale good that poetry can do. Of course, Heaney's relentlessly positive and affirming attitude to "life" (like his attitude to "art") makes such extremes in his own case unimaginable; but his notions of the poet's authority, and the poet's entitlement to speak on the realities that make up our common life, are by now articles of faith for a culture that rewards, as a matter of course, celebrity with authority.

Heaney's Approach: But we have all taken too much on trust the easy job-share which that hyphen in "poet-critic" effortlessly implies, as though the two parts of a complicated function worked obviously and naturally in accord, and one part simply cross-subsidized the other. This element of trust is where issues of authority reside whenever we encounter someone who writes poetry telling us about what poetry is: he or she has earned our trust, the assumption goes, and we should listen carefully to what they have to say. To pay attention to poets' criticism, then, is a way of assenting to, and respecting, what Heaney calls their "vocation". As with any matter of deep religious faith, there is little point in attempting to argue with this; but we might remember, all the same, what W. H. Auden (himself a busy critic) had to say about the whole enterprise, when he wrote in 1956 of how "I am always interested in hearing what a poet has to say about the nature of poetry, though I do not take it too seriously", and hardly spared himself in following this up:

As objective statements his definitions are never accurate, never complete and always one-sided. Not one would stand up under a rigorous analysis. In unkind moments one is almost tempted to think that all they are really saying is: "Read me. Don't read the other fellows".

Perhaps, though, this is less self-castigating than it sounds. There is a subtle, but altogether persuasive connection being established here between critical rigour and unkindness; and just as Auden's winning candour effectively gets the rigorous analysts off his case, so Heaney's gift for the humane and life- affirming makes critical disagreement with him both difficult and distasteful.

Poetic Vocation: For Heaney, the poet's vocation conditions his criticism, and speaks for its ultimate authority. In a fascinating essay on T.S. Eliot (collected here for the first time), Heaney writes of how "poetic vocation entails the disciplining of a habit of expression until it becomes fundamental to the whole conduct of a life". While Heaney characteristically underestimates the extent of Eliot's doubt on the matter of his own poetic vocation, the confidence of this connection between expression and the conduct of a life is impressively and persuasively voiced. There are no reasons for doubting that fine poets like Heaney - and other excellent poets before him - have felt a sense of "vocation"; at the same time, mediocre poets have also professed to have such a sense, and it has been far from unknown amongst the downright bad poets of all ages. "Vocation" is not enough in itself: for many are called, but few are chosen.

It is at this point, the point of comparison and evaluation in the reader's exercise of judgement, that the critical function comes into play, and here Heaney is both an excellent guide and practitioner. Finders Keepers reprints a number of critical essays which have become essential items for serious readers of the poets they examine: Heaney's insight and acuteness on W. B. Yeats, Patrick Kavanagh, Philip Larkin, Elizabeth Bishop, William Wordsworth, and John Clare are enough to give him serious critical weight, and an assured currency. Even so, the worth of this criticism is sometimes confused with its attitude, with its impeccable manners and ability to work the cultural room, and Heaney himself is not always able to prevent his admiration for writers shading in to a mode of proprietorial congratulation; in this sense, the constant juxtaposition of reminiscence and personal reflection with critical assessment is not always to Heaney's advantage.

Heaney's Erudition: It would be hard, though, to call any of the autobiographical elements in Heaney's prose idiosyncratic or distracting. On the contrary, these stretches (which may account for whole essays, or which may introduce or conclude a critical discussion) seem brilliantly of a piece with the tone of address overall, and offer scores of connections with Heaney's own poetry, assuring us that the critical and the creative functions of this mind are moving in step, and towards some wholeness of aesthetic perception and activity. In terms of rhetorical effect, Heaney's technique is a triumph.

While this achievement encourages other poet-critics, it does not necessarily vindicate their efforts. One secret of Heaney's success is the relatively conservative nature of what he has to say, and the safely canonical area in which he chooses to operate. Situating himself rhetorically above the academic fray, Heaney can afford to wear his learning lightly, while voicing critical views that have weight and consequence in the academic/critical world. And, just occasionally, we can make out the sound of points being scored in the academic power-play, as when Heaney (in 1991) affirms that "Poets are more likely to attest without self-consciousness to the living nature of poetic tradition and to the demotic life of 'the canon'", and laments that "Nowadays, undergraduates are being taught prematurely to regard the poetic heritage as an oppressive imposition". This taught "suspicion", Heaney continues, is "destructive of cultural memory when it is induced in minds without any cultural possessions whatever". It is when "a poet quotes from memory or from prejudice or in sheer admiration", he concludes, that "'the canon' is manifested in an educationally meaningful way". These sentiments (which are both correct and necessary) are coming from a poet, but also - and perhaps more meaningfully - from an Ivy League Professor.

Culture, Personality and Criticism: "Cultural memory" is where criticism, like poetry, has its true business. Yet the term itself is snared in difficulties and complications. What is unfortunate in Heaney, and distressing in some poet-critics who take his success as their example, is the failure to understand that an artist's sense of authority, and the authority residing in our common memory and culture, are not the same thing. Audiences, in this respect, have a lot to answer for: Heaney writes, for example, of their "desire to have the worth and meaning of the art confirmed" when the poet, reciting or lecturing, stands before them. There is a glitzy confusion here, which affects more poets than Heaney. It is as though a rapt audience adores through its hero the art of poetry itself, binding listeners and performer into a common identity. The celebrations here are also implicitly matters of mutual congratulation. If the true critic seldom feels this, there are good reasons why he or she cannot feel it, and cannot let it condition or influence the work in hand. And, in this case at least, it is the critics who are in the right, and the poets who are dazzled by the occasion, and misled into mistaking the authority of acclamation for the authority in culture.

"Culture" is, of course, a much fought-over word, and we use it in the singular here with a degree of deliberateness. However, culture means nothing without criticism: a series of celebrity-endorsed poets and poems does not add up to a culture, and the replacement of poetry's slow complexity of meaning and effect with a set of easy-access sound bites and pre-fabricated evaluations does not constitute criticism. Here, the poets who attempt to peddle their "personality" are parts of the problem: this holds good for the determinedly idiosyncratic as much as for the in-your-face epigrammatists, who offer two kinds of stand-up routine in which a facile cleverness does duty for thought. Too often, media-weight is the measure of authority. Of course, critical authority can and does exist; but it comes from careful judgement, engaged analysis, and reasoned argument. The language needed for that kind of authority is clear and precise; while it may sometimes be difficult, it must always be accountable to the world in which it is read, without resort to any kind of special pleading. No allowances need be made. In part, though, it is Heaney's drive towards a wholeness of personal and cultural memory, critical and creative engagement, which helps to underwrite the cultural amnesia he properly condemns.

Literature, though necessarily a private pleasure, is not ultimately "personal". Good criticism operates on this understanding, and on the good faith that language can be thought about, and thought twice about, without such thinking being overpowered by the force of anyone's personality. And this takes time, for patience is the first critical virtue. If it takes a lifetime to appreciate Wordsworth or Milton, let it: so much the better. But that lifetime must be our own, not someone else's; other people's memories of literary experience, like second-hand interpretations, cannot replace or override the real thing. Our interest in poets' criticism ought to be a critical interest, and not an aspect of our veneration for the poets concerned.

Conclusion: All of this must sound both stern and sour, and it would be difficult, to convince many readers that these reflections stem from what is actually an admiration for Heaney's prose. At his best, Heaney reads himself and others with an utterly persuasive clarity, and expresses his own gratitude to both art and life with an old-fashioned delicacy and grace: the best of this criticism is, in the best sense, indeed good for us. Yet there is a sense in which Heaney only gives us the good news about literature, and this is the prose of a man whom the audience always applauds, and for whom the uncertainties, contradictions, difficulties, and ambiguities of language and memory are always going to be reassuringly resolved in the end. Such a resolution - which may indeed be a necessity for the poet in Heaney - sometimes tells fibs to the critic, for whom the audience's applause seems to constitute a further confirmation of integrity and vocation. These "appreciations", in other words, seem often to bask in the knowledge of their own appreciation. However we admire the performance, it is less critical exertion and all-out struggle than it is a relaxed lap of honour. At a time when too many poets are poet-critics, and when even the most modestly gifted feel obliged to possess a personal ars poetica, there are good reasons for refusing to take Heaney as an example.

Heaney's Concept of Redressing Effects of Poetry

Introduction: The more we understand about poetry the better we can appreciate its unique contribution to our lives. As men and women committed to learning and advancing a Biblical worldview, we must not neglect the benefits poetry can bring to our lives. Poetry has much to teach us – about the deeper significance of ordinary things, the workings of the soul, the nature of true pleasure and the meaning of delight, and the power of artful language.

Further, reading and meditating on poetry can make us better readers overall, and more acute observers of the world around us. As one whose calling is to be an interpreter of God's Word, I shall be forever grateful for my undergraduate training and ongoing studies in poetry, for they have been of much help in the exegetical and hermeneutical work of isolating units of meaning and interpreting texts. As important as this, however, has been the value poetry has been in helping me to understand the human condition, become a more careful observer of the world, and find satisfaction in words and images. But, in order to gain the benefits poetry can afford us, we must apply ourselves to learning how poetry works, and what the work of poetry is. Poets can sometimes be our best guides in this quest for understanding, particularly when their poems lead us behind the veil of poetry's mysteries and reveal to us the inner workings of the craft. Seamus Heaney, the Irish Nobel laureate, is an especially helpful and altogether willing guide in this cause. In many of his poems and all his prose works he invites us to consider the work of poetry from the inside. Heaney helps us to understand the poet's sense of calling to this work; shows us what work a poem can do; gives us insight into the actual work of making poems; and helps us to understand how good poems work to accomplish their objective. All these poetic features are claimed by Heaney in his Redress of Poetry. The Redress of Poetry is a series of lectures given by Seamus Heaney at Oxford; in all of them, he examines poetry and how it can be strong enough to help the reader, to act as an equal force to the life lived by the reader. He looks at all kinds of poets - Dylan Thomas, Christopher Marlowe, Yeats, Wilde and Bishop - and of course talks about his own position as a Catholic from the Northern Ireland living in Dublin. In all the lectures Heaney is wonderfully informal and funny, while still solidly getting across how important and vital these writers are. The lecture on Thomas alone is a great lesson on writing and authenticity, and the last one, "Frontiers of Writing", makes a strong case that a nation is imagined by writers first - that language, poetry, opens up possibilities in nations as well as in people. Though he knows that words can't do everything, Heaney's affection for writing and writers is convincing.

Heaney's imaginative power: Heaney's redressing of poetry is vividly imaginative, whilst being firmly rooted in reality. Seamus Heaney is described as imaginative and honest whilst enabling him to share his views on the political and social situation in Ireland at that time. Through the use of metaphors and strong imagery aided by his choice of form and structure Heaney is able to appeal to a wide range of people. The use of etymology, the study of words, furthers this.

His approach to Redress of poetry is all nostalgic as a result of Heaney's upbringing and his family situation. Heaney says that poetry should be used to voice his feelings of insecurity after the birth of his first child. Within this section in 'Blackberry Picking' Heaney uses the childhood tradition of picking blackberries to express his adult view on how naively hopeful he was as a child. The poem is used as a metaphor to explain that even as an adult that a recurring delusion, where there is a perpetual consciousness that life, love and youth do not 'keep' but the temptation for another try is always succumbed to. Heaney's use of metaphors in order to relate a current feeling through a childhood incident gives evidence of not only his feelings but also is able to be related to by many who feel they are unable to express their views in similar situations. Heaney is able to appeal to these readers, through showing his feelings of worthlessness and dejection after the birth of a child, through the use of poetry. Heaney's poetry is described as being 'rooted in reality' because he is able to express his truthful emotions 'I hoped they'd keep, knew they would not' despite the social constraints of having to feel ecstatic after the birth of a child.

Poetry and emotions: Heaney's success in showing his emotions is as a result of the strong imaginative imagery 'our palms sticky as Bluebeard's'. This use of strong imagery shows Heaney's desire to create a perfect portrait of the image within his mind. Heaney uses lavish description in order to create the 'lust for picking'. By juxtaposing this with his negative view 'lovely canfuls smelt of rot' he heightens the impact of his condescending adult perspective of how things never live up to our expectations. His own poetry apart from the critical work of redress of poetry asserts this fact. The poem 'Requiem for the Croppies' describes rebel farmers in 1798 striving to save their land in a vicious battle with English armies. Heaney uses the poem to give voice to those to whom history has denied. The use of a possessive pronoun 'we' shows the reader which side they are encouraged to identify with, reinforced by the lack of rhyme scheme to show their deficiency of army knowledge. The poem is inventive in portraying a scene often forgotten 'we moved quick and sudden in our own country'. It also shows Heaney's imagination in recreating a full picture of a scene based before his time in situations Heaney has never experienced. Heaney is able to show the reality of death in 'they buried us without shroud or coffin' whilst praising their spirit in dying for those in Ireland in reference to 'Requiem' in the title.

Poetry and politics: In each of Heaney's poems is an underlying implication of Heaney's political views. In 'Requiem for the Croppies' Heaney refers to the 'barley grew up out of the grave' and in doing so reflects on how little the Irish in Ulster appreciate the martyrs who died for the cause. In the poems throughout 'Wintering Out' Heaney embellishes this, particularly in 'Gifts of Rain'. At first read the poem regards a simple river akin to the poem 'Broagh'. However, in the line 'I cock my ear / at an absence' Heaney refers to those who have died and have worked to uniting Ireland without violence. He asks for help to go back in time to hear advice from those who have made a difference in uniting Ireland 'Soft voices of the dead are whispering by the shore'. The use of the central imagery throughout the poem of water reflects the nature of being purged, to come out clean with a fresh beginning. Heaney's ability to be 'firmly rooted in reality' is most clearly shown in each poem through his ability to connect everyday landscapes such as the 'River Moyola' to the political situation in Ireland.

Seamus Heaney and Irish Tradition: In the poems featured in 'Wintering Out' Heaney uses several examples of a tradition known in Irish poetry as dinnshenchas. Through this Heaney explores the linguistic elements and lore of a place name. In the poem 'Anahorish', Heaney explores the place name of where he went to school as a child. Heaney's analysis of the name's phonetics, 'soft gradient / of consonant, vowel meadow' leads him to imagine the landscape to which the name was attached. He believes the rise and fall of the word over the consonants reflects the gradient of the land, rising and falling. This is further embellished upon throughout the poem 'Gifts of Rain. Heaney analyses the phonetic sounds of the name of the local river 'Moyola' , 'the tawny guttural water, spells itself: Moyola'. The name reflects the undulating notion of the water's movements. Heaney shows through his use of etymology his imagination in reflecting sounds with place names and imagining the histories that add to this. In connecting this with the political situation of Ireland, Heaney shows how by taking an elaborate concept behind a place name one can resolutely connect this to our lives today.

Evidence for Heaney's ability to connect a place name and the political situation in Ireland is most identifiably showing 'Broagh'. Heaney connects both the linguistic etymology and the political views within the poem to give an underlying message only accessible by the Irish. In taking a simple concept such as a river the poem is taken at face value to be regarding a 'riverbank'. Heaney uses the word 'Broagh' and compares this to the landscape of a riverbank. However, the poem title 'Broagh' meaning riverbank is unable to be voiced by the English as is pronounced 'bruach' in Irish, 'ended almost suddenly / like the last gh the strangers found difficult to manage'. In using words of an Irish only dialect such as 'rigs' and 'docken', Heaney isolates the English reader to unite Ireland through linguistics, "Broagh is a sound native to Ireland, common to unionist and Nationalist but unavailable to the English" (Heaney).

Poetry as calling Poetry for Seamus Heaney is his life's calling. In "Digging", one of his first published works, he likens his calling as a poet to the work of his father and grandfather. He looks upon his father's work of digging potatoes and his grandfather's labor digging peat as noble callings, but not right for him. Indeed, he seems to regard himself as not of the same caliber of "stuff" to follow in their footsteps. Instead, he will take up another traditional Irish vocation, that of the poet. He will dig – that is, make his mark on the earth and provide for his needs – as a poet.

But his work in this vocation will also allow him to "dig up" mysteries and delightful images to benefit others. This sense of the poet's calling Heaney explores more fully in "The Diviner." Here he presents "poetry as divination" and the poet likened unto one who uses a forked stick to divine for water. As he wrote in an essay entitled, "Feeling Into Worlds," "The diviner resembles the poet in his function of making contact with what lies hidden, and in his ability to make palpable what was sensed or raised." As the diviner needs a forked stick to discover hidden water, the poet needs the tools of his trade, and a certain confidence that hidden mysteries and meanings actually exist, in order to bring those freshets of meaning to the surface.

This same idea can be seen in "The Rain Stick," where the poet leads us to discover worlds of water, and all the images and sentiments associated with those worlds, in the very place where no water exists whatsoever, the hollowed out branch of a cactus plant in which seeds and grit rush from one end to the other as the stick is upended.

Few poets – including Heaney – are able to make their living entirely by writing verse. However, this does not prevent their taking up poetry as their primary calling, the means by which they seek to realize their reason for being, and through which they hope to make the world a little more expansive and meaningful for the rest of us. Heaney regards the poet's work, as he wrote in The Redress of Poetry, to be that of "[bringing] human existence into a fuller life":

We go to poetry; we go to literature in general, to be forwarded within ourselves. The best it can do is to give us an experience that is like foreknowledge of certain things which we already seem to be remembering. What is at work in this most original and illuminating poetry is the mind's capacity to conceive a new plane of regard for itself, a new scope for its own activity.

The poet whose work accomplishes this objective makes an extremely useful contribution to the rest of us.

The Function of Poetry But what does poetry do? What does it achieve? Two of Seamus Heaney's objectives in the work of poetry are to dare and to delight. In "Digging" we see this idea of the poet as daredevil only in the background. It is skillfully suggested in the final stanza, which repeats the first stanza except for the omission of the words, "snug as a gun." Heaney grew up in strife-torn Northern Ireland, and was himself torn with what his own role should be in view of "the troubles." Should he just retire from nation's pain and be a rural farmer, like his forebears? A noble and traditional calling, to be sure, but hardly the kind of work that will redeem a nation. Should he become a revolutionary? But can violence against one's neighbors ever accomplish true redemption? His refusal to follow either of these paths would cause him trouble and pain at various times in his life. But by becoming a poet – a filidh, in the Celtic tradition – he keeps his Irish roots firm and takes up a calling that, he believes, has redemptive potential. And by omitting the phrase, "snug as a gun," in the closing stanza he makes us mindful, by the absence of this image, which is nevertheless in his mind, that he believes his poetry can make its own "revolutionary" contribution to his nation's future.

In many of his poems he dares his readers to find in verse a way out of their present, stultifying existence by delighting them with the experience of new worlds – water where there is none ("The Rain Stick") or where one has to search carefully and diligently to find it ("The Diviner"). He challenges us to engage our imagination with ordinary things in order to discover extraordinary new meanings and possibilities. He dares his readers to let their minds expand to consider new worlds beyond their present, and to hope for better things, even as he delights them with remarkable and even unforgettable images. As he wrote in The Redress of Poetry,

An exuberant rhythm, a display of metrical virtuosity, some rising intellectual ground successfully surmounted – experiencing things like these gratifies and furthers the range of the mind's and the body's pleasures, and helps the reader to obey the old command: nosce teipsum. Know thyself.

The techniques of Poets In order to fulfill his calling and accomplish his purpose to dare and to delight, the poet must become a careful observer of the world around him, able to associate images of various kinds with one another and to link these with other images and ideas in order to reach into the soul of the reader. We see him doing this in a remarkable way in "Digging." His father digging in the flower bed recalls an image of his father twenty years earlier digging potatoes. This connects with an image of his grandfather digging peat, with all the sights and sounds each image suggests. Then to connect their work with his own – the work of poetry – accomplishes the effect of rolling all the nobility and nuance, sweat and struggle, harvest and happiness of his father's and grandfather's vocations into his own choice of work. In so doing he invites the reader to consider his or her own sense of calling and connectedness to the past, present, and future.

The images that appear in Heaney's poetry come from his rural past, experiences he has known, Ireland's history and troubles, and everyday objects. Like the diviner the poet must believe there is in every image that presents itself to his mind a refreshing truth to be discovered. So, "nervous, but professionally/Unfussed", he takes up the tools of his trade – the "squat pen" between his thumb and finger – and begins to walk the terrain of the image, waiting for the "pluck" of what lies beneath to announce its presence.

The working mechanism of poetry The challenge then becomes to relate that "pluck" in an image that will be familiar to the reader, so that what the poet experiences can be the reader's experience as well. But it is not enough just to leave the reader saying, "I get it." The poet wants the reader not just to see what he sees or know what he has come to know; he wants the reader to feel all the excitement, wonder, pain, anxiety, joy, or delight that he himself experienced in the process of making these associations of images. In order to accomplish this the poet draws on subtle devices – such as the slant-rhyme scheme in "The Diviner" and the careful alliteration of "s's" and "ck" sounds to replicate the slushing and trickling of water in "The Rain Stick." A poet must have "[a]n awareness of his own poetic process, and a trust in the possibility of his poetry" in order to bring his art to life ("Canticles to the Earth"). At the end of "Digging" we're left with a kind of curiosity about the poet's sense of calling by that modified image: Is he not going to use his poetry in a revolutionary manner? Or will his revolution be more subtle? He lets us know elsewhere that his purpose is clearly the latter, when he writes of "poetry's high potential, its function as an agent of possible transformation, of evolution towards that more radiant and generous life which the imagination desires" (The Redress of Poetry).

Good poetry can thus expand our imagination, enlarge our world, enrich our experience, and enlighten our worldview. Because of the power of poetry to capture the affections, communicate ideas in images, and point people toward new possibilities, we who are committed to the Biblical worldview could realize much benefit by devoting at least part of our time in this endeavor to developing our ability to read and enjoy poetry. Seamus Heaney's work can be an excellent place to begin or further refine your skills in this endeavor.

Conclusion: Heaney's poetry is referred to as 'vividly imaginative, whilst being firmly rooted in reality', a sentence of which is essential in understanding Heaney's poetry. Throughout each collection Heaney takes a central idea of 'childhood' or 'place names' and connects these through his own emotions to his strong feelings on the disastrous political situation in Ireland, 'I am afraid'. However, The strong emotions Heaney feels connected through a central face value theme is most strongly shown through Heaney's evocative imagery, metaphors and structure. Heaney's poetry endeavours to be 'vivid' through using strong personal messages that relate to the reader but succeeds most readily by combining this with the subtlety of using a common theme. All the above features in Heaney's poetry shows that as a poet, Heaney himself has achieved the redressing effects of poetry.

The power of poetry is supreme so it creates a balance in the environment, discuss.

In his essay "Redress of Poetry" Heaney brings poetry's creative role to light. Besides other function of poetry, he especially evaluates poetry as a balancing force. He finds support for his views about imaginative literature, which poetry is, in Plato's theory of Ideas.

Plato has banished poets from his Republic, he says that they take us away from the ideal but Aristotle is of the view that poets are essential to keep balance in society. Aristotle insisted that the poet takes us towards the ideal not away from ideal. To support his argument Heaney quotes Robert Frost's poem "Directive".

The poem is about a house that the children make with sand. They try to put in it all the comfort of a good real house. It means that poetry is an alternative to the world of actuality. Thus poetry serves to show us that perfection which we want to achieve. Actually poetry is a link between the real and ideal. Poetry takes us to Paradise while we stay on earth. This is how poetry strikes a balance between the real and the ideal.

Many critics say that poetry has nothing to do with real world and poets have been considered as idle creators, who are always lost in their flights of imagination. But Heaney says that the world of reality and the world of imagination are two different worlds but they depend upon each other and they reinforce each other. He gives an example that once poets wrote the tales of flying carpets with the help of their imagination and today as a result now man only can fly in sky in aeroplanes but he has also conquered the space.

Heaney considers poets as a positive influence upon the people as poetry strikes a balance between the suffering of real world and human aspiration with its power of consolation. Poetry builds for us our world of consolation. We live in the world which is given to us. We did not choose it. But in our imagination we create our own world. That is the world of poetry. Poetry shows us the glimpse of those things which we miss in our life. This is consolation. Aristotle says that poetry performs catharsis and purifies human mind. Arnold went to the extent of saying that

All that now goes in the name of religion or philosophy will be replaced by poetry. He says poetry will show man the right path and it will bring consolation to man. Poetry has a power of sustaining man in difficulties. Here, he quotes Hardy's poem, Afterwards, he says that the poet tries to answer the question raised by life. Life creates anxieties; Poetry tries to relieve them. Sidney wrote in "Apology for Poetry" Poetry strengthens the faculty which is the organ of the moral nature of men, in the same manners as exercise strengthens a limb.

Many people say that poets should write revolutionary poetry to shock the minds of people. And if anyone is writing he must write to evaluate the benefits of his state and as well as to promote the political views of people. There must be a balance between narrow nationalism and humanism.

He considers poets human first and patriots after that Here, he quotes W.B Yeats an Irish poet, who in one of his poems remembers the Irishmen who were killed in the rising of 1916. But he is also sorry for the Englishmen who died in the fight. Talking about the humanitarian zeal of poetry, Heaney says, that Yeats considers both enemies and friends as men. Heaney says, this is what poetry conveys to us, every man whether black or white, Irish or English has the same feelings, passion and blood. He says that poetry promotes the love of humanity while Politics divide.

Heaney rejects the "Obedience to the force of gravity". He says in Politics we are always carried away by the force of gravity. The point which the poet wants to take side with stronger or weaker side. The poet should go with the merit of case. This is how there would be a balance between nationalism and humanism.

Many critics only emphasized an aesthetic role of poetry, they were of the opinion that poetry only reflects life. This opinion brings a only reflects life. This opinion brings a blot on constructive role of poetry that it cannot serve society as it is not practical. But Heaney says that poetry does more than reflecting life. Poetry is no longer just an aesthetic piece of art, it's real value lies in its political usefulness and practical efficiency. But the impact of poetry is not practical, it is psychological. It is most important function of poetry to violent practically. Heaney says that if poetry becomes practical, it will not remain poetry, it will become propaganda. He says that poetry shows possibilities; it shows what is desirable and politician and other people from different sections the hidden hints in poetry. Thus, poetry gives us wisdom through delight. Giving pleasure and entertainment is the main function of poetry which satisfy our aesthetic sense. Poetry entertain us with its beautiful words, rhyme, and thought. If the thought would not be impressive and helpful, poetry would lose its value. Thus poetry entertains us with it's musicality and aesthetic values and also serves as a pragmatic force through Psychological impact with the help of useful thoughts.

Heaney tries to demonstrate that poetry has a function in life, it serves as a balancing force. Poetry does not lead towards extremism. It shows us right way and leads towards perfection. If there are sufferings and miseries in life, poetry consoles us. Poetry deals well with our responsibilities to a nation but also infuses in us a spirit of humanism. It is poetry which is the real motive power in life. In his essay "Redress of Poetry" Heaney brings poetry's creative role to light. Besides other function of poetry, he especially evaluates poetry as a balancing force. He finds support for his views about imaginative literature, which poetry is, in Plato's theory of Ideas.

Plato has banished poets from his Republic, he says that they take us away from the ideal but Aristotle is of the view that poets are essential to keep balance in society. Aristotle insisted that the poet takes us towards the ideal not away from ideal. To support his argument Heaney quotes Robert Frost's poem "Directive".

The poem is about a house that the children make with sand. They try to put in it all the comfort of a good real house. It means that poetry is an alternative to the world of actuality. Thus poetry serves to show us that perfection which we want to achieve.

Actually poetry is a link between the real and ideal. Poetry takes us to Paradise while we stay on earth. This is how poetry strikes a balance between the real and the ideal.

Many critics say that poetry has nothing to do with real world and poets have been considered as idle creators, who are always lost in their flights of imagination. But Heaney says that the world of reality and the world of imagination are two different worlds but they depend upon each other and they reinforce each other. He gives an example that once poets wrote the tales of flying carpets with the help of their imagination and today as a result now man only can fly in sky in aeroplanes but he has also conquered the space.

Heaney considers poets as a positive influence upon the people as poetry strikes a balance between the suffering of real world and human aspiration with its power of consolation. Poetry builds for us our world of consolation. We live in the world which is given to us. We did not choose it. But in our imagination we create our own world. That is the world of poetry. Poetry shows us the glimpse of those things which we miss in our life. This is consolation. Aristotle says that poetry performs catharsis and purifies human mind. Arnold went to the extent of saying that

All that now goes in the name of religion or philosophy will be replaced by poetry. He says poetry will show man the right path and it will bring consolation to man. Poetry has a power of sustaining man in difficulties. Here, he quotes Hardy's poem, Afterwards, he says that the poet tries to answer the question raised by life. Life creates anxieties; Poetry tries to relieve them. Sidney wrote in "Apology for Poetry" Poetry strengthens the faculty which is the organ of the moral nature of men, in the same manners as exercise strengthens a limb.

Many people say that poets should write revolutionary poetry to shock the minds of people. And if anyone is writing he must write to evaluate the benefits of his state and as well as to promote the political views of people. There must be a balance between narrow nationalism and humanism.

He considers poets human first and patriots after that Here, he quotes W.B Yeats an Irish poet, who in one of his poems remembers the Irishmen who were killed in the rising of 1916. But he is also sorry for the Englishmen who died in the fight. Talking about the humanitarian zeal of poetry, Heaney says, that Yeats considers both enemies and friends as men. Heaney says, this is what poetry conveys to us, every man whether black or white, Irish or English has the same feelings, passion and blood. He says that poetry promotes the love of humanity while Politics divide.

Heaney rejects the "Obedience to the force of gravity". He says in Politics we are always carried away by the force of gravity. The point which the poet wants to take side with stronger or weaker side. The poet should go with the merit of case. This is how there would be a balance between nationalism and humanism.

Many critics only emphasized an aesthetic role of poetry, they were of the opinion that poetry only reflects life. This opinion brings a only reflects life. This opinion brings a blot on constructive role of poetry that it cannot serve society as it is not practical. But Heaney says that poetry does more than reflecting life. Poetry is no longer just an aesthetic piece of art, it's real value lies in its political usefulness and practical efficiency. But the impact of poetry is not practical, it is psychological. It is most important function of poetry to violent practically. Heaney says that if poetry becomes practical, it will not remain poetry, it will become propaganda. He says that poetry shows possibilities; it shows what is desirable and politician and other people from different sections the hidden hints in poetry. Thus, poetry gives us wisdom through delight. Giving pleasure and entertainment is the main function of poetry which satisfy our aesthetic sense. Poetry entertains us with its beautiful words, rhyme, and thought. If the thought would not be impressive and helpful, poetry would lose its value. Thus poetry entertains us with it's musicality and aesthetic values and also serves as a pragmatic force through Psychological impact with the help of useful thoughts.

Heaney tries to demonstrate that poetry has a function in life, it serves as a balancing force. Poetry does not lead towards extremism. It shows us right way and leads towards perfection. If there are sufferings and miseries in life, poetry consoles us. Poetry deals well with our responsibilities to a nation but also infuses in us a spirit of humanism. It is poetry which is the real motive power in life.

How far is Seamus Heaney justified in seeking the redress of poetry? (P.U. 2005)

The subject that Seamus Heaney has treated, the redress of poetry, is not a new subject. The nature and purpose of poetry has been a subject of practical importance to everyone who has an interest in poetry. Heaney builds different assumptions for the redress of poetry. The question is that whether, poetry is a useful activity in society; whether poetry is an aesthetic or a pragmatic work.

There have been a lot of discussions whether poets and poetry are of any use in the complexities and miseries of life or not some are of the view that the poets are worthless people and some condemned them as idle people. As Plato is among the haters of poets and poetry. He had banished the poets from his 'Republic'.

Aristotle was of the view that the poets are essential to keep balance in society and they took us towards the ideal. There were others also who kept defending poetry against all kinds of objections for instance, Sydney asserted that 'The poet takes us to the ideal'. So did Shelley support poetry because poetry teaches the perfect? Oscar wild said that life should imitate art because art presents the perfect. Arnold went to the extent of saying that all that now goes in the name of religion or philosophy will be replaced by poetry. Sidney wrote in "Apology for Poetry" "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the World".

Heaney makes a fresh attempt to defend poetry in this age of science and technology when everyone is becoming a utilitarian and even education has been commercialized. Poetry and Philosophy are now considered idle mental luxuries while commerce, computer and business administration have been given the name of education. Heaney starts his thesis by distinguishing two planes of existence. Here he quotes George Herbert's poem 'Pulley; which suggests that the mind and aspiration of the human beings turned towards the heavenly in spite of all the pleasures and penalties of being upon the earth. This can be done by poetic sixth sense which provides a passage from the domain of the matter of fact; into the domain of the imagination. Here Heaney also quotes the same explanation of religious experience by John Donne. Donne says God throws down in order to rise up. It s a religious paradox that sin brings man closer to God. This is how Heaney concludes that these paradoxes are captured only by poetry.

Heaney is of the opinion that the world of reality and the world of imagination are two different worlds but they depend upon each other and they reinforce each other and this is the subject of his poem "Squarings". From this story, Heaney concludes that there are two worlds, our everyday world and the world of visionary crew. Heaney keeps moving between the world of fact and the world of imagination. He quotes from Pinskey to support his argument. Pinskey in "Responsibilities of The Poet" says that the poet has a responsibility to answer. He is to answer the question raised by life. Life raises questions and poet gives answers.

Seamus Heaney defends poetry on the ground of utility also. He says poetry focuses from delight to wisdom. He says the world of poetry is an answer to the world of fact. Life creates anxieties; Poetry tries to relieve them. Life disturbs but poetry consoles. It shows man the right path and poetry has a power of sustaining man in difficulties. These are the pragmatic advantages of poetry. Heaney also defends poetry on the level of its aesthetic utility. We get pleasure out of words. Man comes to wisdom through delight, not to delight through wisdom. Man studies poetry to amuse himself and to satisfy his soul but in this psychological state he gets wisdom as well. Thus, poetry is a pleasurable study of life.

Poetry can very pleasantly and easily explore the subjects which are generally denied by social, racial, sexual, and political prejudices and all this is done through the linguistic medium. But the poet has to take care that while discussing these issues poetry should not be sacrificed, Heaney says that the poets should not narrow down their scope by limiting poetry to certain dimensions of time and space. It should be free from any restriction. Some demand that the poets should write against the common trend to shock the minds of the people. They should write revolutionary poetry. But the impact of poetry is not practical, it is psychological. Poetry does not force man to go and fight. But poetry shows what is wrong and what is right. If poetry becomes practical, according to Heaney, it will not remain poetry, it will become a propaganda. It is not the nature of poetry. Heaney quotes Wallace Stevens in order to evaluate his argument. Wallace says! Poetry creates an alternative world to the world of fact. Poetry suggests what life ought to be. Poetry makes sketches and plans. It shows possibilities; it shows what is desirable.

Moreover, Poetry is about man. Poetry promotes, love of men. Poetry shows that all men are human beings and they deserve sympathy. But politics tells us that some people deserve sympathy and some deserve our wrath. Poetry speaks of love for all people: Politics forces people to kill other people. In fact politics divides men. If poetry becomes politics then it will not remain poetry, it will become a propaganda and in this way it will divide humanity into friends and foes. For instance, the Irish men who were killed in the rising of 1916. But he is also sorry for the Englishmen who died in the fight. Talking about the humanitarian zeal of poetry. Heaney says, that zeals considers both enemies and friends as men. He does not discriminate between the Irish People and the English people. Both were fighting for their ideals. That is exactly what poetry conveys to us, everyman whether black or white; Irish or English has the same feeling, passions and blood.

Heaney raises an interesting point here which is also shared by Edward Said in "Culture and Imperialism" that the sensibility of the people of the colonies is coloured by the sensibility of the imperial masters. As the Irish condemn the English but they use the English medium. Imperialism has inculcated in their minds a culture that they tried to reject. But this is also a very healthy experience. The Irish hate the English, still they love Shakespeare and Keats.

To conclude, Heaney tries to demonstrate that poetry has a function in life, though not ostentatious. The poet does nothing on purpose, but poetry is a medium which by its very nature serves a purpose. This can be understood with reference to a statement by Wordsworth that his poetry has a purpose. It is not meaningless activity. But this purpose is not imposed upon poetry. Since Wordsworth lives a purposeful life, therefore whatever he does has a purpose in it. Heaney believes that poetry cannot be subjected to any particular direction and not limited to any certain aspect of society. He emphasises that poets should elevate their services on universal level and poetry should be above all racial, social and political prejudices. This is how he evaluates brighter sides and aspects of poetry in his essay 'Redress of Poetry"

Heaney's prose style is aphorist like Bacon, philosophical like Russell; but antithetical and unique in its own right, discuss the statement.

Seamus Heaney an Irish poet and writer was awarded the noble Prize in 1995. In the course of his careers, he contributed to the promotions of artistic and educational cause, both in Ireland and abroad.

Heaney's approach is rational, scientific and it is imaginative as well. This is a paradox that Heaney is scientific and imaginative at the sometime. But he does convey his thought in an impressive and convincing way. He seeks balance and does justice to both reality and imagination. He lives to convey his thought and meaning through appropriate language and words and he avoids all superfluous expressions. His approach is anecdotal. Heaney's style is that he begins by giving examples or by telling stories. He develops an argument with the help of stories, as he begins his essay "The Redress Of Poetry" with the story of fantastic crew from some other world arriving on the earth.

Heaney's style is a blend of the classical and the romantic. He also has an intuitive approach. He very much bases his arguments on the sixth sense though he is a practical thinker. Thus like the romantics, he believes in institution and like the neo-classics, he believes in reason and practice. He is also didactic. He believes that the poet has a responsibility and that is to respond the questions raised by life. He believes that poetry gives lessons. This is Heaney's mysticism. Heaney is an idealist too. He is of the view that poetry gives an alternative view of life—a view of what life ought to be is desirable as well as possible.

Heaney's approach is historical. He sees the issues of poetry in the historical perspective. For instance, he starts the essay with Plato's condemnation of poetry. Another aspect of his classical approach is that he believes in authority. He quotes other writers, critics and poets in his favour. This is a classical style of argumentation. His arguments are based upon other's views besides his own reason. There are many textual references in his writings, such as references to the poems of Robert Frost, Hardy, George Herbert and his own poetry. There are allusions from Poetry as well as from prose. Heaney's well known for his antithetical style which has also been very popular among the schoolmen. Heaney is very much conscious of Paradoxes- "Creators/Creative, heaven/earth, soul/body, eternity/Home, life/death, Christ/man, grace/guilt, virtue/sin." All these antitheses help Heaney a lot in his defence of poetry.

Heaney's Prose style has the qualities of precision and meaning through appropriate language and words. His use of proper words in proper places is in a straight forward manner. His prose style is aphoristic But his aphorisms are not as striking as those of Bacon. Still there is a glimpse of his terseness of thought. As he says;

"Poetry is comprehensive of events but not itself productive of new events"
"Life raises questions; Poetry answers them".
"Poetry leads from delight to wisdom".

These kinds of paradoxes, balances, counter balances, comparisons and contrasts are typical of Heaney's prose style. He also appeals to the common sense of the everyday practice of life to bring a point home. As he says we condemn English by using the English language .Through language and Media we have already been influenced by what we condemn. This creates another Paradox, and it is a culture paradox. Heaney uses linguistic paradox as well as a culture paradox. Heaney talks of force can be physically expressed as one shaking with excitement. Like Eliot Heaney also believes in a personal mind and a communal mind. The two become one, as in the case of Irish Poets, Poetry and Politics become one .The individual poet has the same feelings of liberation does not become a propaganda.

Heaney's approach is partly religious, partly intuitive, partly anecdotal and partly rational. Thus it is a blend of the neo-Classic, the Scientific, the romantic and the pragmatic. He is versatile and practical thinker. He, unlike the schoolmen, is not dogmatic. He talks, argues analyses and critically evaluates the commonly held beliefs and then gives own philosophy the basis of the opinions of different critics, poets and writers and all this makes his essay "The Redress Of Poetry" a literary achievement.

Seamus Heaney discusses the concept of poetry from a number of angels, discuss.

The essays in The Redress of Poetry have more cumulative force than individual character. Though seldom striking in themselves, they are convincing in their belief that poetic invention "represents not a submission to the conditions of [the] world but a creative victory over them." If Heaney does not have the original prose voice of Auden or Eliot, he has maintained for English poetry a responsive, gratified and radical ear. Redress of Poetry exhibits a number of themes, critical concerns and stylistic prose bytes. To achieve this, Heaney also used many intertexual references.

For example, he refers to Herbert. Herbert is an unexpected model, coming from the man who, more than anyone, speaks for civilization and decency in contemporary Ulster, a more polemicized hero seems to be in order. But Heaney has always had a bittersweet relationship to his community. In 1975, he made an early appearance on the international stage with his poem "Punishment." This was around the time that the IRA began tarring and feathering Catholic women who dated British soldiers. Heaney compared those women's bodies to that of a neolithic adulteress who had been stoned to death and dumped in a bog. He concludes:

My poor scapegoat, I almost love you but would have cast, I know, the stones of silence.
I am the artful voyeur of your brain's exposed,

This is a far cry from Herbert's clever machinations on Anglican theology. The choice of Herbert as a model is also a flagrant defiance of the poet with whom Heaney is too often compared: W.B. Yeats. (It takes Heaney five pages to use the Anglo-Irishman's name.) This is understandable: enormous difference stands between the photographic mind that captured "Punishment" and the misty painter's eyes that looked into Victorian medievalism and saw a Celtic Revival. We shall see whether Heaney can actually become Herbert, and what effect that attempt will have on his writing. In any case, he is, now in position to make the attempt.

Seamus Heaney wrote of the need to bring about a redress of poetry in modern poets. The concern indicated is the place that poetry should strive to attain in a socio-political setting. The idea is that poetry should function in redress of balance to unbalanced forces acting upon the world of the poet. This is such that the prevailing sentiments of the poet's surroundings should shape and bend the nature of the focus of their writing. For example, Heaney states that an American poet writing during the Vietnam period should concern themselves with poetry that addresses the existing unrest in such a way as to bear a standard for the position of the author within the conflict also. In this the poet unsheathes his pen in the same manner as the soldier lifts his rifle, and towards the same goal, i.e. the elevation through victory, or the ode that praises it, of the position for which the warrior-poet strives. Thus the American "wave[s] the flag rhetorically", just as the English poet, the German poet, or any other nationality elicits support and response from its poets as patriots of its cause. Though this can easily be anti-governmental as well, and poets are supposed to establish redress through support of revolution where that imbalance is detected also. Poetry, and the act of redress is a system of weights and counterweights, or to be more accurate reality and counter-reality. The poet sets up through his words a disparate view of a particular situation than would be readily apparent by having merely observed the situation. This creation of a counter-reality does in no way suggest a conflict with the presented reality and the observed reality, these two need not be placed into such direct opposition.

However, the reality suggested by a poet through their work should highlight a position in order to more easily show a concurrent yet different position, which the poet presents as a better scenario. This presentation need not be explicit. Nowhere in poetry must the poet in true expository style state the redress he wishes to make and support his position. It is up to the reader in trying to gain a true understanding, not only of the poet's words, but of his position, to justify that position via the vision given him by the poet's words. Perhaps a good place to begin in examining the issue of redress in poetry would be in Heaney's own work "Requiem for the Croppies". This is a poem that deals with a people's need for redress, which is actively sought through warfare. This position can be gleaned by careful study of the poem, and is never expressly stated by Heaney.

In this particular piece, Heaney is attempting to speak to an audience about the difficulties he personally has observed in his native Ireland. To do this he utilizes the language which would be a common parlance for that region, and sets up with his readers a familiarity based on language between the reader, and the subjects of the poem. Heaney is careful, unlike some of his contemporaries and most of the literary models of excellence to refuse obscurity in his poem. This is of course obscurity both of language, and of reference. Such things, though they admittedly show a great knowledge, and creative use of the language would only serve in this instance to distance the reader from the subject Heaney is presenting. This linguistic style is also a matter of redress, and stems in large part from Heaney's conscious or unconscious desire not to distance himself from his origins, but rather to exemplify them through the elegant simplicity of language. The redress of poetry is an issue that Heaney is remarkably adapted to presenting.

Throughout the 10 lectures reverberates the overall theme of redress — in its dictionary sense meaning reparation, and in one of its obsolete definitions suggesting "a course where something unhindered, yet directed, can sweep ahead into its full potential." The first poem cited, Robert Frost's allegorical "Directive," commences with the hard monosyllabics of desolation, "Back out of all this now too much for us," but glimpses nevertheless a potential order of things "beyond confusion" and implies "that the imaginative transformation of human life is the means by which we can most truly grasp and comprehend it." Poetry, Heaney states, is essentially an answer to the conditions of the world given in poetry's own terms rather than the language of uplift. "To effect the redress of poetry, it is not necessary for the poet to be aiming deliberately at social or political change." Which, of course, does not mean the poet dodges his civic responsibilities; only that poetry reconciles two orders, the practical and the poetic, the former teaching us how to live, the latter how to live more abundantly. When Mr. Mandela's writing rises to a noble statement, that statement has been earned. It has behind it the full weight of a life endured for the sake of the principles it affirms.

Consequently, there is genuine healing power rather than mere rhetorical uplift in Mr. Mandela's espousal of the aims of the Durban conference, and the conference could well adopt as its sacred text something he wrote in his book, "Long Walk to Freedom": "It was during those long and lonely years that my hunger for the freedom of my own people became a hunger for the freedom of all people, black and white. I knew as well as I knew anything that the oppressor must be liberated just as surely as the oppressed. I am not truly free if I am taking away someone else's freedom, just as surely as I am not free when my freedom is taken away from me. The oppressed and the oppressor alike are robbed of their humanity."

With such personal, individual empathy, Mr. Mandela shows himself to be an artist of human possibility. He might well be called an activist, but he has a visionary understanding and would surely agree with the conviction that sustains. Highly recommended for anyone to whom poetry is important and feels that most criticism seems to miss the point. These lectures were originally conceived and delivered as individual pieces, but as a collection they also provide an account and defence of Heaney's philosophy of poetry. Heaney deals with poems from the point of view of a reader to whom poetry is important as a means of understanding and coping with life — for whom, as he says, poetry is "strong enough to help". As literary criticism they are excellent (if eclectic), and are particularly valuable because they are free of much of the nonsense which creeps into academic commentary on poetry. This isn't to say that Heaney always makes perfect sense, and a couple of the pieces veer towards self-indulgence; nevertheless they are extremely readable, stimulating and — an extremely rare thing in critical writing — inspiring.

In 'The Redress of Poetry, Heaney wants now to speak directly to the issue of aesthetic release and its relation to ethical concern. This impossible and necessary relation is one interrogated afresh by artists in each generation….[He] suggests that the truest ethical concern for the writer must be the widening of consciousness, first on his own part and then perhaps on the part of his readers….But when the chief aspect of poetic utterance which is being appreciated is ethical intent–as in all the chant about 'the personal is political' and 'the poetry of witness'–the time requires Heaney's insistence on the irrepressibility of headlong imagination and spontaneous linguistic freedom which he finds not only in Marlowe but also in the comic energy of Merriman.

Heaney wants to think of poetry not only as something that intervenes in the world, redressing or correcting imbalances, but also as something that must be redressed–re-established, celebrated as itself. The criticism poets write is most often interesting because of their own poetry, but Heaney's criticism would be read even if it were unbolstered by a contiguous poetic achievement. The essays are not always startlingly revisionary; they are the result of a deeply personal engagement that has been transmuted into what feels like common–communal–sense. Heaney has the most flexible and beautiful lyric voice of our age, and his prose often answers his poetry in a run of subtle and subtly resonant phrasing….The essays in 'The Redress of Poetry' have more cumulative force than individual character….If Heaney does not have the original prose voice of Auden or Eliot, he has maintained for English poetry a responsive, gratified, and radical ear. Heaney's tendency is to look for the poet's visionary prowess within a repressive social context. This is not a simple political stance…but the endurance of the poet's words to envision either a Utopia or a chaotic universe entrapped by its priorities.

The position of a poet within the political and social movements of their times is a precarious one in that the poet has two public duties to fulfill, while at the same time has many personal obligations that cannot be negotiated or subsumed for any public option that might present itself. Heaney often quotes Stephen Dedalus's dictum that the poet, famous or not, unconsciously or not, "forge[s] the uncreated unconscious of the race," and I think this is indicative of the tension and tradition from which Heaney himself must fall back upon and uphold. This pulling, this turning of the head one way at one moment, another way the next second can prove to be quite debilitating when there is any sort of self-conscious self-reflection. The poet remains hidden under layers of public namings and roles he must play, but at the same time has this inner privacy that tries desperately to remain unaltered and true to the poet's techne, that all-encompassing descriptor of means and ends, teachable and unteachable.

But what does this mean for the poet, this moment of looking back and forward that remains perpetually encased in all uncoverings and disclosures? For Heaney it remains essentially the pull between private and public, between personal motivations and wants and public demands and beckonings–those "daunting pressures and responsibilities on anyone who would risk the name of poet." Much of the time, Heaney remains focused towards his discipline, his techne, which is that of "Seamus Heaney, Nobel laureate poet." But is this what remains of Heaney after these namings are taken off? What of the Heaney who sits in front of his fireplace reading Eastern European poets? What of the Heaney who talks to his wife on a nightly basis, and does the usual "person" duties that all of the masses who read his texts do? What of the Heaney that is underneath the all-encompassing propaganda machine that is the literary trade in Western neo-liberal capitalist states?

The conflict of topos, figuratively and literally, is teased out throughout much of Heaney's prose works. He seems constantly lost within these dueling forces, who present to him no answers but more problems and questions in which the poet, consciously or not, answers with what Pinsky calls the "feel to answer, a promise to respond." But this response, as Heaney continues, throws the poet's experience into a "labyrinth" from which the aporia of his situation arises and becomes pronounced as a poet to face and take heed of. Heaney is taking his own frontiers of his written work and recasting it within the needed commentary of what it means to be a poet in a specific historical situation that seems to have no alternatives, no ways of curing the disease of contempt and historical baggage. Heaney wants poetry to provide an alternative:

Poetry that is, being instrumental in adjusting and correcting imbalances in the world, poetry as an intended intervention into the goings-on of society–even then, poetry is involved with supreme fictions as well as actual conditions. What [poetry] is offering is a glimpsed alternative, a world to which 'we turn incessantly and without knowing it.'

Poetry can do this, I think, to a certain event. I would argue even more so in Ireland than in the United States, where poetry has fallen below many other forms of cultural creations and is now considered romantic entertainment by the catchy media conglomerates who control dissemination of ideas. But with the Irish still caught up in troubles that are beyond borders and nationalities (all people everywhere should be worried about what is going on in Ireland), it still remains to be seen what poetry can do for specific cultural/social realities. I mean, honestly, is poetry going to provide an alternative political reality for someone stuck in a abusive/discriminatory social environment? Is poetry going to provide some notion of truth that is obtainable by a populace of literate people? Heaney comments:

To be a source of truth and at the same time a vehicle of harmony: this expresses what we would like poetry to be and it takes me back to the kinds of pressure which poets from Northern Ireland are subject to. These poets feel with a special force a need to be true to the negative nature of the evidence and at the same time to show an affirming flame, the need to be both socially responsible and creatively free.

What Heaney is describing is something that is long past in his career and at the same time something he speaks of in the present tense–the need to be cognizant at all times the historical milieu that the artist, the poet is thrown in existentially, is under the influence of intellectually, and must respond tow as a figure that provides alternative worlds from which some escape can be had be an audience.

A poet's political views will more likely turn up in his prose, but even here Mr. Heaney is wary. That very wariness was the subject of a series of public lectures he gave between 1989 and 1994 as the Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Ten of those fifteen lectures have now been gathered in "The Redress of Poetry," and the result is a meditation on the uses of art and power, a fresh and astute defence of poetry against any attempt to reduce it to a relevant or useful commodity. Poets from Sir Philip Sidney to Percy Bysshe Shelley to Wallace Stevens have all written impassioned, stirring defences of their art. In its more reasoned, subtle and amiable way, Mr. Heaney's new book takes an honoured place with theirs.

Poetry is not printout, never merely a fading duplicate of experience. Instead, the book's title essay insists, a poem is the imagined alternative: "If our given experience is a labyrinth, its impassability can still be countered by the poet's imagining some equivalent of the labyrinth and presenting himself and us with a vivid experience of it." And reading, then, is a fable about crossing from one dimension of reality to another.

Poetry's counter reality, furthermore, is meant to complicate experience rather than simplify it, to distort in order to reveal. Grotesque or ecstatic, its excess is meant to balance "life's inadequacies, desolations and atrocities" without being expected to assume ethical obligations or political motives. Mr. Heaney's first principle is pleasure. After all, "no honest reader of poems . . . would see moral improvement or, for that matter, political education, as the end and purpose of his or her absorption in a poetic text." The pleasure we take in poems — even our guilty pleasure in poems written by a talented "oppressor" — comes from their sensuous bravura, from their ability to include what Rilke once called "the side of life that is turned away from us," and finally from their instinct to transform the circumstances and conditions of life.

An exemplary reading of Christopher Marlowe's "Hero and Leander," which was written in the late 1580's, makes his point convincingly. Mr. Heaney first read the poem as a student at Queen's University in Belfast, and even then could see it as an example of nascent English imperialism: "This English pentameter marched in step with the invading English armies of the late Tudor period." However he may have winced at the implication, he thrilled to the lines, and he began to see how Marlowe's mind worked: "a mind that knows both the penalties of life and its invitations, one closer to the spirit of carnival than to the shock tactics of agitprop." Marlowe's gorgeous poem of doomed love is, at its grandest, a parable about the motion of the soul, a motion toward liberation and beatitude but "countered by an implicit acknowledgment of repression and constraint." Its artistic virtuosity, in other words, is at once undercut and heightened by its psychological realism.

In his "Defense of Poesy," Sir Philip Sidney linked the creative act of the poet with the pursuit of virtue, "since our erected wit maketh us know what perfection is, and yet our infected will keepeth us from reaching unto it." There is, of course, something too simple . . . about that account of the matter. . . . There's more phenomenological accuracy in John Keats's notion that poetry surprises by a fine excess, although it's worth remembering that by "excess" Keats did not mean just a sensuous overabundance of description. What he also had in mind was a general gift for outstripping the reader's expectation, an inventiveness that cannot settle for the conventional notion that enough is enough, but always wants to extend the alphabet of emotional and technical expression. Even a poem as tonally sombre as, say, "Tintern Abbey" is doing something surprising and excessive, getting further back and deeper in than the poet knew it would, the poet being nevertheless still ready to go with it. . . . At these moments there is always a kind of homeopathic benefit for the reader in experiencing the shifts and extensions which constitute the life of a poem. An exuberant rhythm, a display of metrical virtuosity, some rising intellectual ground successfully mounted — experiencing things like these gratifies and furthers the range of the mind's and the body's pleasures, and helps the reader to obey the old command: nosce teipsum. Know thyself.

Redress of Poetry display much of the intellectual restlessness, linguistic wizardry and political conscience that have shaped Heaney's own poetry. His thesis is that poetry of the highest order must redress social imbalances, at once transfiguring the circumstances it observes and offering an unforeseen, more humane, aesthetic alternative. This is an abstract and rigorous idea, yet non-academic readers will find much to savour as Heaney tests and refines his paradigm in light of a largely canonical selection of poets (most are from the British Isles). Ranging freely from a brief life of each poet to a close reading of a few poems by him or her, he addresses, for instance, how Elizabeth Bishop's "One Art" assuages the "loss" to which it alludes; how Christopher Marlowe's "Hero and Leander" "extended the alphabet" of Elizabethan sexual mores; and how 19th-century rustic poet John Clare achieved a truly lyrical local idiom at odds with official English. With their palpable evocation of the writing process and their disavowal of jargon and trendy political abstractions, these are exemplary essays? and tell us much about the influences and obsessions of this year's Nobel laureate in literature.

By "redress" Heaney means the preferred definition of compensation for a wrong, but he also intends the obsolete meaning of bringing hunting dogs back to the chase, since poetry is a game of "fundamentally self-delighting inventiveness," one in which a force "unhindered, yet directed, can sweep ahead into its full potential." Eminently readable, the various essays here are united by a personal yet profound tone. They explore a broad range of poets, from Christopher Marlowe and John Clare to W.B. Yeats and Elizabeth Bishop, but Heaney's focus is on poetry's ability to redress "all of life's inadequacies, desolations, and atrocities," not by means of direct political response but simply by being its own intrinsic reward. For all literary collections.

Heaney's sonorous lyricism stems from his love of the cycles of country life, the mystery of the sea, the satisfying rhythm of hard, physical work. But Heaney loves poetry and poetics as well as nature and expresses this passion in his forceful if demanding literary essays. Heaney explains how poetry balances the "scales of reality towards some transcendent equilibrium." After considering all the burdens contemporary poets carry, from the long tradition of the form itself to pressing political perspectives, Heaney still insists that "poetry cannot afford to lose its fundamentally self-delivery.

Poetry is as much relevant as ever even in this highly industrialised age of ours. Discuss with reference to Seamus Heaney. (P.U. 2006)

Poetry has always been a powerful medium throughout human history; even in this industrialised and mechanised age, poetry does have a function to play because where politics divides, poetry unites. Seamus Heaney in his essay "Redress of Poetry" defines the effectiveness and creative role of poetry in society. He disagrees with the idea of PLATO in 'The Republic' who regards poets as an idle creature Heaney defends poetry by explaining its functions in society. He also points of that the true art of poetry is above all prejudices ad worldly considerations. He says that art should not lose its effectiveness by representing Culture and Politics.

Seamus Heaney sustains very clear notions about art in general and poetry in particular. Coming from Irish background, he closely observed the relationship between art and politics. The first problem he faced due to the influence of politics was of language.

English was regarded as the language of the enemy and English literature was unacceptable to Heaney's countrymen was, therefore, an unpatriotic act.

Heaney began to feel that Irish patriotism, particularly the fanatic nationalism was poisonous rather than healthy. It only served to narrow down the Irish thinking. Irish language and tradition were a work of national identity but on the other hand were chains binding free thinking. The study of English literature, Heaney thought, exposed him to thought outside the Irish culture and enlarged his mind. Heaney's poetry, therefore, looks within but also beyond the Irish.

Stevens and many others believe that poetry is not meant just for aesthetic satisfaction. Their view was that poetry cannot and should not be divorced from politics. Poetry must speak for those who have been suppressed; who cannot speak for themselves. Poetry is the voice of redress Stevens disagrees with those who only emphasise the aesthetic and artistic value of poetry. According to this point, of view poetry creates a world of art as opposed to the world of reality. Heaney does not feel happy with this role of poetry. Poetry shall do more than just reflect.

Heaney evaluates the dangers of the influence of politics on poetry. He says that Politics damages the faculty of rationality, therefore, the poets cannot serve society with utility of poetry. He says poets should not narrow down their scope by limiting poetry to certain dimensions of time and space. It should be free from any restriction. Some demand that poets should write against the common trend to shock the minds of people. They should write revolutionary poetry. But the impact of poetry is not practical; it is psychological. Poetry does not forces man to go and fight. But the poetry shows that what is wrong and what is right. It is the most important function of poetry to create psychological effect rather than lead to violent practically. If poetry becomes practical, according to Heaney, it will not remain poetry, it will become propaganda.

Heaney explains that in time of practical tensions and national disaster, there was common trend of generalising and simplifying the situation in black and white. The real point is that a political situation is never too simple as to be labelled into opposite elements. Politics divides men, poetry promotes the love of men. Poetry shows that all men are human beings and they deserve sympathy. But politics tell us that some deserve our wrath. If poetry becomes politics then it will not remain poetry, it will divide humanity into friends and foes.

To evaluate the role of poetry in Political crises, Heaney quotes W.B Yeats, an Irish poet; who remembers the Irish men who were killed in the rising of 1916. But he is also sorry for the English men who died in the fight. Talking about the humanitarian zeal of poetry, Heaney says that Yeats considers both enemies and friends as men. He does not discriminate between the Irish People and the English people. Poetry conveys to us, everyman whether black or white Irish and English, has the same feelings, passions and blood. All should be regarded as equal and there should be no compromise on merit. In short, Poetry should not follow the force of gravity.

Regarding this role of poetry, Heaney quotes Simone Weil, who in her book, "Gravity and Grace", writes that the function of poetry is to serve as a balancing force. In Politics we are always carried away by the force of gravity we always, try to side with the weak party. The point which poet wants to make is that it is not the function of poet and poetry to side with the weak party. The poet should go with the merit of the case. If the weak is wrong, then it is necessary not to support it rather it must be condemned. Poetry speaks the truth. It does not seek balance; Politics seeks balances. As poetry is not politics, it should not try to strike a balance; it should support where the truth lies.

Heaney neither rejects the influence of politics and poetry fully, nor accepts it totally. He seeks the ideal midway where poetry serves its role of entertainment and providing needed ideas for the betterment of humanity. To Heaney, poet is a universal figure. He is a member of a community but he is also a citizen of the world- a representative of humanity without regarding religious, sexual, regional and social differences. He considers poet an observer not a participant in political movement and an observer must not take sides.

Political and industrial influences have always been in the history of world; only 20th century is a little more prominent in this case; but the we have seen that even the present age does accommodates poetry because poetry is human and where there are humans (however industrialised, politicised and mechanised), there is poetry.

Culture and Imperialism

Edward Said; 1935 –2003

Edward W. Said was born in Jerusalem, Palestine and attended schools there and in Cairo. He was a Christian Arab. He received his B.A. from Princeton and his M.A. and Ph.D. from Harvard. He is University Professor at Columbia. He is the author of Orientalism, The Question of Palestine, Covering Islam, After the Last Sky, and Culture and Imperialism.

He delivered his speech Culture and Imperialism at York University, Toronto, February 10, 1993. He was an influential writer, speaker and teacher. 1950's he went to the USA and studied at Princeton and Howard. His writings have been translated into 26 languages. Orientalism is his most influential book which presents the Western view of the Islamic World. It is limited to the Middle East only but it covers the whole landscape occupied by 19th and 20th century. He had been a teacher of Literature (Comparative) and made critical and literary analysis of most writers literary allusions are frequently found in his political works. He died on 25th September, 2003.

Edward Said's views on Culture and Imperialism

Culture and Imperialism is a lecture by ES. It briefly surveys the formation of Western Culture to show that the process itself was a result of imperialism. In defining the two terms he says that Culture: The learned, accumulated experience of communities and it consists of socially transmitted patterns of behavior. According to the anthropologist Cliff Greety, Culture is: An ordered system of meanings and symbols in terms of which social interaction take place.

Imperialism: (According to OED may be defined as): aggressive expansion of peoples at the expense of the neighbors. This has been going on for years.

Imperialism implies some sort of collective premeditation which means a policy formed at home by the imperialistic force before launching an offensive against another nation. The Historian Solomon Modell says: "Imperialism is a policy extending a country's power beyond its own borders for the purpose of exploiting other lands and other peoples by establishing economic, social and political control over them."

Introduction to the Book: Culture and Imperialism is an important document. Edward Said explains his own concepts of Culture and Imperialism. Edward Said explains Imperialism as "the practice, the theory and the attitudes of a dominating metropolitan center that rules a distant territory." Imperialism originated with the industrial revolution in 19th century. The British and the French held sway over a large part of the globe.

For the industrial revolution, cheap raw material and labor was needed so for the development of the backward countries, loud claims were made out to be need of the nations. The slave nations were taught to regard it as a blessing. 1st world war ended the European Imperialism to some extent, but the 2nd world war brought about it. The two hot wars initiated a major cold war between USSR and the USA. Thus, Imperialism took a new shape. The USA reduced USSR and came to be the sole super power. It the USA-based Imperialism that ES targets in his works.

The book also has its literary merits like Conrad's Heart of Darkness, E.M. Forster's A Passage to India and many others.

Important Textual areas of his Speech: "The 19th century is rise of the west for its dominating posture." "It grabbed lands so largely and abundantly as never before." "The industrial revolution caused imperialism."

Colonialism, almost always a consequence of imperialism, is the implanting of settlements on distant territories. Imperialism is simply the process or policy of establishing or maintaining an empire.

Direct colonialism of the British in India, the French in Algeria and Morocco has largely ended but Imperialism exists. Russia acquired bordering lands and the British and the French jumped thousands of miles for occupation.

The Soviet Union's and America's super power status which was enjoyed a little less than half a century derives from very different histories than those of Britain and France in the 19th century. In the expansion of western empires, profit and the hope of further profit was important – spices, sugar, slaves, cotton etc. gold. There was very little domestic resistance to foreign dominations in Britain & France because the superior thought it a metaphysical obligation to rule the inferior. According to them, their imperialism was different from that of the Romans who were for the loot but they went there with an idea of civilizing and improving their life.

We see in the empire nothing but a mitigated disaster for the native people. It was their native, cultural design and need that matured imperialism and they regret it now. Imperialism has caused dislocations, homelessness for the Muslims, Africans and the West Indians. They have created the troubles for Britain and France and also caused the emergence of Soviet and later today America.

According to Arno Mayer's telling phrase, "of the old regime" The Willy Brandt Report, entitled North-South: A program for the survival published in 1980. It says that the needs of the poorest nations must be addressed. Hunger must be abolished and other problems solved. The main purpose is power-sharing in decision making within the monetary and financial institutions.

It is different to disagree with it. But how will the changes occur? The post-war classification of all nations into three worlds: First world, Second world and the third world. The solution is the revised attitude to education, to urge students on insistence of their identity, culture and democracy, thus nationalism is the solution.

The relationship between culture and empire is one that enables disquieting forms of domination. Imperialism considered the mixture of cultures and identities on a large scale, but its worst and the most paradoxical gift was to allow people to believe that there only white, black, western or oriental.

Imperialistic allusions from literature: He believes that novel has been important in formation of imperialistic attitudes, references, and experiences. He calls Robinson Crusoe "the prototype of modern realistic novel". He draws his arguments particularly from the novel because he believes that "Narrative is crucial to my argument here, my basic point being that story are at the heart of what explorers and novelists say about strange regions of the world, they also become the method colonized people use to assert there an identity and the existence of their own history." Said further argues that narratives of emancipation and enlightenment mobilized the people to rise against the yoke of imperialism. The stories of Sir Walter Scott charged the Scottish nation against the British rule. Edward Said cites Mathew Arnold who says that culture is each society's reservoir of the best that has been known and thought. Literature is, no doubt, the mirror that faithfully captures and reflects the picture of culture.

He says that his entire life was devoted to teaching culture. He developed the habit of looking for the imperialistic implications in the stories. He says that in Great Expectations by Charles Dickens "What Dickens envisions for Pip, being Magwitch's London Gentlemen is roughly equivalent to what was envisioned by English benevolence for Australia." Edward Said believes that nearly all Dickens' businessmen, wayward relatives and frightening outsides have a fairly normal and secure connection with Empire.

Edward Said highly admired Joseph Conrad – a star novelist of the late Victorian period for his superb criticism of Imperialism, especially in the Heart of Darkness which is still highly relevant to the situation across the world.

Edward Said's message is that Imperialism is not about a moment in history, it is about a continuing interdependent discourse between subject peoples and the dominant empire. Said's view of the empire and colonialism is best expressed through Fanny and Sir Thomas from Jane Austen's Mansfield Park which is the story of Fanny's being taken into Sir Thomas's life at Mansfield Park where she eventually adjusts into the role of mistress of "estate". Fanny was poor. Her parents are not capable managers of wealth. These skills she acquires when she goes to Mansfield Park to live at 10. Said's comment on Jane Austen's writings highlight the extent to which he sees in her the reflection of empire.

Culture and Imperialism : Introduction

The extraordinary reach of Western imperialism in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries is one of the most astonishing facts in all of geopolitical history. Neither Rome, nor Byzantium, nor Spain at the height of its glory came close to the imperial scope of France, the United States, and particularly Great Britain in these years.

But while the rule of these vast dominions left scarcely a corner of life untouched in either the colonies or the imperialist capitals, its profound influence upon the cultural products of the West has been largely ignored. In this dazzling work of historical inquiry, Edward Said shows how the justification for empire-building was inescapably embedded in the Western cultural imagination during the Age of Empire, and how even today the imperial legacy colors relations between the West and the formerly colonized world at every level of political, ideological, and social practice.

With Culture and Imperialism, Said offers a powerful investigation of the relationship between culture and the imperialism of the West. Probing masterpieces of the Western tradition--including Austen's Mansfield Park, Conrad's Heart of Darkness, Verdi's Aida, and Camus's The Stranger-Said illuminates how the justification for empire-building in the 19th and early 20th centuries was inescapably embedded in the cultural imagination of the West. The result was a way of thinking that affirmed not merely the Europeans' right but also their obligation to rule--and touched nearly every facet of life in both the colonies and the imperial capitals.

Said reveals as well how writers such as W. B. Yeats, Salman Rushdie, Aime Cesair, and Chinua Achebe have challenged this imperial vision to reclaim for their peoples the right of self-determination in history and literature. Imperialist assumptions, Said argues, continue to influence our politics and our arts--from the media s coverage of the Gulf War to debates about what literatures are worth teaching in our schools. Finally, Said argues for awareness that all cultures are interdependent and that the true human community is global. Probing some of the great masterpieces of the Western tradition - including Conrad's Heart of Darkness, Austen's Mansfield Park, Verdi's Aida, and Camus's L'Estranger - Said brilliantly illuminates how culture and politics cooperated, knowingly and unknowingly, to produce a system of domination that involved more than cannon and soldiers - a sovereignty that extended over forms, images, and the very imaginations of both the dominators and the dominated. The result was a "consolidated vision" that affirmed not merely the Europeans' right to rule but their obligation, and made alternative arrangements unthinkable. Pervasive as this vision was, however, it did not go unchallenged. Edward Said also traces the development of an "oppositional strain" in the works of native writers who participated in the perilous process of cultural decolonization. Working mainly in the languages of their colonial masters, these writers - including William Butler Yeats, Aime Cesaire, and Chinua Achebe - identified and exposed mechanisms of control and repression. In so doing, they reclaimed for their peoples the right of self-determination in history and literature. In today's post-colonial world, Said argues, imperialist assumptions continue to influence Western politics and culture, from the media's coverage of the Gulf War to debates over what histories and literatures are worth teaching in our schools. But his vision reveals a hopeful truth: if the West and its former subject peoples are to achieve a meaningful, harmonious coexistence, it will depend upon the development of a humanistic historical understanding that all cultures are interdependent, that they inevitably borrow from one another. Finally this passionate and immensely learned book points the way beyond divisive nationalisms toward awareness that the true human community is global.

Imperialism: Imperialism is a practice by which powerful nations or peoples seek to extend and maintain control or influence over weaker nations or peoples. Scholars frequently use the term more restrictively: Some associate imperialism solely with the economic expansion of capitalist states; others reserve it for European expansion after 1870. Although imperialism is similar in meaning to colonialism, and the two terms are sometimes used interchangeably, they should be distinguished. Colonialism usually implies formal political control, involving territorial annexation and loss of sovereignty. Imperialism refers; more broadly, to control or influence that is exercised either formally or informally, directly or indirectly, politically or economically.

History: Imperialism dates from antiquity, and throughout history it has taken many forms. In any given historical period, certain forms tend to be more prevalent than others. In the ancient world imperialism manifested itself in a series of great empires that arose when one people, usually representing a particular civilization and religion, attempted to dominate all others by creating a unified system of control. The empire of Alexander the Great and the Roman Empire are salient examples.

Early modern European imperialism (1400-1750), by contrast, generally took the form of overseas colonial expansion. Rather than one state attempting to unify the world, in this period many competing states established political control over territories in South and Southeast Asia and in the New World. Imperial systems were organized according to the doctrine of mercantilism: Each imperial state attempted to control the trade of its colonies, in order to monopolize the benefits of that trade.

In the mid-19th century yet another variant of imperialism appeared, the imperialism of free trade. The practice endured in this period even though mercantilism and the pace of formal empire building declined significantly. European, especially British, power and influence were extended informally, mainly through diplomatic and economic means, rather than formally, through direct colonial rule. The imperialism of free trade, however, was short-lived: By the end of the 19th century European powers were once again practicing imperialism in the form of overseas territorial annexation, expanding into Africa, Asia, and the Pacific. Since the end of World War II, when most of the formal empires were dissolved, what might be called modern economic imperialism has come to predominate. Control is exercised informally and less overtly. The U.S., for instance, exerts considerable influence over certain Third World nations, as a result of its national economic power and its dominance of certain international financial organizations, such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. Similarly, European powers have continued to affect significantly the politics and the economics of their former colonies, and they have consequently been accused of neocolonialism—the exercise of effective sovereignty without the formality of colonial rule.

Motives behind Imperialism: Historically, states have been motivated to pursue imperialism for a variety of reasons, which may be classified broadly as economic, political, and ideological. Theories of imperialism break down similarly, according to which motive or motives are viewed as primary.

Economic explanations of imperialism are the most common. Proponents of this view hold that states are motivated to dominate others by the need to expand their economies, to acquire raw materials and additional sources of labor, or to find outlets for surplus capital and markets for surplus goods. The most prominent economic theories, linking imperialism with capitalism, are derived from those of Karl Marx. Lenin, for example, explained the European expansion of the late 19th century as the inevitable outcome of the need for the European capitalist economies to export their surplus capital. Similarly, contemporary Marxists explain the postwar expansion of the U.S. into the Third World in terms of economic imperatives.

Alternatively, some stress the political determinants of imperialism, contending that states are motivated to expand primarily by the desire for power, prestige, security, and diplomatic advantages vis-à-vis other states. In this view, late 19th-century French imperialism was intended to restore France's international prestige after its humiliating defeat in the Franco-Prussian War. Similarly, Soviet expansion into Eastern Europe after 1945 can be understood in terms of security needs, specifically the need to protect the nation from another invasion across its western border.

A third set of explanations focuses on ideological or moral motives. According to this perspective, political, cultural, or religious beliefs force states into imperialism as a "missionary activity." Britain's colonial empire was motivated at least in part by the idea that it was the "white man's burden" to civilize "backward" peoples. Germany's expansion under Hitler was based in large measure on a belief in the inherent superiority of German national culture. The desire of the USA to "protect the free world" and of the former Soviet Union to "liberate" the peoples of Eastern Europe and the Third World are also examples of imperialism driven by moral and ideological concerns.

Finally, some explanations of imperialism focus not on the motives of powerful states but rather on the political circumstances in weaker states. The argument holds that powerful states may not intend to expand, but may be forced to by instability on the periphery; new imperial actions result from past imperial commitments. The British conquest of India and the Russian colonization of Central Asia in the 19th century are classic examples of reactive imperialism.

The Effects of Imperialism: Because imperialism is so often viewed as economically motivated, discussions of its effects also tend to revolve around economic issues. Disagreement arises between those who believe that imperialism implies exploitation and is responsible for the underdevelopment and economic stagnation of the poor nations, and those who argue that although the rich nations benefit from imperialism, the poor nations also benefit, at least in the long run. The truth has been difficult to ascertain for at least two reasons: (1) No consensus has been reached on the meaning of exploitation, and (2) it is frequently difficult to disentangle the domestic causes of poverty from those that are possibly international. What is apparent is that the impact of imperialism is uneven: Some poor nations have enjoyed greater economic benefits from contact with the rich than have others. India, Brazil, and other developing nations have even begun to compete economically with their former colonial powers. Thus, it is prudent to examine the economic impact of imperialism on a case-by-case basis.

The political and psychological effects of imperialism are equally difficult to determine. Imperialism has proven both destructive and creative: For better or worse, it has destroyed traditional institutions and ways of thinking and has replaced them with the habits and mentality of the Western world.

Culture and Imperialism : Stripping the mask from the ugly face of Imperialism

Before discussing Edward Said's views on culture and imperialism, it is better to have a brief view on those events, reasons and trends of English Society which caused extending or expanding their culture and imperialism to the other territories of the world. We shall talk historically at first as the history of English society shows though the trend of industrialization had been initiated or started in the 17th century yet it took its speed or rapidity in 18th century.

Under the influence of this trend of industrialization, the landlords, farmers and peasants of rural class of English society were converting their farms, lands and dairies into industrial units. As the industries or industrial units were becoming more under the influence of the trend of industrialism in European countries, hence their demands for raw material as iron, silver, chemical, oil, stone etc. were also increased. To fulfill their basic needs arid demands of running the industrial units for modernization, European as well as other super powers extended their immense power to the other territories of the other weaker or underdeveloped countries which were loaded with natural sources and raw material. To capture the natural sources of other territories of the countries, the imperial countries dominated over metropolitan centres of other countries and then started ruling over distant territories.

It is very worthy to note here that these imperial countries outwardly gave an expression to the rest of the world that they had intervened or came into these territories in order to civilize the ignorant, uncivilized and uncultured natives but as a matter of fact is concerned, they intruded in their countries in order to loot or capture their natural resources of raw materials. That's why, Edward Said says rightly that this immense power which concentrated in Britan and France as a result of industrialization, was more formidable than the power of Rome, Spain, Baghdad or Constantinople in the past. Gradually, other Western countries especially USA also joined with Britain and France in this practice. So, we can say that 19th century showed a climax of ascendancy of the west.

Here, Edward Said also points out a very important fact that Western countries extended their domination of acquisition of foreign territory by the rate of 247000 square miles a year. These Western countries did so under the influence of their expanding economics which were "hungry for overseas markets, raw materials, cheap labour and fertile land".

This practice increased more after the mergence of the North American territory. Now these allied countries captured distant lands of Philippines, the Caribbean Central America, Barbary coastal parts of Europe and the Middle East, Vietnam and Korea. Said rightly says in the regard:

"The US was forward as an empire ...... that would expand its population and territory and increase in power". Subcontinent was also dominated and ruled by Englishmen. As the history of subcontinent itself shows that Englishmen invaded over sub-continent through trade and business and ultimately occupied the whole territory. As this territory was enriched or loaded with mineral and natural sources, it fulfilled the demands and needs of raw material for the industrial units of the Western Countries for a long time.

There was a time when Romans also exploited or looted the territories of other countries but the exploitation of the rights of the natives of dominated territories by the imperialism of French and the British was different in its nature. In other words, it means to say that they went out with the aim of improving those backward regions. It was their outward feigned declaration which, history had itself shown the falsity of that flattering notion. They were more interested in exploiting and looting their rights as well as raw materials than civilizing them.

To prove this fact, Said gives reference of Conrad's Heart of Darkness in which Conrad has openly and ruthlessly exposed the violation, exploitation and cruelty of the natives of Congo in Africa by the Englishmen. Another writer named as Franz Fanon also openly says in this regard in the following words:

"Colonialism and imperialism have not paid their dues when they withdrew their flags and their police forces from our territories. For centuries the foreign colonists have behaved in the under developed world like nothing more than criminals".

The literature of this time only exhibits the vice of imperialism because whatever the writers and critics felt in that period portrayed through their literary compositions and works. Edward Said rightly says in this connection:

"Imperialism means the practice, the theory and the attitudes of a dominating metropolitan centre that rules a distant territory".

Throwing light on the term "colonialism" Edward Said utters: "Colonialism which is almost always a consequence of imperialism is the implanting of settlements on distant territory".

There is no doubt in saying that some European writers of that time wrote on the problem of nostalgia; faced by dislocated natives and immigrants who were colonialized in the foreign territories; it was nothing but a yearning for-the supremacy which they enjoyed.

After the Second World War, imperialism did not come to an end even after the post-war decolonization. The cultural effects of western countries can even be observed or seen in the countries like India and Algeria which are still linked in a legacy of connections to France and Britain.

The ending of the second world war heralded the message of freedom and liberty from the foreign imperial rulers and as a result many colonized territories were decolonized, yet the influence of the cultural rites and customs was very much dominant on the ways of life of subjugated people of dominated and occupied territories by western rulers. Though direct colonialism like the British in India' and French in Algeria has almost vanished yet it does not end from its roots absolutely. Now it is present in its other forms. It is rather reflected in the changed outlook or mentality of the two nations.

It is very worthy to note here that some of the European writers defined imperialism as: "... ideas that certain people and certain territories require and beseech domination".

Some European writers and critics of the second half of the 19th century illustrated this above mentioned idea by favouring it as that India was created only in order to be ruled by England. Edward Said quoted Kipling's novel Kim to support in this connection.

Edward Said further says in his lecturers on "Culture and Imperialism" that after the end of the cold war, the super powers of the world devised a new world order. In this respect or regard, USA is at the top of the list. In other simple words, it is a new brand of imperialism.

Willy Brandt presented a so-called report on North South problem in 1980. This report also demanded a sudden solution of the problem because the newly diagnosis of the North South problem was being applied to all the underdeveloped countries in the world. This-new world order is itself a doctrine of USA's responsibility to set things right all over the world.

Now in the present age, we see that USA is the guardian of setting all the things right in all the countries of the world. The 'doctrine of "world responsibility" is taken as justification for USA's involvement in any affair of other countries under the sun. Once again Said absolutely says right in this connection: "The goal of US foreign policy is to bring about a world increasingly subject to the rule of law. But it is the United States which organizes the peace and defines the law".

Edward Said has rightly said that these terms as "world responsibility", "new world order" symbolise a new brand of imperialism. It is also an open and causeless exploitation and loot of the rights as well as the raw materials of the third world countries. In this present age, we see that under the guise of world's responsibility to set things right, the guardian of the world is making its involvement in affairs of the third world in order to fulfill their economic interests by capturing the natural sources and raw materials of these countries rather than having any genuine concern for the people of the world.

In this connection Chomsky rightly condemns this so called western ideology in the following words: "It is an absolute requirement for the western system of ideology that a vast gulf be established between the civilized west, with its traditional commitment to human dignity, liberty and self-determination, and the barbaric brutality of those who, for some reason, perhaps defective genes, fail to appreciate the depth of this historical commitment".

It is also very rightly observed that USA advocates its self-appointed writ which runs in the entire world of today. Americans think that whatever their country thinks or regards, it is just as the rest of the people of the world want.

Edward Said is of the view that if the counter forces to imperialism such as migrant workers, refugees and decolonized people, black immigrants, urban, squatters, students and popular insurrectionists are united on two points—one is of security of personal freedom and second is of environmental concerns, these millions of dislocated people can rise a formidable revolt. Moreover, these dislocated human beings are free from ethnic and national prejudices because their dislocation has made them free from these rational, national and ethnic prejudices. They also know that if they indulge in such kind of petty prejudices, it will help imperialists. They make it easy for them to divide and rule. Actually they are the instruments of the so called and vicious system enforced by imperialism.

To conclude this above mentioned discussion, we can say openly and forcefully that whatever Said has delivered in his lecturer on culture and imperialism, absolutely shows the clear picture of the so called imperialism, exploitation and lootings of the basic rights of natives of the subjugated territories of the world. The hunger of the western economies for fulfilling the needs, necessities and demands of raw materials for industrialization, led the western countries to extend their domination on the distant territories of the other countries in order to capture their natural sources of raw materials. This imperialism even did not come to end after the post war decolonization but it shaped in newly devised world order by the US which was no more than a worst kind of reproduction of the old imperial order under the feigned guise of setting the things right in all the other countries.

Culture and Imperialism : Culture as a “sort of theatre”

A series of lectures that Edward Said delivered on the relationship between culture and empire in the universities in the United States, Canada and England shows that Edward Said wants to expand the appeal of his arguments to the rest of the world. The arguments which he put forward in “Orientalism” were particularly focused on the Middle East but now through the subject matter of these lectures on culture and imperialism, he wants to describe a more general structure of relationship between the modern metropolitan West and its overseas territories.

It is worthy to note here that instead of doing so really by the cores of heart, the imperialists just did not care to apologize. There were their vanity, pride and feigned arrogance which did not allow them to bow before the people over whom they had ruled. As far as the matter of financial loss is concerned; those who suffered by the land and property, could have been compensated by the imperialists but they did not do so. Instead, they ironically bestowed independence on the natives as a favour which actually could not have been held back longer in the changed post-war situation. The African writer Franz Fanon rightly utters in this regard:

"Colonialism and imperialism did not pay their dues when they withdrew their flags and police forces from our territories".

Edward Said quotes another writer named Noam Chomsky who very aptly and clearly exposes the lame and feigned western claims of civilizing the uncivilized, brutal and ignorant people of Asia and Africa. Apparently Western ideology was of ensuring human dignity, liberty, self-determination and self-sufficient economy for all the independent countries of the world but practically it served for fulfilling the interests of the western imperial powers. In fact, this ideology or claim of the western countries has proved the cruel nature of the Englishmen. They want to keep under developing countries poor, ignorant and insufficient in modern technologies so that they may rule over them through the various money-lending agencies like the World Bank and I.M.F. Whatever Chomsky has pointed out by saying, is absolutely right in the present age. Western imperialists are holding the economies of the third world countries by lending loans through World Bank and I.M.F. and above all they proclaim that they are favouring these countries by helping them in their difficult time of poverty, lack of technology and feeble economy. Noam Chomsky rightly points out in this connection and utters:

"It's an absolute requirement of the western system of ideology that the vast gulf be established between the civilized west, with its traditional commitment to human dignity, liberty and self-determination, and the barbaric brutality of those who, for some reason, perhaps defective genes, fail to appreciate the depth of this historical commitment".

In all aspects whether it is intervention or domination or interference, one thing or reason is very much evident that it is unending thirst or greed for capturing and looting the raw materials of most of the countries of Asia and Africa. Said once again rightly refers to British and French imperialism which once had dominated and penetrated to the farthest territories of distant lands. It had been the practice of imperialistic Englishmen that wherever they found any sign of raw materials in any country, they went for capturing it without caring how many miles these distant territories might be. The subcontinent was one case in point; so was Congo. The history of these continents shows that Englishmen had once ruled over these lands by capturing all their natural resources of raw materials for fulfilling their industrial needs. They came in these lands under the feigned guise of professing an aim of developing the resources for the welfare of the natives, but their intervention was actually inspired by economic and strategic interests.

Their intervention and domination of a long period resulted in an interaction of cultures in the process. Edward Said also takes much interest of this interracial culture which has its positive and negative results for the natives. Actually these developments and enlightenments did come through the interaction; as it still haunts the nations that remained under imperial rule. He takes too much interest in, the cultural impact of this interaction, and opines that the attitudes and feelings of the nations involved towards each other owe to their origin to the colonial experience of the past.

To conclude this above mentioned discussion, we can say that Said has very openly and clearly exposed the inner cruel nature of imperialistic society of Europe. He has very strictly rebuked and condemned the supreme authority of the United States. After the end of the cold war, America has been assigned a role of setting the things right in all the countries of the third world under the devised term of world's responsibility. USA has also introduced a new world order which is nothing more than a reproduction of the old imperial order. Said's lectures on the subject of culture and imperialism clearly and openly show the feigned supremacy and imperialistic attitude of the Englishmen of western countries. The appeal of his lectures not only affects the subjugated people of the dominated territories of the third world but also the rest of the people of the whole world. Whatever Said has said in his lectures, did absolutely happen in the history; and is still happening by the western countries under the feigned claim of civilizing the uncivilized nations of the third world countries.

Culture and Imperialism : References from English novelists and Novels

When we have an analysis of Said's book "culture and imperialism" in detail, we come to know that the main idea of this book was inspired by Said's earlier work Orientalism. This book was limited to the Middle East. But his book culture and imperialism presents a clear picture of the domination on the distant territories of the countries of Asia and Africa for capturing their natural responses of raw materials by the imperial western countries. Said also includes the Caribbean Islands, Ireland, the Middle East, East and even some certain areas of the USA.

It is also very worthy to note here that Said does not draw his subject matter from European writings on Africa, India, Far East, Australia and the Caribbean Islands. The writings of these European writers were based on rhetorical figures like the mysterious East, the Indian, Africa or Irish mind and further they depicted violation, torture to death, punishment of flogging the primitive barbaric people for civilizing them. They also asserted in their writings that such punishments were being required when they misbehaved or became rebellious.

Said takes much interest in the cultural study of imperialism and is of the view that the best source of such kind of study can be drawn by the fiction of the period. He also believes that the novel serves as the best source of forming of imperialist attitudes, references and experiences of a certain age. Being a professor of Comparative literature, he has devoted his entire professional life to teaching literature and yet his outlook was influenced further by the colonial system of the Englishmen. That's why, it became his habit to expose and draw the imperialistic implications in the stories. Further, he also quotes the references from the great novelists' works to support his view point on cultural imperialism. Referring to the great novel Great Expectations by Charles Dickens, he says:

"What Dickens envisions for Pip, being Magwitch's London gentleman, is roughly equivalent to what was envisioned by English benevolence for Australia".

As it is known that Said always writes in organizing the resistance against imperialism, so, his genius tallies to Conrad's genius, who also writes on the imperialistic exploitation of the basic rights of Africans by the Englishmen. Being the great admirer of Joseph Conrad, Said's conscience is spurred up or affected by Conrad's superb criticism of imperialism, especially in Heart of Darkness. In this novel, Conrad openly and clearly exposes the feigned claim of civilizing the barbaric uncivilized people of Congo in Africa. Kurtz who was a British administrator, was sent to Congo to prepare a report on the unspeakable rites, customs and behaviours of the savages of Congo and took suitable steps or measures to eliminate these rites. But what Kurtz did there, was absolutely contrary to our expectations because an imperialistic effect got the better hold of his noble intentions and he turned into a beast by looting, exploiting and snatching their basic rights. He became a cruel collector of ivory and started robbing the wealth of the natives of Congo. In short, we can say that this novel is absolutely and rightly regarded as the severest indictment of imperialism. In the very introductory paragraph of Introduction to Culture and Imperialism, Said rightly utters:

"For the enterprise of empire depends upon the idea of having an empire, as Joseph Conrad so powerfully seems to have realized in Heart of Darkness. He says that the difference between us in the modern period, the modern imperialists, and the Romans, is that the Romans were there just for the loot. They were just stealing. But we go there with an idea".

Here, one point is very worthy to note though Said's criticism and indictment of imperialism are not so severe and violent as Conrad's are yet it is his indictment of imperialism which has shaken the sentiments of the people all over the world.

Commenting on Conrad's detachment, Said points out in the following words: "Never the wholly incorporated and fully acculturated Englishman, Conrad therefore preserved an ironic distance (from imperial conquest) in each of his works".

In his views on Culture and Imperialism, Said chooses four novelists whose work clearly highlights and promotes their current ideas of their day about the British Empire.' These four great novelists are as Joseph Conrad, Rudyard Kipling, Jane Austen and Charles Dickens.

Quoting Jane Austen, Said says that it seems that by causally referring to Antigua in Mansfield Park, Austen revealed that she had the empire in the back of her mind most of the time, that she was nevertheless indifferent to tie condition of the subjected peoples. Actually, in the Mansfield Park, she sublimates the agonies of the Caribbean existence to a mere half dozen passing references to Antigua, and that she dodged facing up to her true responsibility to condemn imperialism and its entire works.

At another place in the book culture and imperialism, Edward Said refers to Dickens in Great Expectations. In this novel, we see that he sent the convict Magwitch off to Australia, which was absolutely a dreadful place, unfit for decent Englishmen; it showed that Dickens intentionally knew that he was a despised colonial lad.

Said is of the views that colonialism is also a consequence of imperialism and it takes its final shape in implanting of settlements on distant territory. Here he quotes the historian Michael Doyle who states as:

"Empire is a relationship, formal or informal, in which one state controls the effective political sovereignty of another political society. It can be achieved by force, by political collaboration, economic, social or cultural dependence. Imperialism is simply the process or policy of establishing or maintaining an empire".

In addition to the novelists, Edward Said also quotes some prominent historians of English society who have differently favoured the imperialism and domination of the western countries. For example, a very allowable but curious idea was propagated by the English historian J.R. Seeley. He was of the views that some of Europe's overseas empires were originally acquired by accident, it does not by any stretch of the imaginative account for their inconsistency, persistence and systemized acquisition and administration, let alone their rule and sheer presence.

As David Landes also speaks in the same connection but to some an extent it is about the industrial expansion of western countries. He states in the following words as "the decision of, certain European power to establish plantations, that is, to treat their colonies as continuous enterprises, was, whatever one may think of the morality, a momentous innovation".

In the mid of 19th century though the era of imperialism came to an end because France and Britain gave up their strong possessions after World War II yet that era had an identity — for example, Eric Hobsbawm, talked about the latter part of the nineteenth century. He utters as: "Though the age of empire clearly had an identity all of its own, and historians talk about it roughly from 1878 through World War II, the meaning of the imperial past is not totally contained within it, but has entered the reality of hundreds of millions of people. Its existence as shared memory in a highly conflicted texture of culture, ideology memory and policy still exercises tremendous force".

Talking about the flattering notion of the French and the British that they were going to improve and civilize the barbaric people of backward regions, Franz Fanon, another historian openly exposes the real cruel nature of exploitation of the imperialists of the western countries in the following words: "Colonialism and imperialism have not paid their dues when they withdrew their flags and their police forces from our territories. For centuries the foreign colonists have behaved in the underdeveloped world like nothing more than criminals".

The end of the Cold War resulted in a new world order with the United States at the top. Edward Said is of the views here that it is a new kind of imperialism which gave US an authority of setting things right all over the world. In the present age, we see its implimentation in almost all the countries of the third world because this doctrine of "world responsibility is now considered as justification for US involvement in any affair of every country.

In this regard, Said rightly quotes the words of Chomsky who aptly and beautifully lashes out at the western ideology of "world order" and "world responsibility" in the following words: "It is an absolute requirement for the western system of ideology that a vast gulf be established between the civilized west, with its traditional commitment to human dignity, liberty and self determination, and the barbaric brutality of those who, for some reason perhaps defective genes, fail to appreciate the depth of this historical commitment, so well revealed by America's Asian Wars, for instance".

In the concluding portion of the book, Said gives reference from Kurnan's saying who points out that now America's self-appointed writ is running and working throughout the world today. As the utters: "America loved to think that whatever it wanted was just what the human race wanted".

Every prominent critic knows and believes that the counter forces to imperialism are migrant workers, refugees, and decolonized people. Imperialism always threatens personal freedom as well as environment ironically under the guise of trying to civilize and improve these both. Under these circumstances, these millions of dislocated may unite on these two points and rise a very dreadful revolt against the champion of world order and responsibility. It is also observed now that U.S.A has become weaker and unstable due to its inner problems of economic and cultural crisis, for example, there has been a lot of discussion about the "Canon". It's power is decreasing due to these internal crisis and on the other hand there is ascendancy of Pacific Rim States, like Taiwan, China and Japan.

Culture and Imperialism : Understanding Post-colonial literature

In Twentieth Century literature has been attacked rigorously for containing hegemonic tendencies. Critics have vehemently opposed the subjective tendencies in literature. Critical tools have put literature under a microscope and have tried to find out if there are any real truths without politics in it. Literature is under suspicion now. We have begun to doubt the virtue of literature. Its healing powers are forgotten and its political values are now taken into analysis.

The modern responses to these past experiences have been equally away from objectivity, though we still have to keep it as our noble ideal guiding our academic approaches to life. Though the academic world is craving for objective thought, thoughts and their critiques are always found within some emotional center. Post-colonialism is also a subjective response to western dominance. It questions western literature for its hegemonic tendencies. The problem with Indian post-colonialism is that it has negated its native colonial tendencies. It questions the other's faults without bringing into picture its own issues of domination. Even criticism has to have some ethical balance in its questions. When Indian scholarship has not questioned India's colonial attitudes, it has no moral right to question others. To acquire credibility, Indian post-colonialism has to do some self-critique.

Indian post-colonialism has borrowed heavily from the critical model of Edward Said. Orientalism is studied by Said as a mechanism, which constructed the orient in a political, sociological, ideological and scientific sense . Said suggests that justice should be practiced in academic research, instead of making partial judgments based on prejudices. He proves that ideologies are created by humanity to promote the self of man. Orientalism cannot stand the test of rationalism. To prove his point Said uses not only political issues, but also literature, treating works of art as pieces of political documents containing agendas and inner meanings.

Said uses the same method in his book Culture and Imperialism. When students try to do similar analysis for book after book in the name of research, we are encouraging a pessimistic and negative interpretation of literature. Precious time is spent in the name of research finding out the politics in every work of art. This kind of criticism will not encourage young readers to read literature. They will be more interested in tearing it apart to prove their superiority over the literary work itself and will ultimately lead to depression in society, as all value systems will be deconstructed one by one.

If Indian post-colonial thought believes in this method it should also expose the hegemonic tendencies in Indian literature too. Lectures in post-colonialism spend hours together speaking about the greatness of Sanskrit and the second-rate quality of other Indian languages while trying to decry English. If deconstruction is used for such academic practices, there is no point in talking about critical rationalism. Our intellectual energies are wasted in becoming anti-colonials all the while openly welcoming globalization. We don't want to accept this double quality in our thought, but are keenly interested in finding out the westerner's double standards.

To Said, a poet has to be basically a human being and should have the ability and the sensitivity to feel the pain of the loser also. In short, in his views, literature should not be hegemonic, but humanistic. But the literary form he is discussing here is an epic. It needed heroes and villains. All oral traditions and origin stories are the same. In Ramayana, Valmiki treats the Srilankan king as a villain. That does not make Ravanan a villain as is portrayed. A political reading of Ramayana will make Southerners hate North Indians. When Valmiki wrote he did not intend this end. During his times, the concept of the world would not have been as large as this. The unknown guy becomes the enemy in epics. To the Greeks, Asians must have been like the aliens. In Mahabharatha, Vyasar makes the sons of Dhirithrashtran as villains. Without a clear-cut definition of villains and heroes epic writing is not possible. With modern concept of the world we cannot read the classics. Five thousand years ago the concept of world must have been quite small. We have to take into account of the movement of time and the shift in politics from monarchy to democracy. Aeschylus would not have been a bad man that he would have hated Asians. He is writing not to please millions of readers, but to please his king and the other elites in his society. Quite naturally he would want to exaggerate certain factors.

If Said had tried to find out what Asian thoughts have felt about Europe then his criticism would have been impartial and humanistic. How does the Indian mind take western culture and tradition? Does it accept western attitudes and the colonial presence with total submissiveness? Could European tendencies really succeed in quenching the spirit of India? Is the Indian really against the westerner? What is the politics in Indian literature? Is it against east and west or Indian north and Indian south? Does India acknowledge the presence of Europe in its literature?

In Culture and Imperialism, Said reinterprets a few 19 century English novels. Of all the novels, the novels of Kipling and Jane Austen, obviously considered the canon texts, receive maximum attention from him. His interpretation of Kim by Kipling reveals the imperialistic tendencies and models of colonialism, which the writer has not negated. Said refers to Kim, as a successfully sustained and mature piece and accepts his literary position as a master stylist, one who acquired a large audience. The question he asks is: Does Kipling portray the Indians as inferior or as somehow equal but different? This question is contemporary as Kipling lived in a modern era used to democracy and mass publication different from the world Aeschylus lived. Why did Kipling encourage a portrayal of Indians as inferior people? Britain recognized the attitudes of Kipling as he became popular. Or, he wrote what the public wanted.

Said goes ahead and gives a short summary of the novel followed by an extensive and detailed discourse analysis looking at the novel from a political angle. Suitable passages are selected which can easily give in to such readings. All the while the artistic achievement and workmanship of Kipling are not questioned.

Kipling refuses to recognize Indian nationalism, and thus he fails to accept reality, and instead constructs his own sense of reality. A writer of the stature like Kipling himself has not arisen above the immediacies of life. He has only catered to his readership. Races have dreams of geographical extensions and writers are people drawn from a society caught by such dreams. Visions of writers become realities and thus the power of thought and word is very high. Subhramaniya Bharathi in Tamil strongly visualizes a free India.

How can we expect Bharathi to sing in support of the British, while his voice is the voice of the people? The poet cannot stand alone, distinct from his people. Right or wrong, the voice of people is the voice of the poet. After hundred years or thousand years or even now, can we blame Bharathi for encouraging fanaticism? What comes first? Writing or social thought? Can writing exist without social thought? Could Kipling have consciously moved himself away from the current social thought? Is it possible for Jane Austen to have separated her thought processes from her society? Can criticism expect a phenomenon that is not possible at all from writers? When we deal with the subject that deals with human emotions, passions and thoughts can we expect it to practice impartiality?

There is no drama in human life if every one practices impartiality. Impartiality in writing is possible only when people become impartial. Writing reflects life and not the other way. No writer can influence society if the society does not share his views. The power of the pen is itself the power of social thought. When the writer expresses and stamps the thought, he becomes successful. Writers become popular even among critics, only if highbrow thinking identifies its thought in them.

Literature should maintain a philosophical distance from actualities and identify with it is the message of Said in his books. What was the real purpose behind orientalism? Was it Europe's dream of becoming rich and powerful? Similarly, what is the dream of India now? What is going to be the future of India? Why is it encouraging globalization? Do all the writers from Asia keep themselves philosophically distant from geographical and political issues? As orientalism of the west is only one side of the story, what is the other side of the story? Even if the east did not construct a west, what is the reason?

How did Mulk Raj Anand or Manohar Malgonkar or even Tagore or Bharathi represent the white man, Said never bothers to find out. Said's criticism encourages leftist writing and calls right wing writing as hegemonic. To what extent can India portray or present England to Indian audience with neutrality? To whom will the author write, if not for his people? When Indian public is in favour of something, can the writer negate it?

When Kipling writes about India he concentrates in the problems westerners faced in India. Can we negate the pain the English man also went through in this alien land, if we have to practice the tenets of scientific principles in criticism?

To find fault with western imperialism we can directly use political policies of the government instead of using novels. When we read Kim, we do not look at it as an English novel against India, till we read Said. Deconstruction has politicized the novel that after reading Culture and Imperialism, we cannot enjoy the novel any more. If every work of art is going to be dehistoricised like this, finally there will be nothing left for our students who opt for literature. Which epic or novel or movie can withstand the test of politics? It is time to review our stand in post colonialism and establish an objective stand in interpreting literature.

Unpopular Essays

BERTRAND RUSSELL; (1872-1970)

Bertrand Russell, in full Bertrand Arthur William Russell, 3rd Earl Russell of Kingston Russell, Viscount Amberley of Amberley and of Ardsalla (born May 18, 1872, Trelleck, Monmouthshire, Wales—died Feb. 2, 1970, Penrhyndeudraeth, Merioneth), British philosopher, logician, and social reformer, founding figure in the analytic movement in Anglo-American philosophy, and recipient of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1950. Russell's contributions to logic, epistemology, and the philosophy of mathematics established him as one of the foremost philosophers of the 20th century. To the general public, however, he was best known as a campaigner for peace and as a popular writer on social, political, and moral subjects. During a long, productive, and often turbulent life, he published more than 70 books and about 2,000 articles, married four times, became involved in innumerable public controversies, and was honoured and reviled in almost equal measure throughout the world. Russell's article on the philosophical consequences of relativity appeared in the 13th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica.

Russell was born in Ravenscroft, the country home of his parents, Lord and Lady Amberley. His grandfather, Lord John Russell, was the youngest son of the 6th Duke of Bedford. In 1861, after a long and distinguished political career in which he served twice as prime minister, Lord Russell was ennobled by Queen Victoria, becoming the 1st Earl Russell. Bertrand Russell became the 3rd Earl Russell in 1931, after his elder brother, Frank, died childless.

Russell's early life was marred by tragedy and bereavement. By the time he was age six, his sister, Rachel, his parents, and his grandfather had all died, and he and Frank were left in the care of their grandmother, Countess Russell. Though Frank was sent to Winchester School, Bertrand was educated privately at home, and his childhood, to his later great regret, was spent largely in isolation from other children. Intellectually precocious, he became absorbed in mathematics from an early age and found the experience of learning Euclidean geometry at the age of 11 "as dazzling as first love," because it introduced him to the intoxicating possibility of certain, demonstrable knowledge. This led him to imagine that all knowledge might be provided with such secure foundations, a hope that lay at the very heart of his motivations as a philosopher. His earliest philosophical work was written during his adolescence and records the skeptical doubts that led him to abandon the Christian faith in which he had been brought up by his grandmother.

In 1890 Russell's isolation came to an end when he entered Trinity College, University of Cambridge, to study mathematics. There he made lifelong friends through his membership in the famously secretive student society the Apostles, whose members included some of the most influential philosophers of the day. Inspired by his discussions with this group, Russell abandoned mathematics for philosophy and won a fellowship at Trinity on the strength of a thesis entitled An Essay on the Foundations of Geometry, a revised version of which was published as his first philosophical book in 1897. Following Kant's Critique of Pure Reason (1781, 1787), this work presented a sophisticated idealist theory that viewed geometry as a description of the structure of spatial intuition.

In 1896 Russell published his first political work, German Social Democracy. Though sympathetic to the reformist aims of the German socialist movement, it included some trenchant and farsighted criticisms of Marxist dogmas. The book was written partly as the outcome of a visit to Berlin in 1895 with his first wife, Alys Pearsall Smith, whom he had married the previous year. In Berlin, Russell formulated an ambitious scheme of writing two series of books, one on the philosophy of the sciences, the other on social and political questions. "At last," as he later put it, "I would achieve a Hegelian synthesis in an encyclopaedic work dealing equally with theory and practice." He did, in fact, come to write on all the subjects he intended, but not in the form that he envisaged. Shortly after finishing his book on geometry, he abandoned the metaphysical idealism that was to have provided the framework for this grand synthesis.

Unpopular Essays: Introduction, Summary and Critical Stance

The Author's Intention to Combat Dogmatism: - The book called Unpopular Essays is a collection of ten essays on various subjects, a chapter containing Russell's impressions of some of the eminent men with whom he had come in contact, and a piece called "Obituary", in which Russell anticipates his own death and expresses briefly his own view of his character and his achievement.

In the preface to the book, Russell tells us that these essays were intended "to combat in one way or another, the growth of dogmatism whether of the Right or of the Left, which has hitherto characterized our tragic century". Russell also tells us that these essays were inspired by a serious purpose, even though at times they seem flippant. He also explains, in the ironical manner so characteristic of him, why he has called this book "Unpopular Essays". There are several sentences in this book, says Russell, which some unusually stupid children of the age of ten may find difficult to understand. That being so, he could not claim that the essays would be popular; and so, if not popular, then, unpopular.

The Popular Appeal of these Essays: - In actual fact, however, these essays have proved to be far from unpopular. The ideas expressed in them possess a popular appeal, and they are written in a style which is easily intelligible even to the layman. Besides, these essays have been made interesting, and almost entertaining, by Russell's unique treatment of the subjects chosen by him, and by his ironical and satirical wit. Nor can the serious purpose of these essays be questioned. A critic has made the following comment on the essays in this collection: "The frivolous wit on the surface almost disguises the serious task of mental slum-clearance to which they are addressed".

Russell's Many-sided Genius: - These essays cover a fairly wide range of subjects. We here see Russell as a philosopher, as a political theorist, as a social scientist, as an educationist, as a moralist, as a propagandist, as a close observer, and as an analyst of human life and character. Indeed, these essays reveal Russell's many-sided genius and his intellectual breadth.

The Contents of Russell's Book: - The following are the contents of this collection of essays: (1) "Philosophy and Politics"; (2) "Philosophy for Laymen"; (3) "The Future of Mankind"; (4) "Philosophy's Ulterior Motives"; (5) "The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed"; (6) "On Being Modern-Minded"; (7) "An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish"; (8) "The Functions of a Teacher"; (9) "Ideas That Have Helped Mankind"; (10) "Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind"; (11) "Eminent Men I Have Known"; and (12) "Obituary".

A brief synopsis of each of these chapters in this collection of essays is given below in order that the student may be able to have a bird's eye-view of the book as a whole.

(1) "Philosophy and Politics"

The Disastrous Political Consequences of Hegel's Philosophy: - This essay is an attack on the political consequences of Hegel's philosophy and a defence of Locke's philosophy of empiricism. After briefly explaining Hegel's belief in what Hegel called the Absolute Idea, Russell tells us that this philosophy had disastrous consequences in the political field. From Hegel's metaphysic, it follows that true liberty consists in obedience to an arbitrary authority, that free speech is an evil, that absolute monarchy is good, that war is desirable, and that an international organization for the peaceful settlement of disputes would be a misfortune. A philosophy which leads to such consequences is evidently something obnoxious, and it is really surprising how at one time this philosophy held a sway over the minds of intellectuals not only in Germany but even in Britain and America.

The Merits of Locke's Philosophy of Empiricism: - Russell then brings out the merits in Locke's philosophy of empiricism which, he tells us, offers a theoretical justification of democracy. Locke also preached religious toleration, representative institutions, and the limitations of governmental power by the system of checks and balances.

Conclusion: - Russell concludes this essay by recommending empiricism not only on the ground of its greater truth but also on ethical grounds. Empiricist liberalism is the only philosophy that can serve mankind's purposes in our times.

(2) "Philosophy for Laymen"

The Need of Teaching Philosophy to People: - In this essay, Russell explains very briefly the uses of philosophy. Philosophy, he says, means a love of wisdom. Philosophy in this sense is what people must acquire if the new technical powers achieved by man are not to plunge mankind into the greatest conceivable disaster.

However, the philosophy which the ordinary people should be taught is not the same thing as the philosophy of specialists.

The Theoretical Function of Philosophy: - Philosophy has always had two different objects: to arrive at a theoretical understanding of the structure of the world; and to discover and propagate the best possible way of life. Philosophy has thus been closely related to science on the one hand and to religion on the other. On its theoretical side philosophy partly consists in the framing of large general hypotheses which science is not yet in a position to test. (When it becomes possible to test such hypotheses they become part of science, and no longer belong to philosophy,) There are a number of purely theoretical questions, of everlasting interest, which science is unable to answer at present. Do we survive after death? Can mind dominate matter, or does matter completely dominate mind? Does this universe have a purpose, or is it driven by blind necessity? To keep alive the interest in such questions is one of the functions of philosophy.

The Practical Aspect of Philosophy: - On its practical side, philosophy can greatly increase a man's value as a human being and as a citizen. It can give a habit of exact and careful thought. It can give an impressive breadth and scope to the conception of the aims of life. It can give to the individual a correct estimate of himself in relation to society, and of man in the present to man in the past and in the future. It can offer a cure, or at least a palliative, for the anxieties and the anguish which afflict mankind at present.

(3) "The Future of Mankind"

The Need of a World-Government: - Here Russell visualizes the consequences of the next world war and expresses the view that only the establishment of a world-government can bring about lasting peace in the world. Russell would like the establishment of a world-government to take place under the leadership of America because there is greater respect in America for a civilized life than there is in Russia. By a civilized life, Russell means freedom of thought, freedom of inquiry, freedom of discussion, and humane feeling. If Russia dominates the world, all these freedoms will be crushed, and there will be a narrowing of science, philosophy, art, and literature. Only democracy and a free circulation of opinion can prevent a powerful government from establishing a servile State, with luxury for the few and overworked poverty for the many. Such a servile State has been established by the Soviet Government wherever it is in control.

Three Dangers to be Averted: - Mankind has to guard against three dangers: (a) the extinction of the human race; (b) a going back to barbarism; and (c) the establishment of a universal servile State, involving misery for the vast majority, and the disappearance of all progress in knowledge and thought. The only way to guard against these dangers is the establishment of a world-government through peaceful means, if possible, and through war if necessary.

(4) "Philosophy's Ulterior Motives"

The Distorting Influence of Desire Upon a Philosopher's Reasoning: - In this essay, Russell dwells upon the dangers and pitfalls faced by philosophers. It often happens that a philosopher is led by certain preconceived notions into a false reasoning, and in this way arrives at false conclusions. Russell takes the case of Descartes first. Descartes had a passionate desire for certainty, and so he started thinking out a new method of achieving certainty. He found that, while everything else could be doubted, he could not doubt his own existence. This became an excellent starting-point for him. He existed because he could see himself clearly and distinctly; and so he came to the conclusion that the things which he conceived very clearly and very distinctly were all true. He then began to conceive all sorts of things very clearly and very distinctly; for example, that an effect could not have more perfection than its cause. Since he could form an idea of God—that is, of a being more perfect than himself—this idea must have had a cause other than himself, which could only be God; therefore, God existed. Since God was good, He would not perpetually deceive Descartes; therefore the objects which Descartes saw when awake must really exist. And in this way Descartes went on throwing all intellectual caution to the winds. Everything that followed from this kind of reasoning was loose and slipshod and hasty. His method of reasoning thus showed the distorting influence of his own desire.

The Absurdities of the Reasoning of Some Other Well-known Philosophers: -
After showing us the absurdity of the conclusions which Descartes reached by his way of reasoning, Russell goes on to expose the absurdity of the reasoning and the conclusions arrived at by certain other philosophers. The other philosophers whom Russell considers here are Leibniz, Bishop Berkeley, Kant, Hegel, and finally Marx.

(5) "The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed"

The Tendency to Discover Some Superior Virtue in the Oppressed Sections of Society: -
In this essay Russell illustrates his view that there is a tendency on the part of writers, especially moralists, to attribute some superior virtue to those classes of people who are oppressed. Russell gives us five examples of the classes of people who have been, or who are, oppressed and who therefore are thought to possess some superior virtue.

The Various Examples Offered by Russell to Prove his Thesis: - The first example to illustrate the central idea of this essay is that of the poor people. The poor people were long regarded as morally better than the rich. The next example is that of nations which have been under foreign domination. Subject nations were believed to have possessed certain superior gifts and some special charm. However, as soon as the subject nations became independent, the belief in their superior gifts also disappeared. Then there is the case of the female sex. Women were believed to have a certain spiritual quality as long as they were dominated by men; but as soon as they achieved equality with men, their angelic qualities also vanished. Next is the example of children. Children were thought to be innocent and pure as long as parents could tyrannize over them; subsequently these superior qualities disappeared, and a new belief arose, namely that there was great wickedness in children in their unconscious minds. Lastly, a superior virtue has been found in the proletariat or the working-class, because this class has been oppressed for a long time. As soon as the proletariat attains its full rights, the superior virtue attributed to this class of people will also disappear. Stated in a nutshell, the thesis of this essay is that there is a tendency to glorify the oppressed class of people, the object behind such glorification being to continue the exploitation of that oppressed class,

(6) "On Being Modern-Minded"

Opinions Dominated By Fashion: - It has become a general tendency nowadays, says Russell, to adopt opinions which are current, and to show a contempt for the past. When fashion alone dominates opinion, it becomes unnecessary for people to think for themselves. The result is that a man deliberately suppresses what is individual in himself in order to acquire the opinions which are popular. A mentally solitary life for an individual has become pointless nowadays, according to the modern standards.

The Value of Detachment and Objectivity: - After criticizing the present-day trend towards adopting ready-made current opinions, Russell concludes the essay by pointing out the value of detachment and objectivity. A certain degree of isolation both in space and in time is necessary for the most important intellectual work. We must not sacrifice the independence of our minds merely to win the admiration of the crowd by holding opinions which have become current.

(7) "An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish"

Irrational Beliefs Propagated By Priests: - This is an essay directed against irrationality. The ages of faith, says Russell, were ages of superstition, and so there was little evidence of rationality in the outlook of people. Priests have always propagated irrational beliefs. The whole conception of sin in the past was merely a manifestation of the superstitious bent of mind. Similarly, the views relating to the resurrection of the body, the sacredness of human corpses, divorce, etc., were purely superstitious.

False Ideas of National and Racial Superiority: - As soon as we abandon our own reason, says Russell, and are content to rely upon authority, there is no end to our troubles. Human beliefs have various causes. There is, for instance, the belief which human beings have about their own excellence. The Englishman, the Frenchman, the Russian— each thinks of the superiority of his own nation and his own superiority as a member of that nation. There is also the belief that man is the supreme creation of God, and that centuries of evolution have been guided by one great divine purpose, namely, the appearance of man. But when we realize that life on this planet is temporary, this belief in the importance of man loses its validity. A scientific view of the future of the solar system lends no support to the view that man is all-important. Then there is the belief in the racial superiority of the white man over the coloured people, while the scientific fact is that there is no difference between the blood of a Negro and the blood of a white man.

A False Belief Regarding Human Nature and the Inevitability of Wars: - There is another wide-spread belief having no rational basis. It is that human nature cannot be changed, and that, for this reason, there will always be wars. The actual fact is that a powerful government, by following certain psychological methods, can produce a population of sane and reasonable people who will discard war. Unfortunately most governments do not wish to achieve such a result, because sane and reasonable people would fail to admire the politicians who are at the head of these governments. Most governments now instill their own particular brands of political ideologies among their respective populations. This kind of thing leads to a bitter hostility among nations which have been fed upon conflicting ideologies.

Some Other Irrational Beliefs: - Irrational beliefs hold a sway upon the minds of people with regard to birth control and with regard to the nature and disposition of the female sex. There are also irrational generalizations about national characteristics.

Some Simple Rules of Conduct: - Russell is of the opinion that by observing a few simple rules mankind can avoid the deplorable consequences which afflict human life because of irrational beliefs. One such rule is to base one's beliefs on actual observation. People must not be dogmatic; they must keep their minds open, and they must discuss their opinions with those whose views and opinions are different from their own. The feeling of self-esteem should also not be allowed to play any part in the holding of beliefs. Another desirable course is for human beings to conquer fear, because fear is the main source of superstition, and one of the main sources of cruelty.

A Note of Frivolity: - Russell closes this essay on a frivolous note, saying that superstitions are not always dark and cruel but that often they add to the gaiety of life.

(8) "The Functions of a Teacher"

The Need of Freedom for the Teacher: - In this essay we see Russell as an educationist. Russell is opposed to the rigid manner in which the State nowadays enforces its own ideology through the education that is imparted to pupils. In countries like Russia, the system of education is such as to produce fanatical bigots who are ignorant of the world outside their own country and who are unaccustomed to free discussion. As a result of the kind of education that is imparted to pupils in different countries, the spirit of cultural internationalism has received a severe setback. Russell pleads for the emancipation of the teacher from the intellectual bondage imposed upon him by the government of his country. Education should never be dogmatic, and that is possible only if the teachers are free to teach what they please and in the manner they think to be the best.

Teachers, the Guardians of Civilization: - Teachers are—more than any other class of people—the guardians of civilization. Civilization is a matter partly of knowledge and partly of emotion, and it is the duty of the teacher to impart the right kind of knowledge in an objective spirit, and similarly develop in the pupils the right kind of emotions. If democracy is to survive, the teacher should try to produce in his pupils the spirit of tolerance which will enable them to understand people who are different from themselves. An attitude of intolerance, which results from ignorance, is the very opposite of a civilized outlook; and the teacher should not allow the spirit of intolerance to take roots in the minds of his pupils. If the teacher is to succeed in his purpose, he must be free: he should feel himself to be an individual directed by an inner creative impulse, and not an individual dominated and controlled by an outside authority.

(9) "Ideas That Have Helped Mankind"

The Advances Made in Pre-historic Times: - In pre-historic times, mankind benefited greatly by the evolution, of language, the discovery of fire, the art of taming animals, the invention of agriculture, and the art of writing.

The Progress in Mathematics and Astronomy: - In historic times, the earliest important steps were taken in the spheres of mathematics and astronomy by the Babylonians and later by the Greeks. In the seventeenth century, Galileo, Descartes, Newton, and Leibniz made great advances in the human understanding of Nature. Galileo unified the principles governing the earth and the heavens by his law of inertia.

Darwin's Theory of Evolution: - From the seventeenth century onwards, it has become increasingly clear that, in order to understand natural laws, we must get rid of every kind of ethical and aesthetic bias. It was geology and Darwin's theory of evolution that first upset the irrational religious beliefs of scientists.

The Idea of the Brotherhood of Man: - Scientific progress without a corresponding moral and political progress may only increase the magnitude of the disaster that the misuse of scientific skill and technique may bring about. Among moral ideas, the brotherhood of man is an ideal which owed its first force to political developments. Subsequently, this ideal received a great support from Buddhism and Christianity.

The Ideas of Liberty and Democracy: -The ideas of liberty, equality, and fraternity have religious origins. The concept of individual liberty within the State first entered practical politics in the form of religious toleration. Other ideas which have helped mankind in the sphere of politics are law and government. Democracy is a system of government which aims at reconciling government with liberty.

The Need for an International Government: - Orderly social life depends upon a balance of certain ideas and institutions which are: government, law, individual liberty, and democracy. But modern techniques have created a new crisis for mankind. In order to face this crisis, people must recognize the need of an international government. If an international government of some kind is not established, the next world war will destroy all civilization.

(10) "Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind"

The Harm Done by Evil Passions: - The misfortunes of human beings have their main source in evil passions rather than in ideas or beliefs. People in the past enjoyed the spectacles of cruelty such as the burning of heretics, and many people even today find the brutalities of war to be enjoyable. Men's cruel impulses can do tremendous harm to them.

The Harm Done by Christian Asceticism and by Political Asceticism: - As for ideas and beliefs, much harm has been done by religious superstitions. Even Christian saints, who practiced asceticism, found pleasure in the thought that sinners would be subjected to great tortures in the next life. Nowadays Christian asceticism has given way to political asceticism. Communism, for instance, teaches its followers to sacrifice all pleasures and to live a life of hard work and toil because those who do not do so have to be either liquidated or put in concentration camps.

Cruelty Resulting from the Belief in Witchcraft: - The feeling that much of our suffering is due to the ill-will of other people led to the belief in witchcraft, and this belief was responsible for much cruelty towards those who were accused of being witches.

Envy and War: - Envy is one of the most powerful sources of false belief. In the international sphere, envy has led to the philosophy of economic nationalism. And this false belief becomes a cause of war.

The Suffering Caused by Pride: - Another passion which gives rise to false beliefs that are politically harmful is pride—pride of nationality, pride of race, pride of sex, pride of class, and pride of creed. All these kinds of pride lead to tremendous injustice and suffering.

A Delusion: - Yet another harmful belief results from the delusion which men and nations sometimes have that they are the special instruments of the divine will.

The Need of Tolerance and of an International Government: - Russell closes this essay with some very useful advice. Both in public and in private life, says he, the important thing is tolerance and kindliness. Besides, the establishment of an international government has become very necessary for the survival of civilization and for the prevention of war. What the world needs today is (1) political, economic, and educational organization; and (2) certain moral qualities, especially charity and tolerance instead of some fanatical faith represented by an "ism".

(11) "Eminent Men I Have Known"

Eminent Men in Different Fields: - This essay is a brief record of the impressions that Russell formed of certain eminent personalities with whom he came into contact. These eminent personalities included poets, philosophers, scientists, and politicians.

Poets: - Among the poets whom Russell met, he mentions Browning, Tennyson, and Rupert Brooke. Russell found Browning to be a pleasant and kindly gentleman, very much at home at tea-parties, but without the divine fire that is generally expected of a poet. For Tennyson, Russell developed an attitude of scorn. Rupert Brooke struck Russell as "beautiful and vital", but the total impression was marred by a touch of Byronic insincerity in the man.

Philosophers and Scientists: - As for philosophers, the most impressive in Russell's opinion was William James whom he found to be completely free from all consciousness of being a great man. Russell found Henry Sidgwick to be impressive through his quality of intellectual honesty. Among the scientists, Einstein impressed Russell as combining a powerful intellect with a childlike simplicity.

Politicians: Lenin and Gladstone: - As for politicians, Russell knew seven Prime Ministers of whom the most unforgettable was Mr. Gladstone. The only other man in public life as impressive as Mr. Gladstone was Lenin. Gladstone was an embodiment of Victorianism, and Lenin was an embodiment of Marxian formulas. Lenin was cruel while Gladstone was not. Lenin had no respect for tradition, while Gladstone had a great deal. Lenin considered all means legitimate for securing the victory of his party, whereas for Gladstone politics was a game with certain rules that must be observed. Both men derived their personal force from a firm conviction of their own Tightness.

A Simple and Good Man, though not Eminent: - At the end of this essay, Russell mentions a man who impressed him a good deal but who was not eminent in any sense. This man was a gardener who could neither read nor write, but who was a perfect type of simple goodness. Russell says that he could never forget this man because of his purity of mind. Worldly success seldom comes to such men, but they inspire love and admiration in those who know them.

(12) "Obituary" (1937)

An Obituary about Himself: - Here Russell shows his sense of humour by writing his own obituary. An obituary is the announcement of a death made by the relatives or friends of a deceased person, Here Russell imagines that he would die on June 1, 1962 and writes his own obituary in anticipation of his death.

Mathematical and Philosophical Works: - As an obituary is also expected to contain some of the important events of the life of a deceased person, Russell here mentions what he regards as some of the foremost incidents of his life. He tells us that in his youth he did work of importance in mathematical logic. He informs us that he did not enjoy the advantages of a public school education but that he was taught at home by tutors until the age of eighteen when he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, becoming seventh Wrangler in 1893 and a Fellow in 1895.

Among the books that he produced, Russell mentions The Foundations of Geometry, The Philosophy of Leibniz, The Principles of Mathematics, and Principia Mathematica (in collaboration with Dr. A.N. Whitehead).

His Pacifist Ideas: - Russell also refers here to his pacifist ideas and his staunch opposition to war. His opposition to war was regarded by some people as eccentric. As a result of his campaign against war during the Great War of 1914-18, he lost his job as a Lecturer at Trinity College, and had to spend a few months in prison.

Other Ideas: - Then Russell talks of his visits to Russia and to China in 1920, and goes on to mention his advocacy of socialism, educational reform, and a less rigid code of morals as regards marriage. In World War II, Russell took no public part, having escaped to a neutral country just before its outbreak.

Russell as a Humanist: his Pacifism and his Championship of Democracy; His Moral Fervour

All these essays show Russell not only as a philosopher but also as a man of strong humanitarian views. He is opposed to war; and he is a great liberal and an ardent supporter of individual freedom and democracy. These essays also show his moral fervour which appears in his advocacy of such qualities as tolerance, kindliness, mutual helpfulness, and sympathy. Russell had a broad mind and an all-embracing outlook: as an internationalist he urges the establishment of a world-government because he finds that the continuance of sovereign states with their narrow, nationalistic outlook can no longer serve the common interest of mankind but are a divisive force. In short, Russell appears in these essays as a most progressive and enlightened thinker who has the good of mankind at heart.

The Style of these Essays: - Russell is one of the great prose-stylists of the twentieth century. Although a philosopher, he does not write in a distorted or obscure manner even when writing about philosophy as we see in the very first essay called Philosophy and Politics, and in another essay called Philosophy's Ulterior Motives. His style is characterized by intellectual brilliance, clarity and lucidity, and a catholicity of temper. In addition to these qualities his style also shows his use of irony and a gay wit. His writing exactly reflects his crystalline, scintillating mind. All these essays are illumined by the clarity and grace of expression which are the most striking virtues of his style. Russell also gives evidence here of his capacity for making condensed statements and generalizations having a ready appeal. Russell did not evolve a style according to any premeditated theory or doctrine. His style came to him naturally. In his case, as in the case of other great writers, it can be said with certitude that the style is the man. His is a style which makes use of all the resources of the English language, excluding nothing and attaching no undue importance to any particular ingredient. Parallelisms, antitheses, contrast, simile, metaphor, quotation, anecdote, simple words and difficult words, short sentences and long sentences—all these are utilized by him to express himself effectively. But there is nothing gaudy or ostentatious about this style. It uses no ornamental devices. It is a plain, unembellished style. It does not even employ rhetoric. In fact, we cannot use a simple formula for this style as we can, for instance, for Bacon's style (concise and epigrammatic), for Carlyle's style (erudite, cumbersome, eccentric), or for Ruskin's style (musical prose). This is a style in which a perfect synthesis has been achieved between a multitude of different ingredients. In its own way it is a unique style.

Bertrand Russell as a pacifist and a socialist

Introduction

Bertrand Arthur William Russell (1872-1970) was a British philosopher, mathematician, and Nobel laureate, whose emphasis on logical analysis influenced the course of 20th-century philosophy.

Born in Trelleck, Wales, on May 18, 1872, Russell was educated at Trinity College, University of Cambridge. After graduation in 1894, he traveled in France, Germany, and the United States and was then made a fellow of Trinity College. From an early age he developed a strong sense of social consciousness; at the same time, he involved himself in the study of logical and mathematical questions, which he had made his special fields and on which he was called to lecture at many institutions throughout the world. He achieved prominence with his first major work, The Principles of Mathematics (1902), in which he attempted to remove mathematics from the realm of abstract philosophical notions and to give it a precise scientific framework.

Russell then collaborated for eight years with the British philosopher and mathematician Alfred North Whitehead to produce the monumental work Principia Mathematica (3 volumes, 1910-1913). This work showed that mathematics can be stated in terms of the concepts of general logic, such as class and membership in a class. It became a masterpiece of rational thought. Russell and Whitehead proved that numbers can be defined as classes of a certain type, and in the process they developed logic concepts and a logic notation that established symbolic logic as an important specialization within the field of philosophy. In his next major work, The Problems of Philosophy (1912), Russell borrowed from the fields of sociology, psychology, physics, and mathematics to refute the tenets of idealism, the dominant philosophical school of the period, which held that all objects and experiences are the product of the intellect. Russell, a realist, believed that objects perceived by the senses have an inherent reality independent of the mind.

Pacifist and Socialist

Russell condemned both sides in World War I (1914-1918), and for his uncompromising stand he was fined, imprisoned, and deprived of his teaching post at Cambridge. In prison he wrote Introduction to Mathematical Philosophy (1919), combining the two areas of knowledge he regarded as inseparable. After the war he visited the Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic, and in his book Practice and Theory of Bolshevism (1920) he expressed his disappointment with the form of socialism practiced there. He felt that the methods used to achieve a Communist system were intolerable and that the results obtained were not worth the price paid.

Russell taught at Beijing University in China during 1921 and 1922. From 1928 to 1932, after he returned to England, he conducted the private, highly progressive Beacon Hill School for young children. From 1938 to 1944 he taught at various educational institutions in the United States. He was barred, however, from teaching at the College of the City of New York (now City College of the City University of New York) by the state supreme court because of his attacks on religion in such works as What I Believe (1925) and his advocacy of sexual freedom, expressed in Manners and Morals (1929).

Russell returned to England in 1944 and was reinstated as a fellow of Trinity College. Although he abandoned pacifism to support the Allied cause in World War II (1939-1945), he became an ardent and active opponent of nuclear weapons. In 1949 he was awarded the Order of Merit by King George VI. Russell received the 1950 Nobel Prize for Literature and was cited as "the champion of humanity and freedom of thought." He led a movement in the late 1950s advocating unilateral nuclear disarmament by Britain, and at the age of 89 he was imprisoned after an antinuclear demonstration. He died on February 2, 1970.

Philosopher and Author

In addition to his earlier work, Russell also made a major contribution to the development of logical positivism, a strong philosophical movement of the 1930s and 1940s. The major Austrian philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, at one time Russell's student at Cambridge, was strongly influenced by his original concept of logical atomism. In his search for the nature and limits of knowledge, Russell was a leader in the revival of the philosophy of empiricism in the larger field of epistemology. In Our Knowledge of the External World (1926) and Inquiry into Meaning and Truth (1962), he attempted to explain all factual knowledge as constructed out of immediate experiences. Among his other books are The ABC of Relativity (1925), Education and the Social Order (1932), A History of Western Philosophy (1945), The Impact of Science upon Society (1952), My Philosophical Development (1959), War Crimes in Vietnam (1967), and The Autobiography of Bertrand Russell (3 volumes, 1967-1969).

Different Aspects of Russell's Personality

Bertrand Russell, whose name shines like a star in the world of philosophy and literature, was a great British philosopher of the 20th century. He was a multi-dimensional personality and his repute had many aspects. He was a scientist, philosopher, mathematician and a humanist. His thoughts and works have left indelible imprints on the intellectual history of the modern world. With his keen and sensitive vision, he observed every aspect and every color of life and practically took part in the affairs of life to know human problems and their solution. He was a lover of humanity. He tried to make man ponder over his status and station, and budge from victimizing and perishing his own species.

Russell was an outstanding mathematician and his contribution in mathematics is a milestone in this field. His Principa Mathatica written in collaboration with White-head, printed in 1913, in three volumes is a landmark in the history of mathematics. This glorious work by him has granted him a noble status among the scientists and mathematicians of world. His deep interest and proficiency in science and mathematics developed a philosophic approach in his mind and he made a high-ranking philosopher of his time. He always insisted to solve all the enigmas and problems of life with the tool of logic. He relied on logic and believed that the light of logic could guide a person on all the paths of life.

Russell was a person who did not confine his feeling and endeavors to a certain field. He did not devote his life to the intricacies of science and complexities of mathematics. Rather he eyed the beauties of life and noticed the threats to this beauty. His mind studied the enigmas of science but his heart throbbed for the humans all around. It was his special inclination towards humanity that he came out of his scientific world to observe and feel the human problems. That is why he not only produced scientific work but also wrote on social, political, human, economic and moral issues of the modern world.

Russell as a Humanist

Russell was born with a scientific brain and human heart. He felt all the sentiments of life. According to him life was the unique phenomenon in the cosmos. He believed that universe was a collection of phenomena and among them life was most charming phenomenon. This most beautiful picture of the album of universe is vandalized and spoiled by the man himself. It is man who unnecessarily takes on his fellows. He commits blunders, makes excesses and slaughters his own fellow beings. His unwanted greed and lust leads to horrible wars, which swallow the human blood and engulf human flesh. So Russell appeals to the good nature of man to teach him not to harm others. They should not be enemy of each other. He wants to see this world a cradle of peace and love, in which man's bosom is filled with love and affection, not hatred and venom for others.

Russell was strictly opposed to monarchy. He strongly flays on the monarchy system that binds humans in the chains of slavery. It is monarchy that humiliates and snatches the rights of humanity. At the same time, Russell also condemns the rule of church as it backs monarchy.

Being a philosopher, Russell does not believe in religion. In the history of Europe, the term humanism was introduced and propagated after Renaissance. He believed that humanism considered in the light of religion was limited and restricted. He defines humanism in a wider sense, without religious restrictions. According to him man is responsible for his good or bad deeds. There is no spiritual power to govern the human deeds. Russell strongly believes in reason and does not believe in some divine system to control human life.

Modern age is the age of democracy. Many countries of the world are running democratic system successfully. But, there is a presentiment that hostile nations may kick off war at any time. Russell believes that world is divided into groups based on race and creed. This difference has generated an antagonism among humans. In his book "New Hopes for a Changing World" he writes:

"One of the most obstinate and difficult of the problems to be resolved if a stable world government is to become possible is the hostility which is apt to arise between different races. When I speak of the races I mean genuine biological varieties of the human species, not the attitude of the Americans of English descent to the Red Indians was different from that of the English to the French, as is shown in the saying "The only good Red Indian is the Indian. (New Hopes)

Again he writes about slave trades:

"There has been one of the most shameful chapters in the history of the nominally Christian nations. The horrors of the slave trade are familiar. The life of a slave might or might not be one of hardships. As a rule household slaves were fairly well treated, but plantation slaves were cruelly exploited. The slave trade was stopped at the beginning of nineteenth century and slavery was ended by the civil war. But the color population remained and remains subject to intolerable hardships, injustices and cruelties."

At that time, the treatment meted out to Jews at the hands of Nazis was also outrageous. They were exterminated brutally, which was inhuman and condemnable.

Creeds and Ideologies

According to Russell creed and ideology are two words with the same meaning. Ideology is the system of ideas characterizing a party, while creed is a system of beliefs. Russell finds no difference in ideology and creed. Mankind is divided into different groups and sections due to difference of ideologies. The different ideologies or beliefs have created an unwanted antagonism among human beings. The poison of disparate beliefs is lethal to humanity. When this poison enters the blood of humans, it deprives them of their good nature and drives them on the paths of bigotry and violence. The big wars and bloody clashes between different nations have been due to difference of creeds or ideologies. A big example is the war of Crusade between the Muslims and the Christians fought for a long time. In the 20th century, two great wars were fought due communism and capitalism, extermination humanity in a dreadful way. Russell felt deeply this large-scale destruction of humanity and condemned it strongly. He was a propagator of peace, he was preacher of fraternity, so he deplored the annihilation and emphasized tolerance, forbearance and harmony. In this way Russell proved himself as the apostle of peace and lover of humanity.

As a Pacifist

Russell always detested wars. He criticizes and denounces the hostile nations who find solace in taking up arms and going to battlefields to solve their problems. Violence breeds violence. A war gives way to other wars. We cannot find the solutions to problems in human assassination. Russell wanted to see peace and harmony prevailing all over the world. He detested wars and bloody clashes engulfing the humans savagely. He vehemently protested against British government when it joined war against Germany in the First World War. He came on front as pacifist but was caught and imprisoned by the government. But this imprisonment could not shake his resolve and commitment to humanity. He remained firm and did not succumb to any pressure or high handedness. He stuck to his ideas and maintained his point of view in the Second World War. To eliminate wars in the world forever he stressed on the presence of one super power in world. There must be a super state with no adversary. And it is possible if America overcomes Russia, or Russia topples the America to become supreme power in the world. However he prefers America on Russia because America is better state in every respect and has ability to rule the world. Russian domination shall drive the world into hell. He says:

"There are even more important reasons for preferring a victory of America. I am not contending that capitalism is better than communism. My reason for siding with America is that in that country there is more respect than in Russia for the things that I value in a civilized way of life. The things have in mind are such as freedom of thought, freedom of inquiry, freedom of discussion and human feeling. What a victory of Russia would mean is easily to be seen in Poland. There were flourishing Universities in Poland, containing men of great intellectual eminence. Some of these men, fortunately, escaped. The rest disappeared. Education is now reduced to learning the formula of Stalinist Orthodoxy."

(New Hopes for a Changing World. P. 94)

The above-described thoughts give an ample proof of Russell to be a strong believer of intellectual freedom. At the same time he is so firm in his favor of America that he holds right to use force against Russia by the Alliance powers of the free world.

In the Second World War, the mass destruction caused by atomic bombs was evident to the whole world. The unprecedented devastation caused by atomic devices shocked the whole human race. Russell strictly condemned this act, for which he had to suffer imprisonment. Again, in 1962, when nuclear war was to kick off between two super powers because of Cuba crisis, he played a memorable role as the world pioneer of peace. Through his convincing letter, written to the heads of both super powers, he succeeded to dissuade them from carrying out a horrible folly. He was able to convince them that nuclear war would annihilate mankind on a large scale on the planet and all the achievement attained by man would be wiped out. This glorious act of Russell grants him an unmatched glory of character. He appeared as prophet of peace and saved humanity from most horrible devastation. He appeared to be not only a prophet of peace but as benefactor of mankind too.

He showed the man a way to solve their problem without waging war. He proved that pen is more effective than a gun. He always diffused tension with his speech and fought against two worst enemies of humanity---- bigotry and narrow mindedness.

Russell's intellectual vision was fairly wide. He was convinced of the nobility of man. He said that man was the noblest creation and he was the real beauty of the universe. But this cosmos is infinite and our earth is just a speck in this huge system. The life appeared on the earth due to favorable environment. Earth was situated at a great distance from the sun. The small heat reaching to earth from sun is conducive to life. The sun is source of energy to earth. If we cross O zone or go deep into the earth, life again becomes impossible. Earth is dependant on sun the gets energy and heat from it. If sun goes cold, life on earth will freeze. So life is subject to suitable environment and circumstances like other things, which cannot survive in non-favorable conditions. Russell negates the old traditional dogma that man is the center of Universe. Planets in the universe are countless like the specks of sand in a desert. Our earth is such a speck.

Russell wants man to crash out his self-styled shell of self and ego. He wants him to abandon self-glorification and cast a rational look on life and its wants. The idol of ego and self-centeredness has parted man from man. To bring men closer to men it calls for to leave obnoxious ethnic, racial and geographical prejudice.

Russell has praised the fortitude and stoicism of Boethius who wrote his great book "The Consolation of Philosophy" in the days of his imprisonment. In his writing he adopted a style, which had a majestic grandeur mingled with sweet reasonableness. He wrote the anthology with such nonchalance and content, as he was still a powerful prime minister. He described the pleasure of contemplation; the delight of world beauty and hopes of mankind, which did not, left him. Boethius had been in public administration but won a disfavor due to which he was sentenced to death. He was sure to be executed yet he did not loose courage. He completed his great book in jail, which according to Russell is more useful in the present age.

His War against Dogmatism and Superstition

Russell did not believe in religion. He was strictly against dogmatism. His deep scientific knowledge and high philosophic approach had given him a mindset to dispel traditional dogmas, which had been adopted by superstitious and narrow-minded people. In his "Unpopular Essays" under "An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish," he expresses his repulsion for the follies of man. He is not ready to admit the fact that man is a rational animal. Rather, in the light of his own experiences, he says:

"Through a long life I have looked diligently for evidence in favor of this statement, but so for I have not had the good fortune to come across it."

On the other side he says that he has seen great nation and formerly leaders of civilized nations, who were led astray by nonsensical declamatory speeches. Further, he says that he has sensed the bitterness and pain of cruelty, persecution and the follies superstition. All these ills are growing rapidly which is deplorable.

Russell regards the Age of Faith as the age of ignorance as the illogical and absurd teachings. They burnt many thousand hags alive for their deeds repugnant to Christianity. It was surprising for Russell to see men punished for their sins through calamities and famines. The narrow minded Clergy and their followers rejected every new discovery and invention as it was contrary to their faith. The Greek research that the earth is round was rejected due to the presence of antipodes. It was sacrilegious to believe that there were men at the antipodes. Again, when Benjamin Franklin invented the lightening rod, the Clergy both in England and America condemned it as a wicked attempt to defeat the will of God. Clergy believed that lightening is the tool of God to punish the sinners, however, the whip of lightening is not for the pious. There for Benjamin Franklin was not justified to be against the will of God. For a long time people has been sacrificing their children to avoid the anger of Maloch, the god of sacrifice, which was strictly against the canons of humanity.

All these foolish and cruel acts, which were fruits of superstition and dogmatism, have tortured and damaged human civilization greatly. Russell vehemently condemns such dogmas, some of which are still prevalent. If man sticks to such superstitious beliefs and does not discards such irrational practices, he can never attain the absolute happiness and contentment.

Russell tells us that the best way of getting rid of the folly of dogmatism is to be well aware of the opinions rampant in social circles, different from your own and try to know their logical truth. Travel can bring you closer to the people and help diminish the intensity of prejudice. If traveling is not possible than make a liaison with the people with whom you disagree or read the newspaper belonging to the party you dislike. Using this way you can broaden you outlook. For the people who are psychologically imaginative, it is good to make an imaginary argument with a person having a different point of view. The great Hindu leader of India, Mahatma Gandhi was opposed to railways, steamboats and machinery. If you fell into an imaginary discussion with Gandhi, you can easily judge his viewpoint. Again to judge the conviction of your own arguments you can imagine what Gandhi might have said to negate you views.

The orthodox object to cremation as it burns the spiritless human body, which is to be reborn on the judgment day. This objection indicates an insufficient faith in the omnipotence of God. It was thought to be difficult for God to recreate a burnt body on the judgment day in its real shape. This thought touches the boundaries of blasphemy. Russell regards this objection as ridiculous and baseless. He contends if God created a human body with most complicated systems, He can rebuilt the burnt body and infuse psyche into it on the judgment day without a pinch of difficulty. To doubt the powers of God is nothing but a blasphemy.

The church was against the dissection of corpse to view the intricate body systems as it was for the study of medicine. Vesalims, the court physician was the pioneer of dissection. He was an accomplished physician and his medical skill protected the emperor against bodily ailments. But after the emperor’s death, he was sentenced to pilgrimage to the Holy Land, by the church.

Till the 18th century, the cause of insanity was attributed to devil. The only way to get rid of this ill was to beat the devil so that to beat the patient. So the persecuted the devil, (the patient) was beaten savagely. But sometimes, this treatment did not work and the patient had to suffer without any rhyme and reason. This treatment was given to King George III, who was insane, but was not cured at all. In that age, the fallacies and discrimination of race and blood were common. The Nazis had adopted them as their creed. But all these were self-created myths. According to Russell there was no pure race in the world. In America, the colored races are considered inferior to the others in respect of intelligence. But those who measure intelligence are unable to know the reality of distinction.

Russell also discovered the causes of superstition. It is actually the influence of great fear, which makes the men superstitious. The sailors, who threw Jonah overboard, took his presence on boat as the cause of storm. When Maloch demanded the children of aristocrats to sacrifice to him, the Carthaginians deceived him by offering the children of lower strata for the sacrifice. This annoyed Maloch and he inflicted defeat on them. However they did not change their way and never offered their own children for the sacrifice. As a result they again met defeat at the hands of Romans.

When fear prevails over masses, they become nervous and disturbed and do anything to get rid of this fear. Fear generates the impulse of cruelty and they justify every nonsensical and fierce thing to discard this fear. This is actually superstition. During the French revolution people went desperate and it gave way to absurd cruelties in the beginning. Had this revolution met less hostility from outside, it would have been less fierce. So we can sum up that the human history has been full of intellectual rubbish. Russel, throughout his life, struggled to eliminate such follies from human mind. So he indicated the hidden causes of dogmas analyzed them on psychological basis with absolute ability.

Russell as a Prose Writer

Bertrand Russell is by all respects, a productive prose writer, who wrote abundantly. He is the prominent writer of present century who wrote on a variety of subjects of human interest, with great zeal and zest. He expressed his acumen and writing power in a forceful and logical style. He wrote almost on everything and there was hardly a human problem, which remained untouched by him.

Basically he was a mathematician and his grand, epoch-making contribution to his subject was published in three volumes. Principa Mathematica in collaboration with professor Whitehaed, which is verily a landmark in the history of mathematics. His scientific and mathematical skill together endowed him with approach to speak and write with perfect proficiency.

The fineness and beauty of his style depends mainly on clarity of his thoughts. There is no confusion or complexity. A rich coffer of knowledge made him upright and honest in his opinions.

Whenever Russell takes to writing on a subject, he adopts a systematic way for a successful production. About his own method of writing, he says:

"If I were to write upon some rather difficult topic, the best plan is to think about is with very great interest------ the great intensity of which I am capable----- for a few hours or days, and at the end of that time give orders, so to speak, that the work is to proceed under ground. After some months, I return consciously to the topic and find that the work has been done. Before I had discovered this technique, I used to spend the intervening months worrying because I was making no progress, I arrived at the solution none the sooner for this worry and the intervening months were wasted, whereas now I can devote to other pursuits.

(The Conquest of Happiness, page 50).

The above-mentioned reference indicates that Russell was convinced of clarity of thought and fluency of expression. His thoughts were always clear and his style always chaste, transparent and lucid. The clarity of thought and neatness of expression were the two things, out of which, he developed a charming style, which left indelible imprints on the reader's mind.

Unity of Thoughts

The second salient feature of Russell's style is the unity of thought. The discipline of logic and mathematics taught him the principle of unity of thought. Like a mathematical premise, his arguments start from a well-affirmed basic assumption and then he proceeds step by step to the logical conclusion of his arguments. A fine coherence exists in his arguments. Each argument is related to the preceding one like the anxious of Euclid. So the conclusion drawn is the logical outcome of his arguments.

The Exact Use of Words

Russell's ideal scientific inclination enables him to make an exact and perfect use of words. He uses words, which are rich, pure, clear and transparent. There is no ambiguity or obscurity. If some ambiguity occurs somewhere he clarifies it in the following sentences. He avoids excessive use of words. He words are small in number but rich in meaning. He avoids empty rhetoric, and produces a charm of writing with modest use of words.

Long Sentences

Russell usually uses lengthy and elaborate sentences to maintain his unity of thought. He is fully aware of this aspect of his style and therefore does not let the length of sentence harm the fluency of writing. From beginning to the end, his thoughts go steadily, and with pleasant rhythm and coherence. His style poses a medium though which his thoughts flow smoothly. There is not dullness, but sweetness in his writing, relished by the readers.

Simplicity of Language

Setting aside bombastic and pompous language, he insists on simplicity and effect of expression. He hardly uses excessive synonymous words to make the sentence tedious and tasteless. That is why his writing is not monotonous and dull, rather sweet and pleasant, relished interestingly by the readers. He adopts convincing and simple style which touch the core of reader's heart directly. He rarely uses excessive synonyms to make the sentence monotonous and boring. However his sentences are long and dilated. He unfurls his thoughts through the long sentences to preserve the unity of thought. Russell could not help it because he wrote on solemn and grave subjects, which demanded an interlinked unity of thoughts and arguments. It is not an easy job to dwell upon sober and grave subjects and maintaining the simplicity of description and clarity of thoughts. But Russell manipulated it with proficiency. He diminished the gravity of subject with simplicity and lucidity of words and produced a style, which was unique but familiar, scholarly and easy.

Seriousness

Almost all his writings retain the seriousness of the subject, but as we have pointed out earlier, his writing does not bear his personal emotional effect. He was among the greatest humanists of 20th century who deeply felt the pain and problems of humanity. He set forth a practical philosophy of human life and all his life preached for it. But again he was a not a traditional preacher like an old type dogmatic clergy. It was his intellectual vision, broadmindedness and impersonal attitude towards human problems, which made him a sober, prolific and high profile writer. The deepness of his outlook actually made his style heart-felt and effective. He was much concerned for the humanity surrounded by horrible problems. There was a possible danger of nuclear war after the invention of nuclear weapons, world population was growing at an alarming rate, natural resources were running out fast and the likelihood of calamities and famines was hanging like Damocles sword on the head of humanity.

Furthermore the endless ideological clash between the two great super powers of the world and its formidable effects on mankind, particularly on the developing countries did not let him attain a peace of mind. He sensed the danger of all these problems on and clamored for it through his writing. He also deplored the follies of man done in the past and showed his deep concern for the imminent calamities. His heart was teeming with sympathy and love for humanity. He contemplated on the human follies, problems and hardships and always thought of their solutions.

His Humor and Satire

A serious discussion, how much important it may be, makes a write-up dull and boring. In spite of high seriousness, Russell's style is tinged with cheerfulness and humor. His writing bears a highly intellectual and scholarly style, with a humorous touch. But his humor does not go outrageous or overboard. His writing never becomes disgusting rather is remains optimistic and lively with a ray of hope. This humor has a reformative aspect, which not only pinpoints human blunders, but also suggests a solution, with a hope for improvement in future. For example, when describing the opposition of the clergy against the scientific inventions towards the end of nineteenth century, when Franklin invented the lightning rod, he writes:

"When Benjamin Franklin invented the lightning rod, the Clergy both in England and America, with enthusiastic support of God to punish impiety or some other grave sin---- the virtuous are never struck by lightning. Therefore if God wants to strike anyone, Benjamin Franklin ought not to defeat His design, indeed to do so is to help criminals to escape. But was equal to the occasion. If we are believe the eminent Dr. Price, one of the leading divines of Boston. Lightning having been rendered ineffectual by the iron points invented by the sagacious Dr. Franklin, Massachusetts was shaken by earthquakes, which Dr. Price perceived to be due to God's wrath at the Iron Point.' In a sermon on the subject he said, "In Boston are more erected than elsewhere in New England, and Boston seems to be of God Apparently, however, Providence gave up all hopes of curing Boston of its wickedness, for though lightning rods became more and more common, earthquakes in Massachusetts have remained rare. Nevertheless, Dr. Price's point of view, or something very like it, was still held by one of the most influential men of recent times. When there were several bad earthquakes in India, Mahatma Gandhi solemnly warned his compatriots that these disasters had been sent as punishment for their sins." (Unpopular Essay page 85-86) The above detailed account shows sharpness of his humor and satire using which, how beautifully he exposes the follies of dogmatism.

Ornate Style

Though Russell's style is generally marked with clarity and brevity, yet he a capable of writing florid and embellished language, to prove his artistic command on writing. His only celebrated essay "The Free Man "Worship" published in his book Mysticism and Logic is a nice expression of his flowery and ornate style, which is an ample proof of his nice taste and command on English language.

Most of his writings are thoughtful and argumentative in nature, but it does not mar his clarity and fluency. The unity of thoughts pours out of his pen with a symmetry and harmony to make his description weighty and chaste. The excellent example of Russell's descriptive style is seen in his own autobiography. It describes his life history narrated in an attractive, simple and appealing way, which is read by the readers with great interest.

In short: Russell can be regarded as one of the greatest prose-writers of 20th century, who wrote on a variety of subjects relating to human life with a great writing skill. Clarity, simplicity, fluency and harmony are the salient features of his style. He skillfully expresses unity of thought along with his unity of style.

Russell's use of irony in his Unpopular Essays.

The Meaning of Irony

Irony always arises from a contrast. It generally implies a contrast between the obvious or surface meaning of a statement and the real or the intended meaning of it. It may also imply a contrast between the incomplete, limited, or inaccurate knowledge of people and the writer's fuller, wider, and more exact knowledge of the facts. Irony is one of the principal sources of humour.

It is one of the most effective weapons of satire. Satire generally aims at ridiculing persons or institutions or customs or modes of thought, and it often employes irony as its tool. The great satirists have always been masters in the use of irony. Such were Chaucer, Samuel Butler, (the author of Hudibras), Dryden, Alexander Pope, and Swift. In modern times, Aldous Huxley and Bertrand Russell are among the great writers to make use of irony as a weapon of attack.

Russell's Use of Irony and Its Purpose

The Unpopular Essays show Russell's use of irony to a striking degree. Russell too employs irony to expose the absurdity or stupidity of certain ideas, beliefs, customs, and institutions. His irony is free from malice, spite and spleen. His irony is not prompted by ill-will or cynicism. Nor does he become furious or indignant in his unmasking of the follies and absurdities in people's thinking. His purpose is improvement and reform; he aims at correcting wrong modes of thought, and teaching people to become rational in their thinking and in taking decisions in the course of their political and social life.

The Use of Irony in "Philosophy and Politics"

Russell is a serious writer; he has always something important and weighty to say. The use of irony, apart from serving as a weapon of attack in his hands, serves also to lighten the gravity of the tone of his writing. For instance, in the essay Philosophy and Politics we feel greatly amused when Russell ironically points out the absurdity of Hegel's philosophy by reducing Hegel's definition of the Absolute Idea to the statement that it is "pure thought thinking about pure thought". Russell mocks at this philosophy by further pointing out what the general reaction of people to it would be. People, says Russell, would not think it worth their while to go through all the verbiage of Hegel and, after reading it, they would "say good-bye to philosophy and live happy ever after". In the same essay, Russell ironically says that people who oppose the philosopher are condemned as unphilosophic, and those who agree with him feel assured of victory, since the universe is on their side. And Russell here ironically adds: "At the same time the winning side, for reasons which remain somewhat obscure is represented as the side of virtue". In the course of the same essay, Russell quotes an ancient Greek writer who said that every beast was driven to the pasture with blows, and then makes the following ironical comment: "Let us, in any case, make sure of the blows; whether they lead to a pasture is a matter of minor importance—except, of course, to the beasts". Russell's criticism of Plato's Republic is also characterized by a use of irony. This recurrent use of irony makes the essay quite entertaining, serious though it is as regards its ideas. Indeed, Russell shows an exceptional capacity to ridicule what is false, fanciful or ill-founded.

An Extensive Use of Irony to Expose Certain Absurdities in "The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed"

Irony is all-pervasive in the essay, The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed. Here we have irony in the very title of the essay, because the superior virtue attributed to the oppressed sections of the population is purely imaginary; this superior virtue does not really exist: it is simply attributed to the oppressed class of people as a compensation for the exploitation to which they are subjected. Russell gives us various examples to illustrate his thesis, and a vein of irony runs through his analysis of the various cases with which he deals. For instance, he ironically observes that in the eighteenth century virtue was not to be found in courts but that court ladies could almost secure it by disguising themselves as shepherdesses because virtue was to be found among the poor. Russell quotes a couple of lines from a poem by Alexander Pope to show that Pope expressed a belief in the blessings of poverty; but then Russell ironically adds: "Nevertheless, for himself Pope preferred London and his villa at Twickenham". What Russell means is that Pope himself tasted the joys of a fashionable life in the city or near the city, while recommending a poor life to people living in the countryside. Russell also makes an ironical reference to the British domination of Ireland. In this context, Russell says that the Irish were regarded by the English as possessed of a special charm and mystical insight until 1921, when it was found that the expense of continuing to oppress them would be too heavy. Then Russell goes on to tell us in the same ironical vein that old English ladies still sentimentalize about the wisdom of the east, and American intellectuals about the "earth-consciousness" of the Negro. In dealing with men's attitude towards the female sex, Russell again makes use of irony. A combination of the Madonna and the lady of chivalry, says Russell, was created in the nineteenth century as the ideal of the ordinary married woman. For a long time, women were regarded as a spiritual force and as the angelic part of humanity, but as soon as women began to demand and acquire equal rights with men, the belief in their superiority over men on spiritual grounds vanished. Thus the belief in women's superiority was part and parcel of men's determination to keep women inferior economically and politically. Russell also mocks at the Freudian theory of the unconscious in so far as it encourages the belief that children are little devils because all kinds of sinful thoughts fill their unconscious minds. In this connection Russell ironically asks whether this theory states the objective truth at last or it is merely an adult imaginative compensation for being no longer allowed to victimize children. And Russell ironically adds: "Let the Freudians answer, such for the others". Thus Russell pokes fun at the Freudians. Again, there is much irony in the way Russell ridicules the communists who tend to discover a superior virtue in the proletariat. The communist intellectuals find the proletariat more amiable than other people. In other words, the tendency of the communist intellectuals is to idealize the proletariat, just as Wordsworth idealized children. It would be more rational, Russell wants to say, for intellectuals to advocate an improvement in the conditions of life of the proletariat to enable them to enjoy all the advantages of a good life; there is no point in building up fanciful theories such as the view that the proletariat is more amiable than other classes of people. Thus Russell gives evidence of his fertile and ready wit. In attacking what seems false or absurd to him, Russell never loses his temper and never becomes abusive; he makes use of his ironical wit and his talent for satire to expose the falseness and the absurdity

The Use of Irony to Ridicule "Modernity"

In the essay, On Being Modern-Minded, the very opening passage contains examples of Russell's use of irony. Russell makes fun of the modern man who thinks that he stands at the apex of human intelligence and that the customs and beliefs of his ancestor have lost all their validity and value. And then, in the same ironical vein, Russell says that, if Hamlet is to be made interesting for a really modern reader, it must first be translated into the language of Marx or of Freud or, better still, into a jargon inconsistently combining both. Russell then refers to a review according to which what had been written about Hamlet in the past had lost its critical value, and makes fun of the author of that review by pointing out that the review itself would, by the reviewer's own standards, soon become out of date. And then Russell ironically adds that the reviewer concerned would be quite happy to find his review becoming obsolete because the reviewer himself would soon have adopted the new fashion in critical opinions. Russell concludes this part of the argument by the following ironical remark: "Any other ideal for a writer could seem absurd and old-fashioned to the modern-minded man". In the same essay Russell goes on to tell us ironically how fashion dominates opinion in modem times. Fashion makes thinking unnecessary and puts the highest intelligence within the reach of every one. It is not difficult to learn the correct use of such words as "complex", "Oedipus", "bourgeoise" and "deviation"; and nothing more is needed to make a brilliant writer or talker. Thus Russell exposes the shallowness of the modern-minded man who pretends to be a brilliant writer or talker by having learnt the use of certain words introduced into the language by modem thinkers. A man has merely to parade his knowledge of these words in order to be thought modern and up-to-date.

An Example of Irony from "The Future of Mankind"

An amusing example of irony occurs in the essay, The Future of Mankind, when Russell pokes fun at Stalin who then alive. In this connection Russell makes the following ironical remark: "Stalin at all times knows the truth about metaphysics, but you must not suppose that the truth this year is the same as it was last year".

The Use of Irony to Expose the Absurdity of Certain Religious Beliefs

There are several examples of the use of irony in the essay, An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish. There is ironical humour in the statement that, if pious men are to be believed, God's mercies are curiously selective. Russell here refers to the case of a priest who moved from one residence to another and who thanked God for his mercy when the house he had vacated caught fire and was burnt down. The implication here is that, if God was merciful to this particular priest, He must have been merciless towards the next priest who had occupied the house vacated by the first. A similar absurdity is pointed out in the case of George Borrow. Borrow thanked God for God's mercy when he escaped being attacked by bandits who attacked and murdered some other travellers crossing a particular mountain after Borrow had crossed it. There is also ironical humour in Russell's statement that religious persons conceive of God as a peeping Tom, whose omnipotence enables him to see through bath-room walls but who is foiled by bath-robes. Russell makes this statement in the context of the practice of nuns who never take a bath without wearing a bath-robe even when they are inside a bath-room where no man can see them. The plea of the nuns is that they wear bath-robes not against the eyes of men but against the eyes of God. When Russell says that the whole conception of sin is puzzling to him, he ironically adds: "doubtless, owing to my sinful nature". In the same context, he says that, if God is capable of wanton cruelty, he should certainly not think Him worthy of worship, and then adds ironically: "But that only proves how sunk I am in moral depravity". In connection with the initial opposition to the dissection of corpses, Russell ironically tells us that a French surgeon's demand for dead bodies for purposes of dissection was received with horror by the Chinese, but that the surgeon was offered an unlimited supply of living criminals whom he could dissect. Again, Russell writes in an ironical vein: "One would suppose that God sees everything, but apparently this is a mistake. He does not see Reno, for you cannot be divorced in the sight of God". (Reno is an American city where divorce is easy to obtain. The implication is that either God is not present at Reno or that God does not see Reno.) Speaking of Mr. Homo, Russell ironically says: "If he is a Yugoslav, he boasts of his nation's pigs; if a native of Monaco, he boasts of leading the world in the matter of gambling". Next, Russell refers ironically to the Biblical doctrine that God made man in His own image and that everything was created for man's convenience. Here Russell ironically adds: "Even the white tails of rabbits, according to some theologians, have a purpose, namely to make it easier for sportsmen to shoot them". Commenting on Adam's eating the apple, Russell ironically says that originally all animals were vegetarians, and the season was always spring. And, in the same ironical tone, Russell goes on to say: If only Adam had been content with peaches, nectarines, grapes, pears,, and pineapples, mankind would not have lost some of the original blessings. It is noteworthy that all these ironical remarks have been made by Russell in order to expose the absurdities of certain religious beliefs which have for centuries been dominating the minds of human, beings.

The Use of Irony in the Essay "Ideas That Have Helped Mankind"

In the essay, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind, we have an example of what is known as devastating irony. Speaking of international disputes and the possibility of the next world war completely destroying the human race, Russell points out that narrow nationalistic ideas often blind the politicians to the disastrous consequences which can result from their squabbles. Russell in this context refers to the disputes about Persian oil, the disagreement as to Chinese trade, the quarrels between the Jews and the Muslims for the control of Palestine; and he then makes the following ironical and sarcastic remark: "Any patriotic person can see that these issues are of such importance as to make the extermination of mankind preferable to cowardly conciliation". Another example of irony in this essay occurs when, after mentioning the brutalities committed by the Germans and the Russians, he writes: "And how about our noble selves? We would not do such deeds. Oh no! But we enjoy our juicy steaks and our hot rolls while German children die of hunger." This ironical remark is intended to bring out the cruel impulses lurking at the bottom of the apparently generous mind of the British and the American people.

The Use of Irony in the Essay, "Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind"

In the essay, Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind, Russell gives us an ironical picture of the minds of the Christian saints. These saints abstained from all the pleasures of the senses. Well and good. But these saints were not so kind and humane as we might think. Even they sought the gratification of their cruel impulses. They experienced the pleasure of contemplating the eternal tortures to which the pagans and heretics would be subjected to in the next life. Again, the two parables or fables offered by Russell in this essay are ironical in tone and intention. One of the parables pertains to a cow grazing in a field, and the other relates to the sense of rivalry among butchers and bakers By means of these fables, Russell makes us laugh at the absurdity of human beings who create certain myths to explain their misfortunes and the absurdity also of those who indulge in competitive practices with the object of making larger profits. There is irony too in the manner in which Russell describes the feelings of national, racial, and religious pride.

Irony to Demolish Obsolete Ideas and Beliefs

In all these cases, it is clear, Russell uses irony in order to attack superstitions, false notions, ridiculous beliefs, and fanciful suppositions. The use of irony makes these essays interesting, and lends them a spicy flavour. The use of irony is an important ingredient of Russell's prose-style. His style would have been so much less entertaining without the use of this weapon which is so effective in demolishing ideas that have become obsolete and creeds that have become outworn. The use of irony greatly contributes to making these essays an intellectual treat for the reader.

To what extent and in what way do the Unpopular Essays show Bertrand Russell to be an opponent of dogmatism and an apostle of liberalism?

The Meaning of Dogmatism and of Liberalism

Dogmatism implies a stubborn holding of beliefs and opinions, and a refusal to subject them to the scrutiny of reason or verify them by evidence. Liberalism, on the contrary, means keeping an open mind, a mind receptive to the fresh evidence which may become available. Liberalism, in other words, implies a readiness to modify, alter, or discard the views which one holds if fresh evidence so dictates. Russell is a determined opponent of dogmatism of all kinds, dogmatism in the philosophical sphere, dogmatism in the religious sphere, dogmatism in the political and social spheres, and dogmatism in educational theories. He is truly an apostle of liberalism. The Unpopular-Essays provide ample evidence to show Russell as a relentless critic of all kinds of dogmatic beliefs, and an ardent upholder of the liberal attitude in all fields of thinking.

The Dogmatism of the Catholics, the Nazis, and the Communists

Russell's opposition to dogmatism in the philosophical and religious spheres, and in the political sphere, is evident in the very first essay, Philosophy and Politics. He here points out that the Catholic Church is connected to the philosophy of Aquinas, and that the Soviet government is connected to the philosophy of Karl Marx. The Nazis upheld German idealism, though the degree of allegiance which they offered to Kant, Fitchte, or Hegel respectively was not clearly laid down. All these three classes of people: Catholics, Communists, and Nazis, are dogmatists, Russell rightly tells us. John Locke is mentioned by Russell as an example of the liberal thinker who showed himself to be a powerful opponent of Hegel and the Hegelian philosophy. Even Plato was a dogmatist, though his dogmatism was not realized until his disciples, Lenin and Hitler, had committed their worst excesses in the persecution of those who did not accept their political ideologies. The political consequences of Hegel's philosophy, like those of the philosophy of Plato, proved to be disastrous. It follows from Hegel's philosophy that true liberty consists in obedience to arbitrary authority, that free speech is an evil, that absolute monarchy is good, that war is desirable, and that there is no need at all for an international organization to bring about a peaceful settlement of disputes. Hegel's philosophy had a great influence on Karl Marx who took over some of Hegel's most fanciful tenets, more particularly the belief that history develops according to a logical plan and is concerned to find ways of avoiding self-contradiction. According to the philosophy of Hegel, and according to the disciples of Marx, any degree of coercion is justified if it leads to the goals stated by them. Both Hegel and Marx thus justify autocracy or despotism or tyranny on the basis of their dogmas.

Locke's Liberalism

Locke's philosophy of empiricism, on the contrary, lends support to an attitude of liberalism and to the democratic values. Locke's empiricism is intimately connected with his views on liberty and toleration, and with his opposition to absolute monarchy. Locke preached religious toleration, representative institutions, and the limitation of governmental power by the system of checks and balances.

The Need of Tentativeness and Tolerance

An examination of these two philosophies makes Russell come to the conclusion that "only through a revival of liberal tentativeness and tolerance can our world survive". Russell condemns dictatorships, concentration camps, and world wars, and mentions the brutal treatment of the Jews at Auschwitz as an example of persecution resulting from dogmatic beliefs. Russell advocates a rational outlook or a scientific attitude: "Science is empirical, tentative and undogmatic; all immutable dogma is unscientific".

The Advantages of Dogmatism Purely Illusory

Russell also rebuts the argument that in a war between liberals and dogmatists (or fanatics), the dogmatists are sure to win. Russell points out that dogmatists or fanatics have failed over and over again because they were too unscientific to adopt the right means even when their aims were good. In every important war since 1700, the more democratic side has been victorious, and the dogmatists have been defeated. Nor does Russell accept the view that systems of dogma, such as Marxism and fascism are capable of producing a greater degree of social unity. During World War II, no nation showed greater social unity than England with its democratic system.

Empiricist Liberalism, the Need of the Times

Russell closes this essay with the statement that dogma demands authority rather than intelligent thought as the source of opinion, that dogma requires the persecution of those who disagree, and that empiricist liberalism is the only philosophy that can serve the purpose in the modern world.

Political Dogmatism in Soviet Russia

In the essay, The Future of Mankind, Russell condemns the political dogmatism which holds the field in Soviet Russia and in countries under Soviet control. In Poland, for instance, education has been reduced to learning the formulas of Stalinist orthodoxy. From such an educational system nothing of intellectual value can result, says Russell. Russell advocates the freedom of thought, the freedom of inquiry, the freedom of discussion, and humane feeling which are found in the U.S.A. A Russian victory in any future world war would be an appalling disaster. Russell gives several examples of the way in which the government in Soviet Russia tries to control the minds of the people with its dogmatic teaching. To take only one example, in America one may write a book debunking Lincoln if one feels so inclined; in Russia, if one writes a book debunking Lenin, the book would not be published, and the writer would be liquidated. Only democracy and free publicity, says Russell, can prevent the holders of power from establishing a servile State.

Religious Dogmatism

In the essay, An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish, Russell first of all condemns the dogmatism of priests. Daring the ages of faith, the priests taught that man’s sins were punished by pestilence, by famine, by earthquakes, by floods etc.; and many thousands of witches were burnt at the stake. So dogmatic were the men of religion that they put up a stiff resistance against Darwin’s theory of evolution; and so dogmatic are they still that they are now fighting in the same fanatical manner against scientific theories of psychology and education. Another example of religious dogmatism is that, although the Copernican astronomy is taught in schools and colleges, it has yet not produced any great influence on people’s religious beliefs and their morals; in fact, this astronomy has not even succeeded in destroying the belief in astrology, so that people still believe in the influence of stars upon human life. Russell’s liberalism also compels him to question the whole conception of sin. Russell feels puzzled by what the religious people consider sinful and by what they do not consider sinful. He exposes the absurdity of such dogmatic beliefs as that human beings will one day rise from their graves, that sexual intercourse is sinful, that there is no need to show any sympathy for the lower animals, that mercy-killing is wicked. In this context, Russell ridicules the puritanical ideas of Tolstoy, Mahatma Gandhi, and the Manichaeans. One of the most amusing examples of the absurdity of such beliefs is a Catholic theologian's view that a priest may fondle a nun's breasts provided he does so without any evil intention.

Other Dogmas and their Consequences

Russell also dwells in the same essay upon the fallacious ideas which result from the dogmas about race and blood. A dogma which causes much mischief is the view that human nature cannot be changed. As a consequence of this belief is the dogmatic assertion that there will always be wars because human nature is so constituted that wars will always be needed. Opposition to birth control is the result of another dogmatic belief on the part of theologians. In short, dogmatic beliefs have done tremendous harm to mankind, and so Russell suggests certain simple rules by which human beings can rid themselves of at least certain kinds of dogmatism, the general rule in this connection being that one should freely discuss one's ideas and opinions with those who hold different views and opinions. Russell advocates complete freedom of discussion and exchange of views.

The Dangers of Dogmatic Education

The Functions of a Teacher is another essay in which Russell appears as a champion of liberalism and a foe of dogmatism. He here deplores the fact that institutions such as universities largely remained in the grip of the dogmatists for many centuries. Russell refers to the dangers of State education which seeks to control the minds of people by instilling certain dogmatic beliefs among them. The evils to be feared as a result of State education were seen in their full magnitude in Nazi Germany, and are still seen in Russia. State education in such countries produces fanatical bigots, who are ignorant of the world outside their own countries, and who are totally unaccustomed to free discussion. The modern dogmatists, says Russell, are preaching one creed in Germany, another in Italy, another in Russia, and yet another in Japan. This kind of thing does great damage to the concept of cultural internationalism which has rapidly been declining ever since the First World War. The inculcation of different dogmatic beliefs in different countries can only lead to another world war, because each set of dogmatists thinks itself to be in the right and all others to be in the wrong. Russell pleads for complete freedom to the teacher who should feel himself to be an individual directed by an inner creative impulse, not dominated and fettered by an outside authority. He strongly disapproves of the system of education by which nationalistic feeling is encouraged in every country and school-children are taught that the inhabitants of other countries are inferior to the inhabitants of their own country. In this way, Russell upholds the liberal ideal in the field of education.

Liberalism: Brotherhood of Man; Individual Liberty; Democracy

In the essay, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind, Russell lends a strong support to such liberal ideas as the brotherhood of man and the freedom of the individual. He traces the development of the concept of the brotherhood of man which was invented by the Stoics, and he dwells upon the meaning of individual liberty. The greatest of the theoretical advocates of liberty was John Locke whose philosophy Russell has discussed in the very first essay in our collection. In this context, Russell refers to the feeling of perplexity which Stalin experienced when, in compliance with the democratic traditions, Winston Churchill resigned as the British Prime Minister when his party was defeated in the general election. The dogmatist Stalin could not understand why Churchill should have given up his control of the government because of the result of a popular vote. In this context, Russell writes: "I am a firm believer in democratic representative government as the best form for those who have the tolerance and self-restraint that is required to make it workable." But Russell is opposed to dogmatism even in supporting democracy as a form of government. He is a believer in democracy, but not a fanatical believer in democracy. He thinks democracy to be an excellent form of government, but it is not a desirable form of government for every country, because some countries are not mentally and morally fit for this system.

Further Condemnation by Russell of Dogmatic Beliefs

Dogmatic beliefs are also condemned and ridiculed by Russell in the companion-essay called Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind. Russell mocks at the dogmatism of the Christian saints who, abstaining from the pleasures of senses, yet enjoyed thinking that pagans and heretics would suffer eternal tortures in hell. This is described by Russell as a fierce form of Christian dogma, an ascetic form of cruelty. The modern political scene shows somewhat similar beliefs. The German Nazis and the Russian communists have given a political twist to the Christian dogma; they have replaced hell with concentration camps and they teach that the best life is a life of hard work in the service of the government. Another dogma in modern times is the philosophy of economic nationalism which is based on the false belief that the economic interest of one nation is necessarily opposed to that of another. Still more examples of dogmatic beliefs are the beliefs in the superiority of the nation, or the race, or the sex, or the class, or the creed to which one belongs. All these dogmatic beliefs lead only to conflicts and persecution. And Russell's recipe is that "in public as in private life, the important thing is tolerance and kindliness". Once again Russell asserts that democracy is an excellent form of government, and once again he points out that the believers in democracy should not assume a fanatical tone, because democracy is not the best system of government always and everywhere.

One of the important liberal ideas of Russell is that only the establishment of an international government can now save the world.

How will you account for Bertrand Russell's appeal to the modern reader? Illustrate your answer from the essays prescribed for you.

The Continuing Validity of Russell's Ideas

The ideas which Russell preached and which he tried to popularize have not lost their validity even today. The problems which he wanted to solve and the dangers against which he warned the readers of his own day continue almost unabated, and in some cases the dangers have actually increased. The value of the suggestions and remedies offered by Russell also continues undiminished. We can still greatly benefit by Russell's exhortations. The relevance of Russell's thought to our times is very great, indeed.

Russell's Opposition to Dogmatism, and his Advocacy of Liberalism

In the preface to the Unpopular Essays, Russell tells us of his purpose to combat the growth of dogmatism, whether of the Right or of the Left, which has hitherto characterized our tragic century. This purpose becomes perfectly clear as we go through these essays. In Philosophy and Politics, for instance, he tells us that dogma demands authority, rather than intelligent thought, as the source of opinion; dogma requires the persecution of those who disagree; dogma calls upon its followers to suppress their natural sympathy and kindness in favour of systematic hatreds. The conflicts that occur between rival dogmatists are bound to lead to war; and war, in our scientific age, means universal death. As against dogmatism, Russell advocates liberalism which means keeping an open mind and a readiness to change one's opinions when fresh evidence becomes available. The liberal creed is one of "live and let live", of toleration and freedom, of moderation and absence of fanaticism in political programmes. In the essay, The Future of Mankind, Russell points out that Russian control over Poland led to education in that country losing its liberal character; education was there reduced to learning the formulas of communist theory; and from such an educational system nothing of intellectual value can result. He also speaks of the absence of intellectual freedom in the Soviet Union itself where, if a man writes a book debunking Lenin, he would be liquidated. In the essay The Functions of a Teacher, Russell points out that the young in Nazi Germany became, and in Russia still become, fanatical bigots, ignorant of the world outside their own country. In An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish Russell suggests that a good way of ridding yourself of certain kinds of dogmatism is to become aware of opinions held in social circles different from your own.

The Value of Russell's Campaign Against Dogmatism

The value of Russell's campaign against political dogmatism is very great even today. If anything, this dogmatism has further hardened in communist countries like Russia and China. Countries like Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia continue to be under the rigid control of Russian communist ideology. All these countries have a totalitarian system of government which is opposed to individual freedom in any form. A citizen in any one of these is a slave to the ideas and doctrines which the government there constantly instils among the people. The writings of a man like Russell would not, for instance, find their way into any of the communist countries for fear lest his ideas should sow rebellion or discontent in the minds of the people there. By going through Russell's ideas we realize how fortunate we are in living in a country where the government does not indoctrinate its citizens and does not try to bring about a regimentation or uniformity of thought.

Russell's Emphasis on Rationalism

The essay called An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish places much emphasis on the need of a rational attitude towards life. Unfortunately, says Russell, cruelty, persecution and superstition have been increasing in this world by leaps and bounds, and rationality has been pushed into the background. Russell then points out the irrationality which characterizes the religious beliefs that have for centuries been held by priests and propagated by them. The belief in witchcraft, the belief that people's sins are punished by pestilence or earthquake or famine, the whole conception of sin, the view that all sexual intercourse is wicked—all these are examples of irrational beliefs. Then there ate the irrational ideas about the superiority of particular races. Irrational also is the view that human nature cannot be changed and that there will always be wars. Science has always tried to fight against all such irrational beliefs, and today science is fighting one of its most difficult battles in the sphere of psychology. What is worse even than holding irrational beliefs is to become dogmatic in holding them, and that is the general tendency where religious beliefs are concerned.

The Value of Russell's Gospel of Rationalism Today

All this is applicable even to present-day conditions in which we find ourselves. Russell's gospel of rationalism is of the utmost importance for our own country if we want to accelerate the pace of our progress. Our people still remain extremely orthodox and conservative in holding certain beliefs in the spheres of religion and morals. Superstitions still reign supreme in our country. The worship of all kinds of deities goes on here with the greatest possible fervour. The exploitation of people by the priests of various religions in this country continues to be as great as ever it was, and the number of the so-called "god-men" is on the increase. People still believe that they can wash away their sins by visiting temples, shrines, and similar other places of pilgrimage. The same orthodox attitudes govern our notions of morality. In view of all this, if we were to follow the teaching of of Russell, we could cleanse our society of many social ills.

The Value in Our Times of Russell's Emphasis on Liberty and Democracy

Russell is a great advocate, as has already been indicated above, of individual liberty and of democracy as a form of government. In the essay The Future of Mankind, he expresses his preference for the American way of life which shows more respect for civilization than we find in Soviet Russia. The Americans have a genuine respect for the freedom of thought, the freedom of inquiry, the freedom of discussion, and humane feeling. In America, one may hold any views on the subject of genetics; and there one may even write a book debunking such a great man as Abraham Lincoln. Only democracy and free publicity can prevent the holders of power from establishing a servile State. In the essay, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind, Russell points out that democracy was invented as a device for reconciling government with liberty. Democracy makes men's tenure of power temporary and dependent upon popular approval. In doing so, democracy prevents the worst abuses of power. In a democracy a man cannot be punished except by due process of law. Furthermore, democracy means free speech, a free press, and the freedom of religion. The value of the emphasis that Russell puts upon democracy and individual liberty is again evident to us. When we look at the kind of dictatorship that now prevails in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Iran, not to speak of the countries under communist influence, we realize again how fortunate we ourselves are. We have not forgotten how, during two years or so of the Emergency that was declared in this country, all kinds of excesses and injustices were perpetrated, and how freedom of all kinds was completely crushed. We can only hope that the democratic form of government with all its advantages and in spite of all its disadvantages, will continue in our country. These essays by Russell serve to strengthen our democratic beliefs and our love of freedom. And yet we must not forget that Russell does not approve of fanaticism or dogmatism in our holding democratic views. As he points out in the essay, Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind, democracy is not the best system always and everywhere: there are many nations which are not yet morally and politically well-equipped for the success of parliamentary institutions. In the essay Philosophy and Politics also, Russell says much the same thing. There he points out that a fanatical belief in democracy makes democratic institutions impossible, as appeared in England under Cromwell and in France during the French Revolution.

Russell's Suggestion About a World-government

Russell is a great believer in a single government for the whole world. In the essay The Future of Mankind, he insists that the world can be saved only through the establishment of a world-government. The hope of a world-government, he says, might be realized by the victory of the United States in the next world war, or by the victory of the Soviet Union, or by agreement among the leading nations. A world-government is essential if world wars are to be prevented and the total extinction of the human race is to be avoided. In the essay, Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind, he again advocates the establishment of an international government to prevent wars. In the essay, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind, he says that either man must revert to primitive conditions or we must learn to submit to an international government. An international government, whether good, or bad, or indifferent, will make the continuation of the human species possible. He also says that an international government is at least as important to mankind as national government.

The Relevance of this Suggestion to Our Times

Now, we do not doubt the value and importance of an international government which can prevent armed conflicts between nations and especially worldwide conflicts. However, we do doubt the feasibility of such an idea. The idea is great and noble, but it is, to use Russell's own phraseology, "Utopian and impossible". Every nation today has a sense of its own importance, and even small nations have learnt to assert themselves in international affairs. We cannot therefore imagine that the nations of the world, and especially the super-powers, will surrender their individual sovereignty in favour of a world-government. Nor can a world-government be established by means of a war which Russell suggests in The Future of Mankind, because any world war now will destroy all civilization. World peace can now be preserved only through a universal recognition by all nations that the next world war will mean either the end of the world or the reversion of mankind to a state of barbarism, Still the ideal of a world-government should not be dismissed summarily; ideals have their own value even when they cannot be given a practical shape.

Russell's Ideas on Education and their Value Today

In the essay The Functions of a Teacher, Russell offers certain suggestions which appeal to us even today. Teachers are, says Russell, the custodians of civilization. But, in order to perform their functions well, teachers should be allowed the freedom to teach what they please and how they please. Russell strongly disapproves of bureaucratic control over education. Teachers should be protected from intellectual bondage. A teacher should feel himself to be an individual directed by an inner creative impulse, not dominated and fettered by an outside authority. Russell also points out that it is the duty of a teacher to produce in pupils the feeling of tolerance which is necessary for the survival of democracy. Furthermore, a good teacher, according to Russell, does not try to conceal the truth; nor does a good teacher allow himself to become a propagandist. All these ideas and suggestions show Russell to be a great educational reformer. His suggestions are still needed in the sphere of education not only in other countries but in our own. The teacher in our country is a man of mercenary motives without any missionary zeal; he is generally a shirker; he is also an intriguer. For the Indian teacher, therefore, this particular essay should be an eye-opener.

Russell's Appeal to Philosophic Readers

One of Russell's great achievements was to explain philosophical theories and doctrines for the benefit of laymen having some interest in philosophy. Philosophy and Politics is an essay in which we find a lucid exposition of the philosophical systems of Plato, Hegel, and Locke. This is a highly illuminating essay for the layman. It teaches us how political ideas and systems are derived from philosophical doctrines. For instance, Hegel's philosophical theory or dialectic led him to his belief in an obedience to an arbitrary authority and to the view that free speech was an evil and that war was good. Similarly from the philosophy of empiricism expounded by Locke, the liberal creed in politics was derived. In this essay, Russell comes to a most valuable conclusion which is valid for us even today. That conclusion is that empiricist liberalism is the only philosophy that can be adopted by rational human beings who want mankind to be happy.

The Appeal of Russell's Prose Style

Finally, the appeal of Russell to the modern reader is due, in no small measure, to the charm of his prose style. Russell writes in a style which is characterized by lucidity, clarity, elegance, and a grace of expression. It is a plain, unembellished style which the layman easily understands, and yet it is a style which abounds in all the literary graces.

"Russell's prose is characterized by clarity, intellectual brilliance, and a catholicity of temper." Discuss with reference to the Unpopular Essays.

Russell, a Great Prose-stylist

Russell is one of the great prose-stylists of the twentieth century. Although a philosopher, he does not write in a distorted or obscure manner as most philosophers do. His style is characterized by intellectual brilliance, clarity and lucidity, a certain frivolity and gaiety, and a catholicity of temper.

As a matter of fact, the phrase "intellectual brilliance" is itself very wide in its scope, and it includes most of the other qualities. After all clarity, wit, and catholicity of temper are different manifestations of intellectual brilliance. Russell is incapable of being dull in his writing just as he is incapable of being shallow. In the Unpopular Essays he deals with various subjects—philosophical, political, sociological, psychological, educational, historical, and so on—and his expositions of all the ideas are illumined by clarity and a grace of expression. His writing exactly reflects his crystalline, scintillating mind. These essays are, of course, far from being unpopular; in fact, they have a ready appeal for the average mind, and there can be no doubt at all about their popularity. One reason for the popularity of these essays is certainly the simplicity and charm of Russell's prose-style.

Clarity, Lucidity, Grace and Elegance

The most conspicuous characteristics of this style are clarity, lucidity, grace, and elegance. Even when Russell is dealing with ideas which are philosophical and technical, he succeeds in conveying them to the reader by the manner in which he expresses them. He takes great pains to make ideas clear to the reader, and yet his style is not at all forced or laborious. It is a sign of his intellectual brilliance that he writes effortlessly and spontaneously in a style that is singularly free from all kinds of obscurity and ambiguity. Such an effect is achieved by him by means of his method of logical reasoning and by his habit of offering homely examples to clarify ideas. Every thesis, every proposition, every theory, every suggestion that he offers in the course of his Unpopular Essays is well-argued, well-reasoned, and supported with appropriate examples, illustrations, and analogies, most of which are drawn from either well-known facts of history or everyday life,

Ideas, Intelligible and Coherently Presented

The essay, Philosophy and Politics, is not meant for everybody; but it is thoroughly intelligible to well-educated men who may not have made a special study of philosophy. This essay is an attack on the philosophy of Hegel with its destructive political implications, and a strong defence of Locke's philosophy of empiricism with its liberal political consequences. The argument in this essay proceeds in a most logical and coherent manner. The ideas are so presented that we have no difficulty in grasping them. And the essay ends with a conclusion which is really a brief summing-up of what Russell has said in the course of the essay. His conclusion is that empiricist liberalism is the only philosophy which can yield the desired results in the world of today. In the essay, The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed, Russell's thesis is that writers, and especially moralists, have a tendency to admire certain sections of the population, which are oppressed, on the supposed ground that these sections of the population possess certain superior virtues. This thesis is also developed in a logical manner by means of several examples. In the essay, On Being Modern-Minded, the central idea is that the modem-minded man tends to fall under the sway of current opinions and shrinks from independent thinking; one of the consequences of this trend being that a mentally solitary life seems pointless according to modern standards. This essay, though slightly difficult as regards its ideas, is yet not perplexing or obscure in any way; all that it demands is a greater degree of concentration than such essays as An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind and The Functions of a Teacher. The three last-named essays are extremely easy, as regards both the ideas and the expression. The same is true of Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind. In these essays we have a transparency of thought, and a perfect simplicity of expression. A noteworthy feature of the style in all these essays is a complete absence of digressions or any other form of superfluity. Russell is never prolix or diffuse, even when an essay is somewhat long as is An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish. Nor does he create an impression of copiousness or over-abundance in the matter of expression. Every essay is compact and well-knit, even when somewhat long.

An Unadorned but Effective Style

Russell's style is free from embellishments and ornamental effects. It is a plain, unadorned style. It is rarely charged even with emotion, being mainly addressed to the intelligence or the intellect as distinguished from the heart or the feelings. And yet it is not uninteresting, dull, tedious or monotonous in its effect. As has been indicated above, it is an elegant style with a charm of its own. Here, for instance, is a specimen of his writing, showing an excellent combination of lucidity, clarity, and the grace of expression:

Upon our collective wisdom during the next twenty years depends the question whether mankind shall be plunged into unparalleled disaster, or shall achieve a new level of happiness, security, well-being, and intelligence. I do know which mankind will choose. There is grave reason for fear, but there is enough possibility of a good solution to make hope not irrational. And it is on this hope that we must act. (Ideas That Have Helped Mankind)

In these lines an important idea has been expressed in utterly unembellished language which, however, does not fail to produce the desired effect upon us. Here is another example of this combination, which is very frequent in Russell's writing, of simplicity and elegance:

Education, which was at first made universal in order that all might be able to read and write, has been found capable of serving quite other purposes. By instilling nonsense it unifies populations and generates collective enthusiasm. If all governments taught the same nonsense, the harm would not be so great. Unfortunately each has its own brand, and the diversity serves to produce hostility between the devotees of different creeds. (An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish)

There are no rhetorical flourishes here, nothing theatrical. A weighty idea finds expression in the plainest words which do not, however, fail to produce an effect.

Suited to Exposition and Argument

Russell has a style of writing which is admirably suited to exposition and argument. While reading through these essays, we do not get entangled or enmeshed in the intricacies of thought. In the essay, The Future of Mankind, Russell visualises three possibilities which are in store for mankind. And, after discussing them, comes the following irresistible conclusion: "There are now only two fully independent States, America and Russia. The next step in this long historical process should reduce the two to one, and thus put an end to the period of organized wars, which began in Egypt some six thousand years ago." In the essay, The Functions of a Teacher, Russell makes the distinction between a true teacher and a propagandist in a masterly manner. In the same essay the way in which he explains the meaning of civilization is remarkable for its cogency and clarity.

Examples and Illustrations

Russell's intellectual brilliance is also seen in the abundance of examples and illustrations which he provides in the course of his essays, as also in the wealth of allusions that we find in them. In order to bring out the difference between the freedom that exists in America and the absence of it in Russia, he gives us as many as three examples in his essay, The Future of Mankind. In America one may hold whatever view of Mendelism one may like to hold on the basis of available evidence; one may write a book debunking Lincoln; one may hold or not hold that America is heading for an economic slump. In Russia one can hold only those views which are officially sponsored. In the essay, An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish, Russell gives us a host of examples to show how people's minds have been dominated for centuries by superstitious beliefs. In the essay, Ideas That Have Helped Mankind, he makes a statement that man is morally a mixture of good and evil, and then goes on to illustrate this statement with reference to the brutal treatment of the Jews by the German Nazis, the expulsions of the Germans ordered by the Russians, and the attitude of the British and the Americans towards German children, all these being concrete cases to show the evil in man. Russell is never content with abstract statements and ideas; everywhere we find concrete examples. Sometimes he offers parables or fables to illustrate his point: for instance, he gives us the fable of the butchers and the bakers, and the fable of a cow grazing in a field and running away in fright from a passing railway train, (in the essay Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind)

The Abundance of Condensed Statements and Generalisations

Russell's intellectual brilliance shows itself also in his capacity for making condensed statements and generalisations which in most cases produce a striking effect. The following examples, chosen at random, illustrate this point:

(1) Change is scientific, progress is ethical; change is indubitable, whereas progress is a matter of controversy. (Philosophy and Politics)

(2) Science is empirical, tentative, and undogmatic; all immutable dogma is unscientific. (Philosophy and Politics)

(3) Children were idealized by Wordsworth and unidealized by Freud. Marx was the Wordsworth of the proletariat; its Freud is still to come. (The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed)

(4) We are suffering not from the decay of theological beliefs but from the loss of solitude. (On Being Modern-Minded)

(5) Fear is the main source of superstition, and one of the main sources of cruelty. To conquer fear is the beginning of wisdom, in the pursuit of truth as in the endeavour after a worthy manner of life. (An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish)

(6) Fear generates impulses of cruelty, and therefore promotes such superstitious beliefs as seem to justify cruelty. (An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish)

(7) To the propagandist his pupils are potential soldiers in an army. (The Functions of a Teacher)

(8) Selfishness beyond a point, whether individual or national, is not wise. It may with luck succeed, but if it fails failure is terrible. (Ideas That Have Harmed Mankind)

Irony, Wit, and Gaiety

Although Russell has always something serious to say in his essays, yet he is not too grave or solemn a writer. His essays are interspersed with witty observations and comments. Irony and sarcasm are often employed by him as weapons of attack. However, his wit is generally dry, though occasionally also gay. (Wit is gay when an author really seems to enjoy his witty remark, but wit is dry when the author makes a witty remark somewhat scornfully or with a sense of great superiority.) We have a striking example of gay wit towards the close of An Outline of Intellectual Rubbish when he points that out superstitions are often interesting and enjoyable. Once, he says, he received a communication from the god Osiris, giving his telephone number. He frequently receives letters from men announcing themselves as the Messiah. During prohibition in America there was a sect which maintained that the communion service ought to be celebrated in whisky, not in wine because this belief gave them a legal right to drink some hard liquor. Then there was the prophetess who duped her followers into believing that she could walk on water. Another example of gay wit in the same essay occurs when Russell says that Aristotle could have avoided the mistake of thinking that women had fewer teeth than men, by the simple device of asking Mrs. Aristotle to keep her mouth open while he counted. Examples of irony and sarcasm are many. In Philosophy and Politics, Russell mocks at Hegel by defining Hegel's "Absolute Idea" as "pure thought thinking about pure thought". In The Future of Man, Russell makes the following ironical observation about Stalin: "Stalin at all times knows the truth about metaphysics, but you must not suppose that the truth this year is the same as it was last year". In The Superior Virtue of the Oppressed viz have plenty of irony; for instance, Russell here pokes fun at the Freudian theory of the unconscious mind in relation to children.

Catholicity of Temper

Russell is a liberal philosopher. He suffers from no prejudices and no pet aversions. He has no crotchets or fads. A philosopher who is never tired of preaching a scientific temper of mind could never be narrow-minded in any sense of the word. His mind was large enough to take in its sweep all issues pertaining to human welfare. He has expressed his opinions in the Unpopular Essays on many subjects—politics, economics, psychology, ethics, education, morality, science, scepticism, communism, civilization, war, peace, world-government, and so on. And he has dealt with these matters in a style which reflects his catholic temper and his wide-ranging mind. He did not evolve a style according to any premeditated theory or doctrine. His style came to him naturally. In his case, as in the cases of other great writers, it can be said with confidence that the style is the man. His is a style which is rich in such devices as parallelisms, antitheses, contrasts, similes, metaphors, quotations, allusions, anecdotes, simple words and difficult words, short sentences and long ones. He attaches no undue importance to any particular ingredient of style, his only concern being clarity of expression. We cannot use a single formula for this style as we can, for instance, for Bacon's style (concise and epigrammatic), for Carlyle's style (erudite, cumbersome, and eccentric), or for Ruskin's style (mellifluous, musical prose). This is a style in which a perfect synthesis has been achieved between its various ingredients. In its own way, it is a unique style, even as the man himself was unique.

The Cruicible

Arthur Miller; 1915-2005

Arthur Miller was born on 17th October 1915 in Harlem. He was the son of Polish immigrants and his parents enjoyed good prosperity up until the Wall Street Crash of 1929. Financial hardship forced the Miller family to move to Brooklyn in 1929. He was not a good student and in fact he failed to graduate from High School, and his initial working career involved a mixture of labouring jobs either in the country or on the New York Waterfront. Miller learned much about life at the sharp end, and this was to stand him in good stead when he commenced his literary career. In fact, his work 'A View from the Bridge' dealt with life on the waterfront.

His work in the countryside gave him the inspiration for the movie, 'The Misfits' which starred his late wife Marilyn Monroe. It was whilst he was earning a meagre wage from menial work that he started to read extensively, and he decided that a literary career should be the goal to aim for. He was able to convince the University of Michigan to take him on as a student although he had never graduated from High School.

He supported himself at University by working on a Newspaper and entering literary competitions. He graduated in 1938 and returned to New York. He soon became involved in writing scripts for radio and the theatre. Much of his work has the common thread of dealing with the problems faced by the man in the street.

His first major success was the play, 'All My Sons' published in 1947. This was followed by 'Death of a Salesman' published in 1949 and which won the Pulitzer Prize.Many misinterpreted Miller's views regarding the common man as being sympathetic with communism, and he was subsequently investigated in 1947 by the House Un-American Activities Committee, but was completed cleared by the Committee.

'The Crucible' was published in 1953 and there is no doubt that Miller is making a direct comparison in this book of the Salem Witch Trials with the McCarthy Hunt for Communists. However, it is to do the work injustice by viewing it as merely a swipe against the McCarthy era, and there is a far deeper message in this work concerning human nature and mass hysteria.

Miller was married to Marilyn Monroe in 1955 and he wrote the screenplay of 'The Misfits' for her in 1961. 'After the fall' was published in 1964, and is a fictionalised account of his relationship with Marilyn.Also in 1964, he wrote 'Incident at Vichy'. Other works include 'Fame' 1970, 'The American Clock' 1980, 'Elegy for a Lady' 1982, and in the same year 'Some Kind of Love Story'.

Miller wrote the screenplay for the movie version of 'The Crucible', which was released in 1996.In addition to the Pulitzer Prize, Miller has received numerous awards over the years, including The Gold Medal for Drama, by the National Institutes of Arts and Letters. In 1965 he was elected President of Poets, Essayists and Novelists.

Background to the Crucible

Before the Crucible:

The playwright Arthur Miller was born in New York on 17 October 1915, to a non-Orthodox Jewish family. Miller had a comfortable childhood, but when his father was ruined in the Depression of 1929, the family moved to Brooklyn, at that time almost a country suburb. Arthur Miller's school career was unpromising; he worked briefly in his father's business and then took a variety of casual jobs, some of them manual, which provided the background for several plays.

Miller began to read extensively, and applied for a place at the University of Michigan to study journalism. As a student, he wrote award-winning dramas and began to think of playwriting as a career. After graduating in 1938 he returned to New York, where he worked on various theatre projects, but was eventually forced to return to manual work. In 1940, he married an old college friend. When the USA entered World War II in 1941, he was rejected for military service because of an old sports' injury.

Miller was beginning to be successful in other forms of writing, but his main interest was in live theatre. His first Broadway play won the Theatre Guild National Award but was not a commercial success. During this long apprenticeship, Miller was hammering out the themes central to his best-known work - the link between social commitment and personal integrity, the individual's need to confront his past, and conflict within the family. A chance conversation provided the idea for his first widely acclaimed play, All My Sons (1947). Death of a Salesman (1949) had an even longer run, and was performed worldwide.

The Cold War and Senator McCarthy

After the end of the World War II, America became locked in political rivalry with Communist Russia. This was the so-called Cold War. The threat of nuclear weapons hung over the two superpowers' struggle for dominance. In June 1950, when Russia's ally, Communist China, began to expand into South-East Asia, America embarked on the Korean War. This conflict had an enormous effect on the political climate at home. Fear that Communists were infiltrating Government led to the rise of Senator Joseph McCarthy, the most prominent figure in a committee that scrutinized possible suspects. His investigations were aimed particularly at university teachers, trade unionists, and artists of all kinds—anyone suspected of left-wing sympathies. Those called before the Un-American Activities Committee were asked to prove their innocence by naming others. Some witnesses caved in; others lost their jobs. There were many suicides.

It was against this background that Miller wrote The Crucible. The Salem witch trials had fascinated him long before he saw their possibility as an allegory for McCarthyism. The play opened in January 1953, and won two prestigious awards, but the critics were distracted by the obvious parallel with contemporary events.

In 1956 Miller found himself in the same dilemma as his hero, John Proctor. He was refused a passport to visit Brussels for a production of his play. The committee called on him to testify. When Miller refused to mention names, he was fined and given a suspended prison sentence. The Supreme Court acquitted him a year and a half later. By then McCarthy himself was dead.

The Crucible

The Crucible is Miller's most frequently produced work. As the McCarthy era receded, it became easier to assess the merits of the play and realize that it has a universal significance outside the context of a particular crisis in American history. Miller himself is pleased at his development.

A crucible is a melting pot or vessel in which crude ore is heated to a temperature that makes it release the pure metal. The metaphor applies most of all to the hero, John Proctor, who finds his true self by enduring a different kind of purification; but it is almost as apt for several other characters as well as for the whole community that suffered from these tragic events.

Historical Background to "The Crucible"

Puritans in North America

In the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, some English trading companies started to send settlers to North America. Among them were the Pilgrim Fathers, who crossed the Atlantic in the Mayflower and landed in Massachusetts on 21 November 1620. Ten years later, about a thousand Puritans settled around Massachusetts Bay, in the area later known as New England. They brought with them a royal charter to set up a colony ruled by a Governor and General Court. A Puritan elite of politicians and clergymen imposed a strict administration on the new colony. As well as reclaiming land from the forest, the settlers had to come to terms with the Native American tribes and periodic outbreaks of smallpox.

By 1692, there were marked differences between the various centres of population. Trade and education flourished in towns like Boston; inland areas were much less safe and prosperous. Several other factors caused unrest. While the colony awaited the arrival of a new charter from England, its laws, including those on land tenure, were technically suspended. The rulers felt their grasp slipping.

Salem

The village had developed as the agricultural hinterland of Salem, a thriving trading town on the coast five miles away. Rivers and sea inlets lay between the town and the village, which was in reality a collection of scattered farmsteads. Farmers living further inland had to grow their produce on much less fertile terrain. Added to jealousies about land were disputes over appointing a minister. The town continued to demand taxes to exercise authority over the villagers.

Puritanism

Although officially part of the Church of England, the 1630 Puritans were closer in belief and practice to Presbyterian Calvinism. They believed that every soul was predestined for Heaven or Hell. Old Testament law applied to every area of life. The Puritans blamed any temptations to break their stern code on the Devil and other evil spirits. Those who broke the rules had to confess in public and suffer severe punishment. To work on Sunday was a serious offence. The Puritans disapproved of most forms of relaxation. They confined private reading to the Bible and other religious texts. Children had to live up to this code of behaviour from their earliest years and take their share of adult work from the age of seven.Miller discusses the effects of this highly demanding self-discipline in his notes to Act I of The Crucible.

Witchcraft

Like most people in the seventeenth century, the Puritans believed in witches. The idea of witchcraft existed long before the Christian era. The Old Testament states, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live". This was the basis of the witchcraft laws. In prehistoric societies, magic and sorcery were a feature of religion; the early Christian Church regarded them as the remains of paganism. There were laws against the practice of witchcraft, but no systematic persecution.

Anxieties began to increase when the Church declared (1320) that magic and witchcraft involved a pact with the Devil. From then on they were classed as heresy, carrying the penalty of eternal damnation. The reformed Protestant Church shared these views. Whereas ordinary people worried about the harm witches might do them, the Church regarded every lost soul as a defeat in the war between God and the Devil. A reader can notice this difference in The Crucible.

During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, thousands were put to death for witchcraft. When medicine and veterinary science were at such a primitive stage, disease and sudden death could seem to result from a spell cast by a spiteful neighbour. Those thought to be witches were male and female, of all ages and social ranks, but most of them were elderly women.

The most famous handbook on witchcraft was Malleus Maleficarum ("The Witches' Hammer"). This might have been one of the books weighted with authority that Reverend Hale brings to Salem.

The Salem Witch-Hunt

There were several witchcraft trials in Massachusetts before 1692. Two involved adolescent girls suffering hysterical fits similar to those seen in Salem. In January 1692, the daughter and niece of the village parson, Reverend Parris, having experimented with fortune-telling began to gabble nonsense and twist their limbs into grotesque positions. They claimed that the spirit of Parris's West Indian slave Tituba was tormenting them. Soon more young girls began to display the same symptoms. Tituba and two other women were arrested on the charge of bewitching them.

Over the following months the number of hysterical girls increased, as did the people they accused. The youngest victim was a child aged four. The defendants were jailed, but not tried until June, when the new governor set up his official court, which decided to allow 'spectral evidence'; that is, the girls' allegation that the witches were sending out their invisible spirits. The witch-hunt spread and scores of people went to prison. Those that confessed were reprieved. Six men and thirteen women were hanged. Since prisoners had to pay for their keep, many families went bankrupt. Doubts arose about the 'spectral evidence', particularly when the girls began naming prominent people. The Governor intervened, and in May, 1693, the remaining accused were set free, apart from those who could not pay their prison charges.

How Historically Correct is The Crucible?

The Crucible keeps close to what we know about events in 1692. Much of the dialogue repeats the enquiry documents word for word. Miller made changes for practical dramatic reasons or to emphasize the themes of the play. Here are some reasons for Miller's attempt to make some alterations.

All characters in The Crucible are taken from official documents, but the number of persons involved in the witch-hunt is greatly reduced. The fortune telling becomes a more dramatic expedition into the Devil-haunted forest. The date when the hysteria began is advanced from winter to spring. Several execution dates are altered; for example, John Proctor did not die with Rebecca Nurse. Miller also standardizes the ages of the girls; apart from Betty Parris, they are all teenagers. In reality, they spanned a much wider age range and included several adults.

The only piece of pure invention is the relationship between Abigail Williams and John Proctor. In 1692 he was a man in his sixties and she was a girl of 11. However, the invented relationship rings true to the repression of Puritan society and forms a dynamic centre around which the whole story develops.

Such discrepancies are less important than the themes developed in the text. Like all great plays, The Crucible speaks to us about universal human issues. The details of place and time are merely the playwright's way of creating his ideas in flesh and blood.

Introduction to the Crucible by Arthur Miller

Introduction

A "crucible" is a severe test, or a trial. It is also a container that can withstand great heat. As it passes through a furnace, the metals and ores within it are transformed in some way. For the characters in The Crucible, the Salem witch hunt is the trial from which they emerge utterly changed. As each character passes through the furnace of lies, vengeance, greed and tor-ture, he is either purified or corrupted. For John Proctor, the heat is especially intense, and the struggle toward goodness is laden with many traps and obstacles.

All the characters in The Crucible are based on real persons who lived in Salem in 1692. For dramatic purposes, several characters have sometimes been fused into one and small details have been changed. In general, however, the actions of the char-acters are closely matched to the actions of their historical counterparts. Miller researched the period exhaustively and wanted his play to be as true to the historical records as possible. See Appendix I for some of these records.

Although The Crucible offers many parallels with our own time, it also makes use of many ideas and attitudes that were unique to Salem, Massachusetts, in 1692. Some knowledge of life in Salem is needed to fully understand the play. The follow-ing material, therefore, explains basic Puritan customs and beliefs, and offers a summary of the actual Salem witch hunt. In addition, this introduction looks at Miller's use of the witch hunt to comment on the McCarthy hearings of the 1950s.

The Puritans

In 1620, the Puritans landed at Plymouth Rock in Massa-chusetts and founded the first permanent settlement in New England. They had left England to escape religious persecution and to establish a New Jerusalem in the New World. This Pro-mised Land, however, contained many new dangers. In the face of a harsh climate, fierce animals, hostile Indians and a vast, godless wilderness, the Puritans drew together in a tightly unified group with extremely strict rules and an autocratic leadership. Through a combination of bitterly hard work, rigid discipline and harsh justice, the Puritans succeeded in taming the land that no one before them could conquer.

The Puritan government was a theocracy; that is, it was completely controlled by the Puritan church. The ministers of the church were also the town officers and administrators. Because the Puritans believed that they were the new Chosen People, they did not permit members of any other religion to corrupt their pure society. Those who did not belong to the church could not hold property or vote. In addition, those who did not attend church regularly or follow the church regulations could be excommunicated, thereby losing all their property and rights.

In The Crucible, Deputy Governor Danforth is the perfect example of a theocratic ruler. Because he believes that he speaks for God, he cannot accept the possibility that he has been wrong. In his ruthless judgments, he holds to the strict letter of the law, for "While I speak God's law, I will not crack its voice with whimpering."

"God's law" for the Puritans was certainly strict. Any-thing that distracted them from hard work was part of the Devil's plan to destroy them. There were no celebrations or holidays, no theaters or novels and no children's games or enter-tainments. Dancing was considered a serious sin. It was natural, then, that Abigail and the other girls felt a need to dance in the woods. Their youthful high spirits had no other outlet. It was also natural that they should lie to cover up their "sin." If they had been found out, they would probably have been whipped.

In addition to viewing pleasure as sinful, the Puritans saw sex as a necessary evil, to be practised joylessly only between a man and his wife. As John Proctor knew only too well, adultery was considered a hideous crime and could easily result in excom-munication and the loss of one's property. Some historical analysts believe that this sexual repression was directly respon-sible for the mass hysteria that produced the witch hunt. In The Crucible, Abigail's dislike for the people of Salem is largely based on her contempt for this repression.

The Puritans believed that everything stated in the Bible was literally true. The Devil was very real to them, always trying to tempt them away from their work and God's laws. Moreover, the Devil was a cunning and extremely powerful opponent. Once he set out to destroy a soul, there was almost nothing the person could do to prevent it. As Abigail angrily tells Deputy Governor Danforth: "Think you to be so mighty that the power of Hell may not turn your wits? Beware of it!"

This grim sense of man's powerlessness was also found in other aspects of Puritan life. The Puritans believed in the doc-trine of the elect. According to this fatalistic belief, only a few people would be chosen by God to be saved from Hell. There was nothing a person could do to earn a place among the elect. No amount of good works or righteous living could help. All a person could do was live an upright life in the blind hope that he might be one of the few who were chosen.

A major reason why salvation was so difficult to attain is found in the Puritans' adaptation of the doctrine of original sin. According to the Puritans, each person at birth is already evil and on the verge of eternal damnation. As Jonathan Edwards, a famed Puritan minister, once preached, "The God that holds you over the pit of Hell, much as one holds a spider, or some loathsome insect, over the fire, abhors you, and is dreadfully provoked; his wrath towards you burns like fire; he looks upon you as worthy of nothing else, but to be cast into the fire . . . ." In The Crucible, Parris also preached "hellfire and bloody damnation" in his sermons, much to Proctor's disgust.

Not only was man born an evil sinner, but his sins could not be washed away. Therefore, every person concealed guilt in his heart from which he could never be free. In The Crucible, John Proctor is deeply troubled with guilt as a result of his adulterous affair with Abigail. He tries to bury this guilt by pretending it doesn't exist. Nonetheless, as Elizabeth tells him, "The magistrate sits in your heart that judges you."

Although their guilt could never be entirely removed, it was sometimes possible for Puritans who sinned to regain the path of righteousness. First, however, they had to publicly confess their sins and perform some act of penance. This policy of open confession was carried to absurd lengths during the witch hunt. Those accused of witchcraft could either confess to lies or hang. Not surprisingly, most chose to confess.

Because the Puritans' legal system was used to uphold religious laws, many such absurdities were possible. Over the cen-turies, Western society has developed "due process of law" so that the truth can be uncovered. This due process uses witnesses and other hard evidence to prove whether a person is innocent or guilty. The accused is also granted certain rights so that he can defend himself. The Puritans, however, could not rely on due process to get at the truth. Because religious crimes involved magic and invisibility, there could be no witnesses or hard evidence.

In The Crucible, Deputy Governor Danforth sums up the absurdity of the Puritan court when he explains that witchcraft is an invisible crime. Only the witch and her victim can possibly witness this crime, and the witch would never accuse herself. Therefore, the victim's testimony must always be accurate. As a result of this absurd reasoning, the Puritans had no way of objectively finding out the truth. When the lack of due process was combined with the false confessions, the door was opened to a reign of terror in which rumors, lies and superstitions ruled the courts.

In summary, then, virtually every aspect of a Puritan's life fell under the strict control of the church. Rigid discipline was enforced, and pleasures were forbidden. Personal rights were few and could be suspended at any time. Personal freedoms were virtually non-existent. Life for the early Puritans was a constant battle against the harsh climate, the vast wilderness and the temptations of Satan. Even for those who won that bat-tle, divine salvation was by no means guaranteed.

By 1692, however, the land had been partly tamed and the surrounding wilderness was no longer so terrifying. The need for rigid discipline, hard work and tight unity was no longer as great as it had been. To the great concern of the church, many Puritans began to feel the need for more personal rights and freedoms. Ultimately, the church's struggle to maintain its auth-ority against ever-increasing opposition erupted into the full--blown hysteria of the Salem witch hunt.

Witchcraft among the Puritans

The persecution of witches was by no means limited to the Puritans in New England. During the 17th and early 18th cen-turies, tens of thousands of people were executed as witches throughout Europe and the Americas. The Roman Catholic Inquisition was especially bloodthirsty in its relentless pursuit of those who practised the black arts.

It is not surprising that the fear of witchcraft took so deep a hold among the New England Puritans. As fundamentalists, they believed every word that was written in the Bible. Moses' statement, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," was well known by almost every member of the colony. In The Crucible, when Elizabeth Proctor suggests that witches do not exist, Reverend Hale scolds her, "You surely do not fly against the Gospel, the Gospel —."

The Puritans deeply believed in evil as a tangible force in the world. The Devil was a real being, the lord of the angels cast out of heaven for betraying God. Since his fall, the Devil had worked constantly to destroy God's kingdom on earth by temp-ting God's subjects away from Him.

Because the Puritans believed that their colony was the center of God's earthly kingdom, they believed that the Devil was focusing all his attention on their destruction. The vast wilderness around them provided the Devil with many hiding places, as well as many heathen savages who willingly did his work. According to Puritan belief, once the colony was perfected the Devil would be banished forever. Because he knew this, he was attacking them now with all his power and might.

The Puritans, then, considered themselves soldiers in the midst of a great war against evil. The enemy was powerful, and capable of infinite deception. As Reverend Hale claims, "Until an hour before the Devil fell, God thought him beautiful in Heaven." Human beings, on the other hand, were weak, born in sin and likely destined for damnation. To make matters even worse, the Devil had recruited many helpers among the Puritans themselves. These helpers were known as witches.

The belief in witchcraft is very ancient and can be found in almost all cultures. In general, a witch is a person who is believed to have supernatural powers. In many cultures, witches have been revered as wisewomen or healers. In others, they have been persecuted and killed.

As modern feminists point out, almost all of those who have been killed as witches have been women. Often these women directly challenged male authority. Many had become influential in their villages through the practice of midwifery or herbal medicine. Witchcraft has always been associated with the dark, irrational side of human nature, a side traditionally seen as female. In addition, many of the rituals associated with witchcraft are highly sexual in nature. Feminists argue that female sexuality is considered most threatening by male-dominated, sexually-repressed societies. Certainly, no more sexually-repressed a society has ever existed than that of the Puritans.

The Puritans were never really clear on exactly how witches helped the Devil in his battle for human souls. Apparently, a person became a witch by making an agreement with the Devil. The witch then "sent out" her invisible spirit to harm innocent people. Sometimes a witch entered an innocent person's body and controlled his thoughts. A witch could also assume the shape of an innocent person while tormenting others, thereby framing the innocent person for crimes he didn't commit.

Needless to say, all this resulted in a fair amount of legal confusion when charges against witches were laid. As Danforth pointed out, witchcraft was impossible to prove even with witnesses or hard evidence. In general, the word of the victim was taken, even though it was recognized that the Devil's trickery may have caused an innocent person to be accused.

The absurdities do not end there. Any witch could end her contract with Satan simply by confessing to witchcraft. Since hanging was generally the alternative, many witches did indeed confess. Yet, presumably, a real witch would have no qualms about lying while pretending to confess. Meanwhile, a truly devout Puritan, such as Rebecca Nurse, would be unable to make a dishonest confession, and would therefore hang. In other words, the laws on witchcraft were such that the least devout Puritans lived while the most devout, who refused to lie, were hung.

In 1692, the Puritans believed that they had found the Devil's center of attack in Salem, Massachusetts. As a result of the legal absurdities outlined above, the courts were turned over to hysteria, private vengeance and land greed. In what was to become known as "the delusion," hundreds were arrested for witchcraft, and 20 innocent people lost their lives.

The Salem Witch Hunt

Salem does not seem to have ever been a very peaceful village. Long before the witch hunt, the people in the town had split into opposing factions as a result of land feuds and political disagreement. Because boundaries were somewhat unsettled, different claims were often made to the same tract of land.

In particular, a longstanding quarrel had developed between the Nurses and the Putnams, two of the largest and wealthiest families in the district. Various wills and deeds were contested in court through a long series of lawsuits. Over time, the quarrel grew as friends and distant relatives of both families took sides against one another.

This conflict was made more intense when Reverend Parris defeated the Putnams' candidate to be elected as minister of Salem. Because Parris did not have a clear majority, his election was contested. Parris also angered many members of his con-gregation with his requests for free firewood, expensive church additions and the deed to the minister's home.

Reverend Parris had a black servant, named Tituba, whom he had found in Barbados. Tituba's customs were considered strange and dangerous by the solemn Puritan townspeople. Eventually, she was caught teaching Parris' daughter, Betty, and niece, Abigail Williams, how to tell the future by reading palms. Tituba was punished, but the suspicion of witchcraft was firmly planted in the minds of the Salemites.

In February, 1692, Betty Parris began to suffer from some sort of fit. The doctors were baffled by her illness and suggested that it had a supernatural cause. Reverend Parris sent for the help of other ministers, and he tried to keep his daughter's ill-ness hidden from the town. Word spread, however, and before long rumors of witchcraft were flying through Salem.

No one knows precisely what happened next. However, on February 29, 1692, the first three arrests for witchcraft were made. At this stage, the accused were all social outcasts. Tituba was a black servant from another country. Sarah Good was an old beggar woman. And Sarah Osborne seldom attended church and was considered immoral.

These three women were ordered to either confess to witch-craft or hang. Not surprisingly, they confessed. In their confes-sions, they were forced to accuse other Salemites of doing Satan's work. Before long, the jails were full of prisoners accused of witchcraft.

The role of Abigail Williams, Betty Parris, Mary Warren and others in these events is not quite clear. Quite possibly, Abigail and Betty made the first accusations against Tituba, Sarah Good and Sarah Osborne. Certainly, they made a number of later accusations, and many innocent people were found guilty as a result of the girls' testimony.

The witchcraft trials took place in Salem while the governor of Massachusetts was absent on a campaign against the Indians. In his place, Lieutenant Governor William Stroughton acted as chief justice. Stroughton was a strict Puritan who followed the law to the letter, and he totally believed in the existence of witch-craft. Like Danforth in The Crucible, he could not bear to have his authority questioned. Stroughton issued the first death war-rant in Salem and personally witnessed the hanging that resulted.

The Salem trials began in March, 1692. For evidence, the court relied on the testimony of the young girls and on the con-fessions of those who were threatened with hanging. During the trials, 55 people confessed to being witches. The first hanging took place in June. Five others were hung on July 19, five on August 19, and eight on September 22. During this time, Giles Corey was pressed to death for refusing to plead guilty or not guilty. In addition, two dogs were hung as witches.

By October, 150 prisoners were still awaiting trial, and others had already been condemned to die. Many of these prisoners were highly respectable men and women whose arrests had raised a public outcry. The public had also been enraged by rumors that some important men had used their influence to prevent their wives' arrests, while others had bribed the court to find their wives innocent. Salemites began to doubt the testi-mony of the young girls and question the false confessions.

Governor Phips ordered the court to find a more trust-worthy method of testing for witchcraft than the testimony of the girls. A series of meetings resulted with some ministers pro-testing the lack of hard evidence and rejecting the use of the forced confessions. Finally, on October 29, 1692, Governor Phips yielded to public pressure and put an end to the trials and executions.

The witch hunt continued to affect the lives of the people of Salem long after the last trial was over. Twenty Salemites were dead and their property confiscated. Many others had been excommunicated, and had lost their property and rights as a result.

Not until 1709, 17 years after the trials, did the survivors and the heirs of the victims feel free to ask the government for restitution. In 1711, some money was awarded as compensa-tion. However, much of this money was given to informers rather than to victims or their heirs. The reputations of the accused were reinstated and, in 1712, the excommunications were reversed by government order.

As Miller notes at the end of The Crucible, some of the farms that had belonged to the accused witches were left to ruin for more than a century before anyone would dare to live in them again.

The Crucible : Summary

The Crucible, a historical play based on events of the Salem witchcraft trials, takes place in a small Puritan village in the colony of Massachusetts in 1692. The witchcraft trials, as Miller explains in a prose prologue to the play, grew out of the particular moral system of the Puritans, which promoted interference in others' affairs as well as a repressive code of conduct that frowned on any diversion from norms of behavior.

The play begins in the home of Reverend Samuel Parris, whose daughter, Betty, lays ill. Parris lives with his daughter and his seventeen-year old niece, Abigail Williams, an orphan who witnessed her parents' murder by the Indians. Parris has sent for Reverend Hale of Beverly, believing his daughter's illness stems from supernatural explanations. Betty became ill when her father discovered her dancing in the woods with Abigail, Tituba (the Parris' slave from Barbados) and several other local girls. Already there are rumors that Betty's illness is due to witchcraft, but Parris tells Abigail that he cannot admit that he found his daughter and niece dancing like heathens in the forest. Abigail says that she will admit to dancing and accept the punishment, but will not admit to witchcraft. Abigail and Parris discuss rumors about the girls: when they were dancing one of the girls was naked, and Tituba was screeching gibberish. Parris also brings up rumors that Abigail's former employer, Elizabeth Proctor, believes that Abby is immoral.

Thomas and Ann Putnam arrive and tell Parris that their daughter, Ruth, is sick. Ann Putnam admits that she sent Ruth to Tituba, for Tituba knows how to speak to the dead and could find out who murdered her seven children, each of whom died during infancy. When the adults leave, Abigail discusses Betty's illness with Mercy Lewis and Mary Warren, the servants of the Putnams and the Proctors, respectively. Abigail threatens them, warning them not to say anything more than that they danced and Tituba conjured Ruth's sisters. John Proctor arrives to find Mary and send her home. He speaks with Abigail alone, and she admits to him about the dancing. In the past, John and Abigail had an affair, which is the reason why Elizabeth Proctor fired her. Abigail propositions John, but he sternly refuses her. When Betty hears people singing psalms from outside, she begins to shriek. Reverend Parris returns, and realizes that Betty cannot bear to hear the Lord's name.

Giles Corey and Rebecca Nurse are the next to visit. The former is a contentious old man, while the latter is a well-respected old woman. Rebecca claims that Betty's illness is nothing serious, but merely a childish phase. Parris confronts Proctor because he has not been in church recently, but Proctor claims that Parris is too obsessed with damnation and never mentions God.

Reverend John Hale arrives from Beverly, a scholarly man who looks for precise signs of the supernatural. Parris tells him about the dancing and the conjuring, while Giles Corey asks if there is any significance to his wife's reading strange books. Hale questions Abigail, asking if she sold her soul to Lucifer. Finally Abigail blames Tituba, claiming that Tituba made Abigail and Betty drink blood and that Tituba sends her spirit out to make mischief. Putnam declares that Tituba must be hanged, but Hale confronts her. Upon realizing that the only way to save herself is to admit to the charge, Tituba claims that the devil came to her and promised to return her to Barbados. She says that several women were with him, including Sarah Good and Sarah Osburn, and the girls join in the chorus of accusations, name more people they claim to have seen with the devil.

The second act takes place a week later in the Proctor's home. John Proctor returns home late after a long day planting in the fields, and Elizabeth suspects that he has been in the village. Mary Warren has been there as an official of the court for the witchcraft trials, even after Elizabeth forbade her. Elizabeth tells John that she must tell Ezekiel Cheever, the constable that Abigail admitted that Betty's sickness has nothing to do with witchcraft, but Proctor admits that nobody will believe him because he was alone with Abigail at the time. Elizabeth is disturbed by this, but Proctor reprimands her for her suspicion. Mary Warren arrives and gives Elizabeth a poppet that she made in court. Mary tells them that thirty-nine people have been arrested and Sarah Osburn will hang, but not Sarah Good, who confessed. When Proctor becomes angry at Mary, she tells him that she saved Elizabeth's life today, for her name was mentioned in court.

John Hale arrives. He tells the Proctors that Rebecca Nurse was charged, then questions Proctor on his churchgoing habits. Finally he makes Proctor state the Ten Commandments; he can remember nine of the ten, but Elizabeth must remind him of adultery. Proctor tells Hale what Abigail admitted about Parris discovering her in the woods, but Hale says that it must be nonsense, for so many have confessed to witchcraft. Proctor reminds him that these people would certainly confess, if denying it means that they be hanged. Hale asks Proctor whether he believes in witches, and he says that he does, but not those in Salem. Elizabeth denies all belief in witchcraft, for she believes that the devil cannot take a woman's soul if she is truly upright.

Ezekiel Cheever arrives to arrest Elizabeth on the charge that she sent her spirit out to Abigail and stuck a needle in her. Cheever finds the poppet, which has a needle in it, but Mary Warren says that she made the poppet in court that day, although Abigail witnessed her making it. Upon hearing the charge, Elizabeth claims that Abigail is a murderer who must be ripped out of the world. Proctor rips up the warrant and tells Cheever that he will not give his wife to vengeance. When Hale insists that the court is just, Proctor calls him a Pontius Pilate. He finally demands that Mary Warren come to court and testify against Abigail, but she sobs that she cannot.

The third act takes place in the vestry room of the Salem meeting house, which serves the court. Giles Corey arrives with Francis Nurse and tells Deputy Governor Danforth, who presides over the trials, that Thomas Putnam is charging people with witchcraft in order to gain their land. He also says that he meant nothing when he said that his wife read strange books.

John Proctor arrives with Mary Warren, and presents a deposition signed by Mary that asserts that she never saw any spirits. Parris thinks that they are there to overthrow the court, and Danforth questions whether Proctor has any ulterior motive, and tells Proctor that his wife is pregnant and thus will live at least one more year, even if convicted. Proctor also presents a petition signed by ninety-one people attesting to the good character of Elizabeth Proctor, Rebecca Nurse and Martha Corey. Parris claims that this is an attack upon the court, but Hale asks Parris if every defense is an attack on it.

Putnam arrives at the court, and Giles Corey charges him with murder. Giles tells Danforth that someone told him that Putnam prompted his daughter to accuse George Jacobs so that he could buy his land. Giles refuses to name this person, and so is arrested for contempt. Abigail then arrives with the other girls, and Proctor tells Danforth how Abigail means to murder his wife. Abigail pretends that she feels a sharp wind threatening her. Proctor grabs her by the hair and calls her a whore, finally admitting his affair.

Danforth orders that Elizabeth be brought to the court. If Elizabeth admits to firing Abigail for her affair, Danforth will charge Abigail with murder. Elizabeth, thinking that she is defending her husband, only claims that she fired Abigail because of poor work habits. Proctor cries out for Elizabeth to tell the truth, and Hale admits that Elizabeth's lie is a natural one to tell. Abigail then claims that Mary Warren's spirit is attacking her in the form of a bird. Although Mary claims that the girls are lying, she soon breaks down and tells Danforth that Proctor is in league with Satan and wants to pull down the court.

Proctor cries out that God is dead, and that a fire is burning in Hell because the court is pulling Heaven down and raising up a whore. Hale denounces the proceedings and quits the court.

The fourth act takes places several months later in the autumn at the Salem jail cell. Cheever details how the town is in shambles because so many people are in jail. Hale has been begging Rebecca Nurse to admit to witchcraft. Parris arrives and tells Danforth how Abigail has vanished with Mercy Lewis and stolen his money. Parris worries about the rumors of rebellion against the witchcraft proceedings in Andover, but Hathorne reminds Parris how there has only been great satisfaction in all of the Salem executions. Parris reminds him that Rebecca Nurse is no immoral woman like the others executed and there will be consequences to her execution. Still, Danforth refuses to postpone any of the executions.

Danforth calls for Elizabeth Proctor, and Hale tells her that he does not want Proctor to die, for he would feel responsible for the murder. He tells Elizabeth that God may damn a liar less than a person who throws one's life away, but Elizabeth claims that this may be the Devil's argument. Finally Elizabeth agrees to speak with Proctor, who is brought in bearded and filthy. Proctor and Elizabeth discuss their children, and Elizabeth tells him how Giles Corey died: when he refused to answer yes or no to his indictment, and was thus pressed with stones until he would answer. He only gave the words "more weight" before they crushed him.

Proctor says that he cannot mount the gibbet as a saint, for it would be a fraud to claim that he has never lied. Elizabeth says that she has her own sins, for only a cold wife would prompt lechery. Finally Proctor decides that he will confess himself. Danforth demands a written confession and, to prove the purity of his soul, he demands that Proctor accuse others. Hale suggests that it is sufficient for Proctor to confess to God, but Danforth still requires a written statement. Proctor refuses, because he wishes only to keep his good name for the respectability of his children. Danforth refuses to accept his confession, and orders that he be hanged. Hale begs Elizabeth to plead with Proctor to sign a confession, but Elizabeth claims that Proctor now has his goodness, and nobody should take it away from him.

Literary Analysis the Crucible by Arthur Miller

We are least likely tempted to think that McCarthyism is something that happened when Senator McCarthy was in parliament. When we look around, we see some similar events happening, probably not witch hunting, but some similar chasing where people end up in frames for murder, in isolation charged up with treason and terrorism, or treated differently because of their race, sex, weight, colour, religious and educational background. With punishments ranging from being denied basic human rights and privileges common to other citizens to death, these differential treatments in many ways resemble McCarthyism. In Miller's "The Crucible", one political status or choice was superior to another, and, relativism in shambles. At this time in the US history, those who allegedly became Communists or connived with Communists were labelled Un-American and thus exposed to harsh treatment. The Crucible was indeed an extremely hot furnace that collected molten undesirable ones at the bottom. The result is we are compelled to investigate why Un-Americans deserved the furnace.

During McCarthyism, there seemed to be fear for wickedness linked with alleged witches and supposed un-Americans. Senator McCarthy felt that citizens who aligned with Communist Party deserved verile treatment. Because there was only circumstantial evidence in these charges, we want to believe that witchcraft and Communism were at least not directly linked with the said accusations. Looking at the Mona Lisa we sense darkness which we may associate with Mona Lisa, or with the artist, Leonardo da Vinci. Yet the laws of Physics make it possible for us to understand that shadows do not necessarily come from the objects closest to them. With the witches, Un-Americans and Communists, their seeming wickedness is like a shadow in Lisa's background.

Since time immemorial, we have not reached a consensus about things we claim to know. There are views that we are born with the knowledge, views that we acquire knowledge later on, and views that knowledge is both innate and acquired isnpite of which there is still lack on consensus on what we claim to know and on who is the witch or communist. Those who have absolute knowledge seem to be in a better position to prosecute witches, un-Americans, Jews, Black, Gays and, etc, etc and that is none of us. This is not to say we should get rid of punishment altogether, but, it is we shall find out as we read along, to be careful about severity of punishment we exercise on others because we do not raise the dead.

In the Crucible, Proctor's perspective of the then justice systems seems diminutive. The double-edgedness of the courthouse is the court in paradox, a conflict in the legal system. Of course Elizabeth is satirically paradoxical about the justice system, poking fun at its character and Miller makes the whole thing sound even more comical by speaking through Elizabeth's point of view. The comedy is in the irony about a witch and a woman being a mouthpiece when women were chief engineers of the well-wished witchcraft. Miller sees contradiction in what the government of the time purported to do and what it actually did. A government that preached freedom of choice concomitantly advocated for limited freedom in certain areas, those in opposition with the desires of the rulers. The government supposedly works hard to rid itself of the oppressive communism. Miller projects the conflicting nature of this set up through Elizabeth who sees contradiction in the legal system. According to Elizabeth, a magistrate can only judge is he "is" in someone's heart. YET this magistrate who is not even "sitting" in the victim's heart can judge about the same heart he is not sitting in. Evidently, Elizabeth not only seems to think that the justice system is not a serious issue, but also a laughing matter. Hence Miller infuses the story with sarcasm and laughter, shocking us into realities about events of the time through over dramatisation. Straight facts would probably not arouse much interest in us and Miller was aware of this.

Most of us like carton and comic book characters and therefore this overdramatisation becomes a perfect psychological trap for readers. His intention is therefore possibly not so much to draw us to the outward appearance of the realities, the physical condition of a building or of a flying witch. This would be too common an alert. The inner "reality" of the building, its ambience, would probably be much more exciting to explore as would be the trajectory laws that explain a flight of a woman is accused through a window.

The impressionist that he is, Miller strategically, caricatures the magistrate, the justice system, so that he ironically does not get in trouble with the law by openly condemning the government. Yet the image he paints of the legal system creates alienation of the superstructure both in and outside the text. Amazingly, Miller manages to engage us in a reactionary state where we unceasingly question and demand answers about crookedness in administration of justice. Metaphorically speaking we ask: just how little is this magistrate to fit in a heart? The idea of a little magistrate not only reduces the magistrate's stature but also his intelligence. We are drawn to the magistrate's stupidity in which he appears to put himself into a position he cannot actually fill because literally speaking, he cannot sit in a heart.

The magistrates and those who subject others to these blast furnaces purportedly hold some real standard of what ought to be done or what ought to happen over those who are seemingly astray. Such seem to consider themselves authors of standard truth. Ultimately those who have and who have no standard of truth are viewed in terms of good and evil. For those who believe in some source of all things, there is a dichotomy of moral and amoral. For those who do not think in these terms, things just are. Even in the last case where things just are, some kind of plane or planes of originality for just being is assumed. Yet we must be aware that this latter faction is not an argument in for persecution of Un-Americans where the tension was between two distinct states of Un-American and American. Thus our proposition to treat our argument under the common, least understood notions of good and evil is valid.

Steven Wallace in his The High Toned Christian Woman introduces in the form of hierarchy, an allegory of where morality lies. In the title, "A High-Toned Old Christian Woman" high could reference a place removed form the normal and also in the first line where he talks to madame'. Here he says that the fundamental principles of morality lie in part of the extension', our palms. Even principles opposing morality lie in the same extension. The poem says that this morality is our conscience. It is ethics, which, like the "nave" in the church, is integral to knowledge. Those lacking in moral decency are so impure and taken in by moral wrecklessness that they cannot even be summoned by the call for death, just as those with good morals haunt heaven. Both actions unite in their source, a yearning for something as does our conscience or ethics in the extension.

We see clearly from this poem that we may only speculate about where morality and immorality originate from, but that both appear to be of some abstract origin. As a result it seems a little too farfetched to claim to have some portable yardstick to measure things that are both so intangible. In actual fact we will see that McCarthyism a sophisticated reference for UnAmericannes shares similar philosophies with Americannes in that both are founded on intangible commonalities. The former purportedly evil, and the latter, not evil, both emanate from some abstract commonness that creates a contrast for us to distinguish between the two.

Yet we often speak of evil as though it becomes evil on its own, as though it stems from its own root, forgetting that we learn that evil is what it is by comparison with what it is not, good. What in part makes the two levels of morality comparable is that they are opposites. That is, besides being reverted in the ways that they are, there is still a feel of similarity between the two components of ethics. For example, with palms facing the same direction, we can slide one hand under the other to create opposites. We cannot speak of one hand being good without having the evil hand to compare it with. In the same fashion the immoral McCarthyism and moral anti-McCarthyism both have something that unites them, some common existence that makes the comparison feasible. With palms, the commonality is our hands, the stems for palms, with McCarthyism and anti-McCarthyism, their ethereal foundations. We agree that we cannot say for certain where our hands, our moral ethics, originate from. That is, without fully understanding the difference between these extremes of morality, it should be almost impossible to substantiate our prejudice against either extreme.

One might argue that this example of palms does not quiet represents the situation with good and evil and hence with Americannes and UnAmericannes. Alright. Let us say it does not. Now we create a different organisation of fingers, juggled around in all sorts of possible orders, something like a permutation. We can do this arrangement with one or both hands; in the end it shall not matter. The newly formed hands continue to be the same, even when the arrangement of one is not the same. Their handness shall abide with both. This is to us, at least as far us our imagination may take us, their tentative originality. The same applies to the origin of moral ethics of Un-Americans and those of Americans. We may never know what or how precisely the two diverge before transition but what we know for certain is that something about the genesis of their moral ethics is inherently similar. What gives us this assurance is that Un-Americans were once Americans and their reverting to a different status should not remove whatever elements that persist in both groups. Even if we want to argue that by reverting to a different state, Un-Americans were completely transformed, there is no doubt that both groups are human. But this supposed transformation, then perceived most akin to irrecoverable mental illness, is not mentioned in the accounts about those who were persecuted for their Un-Americanness. In any case the accused would still at least qualify them as human like the rest of the Americans, which is more. Thus there is that element that makes Americans and Un-American the same, and another, which is labels that makes them different. This is the exact difference between a normal person and a "witch" in Salem, and a normal person and a "gay one" in the heart of the current affairs today.

Authors of old have made the same cries about this moral absurdity - we must investigate punishments that we base on amorality and morality, whose foundations we barely comprehend. In the Victorian Hardy's The Mayor of Casterbridge where the adoption of Elizabeth-Jane by Lucetta brings Farfrae and Hanchard together, the good and the bad, moral or immoral are glued together by necessity, and us with a moral dilemma about making judgments and punishing on them. When nature is itself so intertwined, entangled with the so-called moral and amoral, to punish people who are innately part of the universe can indeed be a laughing stock.

Later on in puritan Salem history, Hawthorne addresses the same dilemma. In his The Scarlet Letter. Hester becomes the necessary evil by which we can understand the customs of the Puritan society. How could we gauge the weight of Hester's immorality without her being set apart as evil? When we destroy Hester, what kind of measurement do we achieve by comparing something that would be good with what is not there, with the destroyed evil? Thus on examination we are happy with the contrast darkness or evil against light or good because that is the easiest way for us to learn about ourselves. Even though we may chose not to openly admit become appreciative of Hester's role as the dirty model, we actually do in private appreciate enjoy her being naughty, our two-way nature.

What Miller is doing here is not essentially condemning either end. He seems to be alerting the audience to the diametric opposition that governs the justice system, calling our attention to the elixir that Dr. Jekyll drinks to become Mr. Hyde when opportunity suits him. And now we have become smart to know that McCarthyism in whatever thinkable style: communism, republicanism, democratism, or any McDemo-communo-replicanism or vice versa will be like any of the corruptible, double-pointed human designs.

Major Themes of the Play

A crucible is a vessel in which metal is heated to a high temperature and melted for the purposes of casting. It can also refer, metaphorically, to a time in history when great political, social, and cultural changes are in force, where society is seemingly being melted down and recast into a new mold. The word is also remarkably similar to crucifixion, which Miller certainly intended in choosing it as the title of his play. The picture of a man and a society bubbling in a crucible and the crucifixion of Christ interweave to form the main themes of the play: the problem of making the right moral choice and the necessity of sacrifice as a means of redemption. Both these themes, of course, take place in the context of the larger struggle of good versus evil.

The choice John Proctor must make is between saving either himself or society. His failure to do well initially allows events to get out of hand and eventually forces him into a position where he must make a choice. Reverend Hale, while not subject to the same moral quandary as Proctor, also suffers a crisis of consciousness for his failure to strive hard enough to stop the proceedings of the court. In contrast to them both are Rebecca Nurse and Elizabeth Proctor, whose moral and emotional steadfastness represents society at its best.

In a society at odds with itself and where reason and faith in the society has been replaced with irrationality and self-doubt, a clever manipulator can cause chaos. The Reverend Parris, Danforth, Hathorne, and Putnam represent the corruption of society by self-interested parties preying on society's fears. Through them, Miller highlights the destruction that manipulation and weak-mindedness can thrust upon society.

Miller suggests that in such times good can only triumph through a sacrifice upon the altar of society, that the crisis might only be able to be rectified by the death of those who struggle to uphold society's values. The death of John Proctor, though it might seem a tragic waste, is necessary, both for his own personal redemption and that of his society. The sacrifice of Proctor, Rebecca Nurse, Giles Corey and others, recalls the sacrifice of Christ for the sake of humankind. In the end, The Crucible focuses on a historical event to drive home issues that essentially characterize all societies at all times, which makes the play both universal and enduring.

The Individual Vs Authority

Miller’s concept of the parallel between 1950s America and seventeenth-century Salem emerges most clearly in the Themes of his plays. In both cases, Government assumed the right to control citizens’ beliefs as well as their actions; in both, the consequences were the same.

The reality of Communism and the generally accepted non-reality of witchcraft are beside the point. In The Crucible, John and Rebecca are not standing up for individual rights in the modern sense. Salem villagers all believe in witches and infallibility of the Bible. What the victims oppose is the abuse of power. This is relevant to any age or culture. In late seventeenth-century New England, the balance began to turn to greater individual freedom. This did not please the rulers.

Until the eighteenth century, religion played a large part in the running of most European states or colonies. In particular, those affected by the protestant Reformation conformed to some form of theocratic (god-ruled) system. Laws were based on the authority of the Bible, and the Church used them to control every aspect of people’s lives. The modern idea that religious belief is a matter of private conscience would have been considered blasphemous. Nevertheless, even in seventeenth-century New England, a more tolerant and diversified society was emerging. This movement towards change stirred up great social tensions.

The Reformation had made people more responsible for their own salvation. It substituted public disapproval for the penances of the Catholic Church. Yet the wealthier frequently escaped punishment.

In Act I, ‘I have trouble enough… He says there’s a party’ John Proctor shows his resentment when Parris criticizes his infrequent church attendance. He is absent for practical reasons—Elizabeth’s illness, his own work, and no doubt the ten-mile walk. He feels Parris does not deserve respect. Rebecca, more obedient, knows that Parris is unworthy, but is still shocked by John's remarks. Reverend hale later reprimands him for daring to question Parris's God-given authority.

Act II demonstrates the helplessness of people who try to stand up for their rights in a theocratic state. Once the witch-hunt has started, the potential for conflict escalates. Anyone who doubts the so-called evidence is questioning God's will. The judges' handling of the trial relates more to corruption of justice. They cling so inflexibly to their point of view that law-abiding characters like Rebecca and Francis Nurse are pushed into defiance. Even Hale, an establishment figure, finds he is unable to ignore his conscience. He finally denounces the court. Those whose honesty is stronger than their fear of death inevitably destroy themselves. Rebecca refuses to damn her soul with a lie; Giles values his land more than his life, and willingly accepts a horrible death.

The Effects of Fear

Fear is a dominant emotion in The Crucible. Mr. Parris is afraid that his rebellious Parishioners will use Betty's strange illness to oust him from his position; Abigail fears that Reverend Hale will find out what she did in the forest; so she embarks on an elaborate hoax that almost destroys the village. Ashamed to confess his affair with Abigail, John Proctor speaks up too late. This is only to say that the villagers of Salem are like people everywhere - they have secrets to hide and worry about their reputations.

The unique feature that drew Miller to Salem was the fear that erupted there in 1692. Puritans believed that the Devil was constantly working to tempt human beings away from God. At the end of the play, Tituba is waiting for Satan to transport her to the singin' and dancin' in Barbados. All other references to witchcraft are connected with fear, suspicion, and the collapse of normal social values. The stricken community can no longer defend itself or protect vulnerable individuals.

There are two types of accusation in the play. The first comes from characters seeking revenge or exploiting the panic for personal gain. Others pass on the blame for their misfortunes, but they are not necessarily malicious. Irrational fear deludes them into believing whatever they are told. (No one ever stops to ask why Rebecca should want to harm Mrs. Putnam's babies.)

In both the McCarthy trials and the Salem witch-hunt victims could escape punishment if they denounced others. Supplying names would of course imply that the accused were guilty themselves. In both episodes, only the strongest stood up to their judges. In his autobiography, Time bends, Miller describes his reaction to friends who were called up before the McCarthy tribunal and saved themselves by denouncing others. Similarly, in The Crucible, we meet characters that confess to practising witchcraft and accuse others of doing the same. This is the second type of accusation.

Tituba is the first to be interrogated. Mr. Putnam's threat of hanging produces the desired answer, and thereafter the demoralized slave repeats any names suggested to her. Miller builds a prolonged scene around this minor character to show exactly how the prosecutors went about their business. Tituba represents all that were terrified into naming the 'witches'.

The pressures of irrational fear are most vividly illustrated in their effects on Mary Warren. Mary is terrified from the moment she steps inside the court, but she bears up well under cross-examination; Encouraged by Proctor, she refuses to withdraw her claim that the girls are fraudulent even when bullied by judge Hathorne. Yet she begins to crumple as soon as Abigail sets the girls loose on her within minutes, Mary is caught up in their hysteria and she disintegrates. In her final moments on stage, she rushes for protection to the very person responsible for her ordeal.

Integrity

John Proctor's progress to self-awareness represents a major theme running throughout Miller's work. Miller wrote: I understand the symbolic meaning of a character and his career to consist of the kind of commitment he makes to life or refuses to make (Introduction to Collected Plays). In Miller's thinking, moral honesty cannot be separated from a commitment to society.

In Act 4, the hero cries out, 'God in Heaven, what is John Proctor?' He finds his answer during his final moments on earth. As in several other Miller plays, the central figure must come to terms with the consequences of past actions. In The Crucible's opening scenes, Proctor takes little interest in the outbreak of hysteria at Salem. He is a busy farmer living five miles from the meeting house, and his irritation with Parris has kept him away from church services. Perhaps we should also give him credit for trying to keep away from Abigail, even if his efforts are not successful.

We see him next in his domestic surroundings, ashamed of his adultery, but also resentful that his wife will not accept his sincere repentance. His refusal to meddle in village affairs follows from a very natural reluctance to publicize his adultery. (It later turns out that at least one of Abigail's friends knows about it.) At this stage, John's practical reasons for standing aloof also give him a pretext for evading social responsibility. When the witch-hunters invade his home and arrest his wife, he is forced to become involved. In the court scenes, John rises above his own fears and resentment to argue as well as he can for common sense and reason. We see his growing social involvement when he turns down the chance to save Elizabeth by abandoning his friends and their wives. Yet his plan of action still depends on making someone else take responsibility - Mary Warren. Only when this hope collapses does he tell the full truth, regardless of consequences.

Act 4 concentrates almost wholly on this current theme. John faces a final temptation to retreat into dishonesty and save his life. His newfound closeness with Elizabeth increases his agony. At first he uses his own guilt to escape the gallows, but under Danforth’s relentless pressure he arrives at a clear view of what his choice must be. He manages to accept and forgive his own imperfections. Discovering his 'core' and identity, John can at last take charge of his life, neither rejecting social involvement nor handing over his conscience to someone else.

Irony is often used in The Crucible to emphasize the irrationality of the witch-hunt. That John Proctor's life-affirming choice should lead to death is the greatest irony of the play.

Two other characters, Reverend Hale and Elizabeth, take a similar path to self-awareness. Elizabeth perceives that her own physical coldness was partly responsible for the affair between Abigail and her husband. However, this is a dramatic device to allow John Proctor to come to terms with himself. We have no clue as to how Elizabeth will deal with her knowledge after John's death.

In the final Act, Hale is full of remorse for supporting the witch-hunt. Preaching a doctrine that is the exact opposite of his former beliefs, he urges the prisoners to lie in order to save themselves. This desperate attempt to appease his conscience brings him no comfort. He is a man broken by guilt; there is no indication that he will ever recover.

Mass Hysteria

Mass hysteria does not have to involve hysterical behaviour in the ordinary sense. The phrase describes what happens when the same strong emotion grips a large group of people. Most of us have experienced it in milder forms. When we cheer on our favourite team, or go 'clubbing', feeling part of the crowd intensifies our emotion. This can apply to any situation, even when people are not physically assembled in the same place.

There is another side to the phenomenon. When fear and prejudice spread through a community, they become self-reinforcing and their effect on individuals is enormously magnified. In The Crucible, the behaviour of both adolescents and adults is a powerful demonstration of this reality. Everything happens against a background of on going quarrels that have never been spilled. In Act 1, several random circumstances combine to provoke the disaster. The girls' reaction when their expedition to the forest is found out leads to the suspicion of witchcraft; Mr. Hale is eager to try out his skills; Mrs. Putnam has never stopped grieving for her dead babies, and uses the crisis to find a scapegoat.

By the end of Act 1, the adults have succumbed to their fear that the Devil and his witches are trying to destroy Salem. The only two strong enough to resist - Rebecca and John Proctor -have left the stage. This is the first of the play's biting ironies: the true model of Satanic possession is not the innocent victims, but the accusers (and later, the judges), who hand themselves over to the little crazy children.

Once the hysteria is established, it triggers almost every incident in the play. Through the Proctors' servant, Mary Warren, it invades the quiet domesticity of their home. Tragically, the quarrel between John and Elizabeth has a direct effect on their ability to resist. Their dispute prevents John from taking steps that might have changed the course of events.

We know that common sense has lost when we hear about the arrest of so widely respected a person as Rebecca Nurse.The girls' unpredictable behaviour is both a symbol of the hysteria infecting society and a dramatization of that hysteria in action. So, too, is the gullibility of adults who swallow the girls' accusations. Notice how skilfully Miller leads up to his two scenes of 'possession', the first engineered by Abigail to save her own skin, and the second a full-blown demonstration of mass hysteria in action.

At the end of Act 1, we see Abigail whipping Betty Parris into a state of hysteria as she begins a campaign to save her own skin and, later, to destroy Elizabeth Proctor. In Act 2 we hear about the girls' increasing power, but only through description. Wherever Abigail walks, the crowd would part like the sea for Israel, and if her followers scream and howl and (all to the floor - the person's clapped in the jail for bewitchin' them. At some point - Miller does not say when - the girls' fraud takes them over and they can no longer help their behaviour. The playwright skilfully holds back the second scene of possession until the moment of maximum impact -the terrifying climax to Act 3.

There have been several attempts to explain the behaviour of the girls at Salem. One theory relates it to Sigmund Freud's work on clinical hysteria. Freud concluded that buried emotions were responsible for symptoms in his patients that appeared to have no physical cause. What he described came very close to what happened at Salem. The symptoms were catching; and Freud's patients were often in a state of 'dual consciousness'. They knew what was happening to them, but had virtually no control over themselves.

Miller leaves open the question of how many girls were similarly affected and when this happened. Abigail alone knows exactly what she is doing; she controls the court officials as tightly as she controls her followers. She is confident enough to threaten Judge Danforth, the Deputy-Governor. Danforth thunders at Mary, 'You will confess yourself or you will hang', but Abigail instinctively moves on to something far more sinister. Mary ceases to exist in human form when Abigail 'sees' her in the yellow bird perched on a roof beam. Psychological torture works by alienating victims from their own identity. In the horrifying climax, Abigail hypnotizes the girls into a single mass consciousness, and uses them to destroy Mary's personality and will-power.

The Corruption of Justice

It is hard for anyone today to regard a trial for witchcraft as anything other than a mockery of justice. To pick out what goes wrong in The Crucible we have to put aside disbelief and look at the details of charging, arrest and trial.

Reverend Hale discovers the first 'witch' - Tituba - without any judicial enquiry at all. The first barrier against an unbiased examination of evidence is the close association of Church and State. Those who interpret God's laws do not imagine themselves capable of human error. As a clergyman in a theocratic society, Mr. Hale is allowed to speak on behalf of the state, although he has no legal training. It is through him that Abigail and her followers become linked to the court as official witch-finders. 'The entire contention of the state ... is that the voice of Heaven is speaking through the children', Danforth tells Proctor. Yet the haphazard nature of the accusations leaves them wide open to abuse by people like Thomas Putnam.

The process of arrest is chaotic as well as brutal, as we see when Cheever and Herrick arrive at the Proctors' farmhouse to take Elizabeth to jail. Cheever will not tell her why he is looking for 'puppets'. During the trials, Danforth manipulates both defendants and legal procedure to suit his purpose. He never attempts to look at probabilities, or weigh the defendants' motives. Despite his authority and experience, he presides over an unruly court. He allows Hathorne to score points based on sheer verbal trickery - 'How do you know, then, that you are not a witch?' Danforth does the same himself when he entraps Elizabeth into lying to save her husband's reputation. He also uses leading questions to get the answers that suit him (though not always successfully):

'Might it be that here we have no afflicting spirit loose; but in the court there were some?'

> 'You deny every scrap and tittles of this?'
>
> 'You have seen the Devil, have you not?'

The greatest injustice in the whole conduct of the witch trials is that the inquisitors offer a reprieve to those that confess, provided they name other suspects. Proctor points out the obvious consequences to Hale, but the minister refuses to face the truth. So the witch-hunt swells to an enormous size and infects other parts of the province. The nightmare only ends when the whole community is on the brink of revolt.

Conformity, Imbalance of Power, And Social Injustice

Conformity has plagued mankind for ages. It is a strong theme in The Crucible, and Miller's audience can draw parallels to it in their own lives. In The Crucible, the need to conform to the church's views and that of its minister is quite evident. The characters in the play find themselves in a very difficult situation. They must either turn their backs on what they believe in or lie by admitting to having had "relations with the devil", thereby conforming with the church's wishes, or they must follow their individualistic beliefs and refuse to lie. The Crucible should be considered a great drama just because of itsall-encompassing theme of conformity.

The Crucible has so much more to it that it needn't be considered great drama on the basis of a good theme alone. It also attacks the poor balance of power that we can see around us every day. Miller shows us how much power a sole individual can have when that person defines the ideologies or beliefs by which we live. During the Salem Witch Trials religion was, much more so than now, the answer to what people didn't understand. So as a result, ministers and priests were extremely powerful because they were the only people that were "qualified" to interpret the rules of their religion. They were considered to be the voice of God. Back in Salem, how could anything have been more powerful than that? Nobody could question the priests because they would then be questioning God. Which of course was completely taboo. So a person in such a position of power could say nearly anything they wanted, such as deciding that "cleansing" was needed in Salem. And, as a result, people would listen and it would be done, but not necessarily deemed to be right.

In the 1950's the idea of an imbalance of power was still an issue. After just starting to recover from the Holocaust, which was fueled by the very same need for "cleansing" as in Salem but on a larger scale, Americans were bewildered as to how easily people could be manipulated by those in a position of great power. Hitler had just basically accused a few million people of being witches. Americans could see how weak they were. One could not question the government, the military, or the church. To this very day, a huge amount of people are still afraid of questioning the church - look at the issue of abortion and the Catholic Church's position upon it for example.

Miller portrayed the priests and judges in The Crucible as that certain type of people that Americans will always be up against in the struggle for power. While the Church and its' ministers isn't quite as powerful now because people can openly admit having no belief in God without fear of being hung, we now have a new group of people that decide what is true and what is not. Science is the new religion and scientists the new priests. Scientists are the only people capable of interpreting what all of the math and formulas mean. And as a result, the rest of us openly accept their conclusions to be the true. This is the same kind of reliance that people put on the church two hundred years ago. And at that time, you didn't question it. The church was always right. The Crucible is a great drama because it addresses the issue of conformity in American culture and questions the amount of power that we allow those to have whom are supposedly more educated than the majority of the population and are responsible for defining the ideologies and beliefs by which we live.

At the time when The Crucible was first being performed something was taking place that was very alike the Salem Witch Trials. In Hollywood, the House Un-American Activities Committee was investigating the film industry for communist activities. Actors, writers, and directors were interrogated as to whether or not they had involved themselves in any kind of relations with the Communist Party. If people didn't readily conform to the HUAC's line of questioning, and answer their questions regardless of whether or not they were deemed intrusive or not, it was assumed that they had been involved with the Communist Party. It was thought that the Communists were trying to gain control of the American film industry for propaganda purposes. As a result, those individuals that were thought to be in any way associated with the Communists were blacklisted in Hollywood and could no longer work there.

As history has shown us, the injustices that occurred during the Salem Witch Trials continue to go on. Most obviously by the HUAC in America at the time of Miller's The Crucible. We see parallels between the Salem Witch Trials and other issues even today. Most recently, the military wanted to discharge any gay men in service. These kind of injustices will always exist. The Crucible addresses the idea of a group of select people choosing another group for a scapegoat to a supposedly determined "problem" that exists. This is yet another reason why The Crucible should be considered to be great drama.

Arthur Miller's, The Crucible, addressed issues which were as important to Americans in the 1950's as they are today. The idea of conformity is one which any given individual will always face. People who define the ideologies and beliefs by which we live will also always exist. As will the accusations made by one group of select individuals towards groups of others in order to support their cause, or solve their problem. The House Un-American Activities Committee was doing exactly that in the 1950's which was why the idea of "cleansing" in The Crucible was so relevant to Americans. Arthur Miller's play took on very strong themes and took a stand against issues that are still pertinent to date. Great drama is something in which an audience can find relevance and relation. Great drama is drama that will always be important. The Crucible is a play that no one will ever be able to ignore because of Miller's ability to touch issues and themes that have plagued mankind throughout history and will continue to do so in the future.

The Crucible – The Title

Arthur Miller cleverly picked the title "The Crucible" for his play about the Salem witch hunts of the 1660's because of the word's many meanings. Throughout the play, Miller has characters face severe tests that make them question their own self. A crucible is also an earthen pot that is used for melting metals. In a way the town of Salem was a crucible as people were brought before the court and blasted with allegations from others as being witches. They were either forced to give in and live a lie or be hanged.

The term crucible could also be used to describe the heat of the situation. Innocent people were caught up in the witch hunt were thrown into an overheated situation that had been blown completely out of proportion. The crucible may also symbolize Hell. As substances in a crucible melt and disintegrate they form a completely different substance. This could symbolize the society of Salem disintegrating and forming into a completely new one. After the situation had been heated what you are left with are the remnants of society that once existed.

By the end of this play, the true meaning of the word crucible was a severe test. John Proctor underwent the most severe test and as a result his character underwent a drastic change throughout the play. The ultimate test that John Proctor undergoes is the final decision that he makes before he dies. The town of Salem was deeply religious and they were willing to believe the word of a deceitful young girl rather than believe in the integrity of people like John Proctor, Reverend Hale, and Rebecca Nurse.

Throughout the play John Proctor was an honest man, as was his wife, Elizabeth until she was asked to testify against her husband about his affair. One thing that never changed about Proctor throughout the whole play was his willingness to stand for his beliefs. Time after time, he was bombarded with questions about why he didn't regularly attend church or why he didn't have one of his sons baptized. He answered these questions with integrity and questioned the ministry of Parris. No one in the town of Salem had done that before.

Proctor was also undergoing a difficult time in his marriage with Elizabeth and at the beginning he seemed timid to deal with it. The first time that Elizabeth and John are in a scene together the mood is extremely awkward. There is hardly any eye contact or communication between the two. This had been going on for seven months, since Proctor's affair with Abigail Williams.

By the end of the play, the soreness of the subject seemed to disappear and any timidness that Proctor felt also disappeared. In the final two scenes, John Proctor was willing to ruin his name by stating that he did in fact have an affair with Abigail in order to prove the accusers wrong. Before this time, Proctor would not even discuss the issue especially when Abigail approached him in the first scene about it. Abigail claimed that she thought about him and that one night she had with him constantly. Proctor would not reply and wanted nothing to do with the conversation. Proctor wanted to wish that whole night away, as if never happened. He even said that was ashamed of his act. When it came to restoring credibility to the people accused by Abigail he was willing to set aside his personal problems and admit to his adultery.

The ultimate test came at the end when Proctor must decide between confessing and living or dying alongside the wrongly accused people of Salem. He chose the latter, but I do not think the Proctor from Act I would have done this. The Salem Witch Trials changed the man drastically as he appeared to be a stubborn man in the beginning. By the end, Proctor chose to die in the most righteous way, with dignity. In the beginning, Proctor could be described as stubborn and selfish, but by the end of he was anything but these qualities. He was willing to die alongside those that were accused and he refused to take the easy way out the situation by confessing to something he never did. Proctor and the others were unwilling to confess. Instead they stood for the principles of honesty and integrity in order to die noble deaths.

"The Crucible" was a good name for this play because of its originality and how its various meanings seemingly fit into the plot and the various sub-plots of the play. Salem was the perfect setting for the "the Crucible" as the settlers had no place to turn away from the heat, the mayhem, and the severe tests that faced them in the town. The heat of the situation forced the change of John Proctor and the town was forever changed as a result of the trials and the false the accusations.

Symbolic importance of the Title

Arthur Miller cleverly picked the title "The Crucible" for his play about the Salem witch hunts of the 1660's because of the word's many meanings. Throughout the play, Miller has characters face severe tests that make them question their own self. A crucible is also an earthen pot that is used for melting metals. In a way the town of Salem was a crucible as people were brought before the court and blasted with allegations from others as being witches. They were either forced to give in and live a lie or be hanged.

The term crucible could also be used to describe the heat of the situation. Innocent people were caught up in the witch hunt were thrown into an overheated situation that had been blown completely out of proportion. The crucible may also symbolize Hell. As substances in a crucible melt and disintegrate they form a completely different substance. This could symbolize the society of Salem disintegrating and forming into a completely new one. After the situation had been heated what you are left with are the remnants of society that once existed.

By the end of this play, the true meaning of the word crucible was a severe test. John Proctor underwent the most severe test and as a result his character underwent a drastic change throughout the play. The ultimate test that John Proctor undergoes is the final decision that he makes before he dies. The town of Salem was deeply religious and they were willing to believe the word of a deceitful young girl rather than believe in the integrity of people like John Proctor, Reverend Hale, and Rebecca Nurse.

Throughout the play John Proctor was an honest man, as was his wife, Elizabeth until she was asked to testify against her husband about his affair. One thing that never changed about Proctor throughout the whole play was his willingness to stand for his beliefs. Time after time, he was bombarded with questions about why he didn't regularly attend church or why he didn't have one of his sons baptized. He answered these questions with integrity and questioned the ministry of Parris. No one in the town of Salem had done that before.

Proctor was also undergoing a difficult time in his marriage with Elizabeth and at the beginning he seemed timid to deal with it. The first time that Elizabeth and John are in a scene together the mood is extremely awkward. There is hardly any eye contact or communication between the two. This had been going on for seven months, since Proctor's affair with Abigail Williams.

By the end of the play, the soreness of the subject seemed to disappear and any timidness that Proctor felt also disappeared. In the final two scenes, John Proctor was willing to ruin his name by stating that he did in fact have an affair with Abigail in order to prove the accusers wrong. Before this time, Proctor would not even discuss the issue especially when Abigail approached him in the first scene about it. Abigail claimed that she thought about him and that one night she had with him constantly. Proctor would not reply and wanted nothing to do with the conversation. Proctor wanted to wish that whole night away, as if never happened. He even said that was ashamed of his act. When it came to restoring credibility to the people accused by Abigail he was willing to set aside his personal problems and admit to his adultery.

The ultimate test came at the end when Proctor must decide between confessing and living or dying alongside the wrongly accused people of Salem. He chose the latter, but I do not think the Proctor from Act I would have done this. The Salem Witch Trials changed the man drastically as he appeared to be a stubborn man in the beginning. By the end, Proctor chose to die in the most righteous way, with dignity. In the beginning, Proctor could be described as stubborn and selfish, but by the end of he was anything but these qualities. He was willing to die alongside those that were accused and he refused to take the easy way out the situation by confessing to something he never did. Proctor and the others were unwilling to confess. Instead they stood for the principles of honesty and integrity in order to die noble deaths.

"The Crucible" was a good name for this play because of its originality and how its various meanings seemingly fit into the plot and the various sub-plots of the play. Salem was the perfect setting for the "the Crucible" as the settlers had no place to turn away from the heat, the mayhem, and the severe tests that faced them in the town. The heat of the situation forced the change of John Proctor and the town was forever changed as a result of the trials and the false the accusations.

McCarthyism and "The Crucible"

After World War II, America and Russia began to view one another uneasily. The two countries were based on opposing ideologies, namely capitalism and communism. In addition, each country was rapidly expanding its political influence throughout Europe and the Third World. In 1947, the Cold War began, and the two powers began to treat one another as deadly enemies. In America, anyone who had ever flirted with socialist or communist beliefs was suddenly seen as a traitor to the American way of life.

Although the persecution of leftists took its name from the McCarthy hearings of the early 1950s, it actually began with the publication of the Attorney-General's List in 1947 by the House Committee of Un-American Activities (HUAC). This list con-tained names of people with ties to subversive or communist organizations. Later, this list expanded to become the notorious Black List, by which thousands of people were forbidden to work in their professions. In addition, HUAC held hearings to investigate charges of "Un-Americanism." These hearings con-tinued through the McCarthy era and were often more damag-ing than the McCarthy hearings themselves.

In 1950, the Chinese Revolution had just been won, the Russians had exploded their first atomic bomb and the Korean War had just begun. The time was ripe for an explosion of anti-communist feeling. Overnight, Senator Joseph McCarthy became famous with his accusation that, for 20 years, the Democratic government had been nurturing the growth of com-munism in America. Under McCarthy, Senate hearings were set up and the wholesale persecution of leftists began.

It should be remembered that during the Spanish Civil War and World War II, many people had worked with socialists and leftists to fight fascism. Indeed, only a few years before, America and Russia had been allies. Under McCarthyism, however, anti-communist hysteria became so intense and so irrational that even moderate liberals referred to it as a witch hunt. As Miller states in his notes to The Crucible, "in America any man who is not reactionary in his views is open to the charge of alliance with the Red hell-a political policy is equated with moral right, and opposition to it with diabolical malevolence."

The McCarthy and HUAC hearings followed a similar pat-tern. As each "witness" took the stand, he would be asked whether he had ever had any dealings with communists. If he refused to answer, he could be arrested. If he denied the charge, he would be asked to prove his innocence by giving the names of those who did have communist connections. If he confessed to having once attended a leftist meeting or contributed to a leftist cause, then he was asked to show that he had reformed by naming others who had attended that meeting or worked for that cause. Those who were named were then called to the hear-ings as new witnesses.

Unfortunately, few witnesses had the courage to stand up to the McCarthy and HUAC committees. Most willingly gave the names of friends and colleagues who had at some time been associated with leftist causes. If they didn't know any names, they often repeated rumors or simply lied. And, as one critic commented in disgust, "they lied, not to save their lives, but to save their swimming pools."

The McCarthy hearings particularly focused on the arts in America. Between 1950 and 1954, several artists and intellec-tuals were imprisoned for refusing to testify, including Dashiell Hammett and the famous "Hollywood Ten." In addition, thousands of writers, musicians, actors and directors were "blacklisted" and forbidden to work. Some left the country, others changed professions, and still others changed their names. Some resumed their careers when the blacklist was lifted in the 1960s, but for most the damage was permanent.

Eventually, McCarthy's power collapsed under its own weight. As the government and the arts were purged over and over, the old lists became tired and worn. McCarthy became wilder and wilder in his accusations, claiming that the American army had become disloyal and that powerful generals were traitors. The public became increasingly skeptical of McCarthy's charges and began to press for the truth. Public opposition increased as a number of well-known witnesses, including Arthur Miller, challenged the authority of the HUAC and McCarthy hearings.

The Crucible was first performed in January of 1953. It must have seemed like a slap in the face to McCarthy by a leading American playwright. McCarthyism had been called a witch hunt, and here was a play about the real witch hunt. Parallels between the Salem court and the McCarthy and HUAC hearings were clearly drawn.

During the hearings, as in Salem, due process of law was abandoned and hysteria was spread through lies and rumors. Witnesses were trapped into dishonest confessions and forced to falsely accuse their friends and neighbors. Those who opposed the hearings were accused of working for the Red devil, rather than simply the Devil, as in Salem. In Washington, as in Salem, many innocent people suffered. As Miller says of the victims of the witch hunt, "one can only pity them all, just as we will be pitied someday."

Today, the Salem witch hunt is far behind us and the McCarthy era too is history. Nonetheless, The Crucible still has political meaning for our time. In his notes to The Crucible, Miller points out that "the balance has yet to be struck between order and freedom." Every age and every society has its repres-sions. In the past few years, members of the "Moral Majority" have increasingly tried to limit various freedoms in the United States. Quite possibly, Americans will soon have to choose once more between authority of the state and freedom of the indiv-idual.

The Crucible's themes, then, are timeless. As long as governments continue to distort the truth, individuals with courage and integrity will continue to challenge them. The choice between freedom and repression is always with us.

The Crucible - Weakness, Jealousy, and Manipulation

In every conflict there always seems to be at least one person to blame. In The Crucible by Arthur Miller, many problems arise that deal with live and death. Many innocent people in this play were hanged during the Salem Witch Trials. Of course, there are many people that may be blamed. In The Crucible, one may find Abigail Williams, The Putnams, and Mary Warren to blame. Abigail was manipulative, The Putnams were very jealous, and Mary Warren was weak-willed.

Although she was a smart girl, Abigail was only out for herself and her own reputation. Abigail Williams didn't only lie about witchcraft, but she forced others to join in. She was Reverend Parris's niece and believed she could get away with whatever she wanted. Abigail did not want to have to damage her reputation by having a different testimony as all the other girls, so she forced them to lie as well. While alone with the girls she said, "Let either of you breathe a word, or the edge of a word about the other things, and I will come to you in the black of some terrible night and I will bring a pointy reckoning that will shudder you. And you know I can do it..." (Miller 1044). Abigail also stuck a needle in herself because she knew Goody Proctor had a poppet at her home with a needle in it. While talking to John Proctor about Abigail, Cheever remarked, "...and, stuck two inches in the flesh of her belly, she draw a needle out. And demandin' of her how she come to be so stabbed, she testify it were your wife's familiar spirit pushed it in," (Miller 1077). Abigail may have been the most prominent person to lay the blame on, but other people were guilty as well.

Jealousy also played a big role in who was to blame for the deaths in Salem. The Putnams were a small family, whose seven children out of eight did not survive. Mrs. Putnam was a very jealous person when it came to families, and Mr. Putnam was a very jealous person when it came to land. Goody Putnam wanted more children and was jealous of Rebecca Nurse and her large family, so she blamed her for witchcraft. Mr. Putnam wanted more and more land and was very greedy. He accused many people of witchcraft, and once they were hanged, he would buy their land. Mental weakness is as much to blame for these deaths as much as jealousy and manipulation.

Some people may have good intentions, but still cause harm by the things they do. Mary Warren was the servant for the Proctors. In her case, sewing a poppet for Elizabeth Proctor caused a lot of problems for her. During the trials, Mary sewed a poppet to give to Elizabeth as a gift. However innocent it was, it still was the underlying reason that she got accused of witchcraft. Also, during the trials Mary didn't want to tell the judge that all the girls were lying, even though she did tell Proctor. She made him look bad by lying and saying, "My name, he want my name. `I'll murder you,' he says, `if my wife hangs! We must go and overthrow the court,' he says!" (Miller 1102). Proctor was so aggravated by this that he said some things about God that he shouldn't have, and there was no tolerance for that in Salem.

The people in this play may have had different motives for accusing other people, and practically sentencing them to death, but the outcome of all the accusations were basically the same. Innocent people died and there was more than one person to lay the blame on. In almost every conflict there is someone, or some people, to blame. In this case, it was Abigail, the Putnams, and Mary Warren.

The Witch-Hunting and Historical Scenes in the Time of "The Crucible"

"The Crucible" is a political play pertaining to the backdrop midst of twentieth century in general history of the world. In 1951, America was passing through difficult circumstances. After the 2nd World War Communism was having its impact on the world. Most of the countries and nations were becoming communist e.g. Korea, Vietnam and Algeria. Capitalism was in its defence.

There was a rivalry in nuclear fields and conquering to star world. Russia was in escort in this respect. Russia first sent Spuntink-1, China was expanding but America was trying to stop China. There was a cold war in Loascom. It was not an open armed conflict between U.S.A and Union of Soviet. State of Republic, both super power U.S.A and U.S.S.R were trying to destroy each other though in cold manners. America wanted to check the growing interest of communists. Intellectuals of the world started to appreciate the communism e.g. B. Russell.

Early kings of the Russia were called "Czar". In their period, they occupied many territories of Iran. But when Communism dominated Russia, they returned these areas. This thing brought Muslims in favour of communism. There started a great movement of "Islamic Socialism". There is no difference between Islam and Socialism. Both want equality.

In 1936, in Spain, came the Government of France, as the leaders of Fascists. They were against communism. So he started to crush communists in Spain. Intellectuals from the entire world started together in Spain to participate in war. There was a war between rightist and leftist. America and Britain support France to stop communism.

Under American instructions, there started Islamic movements from Turkey to Indonesia and they say that communists are heathen and are not like Muslims. So most of Islamic movements are the creation of them. Mujahedeen were produced in order to encounter the communists. In this way the influence of communism was tried to break. In this regard there started the search of communists in America and the whole world.

American feels that communist had entered in their Government. In the area from Turkey to Indonesia, communists were banned by America and Islamic religious parties were brought to front. U.S, Senate created a committee called Un American Activities Committee. They arrested everyone whom they suspected to be communist by declaring them witches. This was called witch hunting. There was no way for agents of communism. They either, punished them or put into prisons or sent into madhouses. If one wanted to escape from the charge of communism. There is only one way, to name other one. Many were killed, many went underworld, and many committed suicide. Everyone felt unsafe

.Miller, the great artist, wrote his play in this context. He found an artistic way of bringing up the political issue in aesthetic style. He picked up, from the history of U.S.A, a well-known case of witch hunting in seventeenth century in a town of Salem. He wrote about the incidents of the seventeenth century. There were rumours that witches were in this town and they picked up children. People started to use these rumours for their personal interest. The play was very successive but the reference to 19thcentury witch hunting was too obvious. The chairman of Un American Activities Committee was Senator Joseph McCarthy investigated particularly university teachers, trade unionists and artists of all kinds. That's why Miller was restricted to go to foreign countries.

Arthur Miller's play, The Crucible, is based upon actual events in Salem, Massachusetts in 1692. Some facts, as Miller admits in the introduction, have been changed. Abigail, for instance was only 11 at the time of the trials and John Proctor was 60. An affair between the two of them is a somewhat far-fetched idea. Betty Parris, who was six at the time, became strangely ill sometime after February 1692. She complained of a fever and crashed about the house in pain.

There is much speculation about the actual cause of her symptoms. A man named Cotton Mather had recently published a book called Memorable Providences describing the suspected witchcraft of a woman in Boston. Betty’s behaviour in many ways mirrored that described in the book. Closer attention was paid when Abigail Williams, eleven-year-old Ann Putnam Jr. (called Ruth in Miller's play), seventeen-year-old Mercy Lewis and Mary Walcott (Susanna) began to exhibit similar symptoms. When Dr. Griggs could not cure the children, he naturally suggested that some supernatural force must be at work. An increasingly larger group, which also grew to include adults, began to complain of afflictions. Sometime after February 25, Betty and Abigail named their tormentors with such consistent stories that it seems that the girls must have been working their stories out together. The first people to be accused of witchcraft (Tituba, Sarah Osborn, and Sarah Good) were outsiders.

It was easy for the pious townspeople to believe that those who differed from them were influenced by the devil. The antics in the court proceedings went much as Miller portrayed. Displays of the victim’s apparent affliction when in the presence of the witch were considered valid evidence of guilt. The fervour may have died down at that point but Tituba, who had been adamantly denying involvement in witchcraft, proclaimed that she had been approached by a tall man who asked her to sign his book. She stated that she and four others, including Sarah Good and Sarah Osborn, were in fact witches and flew through the air on poles. At this point, the witch hunting took off. Even the four-year old daughter of Sarah Good, Dorcas, was accused and jailed. Bridget Bishop, the sixty-year-old owner of a house of ill repute was the first brought to trial. She was the most likely of the prisoners to be convicted considering her deviant behaviour (in terms of the standards at the time). After her conviction however, one of the judges, Saltonstall, resigned in disgust. (It is interesting to know that the author Nathaniel Hawthorne was a descendant of Judge Hawthorne. That was added to distinguish future generations from the shameful actions of the Salem judge.) Bridget Bishop was hanged on June 10, 1692.

As time went on the accused were not as disreputable as Bishop. Rebecca Nurse was actually found not guilty but Chief Justice Stoughton urged the jury to reconsider and she was condemned. John Proctor was actually a tavern owner (not a farmer as in the play) and was openly critical of the witch-hunts. He was an example of what would happen to those who spoke out against the proceedings. Proctor was hanged August 19, 1692.Doubt in the validity of the accusations finally began when the Ex-Reverend George Burroughs was hung. He recited the Lord’s Prayer perfectly, which was thought impossible for one in league with the Devil. Cotton Mather, the author, was in attendance that day and it was his intervention that brought the people back to supporting the trials.

After all, an innocent person would not be convicted. Giles Corey was as the play reports, pressed to death for refusing to enter a plea to the charge of witchcraft against him. His wife Martha was hanged three days later with7 other convicted witches. Her group would be the last to die. Salem was regaining its senses. Reverend John Hale and the villagers found it increasingly harder to believe that so many respectable people would turn to the Devil all at once. Increase Mather, the father of Cotton, began to argue against the use of spectral evidence (Cotton had been a strong force in allowing its use). Without spectral evidence, most of the remaining trials ended in acquittals. Reverend Parris was replaced though he tried to blame those around him. Many of those involved also tried to place the blame on others. Those still in prison were released and in later years, the families of the executed were compensated. The people of Salem still remember the terrible events of their history. The Salem Witch Museum is an integral part of the town as is a stone wall with jutting slabs bearing the names of the dead.

When John Proctor is asked to recall his Ten Commandments (a witch could not), he forgets adultery just as he literally forgot when he chose to have an affair with Abigail.

Proctor calls Hale Pontius Pilate. Hale sees the injustice being done yet he is willing to go along with the will of the people (the court) in order to protect himself as the biblical figure allowed the crucifixion of Jesus. Hale is not acting in a just manner. By the time he changes his ways, it is too late for him to have any influence. If Hale is Pontius Pilate, the innocent victims of the tragedy are like Jesus. Christians believe that Jesus died to save future generations. Those who learn from the deaths in Salem are also saved. They are saved from repeating history and suffering another great loss of life.

"The Crucible" Presents the Real Characters from Real American Society

In a sense, The Crucible has the structure of a classical tragedy, with John Proctor as the play's tragic hero. Honest, upright, and blunt-spoken, Proctor is a good man, but one with a secret, fatal flaw. His lust for Abigail Williams led to their affair (which occurs before the play begins), and created Abigail's jealousy of his wife, Elizabeth, which sets the entire witch hysteria in motion.

Once the trials begin, Proctor realizes that he can stop Abigail's rampage through Salem but only if he confesses to his adultery. Such an admission would ruin his good name, and Proctor is, above all, a proud man who places great emphasis on his reputation. He eventually makes an attempt, through Mary warren's testimony, to name Abigail as a fraud without revealing the crucial information. When this attempt fails, he finally bursts out with a confession, calling Abigail a "whore" and proclaiming his guilt publicly.

Only then does he realize that it is too late, that matters have gone too far, and that not even the truth can break the powerful frenzy that he has allowed Abigail to whip up. Proctor's confession succeeds only in leading to his arrest and conviction as a witch, and though he lambastes the court and its proceedings, he is also aware of his terrible role in allowing this fervour to grow unchecked

Proctor redeems himself and provides a final denunciation of the witch trials in his final act. Offered the opportunity to make a public confession of his guilt and live, he almost succumbs, even signing a written confession. His immense pride and fear of public opinion compelled him to withhold his adultery from the court, but by the end of the play he is more concerned with his personal integrity than his public reputation. He, still, wants to save his name, but for personal and religious reasons rather than public reasons.

Proctor's refusal to provide a false confession is a true religious and personal stand. Such a confession would dishonour his fellow prisoners, who are brave enough to die as testimony to the truth. Perhaps more relevantly, a false admission would also dishonour him, staining not just his public reputation, but also his soul. By refusing to give up his personal integrity Proctor implicitly proclaims his conviction that such integrity will bring him to heaven. He goes to the gallows redeemed for his earlier sins. As Elizabeth says to end the play, responding to Hale's plea that she convince Proctor to publicly confess:

"He has his goodness now. God forbid I take it from him!"

Of the major characters, Abigail is the least complex. She is clearly the villain of the play, more so than Parris or Danforth: she tells lies, manipulates her friends and the entire town, and eventually sends nineteen innocent people to their deaths. Throughout the hysteria, Abigail's motivations never seem more complex than simple jealousy and a desire to have revenge on Elizabeth Proctor. The language of the play is almost Biblical, and Abigail seems like a Biblical character—a Jezebel figure, driven only by sexual desire and a lust for power. Nevertheless, it is worth pointing out a few background details that, though they don't mitigate Abigail's guilt, make her actions more understandable.

Abigail is an orphan and an unmarried girl; she thus occupies a low rung on the Puritan Salem social ladder (the only people below her are the slaves, like Tituba, and social outcasts). For young girls in Salem, the minister and the other male adults are God's earthly representatives, their authority derived from on high. The trials, then, in which the girls are allowed to act as though they have a direct connection to God, empower the previously powerless Abigail. Once shunned and scorned by the respectable townsfolk who had heard rumours of her affair with John Proctor, Abigail now finds that she has clout, and she takes full advantage of it. A mere accusation from one of Abigail's troop is enough to incarcerate and convict even the well-respected inhabitant of Salem. Whereas others once reproached her for her adultery, she now has the opportunity to accuse them of the worst sin of all: devil-worship.

John Hale, the intellectual, naïve witch-hunter, enters the play in Act I when Parris summons him to examine his daughter, Betty. In an extended commentary on Hale in Act I, Miller describes him as "a tight-skinned, eager-eyed intellectual. This is a beloved errand for him; on being called here to ascertain witchcraft he has felt the pride of the specialist whose unique knowledge has at last been publicly called for." Hale enters in a flurry of activity, carrying large books and projecting an air of great knowledge. In the early going, he is the force behind the witch trials, probing for confessions and encouraging people to testify.

Over the course of the play, however, he experiences a transformation, one more remarkable than that of any other character. Listening to John Proctor and Mary Warren, he becomes convinced that they, not Abigail, are telling the truth. In the climactic scene in the court in Act III, he throws his lot in with those opposing the witch trials. In tragic fashion, his about-face comes too late—the trials are no longer in his hands but rather in those of Danforth and the theocracy, which has no interest in seeing its proceedings exposed as a sham.

The failure of his attempts to turn the tide renders the once-confident Hale a broken man. As his belief in witchcraft falters, so does his faith in the law. In Act IV, it is he who counsels the accused witches to lie, to confess their supposed sins in order to save their own lives. In his change of heart and subsequent despair, Hale gains the audience's sympathy but not its respect, since he lacks the moral fibre of Rebecca Nurse or, as it turns out, John Proctor. Although Hale recognizes the evil of the witch trials, his response is not defiance but surrender. He insists that survival is the highest good, even if it means accommodating oneself to injustice—something that the truly heroic characters can never accept.

"The Crucible" As a Modern Tragedy

"The crucible" is a modern tragedy written in the perspective of ahistorical incident of Salem's witchcraft (17th century) but, the play highlights the vindictiveness of McCarthyism and Communists trails in America in 20th century.

The play contains almost all the elements of a modern tragedy. Though it is quite different from other tragedies as it brings forth a story of historical importance, yet the protagonist of the play, John Proctor, shares a lot with a modern man. Miller has blended intellectual, social, moral and psychological problems of a modern man in the character of Proctor.

There are many arguments whether this play is a tragedy or not. The left hand critics declare "The Crucible" is not a tragedy as it does not fulfil all the conditions set by Aristotle, that the protagonist should be a royal birth and the centre of attention of everyone as it is common in the plays of Sophocles and Shakespeare to be able to arouse the feelings of pity and fear associated to a tragedy. But this accusation does not hold much strength, as in the world of today kings and princes are not present with similar pomp and show. So, the presentation of a royal figure would be unrealistic and fictitious.

Moreover, modern man is not confronted with supernatural elements like the heroes of classical plays. Rather today man is at war with society to have a dignified and a respectable position in it. Now everyman is a centre of his own attention. The basic problem of modern man is to determine his place in his surroundings. So, the concept of tragedy should be changed according to the requirements of time and age. Thus, a modern tragedy is a tragedy of a layman because a modern man is a layman. So, modern tragedy is a tragedy of everyman.

Arthur Miller stands head and shoulders above the modern American dramatists. He keenly observes the conflict between the aims and objectives of an individual and his social surroundings, and beautifully presents these conflicts in his plays. In this play he presents the image of a "guilt-ridden man"

.John Proctor is a common countryman, a farmer by profession. He is respected for his uprightness and fear for his sharp dealing with hypocrites. The writer says that in his presence "A fool felt his foolishness instantly". But Proctor also holds guilt on his name. He has been sexually involved with a girl, Abigail. Proctor is deeply repentant on his sin of adultery and on betraying his wife, Elizabeth. He cannot came out of this guilt till the end and feels that his salvation is not possible and that he cannot climb up the altar steps with the dignity of righteous people. Consider his statement to Elizabeth:

"Let them that never lie, die now to keep their souls. It is a pretence for me, a vanity that will not blind God nor keep my children out of the wind".

But he reaches a dignified position through proper decision in the end. Thus the attention of the playwright is on the moral choice of Proctor. Though he is a sinner, yet he is a man of good conscience.

It is also to be noted that in Miller's plays, the catastrophe rises from some sexual sin. In fact, he wants to enhance the importance of family life, if the rules of marriage are not abided by the downfall in sure to come in one or the other way. Miller says:

"I cannot live apart from society".

He thinks that moral honesty cannot be separated from a commitment to the society. Though a man and the environment do not merely interact, yet they are the part of each other "a fish is in water and the water is in fish". Miller implies this dictum to every human being and proves it through his protagonist that every person has to live in harmony with his surroundings.

Proctor has been presented as a rebel of society. He leads a life of isolation –partly because of his shame and partly of his stubborn manner and this isolation and inactivity becomes his flaw. At first, Proctor denies the importance of society stays away from the trails of witch hunt and even during his trail takes selfish decision to save his life. But later, he has to accept that he is nothing without his surroundings. He realizes what he owes to his neighbours. He knows that his acceptance of being a witch would greatly demoralize the people and they would not fight against this brutal act.

“I blacken all of them when this (my confession) is nailed to the church the very day they hang for silence”.

Miller presents self-discovery of his protagonist within all the action of the play. The self-quest of Proctor begins when Elizabeth repeatedly pleads him to judge him. He has lost faith in his goodness and needs some outer action to invoke him to a certain decision. But Elizabeth pushes him to take his decision and then he asks for divine help and cries out:

“God in Heaven! What is John Proctor?”

And soon he gets the answer. In the final moments of his life, he realizes that he has not yet lost tall of his virtue, for at least he knows his responsibility towards his neighbours. He utters:

“I do think I see shred of goodness in John Proctor”.

On a broader level, “The Crucible”, is also a social tragedy. Miller describes now innocent people are mercilessly convicted and murdered only to save an ideology. By the time of the settings of the play, Puritan’s church and government is losing control over individuals. This is because of the corruption of priests, presented by Parris in the play. The weirdly vanity and hellish sermons of such priests take people away from the church. So church has an ever increasing fear of losing authority over the masses of people and this fear actually becomes the root cause of such wide spread blood-shed. Thus Puritan church and government make desperate attempt to hold the people in their grip by using a quotation of Bible which says:

“Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live”.

However, this attempt proves futile but deadly, which rather than shifting the minds of people towards the Puritan church causes their death and destruction.

Miller’s play is taken on an allegorical level, for though today subjects have changed so far but the subject matter is ever the same. The individual is bound to society in the same way, as John Proctor is in the play, while the authorities are as furious and anxious to hold their power as the Puritan church and government in Salem.

The Character and Role of John Proctor

In a sense, The Crucible has the structure of a classical tragedy, with John Proctor as the play’s tragic hero. Honest, upright, and blunt-spoken, Proctor is a good man, but one with a secret, fatal flaw. His lust for Abigail Williams led to their affair (which occurs before the play begins), and created Abigail’s jealousy of his wife, Elizabeth, which sets the entire witch hysteria in motion.

Once the trials begin, Proctor realizes that he can stop Abigail’s rampage through Salem but only if he confesses to his adultery. Such an admission would ruin his good name, and Proctor is, above all, a proud man who places great emphasis on his reputation. He eventually makes an attempt, through Mary warren's testimony, to name Abigail as a fraud without revealing the crucial information. When this attempt fails, he finally bursts out with a confession, calling Abigail a “whore” and proclaiming his guilt publicly.

Only then does he realize that it is too late, that matters have gone too far, and that not even the truth can break the powerful frenzy that he has allowed Abigail to whip up. Proctor's confession succeeds only in leading to his arrest and conviction as a witch, and though he lambastes the court and its proceedings, he is also aware of his terrible role in allowing this fervour to grow unchecked.

Proctor redeems himself and provides a final denunciation of the witch trials in his final act. Offered the opportunity to make a public confession of his guilt and live, he almost succumbs, even signing a written confession. His immense pride and fear of public opinion compelled him to withhold his adultery from the court, but by the end of the play he is more concerned with his personal integrity than his public reputation. He still wants to save his name, but for personal and religious, rather than public, reasons. Proctor’s refusal to provide a false confession is a true religious and personal stand. Such a confession would dishonour his fellow prisoners, who are brave enough to die as testimony to the truth. Perhaps more relevantly, a false admission would also dishonour him, staining not just his public reputation, but also his soul.

By refusing to give up his personal integrity Proctor implicitly proclaims his conviction that such integrity will bring him to heaven. He goes to the gallows redeemed for his earlier sins. As Elizabeth says to end the play, responding to Hale's plea that she convince Proctor to publicly confess: “He have his goodness now. God forbid I take it from him!”

John Proctor is the central character and the protagonist of the play. He, as a character reflects Miller’s mastery in portraying his characters. Miller gives very delicate touches in digging the subtleties of Proctor’s relationship with his wife, Elizabeth, and Abigail. Miller also shows very skilfully Proctor’s attitude towards Puritans, Witchcraft, Parris, Hale and court and towards his friends in the end when he was going to be punished for being a witch. Miller also highlights the conflict and the moral choice, which Proctor had to face at the cost of his life. Although, Proctor is the central figure yet he has not been idealized as a hero. He is a blunt, stubborn countryman, though not excessively sensitive yet capable of being tender, especially towards woman. According to John Mahoney:

“The attention of the playwright is on Proctor’s moral choice”.

Miller, himself, says in his introduction of the play that he wants to draw the image of "a guilt ridden man" who has a sense of guilt that he has betrayed his wife, Elizabeth by playing adultery with Abigail, who is a very cunning and fraudulent girl. And this shame holds him from taking positive action at the right moment and consequently suffers a great loss of his life.

Then Proctor is a practical farmer, struggling to win a living for his family but he still finds time to take a sensuous delight in his surroundings. He is a strong man, physically strong, cool tempered and not easily provoked. He emerges as a down-to-earth man who speaks his mind and is not afraid of confronting those in authority –the authority of society, priest and that of court. Only his guilt of all with Elizabeth makes him indecisive until very last.

John Proctor is also good independent minded Christian who is fed-up from dogmatic and the strict values of the church only in order to maintain their authority. He also does not care about his infrequent presence in church. He openly condemns Parris and his greedy and hellish sermons. It is Parris hellish preaching, which prompt John Proctor to stay away from church and explain his absence as follows:

"I have troubled enough, I come five mile to hear him preach only hellfire and bloody damnation … others stay away from church these days because you (Parris) hardly ever mention God anymore".

He is an honest man and sees himself as a sinner and unworthy to follow the martyrs like Rebecca and Giles.

Proctor never interferes with the affairs of others. Miller gives his social views that man can't isolate himself from the trials of community and the man, who refuses to be committed to some cause, will face tragic result. If a man is to be a part of society, he must function and participate in all the aspects of society.

Proctor tries to avoid any involvement in Salem witchcraft trails. He is afraid of the disclosure of his secrets of adultery with Abigail which was probably no more than a moment of passion prompted by the impetuosity and it also characterizes many of his other actions speeches.

John Proctor retains a very strict attitude towards witchcraft. He does not believe in it and takes it as an irrational act. He does not want to be involved in the court probe about witchcraft but in the end he has to do so. When he learns that Elizabeth has been accused, he says:

"Is the accuser always holy now? Where they born his morning as clean as God's fingers? I'll tell you what's walking Salem –vengeance is Salem. We are what we always were in Salem but now the little crazy children are jangling the keys of the kingdom, and comfort vengeance writes the law!"

But in the end, we see that Proctor is accused of being a witch because of his rebellion against the church and the court. He wants to prove the fraudulent behaviour of the girls but he is accused in return. He is sentenced to death if he does not confess to be a witch. As first, because of the pressure on him he becomes agree to confess and signs it but his innocence and soul does not let him to confess, therefore, he tears out the confessions. He says:

"Because it is my name! Because I cannot have another in my life! Because I am not worth the dust on the feet of them that hang! How may I live without my name? I have given you my soul; leave me my name".

He does not want to lose his true identity and to be called a witch. Therefore, he sacrifices his body and saves his soul.

Once he abandons the society at its own, but society does not let him maintain himself in the critical junctures of his life. He remains in critical and complex situation of hope and fear and life and death. He remains caught up in a web of moral dilemmas woven by society. He requires an enormous moral courage to make right choice, the choice, which makes all the difference, and we see that Proctor chooses for his soul. This is what Miller wants to tell us. He says:

"My central impulse for writing at all was not the social but the interior psychological question"

Theme of Relationship between Individual & Society

No person can completely steer clear of the trials and tribulations of his or her society. He who does may be vulnerable to serious allegations. If a man is to work well in his surroundings, he must partake in all aspects of his society or he is leaving himself open to unfavorable charges. In Arthur Miller's, The Crucible, John Proctor's lack of involvement in the Salem witch trials ultimately leads to his execution. John Proctor tries to avoid any involvement in the Salem witch trials. His reason for this attempt is motivated by his past fault of committing adultery with Abigail Williams.

The guilt connected with his lechery makes Proctor hesitant to speak openly because he would condemn himself as an adulterer. Basically, then, in the first act he attempts to isolate himself from the primary proceedings, saying to Reverend Hale:

"I've heard you to be a sensible man, Mr. Hale. I hope you'll leave some of it in Salem"

Proctor tries to wash his hands of the entire affair, than to instead deal with his own personal problems. His wife Elizabeth constantly badgers him about his adulterous affair and he retorts with "Let you look sometimes for the goodness in me, and judge me not". Rather than interfering in the witch trials he is still trying to defend himself in the dangerous love triangle. In Act I, Proctor attempts to retire to the private world of his farm and remain completely oblivious to the events arising in Salem. This refusal to become involved is brought to an end when his servant, Mary Warren, announces that she is an official of the court and that Elizabeth Proctor has been "somewhat mentioned" by the woman who with whom he had copulated. Proctor still wishes to dismiss the hearings, but his wife uses his guilt about infidelity to extract a covenant that he will expose Abigail as being an impostor. Proctor is being coerced by his wife to become involved, it is not his free and open decision. Indirect characterization can be surmised in the aforesaid situation that Elizabeth is very influential upon Proctor's character. Harold Bloom avers that this demonstrates that "Proctor's sense of guilt is central to any understanding of him as a dramatic character". Before Proctor is forced to take the next step, Reverend Hale arrives and then, Herrick with a warrant for Elizabeth's arrest. In anger over his wife's conviction and arrest, Proctor accuses Hale of being a "Pontius Pilate" and later tells him that he is a coward by saying:

"though you be ordained in God's own tears, you are a coward now!"

The significant self-laceration which John Proctor undergoes while struggling to make his choice is finally convincing because it is perfectly in character, Harold Bloom says: "Miller uses Proctor as a vehicle for the play's major moral questions". Proctor is weak, like most men, but he has the potential for greatness likewise common to all men. When John Proctor shouted: ''I am no saint". He asserted his human frailty and vulnerability. As the tragic hero of Miller's drama, Proctor faces his downfall due to his lack of commitment to humanity. Proctor feels guilty about his relationship with Abigail when he is visited by Hale and asked about his commitment to the church and his knowledge of the Ten Commandments. Proctor inadvertently forgets one commandment: "Thou shalt not commit adultery". Proctor accounts for his lack of attendance at church in Act 1 by proclaiming that he will not listen to the "hellfire and bloody damnation", preached by Parris. In Act 2 he states:

"I like it not that Mr. Parris should lay his hand upon my baby, I see no light of God in that man"

An act the town's people and the court view as a revolt against the supremacy of God. This quote also highlights Proctors' otherwise principled approval to his life, he is not prepared to do something just because it is expected by the rest of the community. Proctor's relationship with other characters highlight aspects of his personality. In Act 2 Giles Corey and Francis Nurse come to him for help following the arrest of Rebecca Nurse and Martha Corey. It is apparent from this that he is respected by them. Proctor's character is also highlighted through how he is seen by his wife. Elizabeth is cooking for him and it is clear that she is wanting to please him. This shows that Proctor is obviously making an effort to please and be loving towards Elizabeth, but she is finding it hard to forgive him for his behaviour. "Spare me! You forget nothin' and forgive nothin'. Learn charity woman. I have gone tiptoe in this house all seven month since she is gone. I have not moved from there to there without think to please you, and still an ever-lasting funeral marches round your heart".

It is important to Proctor how he is seen by other people in the community and for this reason he is reluctant to go to Salem's court early on, as he would have to admit to the affair with Abigail. He eventually acts correctly, in order to show his love for Elizabeth who risks condemnation from the court on evidence from Abigail. The outraged court officials summon Elizabeth Proctor to find out the truth about Proctor and Abigail. When asked about her husband, Elizabeth's soul is twisted, for reporting the truth could destroy her husband's reputation, but lying means breaking the solemn oath to God. As she is selfless, Elizabeth choose to lie and save her husband, but perhaps condemn herself to hell for such a sin. This scene indicates dramatic irony, for Proctor knows that which Elizabeth is not aware of, and this is that he has already "confessed it".

In Act 3, Proctor remains loyal to his friends whose wives have been accused. He is tempted to withdraw his charges against Abigail when he is told his wife is pregnant and in no immediate danger of being hung, but he goes ahead to support his friends. Despite Proctor's lack of integrity in his relationship with Abigail, Proctor is initially tempted to save his own life by confessing, but he eventually decides to die rather than lose his good name, Proctor's recognition is his discovery that he contains goodness. "for now I do think I see some shred of goodness in me" . Elizabeth supports him through her confidence that he is a "good" man. "he have his goodness now. God forbid I take it from him". John Proctor is not a perfect man, but his beliefs and values are in the right place. Proctor listens to his soul, a lesson the whole world should learn to follow. John Proctor is a "good" man.

The Crucible : Arthur Miller's Style

Arthur Miller had a reputation for being pedantic. He maintained, and his estate continues to maintain artistic control over his plays. Miller never ever let anyone else have more creative input than himself. He was a visually descriptive playwright both in his stage directions and settings. Miller's plays, including The Crucible include pages of detailed information addressing the concerns of both the actors and the audience.

In preparation for writing The Crucible, he studied pages and pages of court transcripts of the Salem witch hunts in order to develop ideas and to create an authentic dialect. He took small ideas from the testimonies given in the courts and fleshed them out into stories. In fact, the basis for John Proctor's and Abigail Williams' affair was based on the tension he discovered that the two of them shared throughout the actual court proceedings.

'This play is not history in the sense in which the word is used by the academic historian. Dramatic purposes have sometimes required many characters to be fused into one; the number of girls involved in the 'crying out' has been reduced; Abigail's age has been raised; while there were several judges of almost equal authority, I have symbolized them all in Hathorne and Danforth. However, I believe that the reader will discover here the essential nature of one of the strangest and most awful chapters in human history.

The fate of each character is exactly that of his historical model, and there is no one in the drama who did not play a similar-and in some cases exactly the same-role in history.

As for the characters of the persons, little is known about most of them except what may be surmised from a few letters, the trial record, certain broadsides written at the time, and references to their conduct in sources of varying reliability. They may therefore be taken as creations of my own, drawn to the best of my ability in conformity with their known behaviour, except as indicated in the commentary I have written for this text.'

Plays can be classified in two major varieties: plays of episodic action and plays of continuous action. Shakespeare's plays are episodic. No one scene is very long, and the action jumps from place to place, sometimes skipping over years in between. On the other hand, Greek tragedies like Oedipus Rex and some modern plays such as Eugene O'Neil's Long Day's Journey into Night, follow what are called the three unities: of time- the action usually takes place within a 24-hour period; of place- there is only one location,, and of action-there is no break in the action from beginning to end.

The Crucible falls somewhere in between. The time span is about three-and-a-half months; the action occurs in four different places, although it never leaves Salem; and there is a gap of at least a week between each act (between Acts III and IV almost three months elapse). But within each act the action is continuous from curtain to curtain.

One advantage of the continuous-action method is that it allows the author to build tension or suspense gradually. It also can be less confusing for an audience, because we don't have to stop and figure out where we are every few minutes. And, finally, it allows us to get to know the main characters very well, by letting us watch them for a long time at a stretch. This is especially important in The Crucible, where we come to understand what happened in Salem in 1692 through the experience of one man, John Proctor.

The Crucible was written in an historical style, marking a shift in Miller's preferred writing style from the "naturalistic dialogue of the American middle class" in his first three plays, to a formal, New-England-Puritan style. Miller "makes exemplary use of this new style, its biblical echoes, its metaphorical richness, and its ethical basis". The Crucible concerns the dilemma of "making moral choices in the face of community pressure and about the irrational basis of that pressure". The similarity between the Communist and Puritan witch-hunts allows Miller to formulate an explanation for their inception, along with the destructive effect that speculations can have on individuals when brought before an unsympathetic, judgmental and irrational public. The public's trepidation toward the subject matter of The Crucible was due to the play's remarkable similarity to the political pulse at the time, causing critics to give it "polite, lukewarm reviews", and closed after only a few months. Ironically, The Crucible was successful in an off-Broadway production five years later and was given ample praise by the same critics who previously rejected it. This performance ran over six hundred shows, establishing it as Miller's second most popular play.

Miller’s style is very simple. He uses simple sentences and sentence structure with a simple vocabulary. While using the simple style, Miller does not take away from the suspense in he plot. The dialogues of his characters are like actual speech. His words are used effectively and does not include anything not necessary to convey the idea. He makes the plot and idea interesting by foreshadowing future events.

In The Crucible, the characters do not speak in fragments, and some do occasionally string together phrases. Also, they do form their thoughts carefully before speaking. The sentences are simple and the structure does not vary too much.

In the first passage spoken by Reverend Parris, the speech is more formal that speeches spoken by other characters. This displays that Reverend Parris is more educated than the others. It has a somewhat fatherly, yet commanding tone.

The second passage spoken by Abigail is markedly different from the first passage. The sentences are less thought out and more fragmented. She repeats the phrase “I know you” several times. This shows less education but more deep emotion than the first passage. The tone for this line is moving, but when compiled with Abigail's character, becomes deceiving.

The third passage spoken by Elizabeth shows a clearly though out idea. It shows that while Elizabeth may not be as educated as someone like Parris, this is a subject that she has thought about a long time. This gives a tone of something like a bottom line or an ultimatum. While Elizabeth does not give a specific choice to Proctor, it is obvious that he must make a decision on what to do.

Miller does not rely too much on imagery. There are few cases of imagery in this play. One remarkably memorable one is the statement by Abigail about the way John Proctor “sweated like a stallion.” While this statement is also a simile, it provides an unforgettable image in the minds of the audience.

The most memorable case of simile is the line, “I know how you clutched my back behind your house and sweated like a stallion whenever I came near!” This statement compares Proctor with a stallion.

Miller rarely uses metaphors or personification in this work. His people generally referred to as people and items as items. Occasionally he alludes to some portion or person in the Bible, but rarely to anything else. For example, while John Proctor is speaking with Rebecca in prison, she alludes to the martyred apostles. Rebecca says, “Let you fear nothing! Another judgment waits us all.” This is an allusion to idea from the Bible that man is judged by God in heaven.

Miller has few cases of verbal irony. He uses it in act 3 while Elizabeth tell she court that Proctor did not sleep with Abigail she knows that he did.

All parts with the girls lying about witches and ghosts are cases of dramatic irony since, while the audience knows that the girls are lying, most of the characters do not. For example, in court, Abigail and the other girls pretend to be attacked by spirits and the people in court fear them to be in danger. However, the audience knows that they are faking it.

Miller's attitude towards witchcraft is satirical. The tone is serious, cynical, and formal. He achieves this tone by the terrible tragedy of the innocent people executed, and the mental struggles of John Proctor. Miller shows the irony and the unjustness of the witch trials, and thereby the irony and the unjustness of the McCarthy trials.

For Whom the Bell Tolls

ERNEST HEMINGWAY; 1899-1961

Ernest Hemingway was born in 1899 in a wealthy, conservative Chicago suburb. The second of six children, he showed an early talent in writing that he honed through work on his high school's literary magazine and student newspaper. Upon graduating from high school in 1917, Hemingway moved away from home and embarked on a professional writing career, starting as a reporter for the Kansas City Star.

In 1918, during the height of World War I, Hemingway volunteered to serve as an ambulance driver for the Red Cross, which sent him to Italy. Within just a few weeks of his arrival, Hemingway was injured by an exploding shell and was sent to a hospital in Milan. During his recovery, he became romantically involved with a nurse—an episode that he portrayed years later in his novel A Farewell to Arms (1929).

After the war, Hemingway worked as a newspaper correspondent in Paris, where he moved among a circle of expatriate artists and writers, including American writers F. Scott Fitzgerald and Gertrude Stein, Irish writer James Joyce, and Spanish painter Pablo Picasso. Stein, in particular, became Hemingway's mentor. Some critics have suggested that she provided the inspiration for the character Pilar in For Whom the Bell Tolls, who serves as a mother figure for the protagonist, Robert Jordan.

During his time as a correspondent, Hemingway traveled extensively in Spain and developed a strong interest in Spanish culture. He became especially interested in bullfighting, which he viewed as a uniquely Spanish experience that accustomed Spaniards to face death and thus enabled them to live fuller lives. Hemingway's interest in Spain led to literary masterpieces such as The Sun Also Rises (1926), a chronicle of a group of disaffected Americans in postwar France and Spain, and Death in the Afternoon (1932), a nonfiction work about bullfighting.

For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940) takes place during the Spanish Civil War, which ravaged the country throughout the late 1930s. Tensions in Spain began to rise as early as 1931, when a group of left-wing Republicans overthrew the country's monarchy in a bloodless coup. The new Republican government then proposed controversial religious reforms that angered right-wing Fascists, who had the support of the army and the Catholic Church.

After a strong Communist turnout in the 1936 popular elections, the Fascist army commander Generalísimo Francisco Franco initiated a coup in an attempt to overthrow the Republican government. Unexpectedly, the key cities of Madrid and Barcelona remained loyal to the Republic. This divide marked the beginning of the Spanish Civil War, a conflict between the right-wing Fascists (Nationalists) and the left-wing Republicans (Loyalists), a large number of whom were Communists. Violence exploded all over Spain, and both sides committed atrocities. Many western countries saw the Spanish Civil War as a symbolic struggle between fascism and democracy. Eventually, the superior military machine of the Fascist alliance prevailed, and the war ended in the spring of 1939.

